TO THE
Most Illustrious Prince
J A M E S
Duke of Yorke, &c.

S I R,

When this Chronicle of France thus confidently intrudes under Your Royal Highnesses Roof, it arrogates no other Pretence for so bold an Approach, but that they are Crowned Heads that make it ; And there it is, that these Royal Strangers, the Kings of France, may find the Hospitality of an English Court, and by gaining an Access to a Goodness and Greatness so equally Illustrious, obtain not only Your favourable Reception, but also Your Royal Protection. The History of their Reigns is a noble Subject, and the Compiler of it, so Judicious an Author, that if the Ingenious are believed, ~~he~~ may be Ranked amongst the most Eminent Historians. Were I Master of such a Pen, I might adventure to mention Your Royal Highnesses just Praise, a Theme too lofty for my groveling Quill, though perhaps it were but a needless Task, since the lowd Cannon has Proclaimed Your Valour sufficiently on the Sea, as Your Prudent Administration of the Government in Scotland hath evidenced Your Excellent Conduct at Land, while Your more familiar Vertues are attested by all that ever had the Honour to Reside within the Verge of the Court, or have been placed in the Sunshine of Your Favour, the smallest Ray whereof would satisfie my greatest Ambition: But having no Title to such a Blessing in the least, I may wish, but cannot hope ever to attain it. Wherefore I shall only beg Your Royal Highnesses Pardon for this Zealous Presumption, and descend to my own Place, contented to be owned at Your Feet,

The Epistle Dedicatory.

Your Royal Highnesses

Most humble and most

Devoted Servant,

John Bulteel.

TO

R E A D E R.

Courteous Reader,

You have in this Volume the History of the Kings of France traced up so high to the very Nonage of Empire, even to the obscurest Annals of Time; like the Head of Nile from the Mountains of the Moon: as far upwards; as even the faintest Light from Record, or almost Fable could lead: and from thence derived down through the whole Succession of their Kings, even to the end of the Reign of Henry IV. in the year 1610. a descent of LXII Crowned Heads.

This History upon Crossing the Narrow Seas, and Travelling into England, assumes the Habit of the Country it Visits; and comes drest a Britain.

But to satisfie the Reader to what Original Hand we owe this Excellent Labour'd Piece, the Author is the famous Mezeray of France, a Person living to this very day: and to manifest all his Qualities and Perfections that might render him to the World both a faithful and an accurate Historian; In the first place, he is a Gentleman of that Birth, and Fortunes, that he Writes not the Lives of Kings for his Bread from Kings, not like too many of those unhappy Chroniclers, whose humble Station under that servile Fate Dependence, makes them too often rather play the Panegyrists then the Historians, whilst Truth from such Discoverers is too often warpt into Soothing and Flattery.

Secondly, Though by Religion a Romanist, yet he values himself upon the honour of an Historian, not an Enthusiast; he consults not the Conclave when he Characters the King; nor Shadens or Brightens the Diadem in favour of the Miter, a fault too common in the World; but with that Indifference, yet Boldness withall, that's requisite to render the Truth naked; he Writes like a Gentleman, not a Bigot.

And thirdly, Not to offend in another as gross, or grosser fault then all these, an Error amongst too many Chronologers, viz. the Flattery of his Native Country; he Paints not beyond the Life, but

The Epistle to the Reader.

but makes Uprightness and Impartiality the Standards he moves by, and Writes the Annals of France, for the Reading of Christendom.

And for his Personal Knowledge, Learning, and Parts, he has the Universal Fame of all Men to be highly the best of all his Countrymen, that ever wrote on this Subject. With these Advantages and Accomplishments in so Renowned an Author, this Piece appears in England. For 'tis for these only Charms that the Translator of this Book could not see so much Excellence confined to its own Native Country and the bounds of Home, and forbear stepping out for its Interpreter, to make it visit the World abroad.

What Esteem it may find, time only will produce, but that it may want nothing to render it acceptable, the Translator has labour'd to do Justice to so deserving an Original, and has render'd it so English, as may obtain an Entertainment abroad answerable to its Reception at home. The success of which lies wholly in the Approbation of all ingenious Readers, in whose good Hands, I leave it to its own good Fortune.

Farewell.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE General History OF FRANCE.

THE Romans gave the Name of Gaul to that Extent of Lands, which lies between the Alps and the Pyreneans, the Mediterranean, the Ocean, and the Rhine: at present, excepting the Low-Countries, and some others, which for the most part, hold of the German Empire, It is named France, from the name of the French, who subdued it under their Power. Julius Caesar had compleated the Conquest of it about 48 years before the Birth of JESUS CHRIST; So that when the French had perfectly settled themselves, it had been almost Five Ages under the Laws of that Empire.

Now without reckoning those Countreys the Gauls had Conquered between the Alps, from those Mountains, to the little River of Rubicon * and which was named Gallia Cisalpina, in respect of the Romans: It was divided first by Augustus, into Four Parts, Gallia Narbonnensis, which they named Province, because they had subdued it first, and reduced it into a Province; Gallia Aquitania, Gallia Celtica, and Gallia Belgica: To these three last they gave the name of Gallia Comata; and when they said absolutely Gaul, they understood the Celtica. Then by succession of Time, and under divers Emperors, it was again divided into Seventeen Provinces, that is Five Viennensis, of which number was the Narbonnensis Prima & Secunda; Three Aquitani; Five Lugdunensis, if we comprehend the Sequani; Four Belgica, whereof Two were called Germanica, because some German People had inhabited there for a long time; and Two Belgica, properly so called.

Each of these Provinces had its Metropolis, viz. the Five Viennensis, Vienne, Narbone, Aix, Tarentaise, and Embrun; the Three Aquitains, Bourges, Bourdeaux, and Saussé; the Five Lyonnoises, Lyons, Rouen, Tours, Sens, and Besançon; the Two Germanicks, Ments and Colen; the Two Belgick, Treves and Rheims.

Under these Seventeen Metropolitans, there were above an hundred Cities and Towns that were the Chief of the rest, in which the Church did afterward place their Episcopal Sees: Under these Cities, there were yet a greater number of other

Years of our Lord.

other Towns, which they called Oppida; they reckoned Twelve hundred, which were Walled in when the Romans conquered Gaul; but they broke down the Enclosures of most of them, or let them run to ruine.)

As for the Government of these Seventeen Provinces, six of them were Consular, and Eleven were under Presidents, sent by the Emperor. Constantine the Great placed Counts in the Cities, and Dukes in some of the Frontier Towns; their Laws were according to the Roman Rights, only withal, as I believe, some Municipal Customs they had preserved. They were little vexed with the Soldiers, because the Legions, even to a great part of the Fourth Age, lived in good order, and besides, there were hardly any but in the Frontier Provinces: But the Countrey being Good and Rich, and the People extremely submissive, they were laden with all sorts of Exactions; so that their plenty begot their misery, and their Obedience aggravated their Oppression.

An. 330. When Constantine the Great divided the Office of Præfatus Prætorio into Four, Gaul had one, who had Three Vicars under him, one in Gaul it self, one in Spain, and one in Great Britain: the First that held this Office, was the Father of Saint Ambrose, bearing the same Name as his Son; This Præfatus ordinarily resided in the City of Treves; which for that reason was the Capital of Gaul, till having been four times Sacked by the Barbarians; the Emperor Honorius would needs transfer this Prerogative to the City of Arles, which was afterwards dismembered, and cut off from Vienne, and became the Eighteenth Metropolis.

From Augustus to Galienus, the Peace of these Provinces was not disturbed, but only by two Revolts; that of Sacronir and Florus, in the 23 year of JESUS CHRIST, and that of Civilis Tutor, and Classicus, much more dangerous in An. 70. After the death of the Emperor Decius, the Barbarians began to torment them by frequent IncurSIONS. The first hundred years there were none but the French and the Almans that made any on this side the Rhine; but afterwards the mischief increased by the Devastations, and horrible irruptions of the Vandals, the Alains, Burgundians, Sueves, Visigoths and Huns, which never ended, but by the ruine of the Western Empire.)

As to the Original of the French, the common opinion is, that they are naturally Germans, and that France is a Name, which in their Language, signifies Free, or as others say, Wild, and Untameable. Indeed the Authors of the Third and Fourth Age, by the Name of Germans, do almost ever understand or mean, the French. For the time wherein they first began to appear, it was exactly two years after the great Defeat of the Emperor Decius, in Mesia, which hapned in the year 254. by the Goths, and other People of Scythia; the Goths had not begun to make themselves known, till about Twelve years before, when they came out of their own Countrey, (which was the Scythia Europea, between Pontus Euxinus and the Tanais) to ravage the Provinces of the Empire: they were divided into Ostrogoths and Visigoths, which is to say, according to some, Eastern-Goths, and Western-Goths.

After that Defeat, all the Enclosures of the Roman Empire being broken down, and laid open on that side, a Torrent of all sorts of Barbarians rouled in upon them, of whom till then no mention had been made; For this reason therefore amongst others, and likewise because the French had much of the Manners and Customs of the Scythians, (as to use Bows and Arrows, exercising themselves in Hawking, and having many Dukes or Cans) one may conjecture that they are originally Scythians. But it is not possible, and it were to no purpose to tell certainly of what part, because the Scythians were all Vagabonds, and would now be in one place, and in a very short time after, would be removed two or three hundred Leagues from their former Habitation.

The first time therefore that mention is made of them is in An. 256. under the Empire of Galus and Volusian; when they passed the Rhine near Meniz, and that Aurelian, who was then but Tribune of a Legion, slew 700 of them in a encounter, and took 300 Prisoners, who were sold by Out-cry.)

After this first irruption, nigh 180 years passed before they conquered, or obtained, by request from the Romans, some Lands in Gaul, viz. in the Countreys of Colen, Tongres, * and some neighbouring Territory, which hapned about the year 416. There had some Bands of them lodged themselves in a Toxandria, in the days of Julian the Apostate, towards the year 358: but it is not known whether they were suffered to take root there.

During those two Ages, they continued their IncurSIONS with various success, always retiring into Germany with their Plunder; they possessed the most part of the Lands

* Countrey of Liege. a Kempen in Brabant.

Lands which lye between the Mein and the Rhine, the Wefer and the Ocean, sometimes more, sometimes less, extended according as they were stronger or weaker, and were pressed upon by other Nations, especially by the Almans, from towards the Mein, and the Saxons from the Sea-side.

These last coming from the Countrey, named at this present, Holstein, seized upon Frisia, and the Maritime Countreys on this side the Elbe: then as the French inhabited Gaul more and more, they in equal proportions got the most part of those Lands, which they had held beyond the Rhine.

The French Nation was divided into several People, the Frisi great and a little, Salii, Bructeri, Angriuari, Chamavi, Sicambri, and Catti; they had besides, as I believe, many more of their Alliance, and several also under their Dominion.

Oftentimes the Romans went to attaque them in their Woods, and in their Fens, and thought two or three times to have destroyed them, particularly Constantine the Great, but they always sprung up again.

They had several Chiefs, or Commanders, Kings, Princes, Dukes, or Generals, who had no absolute Authority, but in time of War.)

Sometimes they became stipendaries to the Romans, sometimes their Subjects, but as soon as times changed, and they found any opportunity to plunder, they held themselves no longer obliged by former Treaties. It is for this reason the Authors of those times accused them of Levity, of Leasing, and Treachery. But on the other hand it is confessed, that they were the most warlike of all the Barbarians, of great Humanity, Hospitality, and a People that had a great deal of Wit and Sense. Very often they had some that served the Empire, and others at the same time that made War against them. We find many of them in all those times that were raised to the Dignities of Consul, Patrician, Master of the Militia, Great Treasurer, and the like; inasmuch as they Governed in the Courts of many Emperours, as of the two Theodosius's, in that of Honorius, and in Valentinian's the III.

The last day of the year 406. the Alains, and the Vandals, bringing along with them the Burgundians, the Sueves, and divers other barbarous People, passed the Rhine, and made an irruption in Gaul, the most terrible that had been ever known.

Some conjecture it was at this time that they Massacred St. Ursula, and her Glorious Train, which have been called the Eleven thousand Virgins, though in the Tombs, said to belong to those Martyrs, were found the Bones of Men and Children; there are three or four different opinions on this Matter, but neither of them without such difficulties attending, as are not to be solved.

Those Barbarians having ravaged all Germania Prima, and Belgica Secunda, fell upon Aquitain. In the year 409. some numbers of the Vandals and Sueves marched from thence into Spain; Two years after the rest being affrighted upon the coming of Ataulphus, King of the Visigoths out of Italy, took the same course, and follow'd them. However, there were some Alains still remaining in Dauphine, and about the River Loire, who had Kings amongst them for above Threescore years; but in the end, they submitted to the Dominion of the Visigoths, and the Burgundians.

The Vandals and the Sueves possessed Galicia; the Silingi and Betica; and the Alani, part of Lusitania, of Provence, and Carthagenia: Sixteen years afterwards, the Vandals passed over into Africa; but in the mean while, Vallia, King of the Visigoths, who fought for the Romans, utterly rooted out the Silingi, and weakened the Alani so much, that being unable to subsist alone, they put themselves under Gunderic, King of the Vandals. The Suevi maintained themselves almost two Ages in Spain. In fine, their Kingdom was likewise extinguished by Leuvigildus, King of the Visigoths, in the year 588.

All these Barbarians were divided in several Parties, or Bands, and had each their Chief, running about and scouring the Countreys without intermission; so that at the same instant there were several of the same People in Places far distant from one another, and of contrary Interests.

An. 408. Stilicon, who was accused for bringing them in, is Massacred, by order of Honorius. Alaric, King of the Visigoths his good friend, to revenge his Death, besieged the City of Rome three times, and the last time he takes it by Treachery, the 20th day of August, in the year 410. About the end of the same year he dyes in Calabria, near Cosentia, while he was making himself ready to go into Africa. Ataulphus his Cousin succeeded him; and Married Placidia, Sister to the Emperor Honorius, whom he had taken in Rome.

An. 412. Ataulphus goes into Gallia Narbonensis, and takes Narbonna; he remained there but Three years. The Count and Patrician Constantius, who was since

They elected Sigeric in his stead, and served him after the same manner within Seven days. Vallia his Successor was recalled into Gaul by Constantius, who gave him Aquitania Secunda, with some Cities of the neighbouring Provinces, amongst others Thoulouse, where he fixed his Royal Seat, Ann. 419. But he dyed in a few Months afterwards, and Theodorick succeeded him. Under this King and under Evaric or Euric, the Visigoths made themselves Masters of all the Three Aquitani, and the Two Narbonnensis.

Church.

the year 400.

Hitherto very few of the French had received the Light of the Gospel, they yet Adored Trees, Fountains, Serpents, and Birds; but the Gauls were most of them Christians; unless it were such as dwelt in places less accessible, as the Mountainous, Woody, and Boggy Countreys; or in the Germanick or Belgick Territories, which were perpetually infested by the incursions of the Barbarians. The Faith had been Preached to them by some Disciples of the Apostles, and even from the Second Age, or Century, divers Churches established amongst the Gauls, at least in the Narbonnensis, and Lugdunensis Prima. Under the Emperour Decius, about the year 250. there were divers Holy Preachers sent from Rome, who planted other Churches in several parts; as Saturninus at Thoulouse, Garian at Tours, Denis at Paris, Austremonius at Clermont, and Martial at Limoges. The persecutions of the Heathen Emperours had sorely shaken them: Constantine re-assured them, afterwards the incursions of the Barbarians again destroys them, especially those in Germania, and Belgica, and the Arian Heresie much troubled those in Aquitania: Clovis restores them, and endowed them plentifully.

In the fourth Age, the Gallican Church produced a great number of Holy Bishops; above all, Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, an invincible Defender of the Holy Trinity; Maximin and Paulin de Treves, who maintained the same Cause, and at the same time with him, the Great St. Martin of Tours, parallel to the Apostles. Liboire du Mans, Severinus of Colen, Vistricius of Rouen, all four contemporaries, Servais de Tongres, elder by some years, and Exuperius de Thoulouse, who lived yet in 405.

About the middle of the same Age, many of those that had Devoted themselves to God, came from towards Italy, to inhabit in the Islands of Provence, and the Viennensis Mountains; as likewise a while afterwards, great numbers flocked out from Ireland, and took up their stations in the Forrests of the Lyannoises and the Belgicks. Their example, and a Zeal to that Holy Profession, drew many People, either to come into their Monasteries, or dwell in Solitude; but still under the Conduct of the Bishops, and the Discipline of the Canons. Of these there were principally four sorts; such as lived in Community, those were called Cenobites; such as having formerly lived so, retired into Solitude, aspiring to a greater perfection, these were the Hermits, or Anchorites; such as associated in small companies, of three or four in a knot, without any Superior, or any certain Rule; and such as wandred all about the Countrey, on pretence of visiting Holy Places, and finding out such Persons as were most advanced in Piety. There were some also that strictly confined themselves to a Cell, either within some City, or in the Desert, they were called Incluses, or Recluses; all lived by the labour of their Hands, and most of them gave what they got to the Poor; though in the greatest strictness, they were not obliged to renounce their Wealth; nor were they excluded from enjoying it, in case they returned again to the World: but such a return was indeed, looked upon as a kind of a desertion.

Councils being extream necessary to preserve the Purity of the Faith, and Ecclesiastical Discipline; there were several held in Gaul, Ann. 314. The Emperour Constantine caused one to be Assembled at Arles, where there were Deputies from all the Western Provinces, to determine the Disputes of the Donatists in Africk. There was one at Colen in 346. which condemned Euphratas the Bishop of that City, who denied the Divinity of Jesus Christ; One at Arles, in 353. One at Beziers in 356. One at Paris Ann. 362. All three for the business of the Arians; The two first were favourable to them against S. Athanasius; the Third condemned them. One at Valence, in the year 374. about Discipline. One at Bourdeaux in 385. to whom Priscillians Cause having been referr'd by the Emperor Gratian, that Heretick perceiving clearly he was going to be condemned, appealed to the Tyrant Maximus, but it was to his great misfortune. One at Treves the year following, where Bishop Itacus was accused for having contrary to the Spirit of the Church, prosecuted Priscillian and his Abettors to the death: his Party, or Cabal, caused his bloody bloody proceedings to be approved, which notwithstanding, were condemned by the most Conscientious Bishops. One at Turin, Ann. 397. Upon the desires of the Gallican Bishops, to compose the differences about Proculus de Marseille, and that of the Bishop of Arles and Vienne. Proculus pretended to Ordain Bishops in some of the Churches in Provence, which had been dismembred from his, or himself had instituted; they allowed him that Honour for himself only: the Bishops of Arles and Vienne disputed the Right of Metropolitan, it was divided between them by provision. This Cause having been transferred to the Holy Chair, and judged variously, by three or four several Popes, was determined by Symmachus, Ann. 513. who conformably to the Sentence of Leo, adjudged to Vienne, only the Bishopricks of Valence, Tarentaise, Geneva, and Grenoble, and all the rest to Arles.

Our Margent not allowing room enough to set down all the Popes without incumbrance, it was thought necessary to place them in the Page with the Kings, in the same Reigns wherein they sate in the Holy Chair. Though for those of this Fourth Age, it seems more fit to range them here to the time of Pharamond. Silvester I. therefore held the Chair from the 1 of February, Ann. 314. till the last of December, in the year 336. In the time of his Pope-ship, Constantine the Great was Converted to the Faith; and the Holy Nicean Council was Assembled, Ann. 324. Marcus Governed from the 16th of January following, to the 7th of October of the same year. Julius the I. from the 27th of the same Month, to the 13th of April, of the year 352. Liberius, from the 8th of May to the 3 of September, in the year 367. Damasus, from the 15th of that Month, to the 11th of December, Ann. 384. In 381. was the Council of Constantinople. Siricius was Pope from the 12th of January to the 24th of February, Ann. 398. Anastasius, from the 14th of March of the same year, till about the end of April, Ann. 402. Innocent I. from the 14th of May, to the 28th of July, in the year 417. And Zosimus, from the 18th of August, to the 26th of December, Ann. 418.

DURING the great Revolt of the Armorice, or Maritime People, (who were those of the coast of Flanders, Picardy, Normandy, and Bretagne) which hapned towards the end of the year 412, The French King being joyned with them, occupied that part of Germania Secunda, named Ripuarie, and the People Ripuarie, or Ribarols. The Romans by Treaty, or otherwise, left them the free Possession thereof; and it was a little after this that Pharamond began to Reign.

Emperour Honorius in his 18th. and Theodofius 11. in his 5th.

We find in the Historians of those times, that the French had had several Kings before him, I do not speak of those of the Monk Hunibaud, they being as Fabulous as the Author; But we find towards the year 288. Genebaud and Atec, who came to Treves to Demand a Peace of Maximian, An. 307. Ascaric and Rhadagaise, whom Constantine took in War, and whom he exposed to wild Beasts, as a punishment, for that having given their Faith to Constantine his Father, they had nevertheless taken up Arms again. In the year 374. one Mellobaudes, who being Grand Master of the Militia, and Count of the Palace to the Emperour Gratian, slew and vanquished Macrian King of the Almans, and did the Empire many other Services. About the year 378. one Richemer, who had the like Office under Gratian, as Mellobaudes. An. 382. One Priam, or Priarius, whom some will have to be the Father or Grandfather of Pharamond. In the year 397. Marcomir and Sunnon, Brothers, the first of which, Stilicon banished into Tuscany, and caused the other to be Mafacred by his own People, when he attempted to stir to Revenge the exile of his Brother. And An. 414, or 415. One Theodemer, Son of Richemer, who was Beheaded with his Mother Ascala, for having attempted against the Empire.

Nevertheless, common Opinion hath ever begun to reckon the Kings of France from Pharamond, whether because the preceding ones had never had any fixed abode in Gaul, or because he re-established the Royalty amongst the French. In effect, it seems the Romans had in some manner subjugated this Nation; and after the Treatment they had shewn to Marcomir, and Sunnon, and Theodemer, they would no longer suffer them to have any Kings.

He began to Reign, not in 424. which is the common opinion, but in the year 418. very remarkable for a great Eclipse of the Sun. It may be doubted, whether Pharamond be a proper Name, or whether it be only an Epithet, which signifies, that he was as it were, the Father, and the Stock of the French Nation: For Pharamond in the German Language, imports Mouth of Generations.

For the manner of the inauguration of the French Kings, the Lords, or Chief Heads having Elected them, or at least approving them, set them up on a great Shield or Target, and caused them to be carried into the Field, where the People were Assembled in Arms, who confirmed this choice with acclamations and applause. The same Ceremony was practised for Emperours and Gothic Kings.

The Scottish Historians begin the Kingdom of Scotland, An. 422. with King Fergus, from whom they derive the Succession of their Kings; though withal they will have us believe, that he only restored it, and that it was first begun or formed 330 years before the Nativity of JESUS CHRIST; from which time it lasted till the days of the Tyrant Maximus, who ruined it about the year 378.

The Vandals, who had passed out of Gaul into Spain, were from thence called into Africk by Count Boniface, Revolted against the Empress Placidia: They went over, to the number of 80000, only under the Conduct of their King Genferic, and within seven or eight years, drove the Romans totally from thence, and settled their own Kingdom there.

The Romans drive the French beyond the Rhine, and take away the Lands they had bestowed on them in Gaul, or at least a good part of it. It is not certain whether this hapned in the last year of the Reign of Pharamond, or the First of that of Clodion.

In this year they date the death of Pharamond, who by that account had Reigned Ten years. They know not his Acts, the place of his Burial, the Name of his Wife, nor of his Children, excepting Clodion, who succeeded him.

An antient Chronicle gives him the Glory of settling the Salique Law by Four antient Lords, and says they laboured in it for three Males or Affizes. It is called Salique, from the Name of the Salieus, the Noblest of the French People.

HE was Surnamed the Hairy, or Long Locks, because in my opinion, he first brought in a custom, that Kings, and those of their Blood should wear Long Hair, well Combed and Curled, not only on the top of their Heads, as all the Princes of this Nation had done before him, but likewise on the hinder part. The rest of the French had all their Hair cut round, a little beneath their Ears.

It is not known whether there were yet left them any Land in Gaul. It is certain that Clodion in the beginning of his Reign, Inhabited beyond the Rhine, and that he marched over it in the year 431. to make an irruption, but he was beaten, and driven back by Aetius.

He contained himself some years without undertaking any thing, making his Residence at the Castle of Disparg, on the other side of the Rhine: but being informed by his Spies, that there were no Garrisons in the Towns of Belgica Secunda, he went thither in great diligence with his People, and keeping his March private by the Forest Charbonniere, which is Haynault, made himself Master of Bavay and Cambray, and some other adjacent places.

The English Saxons subdued Great Britain: They had been called in by the natural Inhabitants, who being forsaken by the Romans, had set up Kings of their own Nation; and those Kings did not find themselves strong enough to oppose the Picts and the Scots, which were People inhabiting the Mountainous Countreys, now called Scotland. The English gave the name of England to their Conquest, and set up seven Principalities, or little Kingdoms, which in the end were United into one.

The Britains, or Inhabitants of Great Britain, being tormented with these Barbarians, got together in great numbers, and passed into Gallia Armorica: It was then the Romans, who suffered them to settle in the Countrey of Vennes, and Cornualles, and having in process of time, extended themselves to the Bishoprick of Treguier and Leon, and even to the Loire, and the Confines of Anjou; they gave the Name of Bretagne to that Province, which it retains to this day.

The Burgundians a People of Germany, or Scythia, (for there were of them both in the one and the other) after they had remained a long time on the borders of the Rhine in Germania Prima, obtained the Countrey adjoining to Geneva, of the Romans: and there multiplied so much in a short time, that they seized on the Province of Vienne, on that of the Sequani, and of the First Lyonnoise. They had received the Christian Faith in Ann. 430. by the Preaching of St. Sever, Bishop of Treves, but some years after they fell into the Arian Heresie.

There were then Five several Dominations in Gaul, the Romans, the French, the Visigoths the Burgundians, and the Bretons.

Clodion

Clodion pursuing his Conquests, during the extream confusion of the affairs of the Empire, received a great check by the valour of Aetius, in the Countrey of Artois, near to Vicus Helena, perhaps it is Lens. Nevertheless Aetius having too much to do elsewhere, did not wholly destroy him; so that recovering Breath, he made himself Master of Artois, and enlarged his Dominion as far as the Soame, having taken the City of Amiens, which was his Royal Seat, and of Meroveus also.

Towards 444.

He likewise sent, saith a Modern Author, his eldest Son to besiege the City of Soissons, where that Prince having lost his Life, the Father was so touched that he died for Grief, after he had Reigned Twenty years. It was about the end of the year 447. having before constituted Meroveus Tutor to his Sons.

447.

It is certain he left two; and I find they were named Clodeband, and Clodomir. Some of the Moderns give him Three, whom they call Renaud, Auberou, and Ragnacaire; and from Auberou they make Ansbert the Senator to be descended, and from Male to Male, Pepin First King of the Second Race. But for Ansbert; others have proved, that he was issued of the Family of Tonnance Ferreole, Prefect of the Gauls. Pretorian.

ACCORDING to most Authors, who were nearest to these times, he was not Son to Clodion, but only of his Kindred. It is said, that his Mother bathing her self on the Sea-side, a Sea-Bull came out of the Water, and made her Pregnant with this Prince. This Fable seems to be grounded upon the Name, because Mer-veich signifies a Sea-Calf.

Now whether he were only Tutor to Clodion's Children, or otherwise, the French Elected him for their King or General Commander. This was in the City of Ambiens.

The Children of Clodion having been deprived of the paternal Succession, their Mother carried them beyond the Rhine: where it seems they disputed amongst themselves, about that part of their Succession; but in time that came likewise to Meroveus, we know not how.

After Attila, King of the Huns, who caused himself to be named the Scourge of G O D, had pillaged all the Provinces of the Empire in the East, and had killed his Brother Bleda, to invade his Kingdom: he would likewise needs plunder those of the West; He crossed the Pannonias and Germany, entred into Gaul with 500000 Combatants, under pretence of going to attack the Visigoths, in Aquitain; and after he had sacked and burnt Metz, Triers, Tongres, Arras, and all those Cities that lay in his March, he passed along by Paris, and came and besieged Orleans: The Town had already capitulated, and part of his Forces were entred, when Actius General of the Romans, Meroveus King of the French, and Theodoric King of the Visigoths, having joyned their Armies together, charged them unawares, and drove them thence, paving all the Streets with their slain.

A little while afterwards they gave him Battle, in Campis Catalaunicis, which is interpreted the Plain of Chaulons in Champagne; but some imagine with probability, that it was in Campis Secalaunicis, in Soulogne near Orleans. Attila lost nigh 200000 Men. Theodoric King of the Visigoths was killed in the Fight, and the next day his Son Theodismond elected King by the Visigoths.

Notwithstanding this infinite loss, Attila had still Men enough left to Retreat to his own Countrey, Actius having discharged the Visigoths and the French, lest he should be obliged to pursue and make an end of them. The youngest of Clodion's Sons had cast himself into the Arms of that Prince who adopted him for his Son, and the other under the protection of Attila: what their Fortune was we know know not; but for Attila, upon his return from another irruption he made into Italy about the year 452. he died in his own Countrey while he was in Bed with a new Spouse.

This year 452. is commonly reckoned to be the time of the wonderful birth, or beginning of the City of Venice, in the Adriatick Gulph. It is held that the terror of Attila's Forces, after he had taken Aquila, making all the people of those Countreys flee from thence, some numbers of them got into the Island Rialto, and other Islands adjacent, who fixed their Habitation there, which was the first foundation of that noble State.

The Emperor Valentinian caused Actius to be Massacred, who alone upheld the Empire, shaken and assaulted on all hands. The following year he is slain himself, by the friends of that great Captain, and upon the solicitation of Petronius Maximus, whose Wife he had violated. Maximus seizes on the Empire, and Eudoxia his Widdow, whom he Married. The pleasure of his Revenge, and his Reign, lasted but three Months: The People stoned him to death, as soon as Genferic, King of the Vandals, whom Eudoxa had called over from Africa to revenge her, was come to the Gates of Rome. But that Barbarian sacked the City, and took the Empress, who was carried into Captivity with her two Daughters, being at the same time both revenged and punished.

From thence followed the utter destruction of the Western Empire, there being no one Head left powerful enough to repair, or indeed prop the ruins of that vast Building: but only divers petit Commanders, who were but the sport of the Barbarians, and who consumed the small Forces they had, by pushing at one another.

So that Meroveus, and afterwards Childeric his Son, had the proper time to extend their limits. Meroveus took on the one hand all the Germania Prima, or territory of Mentz; and on the other the Belgica Secunda, which is named Picardy, a good part of the Second Lyonnoise, named Normandy, and almost all the Isle of France.

He Reigned almost 11 years, and dyed Anno 458. we know nothing either of his Age, nor of his Wife, nor his Children, but only that Childeric his Successor was his Son.

458. THis Prince, being yet Young, much addicted to his Pleasures, and having a Kingdom too peaceable, gave himself the liberty to debauch his Subjects Wives and Daughters.

459. Or
460. The French who were not accustomed to such infamous dealings, degraded him from his Throne, either by Sedition only, or by some kind of judicial proceedings, and in his stead, Elected Aegidius or Gillon, Master of the Roman Militia, who was a stranger, but in high reputation for Wisdom and Probity. Childeric knowing after this, that they sought his Life also, retired himself into Turingia to King Basin, but left a faithful friend in France, named Guyemans, who promised to work his Restauration, by turning the Hearts of the French against Gillon.

460. Guyemans being very subtil, gained much upon the Good Will and Confidence of Gillon, and encouraged him to charge them with Taxes or Imposts; and when they made a great noise about it, he counsel'd him to strike off the most stirring Heads, who were the same that had degraded Childeric: then do they come secretly to make complaints to Guyemans, who persuades them to recall their natural King: and when he observes them disposed so to do, gives him notice of it, and for a token sends him the half of a Gold Crown broken in two, of which the King kept the other half. The French go as far as Bar to meet him, and re-establish him in his Royalty with formal Solemnity.

468. After his return, he made use of the heat of his Subjects against Gillon, he pushed at him vigorously, forced him to abandon Coleu, took Treves by Assault, and burnt it, Conquer'd the Countrey now called Lorraine; and afterwards crossing Champagne, which then remained firm to the Romans, he made himself Master of Beauvais, Paris, and of many other Towns upon the Oise and the Seine; the People giving themselves up to the French, rather out of choice than by compulsion, to free themselves from the horrible Tailles, and cruel Concussions of the Roman Magistrates, who had put them into so great dispair, that they sought their own relief in the ruine of the State.

A little after, Childeric came from Turingia, Queen Basina charmed with his Virtues, forsook her Husband to come to him; he took her to Wife, and within the year had a Son by her, who was named Clovis.

Gillon, as it should seem, had called in some Auxiliaries of the Saxons, Commanded by their King Odoacer, which he employed to defend the Cities above the Loire, as well against the Visigoths as the French. When he was dead, viz. in the year 464. the Count Pol took the Command, and Odoacer on his side, would secure the City of Angiers, and fortified the Islands in the Loire to preserve his booty: but Childeric vanquished the Count Pol near Orleans, and after he had possess'd himself of that City, pursued him to Angiers, where he forced his way in, and laid him dead on the Pavement. This done, he dislodged the Saxons from their Islands; and after an agreement with them, he set them at work to drive away the Germans, who at that same time had made an irruption into Gaul.

Anno

Anno 476. Of the Christian Era, and the 1229. from the foundation of Rome, the Roman Empire ended in the West, there having been in the last Twenty years Nine or Ten Abortives of Emperours, of which Romulus, whom they called Augustulus, was the last. He was a young Child of about Ten or Twelve years old, to whom the Patrician Orestes his Father, had given the Title of Emperour to Govern in his Name: Odoacer, King of the Heruli having slain Orestes, locked up this Child in a Castle, and gave beginning to the First Kingdom in Italy.

Divers years before Gondiochus, King of the Burgundians was dead, and his Four Sons Gondebaud, Godegefile, Chilperic, and Gondemar, had shared his Kingdom amongst them. Now Anno 477. Gondebaud the eldest, and the most knowing of all, had Leagued himself with the Second, to dispossess the two others; at first he was defeated; and kept himself hid for a time: then when they thought him dead, he comes forth on a suddain and surrounds them in Vienne: Gondemar was burned in a Tower, where he was defending himself: Chilperic fell into the Victors hands, who caused him to be Mangled with his two Sons, and his Wife thrown into the River with a Stone tied to her Neck, but spared the Lives of his two Daughters. They were called Sedeucube, and Clotilda, both of them were of the Orthodox Faith, though their Father and Uncle were Arrians. The First consecrated her self to God, the other Gondebaud kept, and had her bred up in his own House.

King Childeric, upon his return from an Expedition against the Almains, is assaulted by a Fever, and dyes, aged at least 45 years, of which he had Reigned 22 or 23. He left Four Children, one Son whom they named Clouis; and three Daughters, Andefleda, who espoused Theodorick, King of the Orstogoths, Albofleda and Lantilda. These two received Baptism with their Brother Albofleda, being Converted from Paganism, and Lantilda from the Arrian Heresie; These were not Married.

It is conjectured, that he held his Royal Seat at Tournay, because in our times, in the year 1654. digging under some Houses, there was a Tomb discovered, and amongst other singular Curiosities was found a Ring, whereon his Effigies and his Name are Engraved.

Clovis

Clovis, or Louis, so to be understood in rough the whole History.

Clovis, King V.

Aged Fifteen years.

POPE S,

FELIX III. The 8th of March, S. Twelve years.

GELASIUS I. in March 492. S. Four years nine Months.

ANASTASIUS II. the 28th. Novemb. 496. S. Two years.
SYMMACHUS the 20th. Novemb. 496. S. Fifteen years, Eight Months, whereof Three years in the following Reign.

* Clodovic, Ludwin, or Louis, all the same Name.

Clovis, or Louis, (for 'tis the same Name) handsome, well shap'd, and personally brave, was not so soon at age to Command, but he undertakes a War against Siagrius, Son of that Gillon, who had been set up in the place of his Father Childeric; he Fights him, and Defeats him near to Soissons; the unfortunate Man flies to Aleric, King of the Visigoths for refuge: but Clovis by Threats, forces him to send him back; and when he hath him in his hands, he puts him to death, having first secured all his Towns to himself, which were Soissons, Rheims, Provence, Sens, Troye, Auxerre, and some others; and thus there remained nothing in the hands of the Romans amongst the Gauls.

It was a Law amongst the French, that all the Plunder should be brought in common, and shared amongst the Soldiers; there had been taken a precious Vase or Vessel in a Church by his People, he desired as a favour, they would set it apart to restore it to the Bishop, who had besought him for it; an insolent Soldier opposed it, and gave it a blow with an Ax, saying he would have his share: Clovis took no notice of it for the present, but a year afterwards, upon a general Review, he quarrell'd with him, because he did not keep his Arms in good Order, and cleft his Head with his Battle-Axe: a bold Undertaking, and which made him to be the more dreaded by the French.

From the year 489, Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths was entred into Italy; after various events, having overcome, and put to death Odoacer King of the Heruli, he settled a potent Monarchy there, Anno 494.

Clovis subdues a part of the Thuringians, and imposes a Tribute upon them.

His Victories and his Conquests increase his Renown, and his Dominion, and lift him above other Princes; his Power must have been great, since Gondebaud King of the Burgundians was either his Vassal, or his Officer, perhaps Grand Master of his Militia.

Towards the end of the year 491, he Married Clotilda, Daughter of King Childeric, and Neece to that Gondebaud, who consented not to that Match but out of fear; Aurelian a French Lord was the Mediator, and had the County of Melun for a recompence.

The Almains one of the most puissant people of Germany, who then inhabited Swabia, part of Retia on this side the Rhine, Switzerland, and perhaps the Countrey of Alsatia, to Strasbourg, were entred in hostile manner upon the Lands of Sigebert, King of Colen, or of the Ribarols: Clovis his Kinsman went to his assistance, and gave them Battle near Tolbiae; it is guessed to be Zulg, within Ten Leagues of Colen. In the midst of the Engagement, his Men gave ground, and ran into disorder: the greatness of the danger made him then think of Praying to the God of his Wife, and to make a Vow, that if he delivered him from that peril, he would be Baptized. Immediately the Scene of the day changed, his Men returned to to the Charge, the Enemies were put to flight, and left their King, and a multitude of their Army slain upon the place.

He hotly pursued his Victory, entred upon their Countrey, and without Mercy exterminated all that were on this side of the Rhine; the others saved themselves in Italy, under the protection of Theodoric King of the Ostrogoths. It is to be believed, that at the intreaty of this great Prince, who was his Brother-in-law, he suffered such as desired it, to return to their own Dwellings; but he perfectly subdued them, gave them some Counts, and a Duke to Govern them, and shared their Lands amongst his Captains. After this check they had no more Kings, and were but inconsiderable, till the time of the Emperour Frederick the II. under whom, in my opinion, they gave the Name to all Germany.

As he returned from this Expedition, his Wife took care to send some Holy Men to him, to exhort him to keep his Word, and to instruct him in the Orthodox Faith. St. Vaast, who was as then but a Priest, and dwelt at Verdun, Catechized him by the way. St. Remy, Arch-Bishop of Rheims, powerful in Works and Eloquence; confirmed him mightily in the belief of Christianity.

Having therefore brought the most part of his Captains to have a good opinion of this Conversion, he received Holy Baptism, with great Ceremony in the Church of Rheims, on Christmas day, Anno 496. The Bishops plunged him in the Consecrated Lavatory: Three thousand of his French Subjects followed his example; and this regenerated Flock with their Leader, wore the White Robe eight days together, according to the Ceremony then practised in the Church.

It is said, that Heaven in favour of his Conversion, Honoured him and the Kings of France, his Successors, with many miraculous and singular Favours; That the Saint Ampoule, i. e. Holy Oyl, was conveyed at his Baptism by a Celestial Dove; That the Shield Semé with Flower-de-Luces, and the Standard Royal de l'Oriflamme, were by an Angel, deposited in the hands of a good Hermit, living in the solitudes of Joyenval, near St. Germans en Laye; That he had the Gift of Healing the Evil, and made proof of it upon Lanices his Favourite. But God made him a more extraordinary and more excellent Present than all those, when he bestowed upon him the Heavenly Knowledge of the Orthodox Faith, there being amongst all the Princes upon Earth, none but himself that did not live either in Error or Idolatry.

This Conversion did him no little Service towards keeping the Gauls, who were all Christians, in Obedience, and to allure others who were Subjects to the Gothick and the Burgundian Princes, whose Government was odious to them, because they would compel them to follow the Opinion of Arrius.

The zeal of Christianity did not allay his Warlike heats, Gondefigilus having promised, if he would assist him in suppressing his Brother Gondebaud, to share the spoil with him; he set with his Army upon the Burgundians Countrey; Gondefigilus pretending he was mightily scared, sent to pray his Brother to come to his assistance; Gondebaud failed not, but when it came to the Battle, which was fought on the borders of the River L'Ouche, near Dijon, Gondefigilus went over to the French, and began to Assault him: Gondebaud finding it was a thing designed betwixt them, fled to Avignon, Clovis pursues, and besieges him there. The Sage Aredius, Principal Counsellor to Gondebaud, cunningly contrives to do his Master Service upon this occasion; the Siege spinning out to some length, he pretends to desert him, and renders himself to Clovis, with whom he manages Affairs, so wisely, as that King agrees to a Composition, and Gondebaud becomes his Tributary.

When Clovis was out of that Countrey, and perhaps employ'd in other business, Gondebaud scorning to pay him the Tribute, assembles his Forces together, and besieges Gondefigilus in Vienne. One Fontenier, whom they had thrust out amongst the useless People, discovered to him the mouth of an Aqueduc, by which way he sent in some Men, who surprized the City; his Brother having sheltered himself in a Church belonging to the Arrians, was there slain, together with a Bishop of the same Belief. Thus Gondebaud remained sole King of all Burgundy.

It is my opinion, during these years that the French, as Procopius tells us, not having been able to subdue the Armorice, betwixt the Seine and the Loire, did incorporate with them by a mutual Confederacy, which of two made them but one People. The Roman Garrisons not being strong enough, either to Retreat or to Defend themselves, restored their Towns to them, but did not quit the Countrey, where they for a long time afterwards retained their Laws, their Discipline, and Habits.

500.

Towards 504 or 505.

The Citizens of Verdun being Revolted, it is not said for what reason, Clovis being ready to force them, the Prayers of Euspace, Arch-Deacon of that City, a Man of a very Holy Life, allayed his Wrath, and obtained their Pardon.

I cannot tell precisely in what year hapned that which Procopius relates, how Clovis and Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, having made an agreement together to conquer Burgundy, and divide it, upon condition, that if either of the two Armies did not meet at a certain time appointed, they should pay a certain Sum to the other: the Visigoths made no great haste, but left the French to bear all the brunt; then coming when the hottest work was over, and the Countrey subdued, took their share of the Conquest, paying the Sum as had been stipulated.

Neither the one nor the other held those Countreys long, but restored them entire to Gondebaud; who afterwards made a strict Alliance with Clovis against the Visigoths.

There is great likelihood that it was in these peaceable days that Clovis laboured to reform the Salique Law, which having been made by the French, when Pagans might contain many things, contrary to the manners and Laws of Christianity. This Law was only for the French in his own Kingdom, for those of Colen had another which we find to this day by the name of the Law of the Ripnarians, conformable, notwithstanding in many particulars to the Salique Law.

Two Kings powerful and young, as were Clovis and Alaric, could not be long Neighbours and good Friends. Divers petty differences set them at variance, by the secret practices of the Bishops of Aquitain, who being troubled they should obey Alaric an Arrian Prince, pushed on Clovis to a Rupture. The Two Kings had an Interview, and discoursed each other in the Island D'Or, nigh Amboise, * between the City of Tours, which belonged to the Visigoths, and that of Orleanse, appertaining to the French. This Meeting salved up their quarrel for a time, and Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, Father-in-law to Alaric, and Brother-in-law to Clovis, undertook to make them agree; but as great a Politician as he was, he could not restrain the Ardour of Clovis. This Conquerour knowing the Visigoths were softened, or effeminated by a long Peace, and having made sure of Gondebaud, by a League contracted betwixt them, resolved to Attaque Alaric, under the specious pretence of Religion; the French followed him with great cheerfulness, those of Aquitain invited him, Heaven conducted him by visible Signs and Miracles: Immediately the City of Tours surrenders to him; Alaric, who was getting his Forces together at Poitiers, lets him pass along to Vienne, then imprudently resolves to give him Battle; it was in the Plains of Vouglay, Ten miles from Poitiers. Clovis having exhorted his Soldiers, Armed them with the Sign of the Cross, and for the Word, gave them the Name of the Lord. Alaric's Army was defeated, and he slain in the Fight by Clovis's his own hand.

The vanquisher divided his Army in two Bodies, with the one his Son Thierry makes himself Master of Albigeois, of Rouergne, of Quercy, and of Anvergne; and himself with the other, of Poitou, of Saintonge, all Bourdelois, and Burdetux it self, where he passed the Winter; then in the Spring, of Thoulouse, wherein was the Treasure of the Visigoths: At his return he took the City of Angoulesme, the Walls whereof fell down before him; in fine, of all the Three Aquitains, the Catholicks casting themselves into his Arms, to be freed from the yoke of the Arrians.

At the same time Gondebaud, pursuant to the Treaty made with Clovis, Conquered the two Narbonnoises, and the City of Narbona, from whence he drove Gesulic, so was called the Bastard Son of Alaric, who had seized on the Kingdom of the Visigoths, because Almaric, the Legitimate Son, born of the Daughter of Theodoric, was yet in his infancy.

The Fame of Clovis's his Valour, spread even to the East; The Emperour Anastasi, thereby to engage him the closer to the Empire, sent him Consular (Honorary) Letters, and the Imperial Ornaments, viz. The Purple Robe, the Mantle, and the Diadem. Clovis having put them on in St. Martins Church, Mounted on Horseback in the Portall, and bestowed a Largeſs on the People; after that day he was ever Treated with the Title of Consul, and August, which were not altogether useless to him, towards the bringing the Gauls to better Obedience, by those Titles, for which they had still some reverence.

Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, jealous of his success, takes in hand the Defence of his Grand-Son, and sends a great Army on this side the Mountains, made up of Goths, and of Gepids, and Commanded in Chief by the Count Ibba. The French held then the City of Carcaſſonne, besieged, and the Burgundians that of Arles;

Arles, the first quitted their Siege, and joyned the others at Arles, to hinder him from palling the Rhofne.

There hapned many Combats, and at last a bloody Battle; the Count gained it, having killed 30000 French and Burgundians, and afterwards wrested from them all they had conquer'd in Provence, and in Languedoc, excepting Thoulouse, and Uzes.

After this advantage, Theodoric remained King of the Visigoths; and having taken away the Crown and Life of Gesulac, joyned what they held in Gaul and in Spain to his Kingdom of Italy, till his Grandson * Amalaric should be come of age.

Clovis fretted at these losses, distemper'd with a long Fever, and having the Spirit of a Conqueror, that is to say, unjust, and Sanguinary, lays snares for the other petty Kings of the French, who were his Kindred, and rids himself of them by methods full of Cruelty and Treachery. He incited Chlodoric Son of Sigebert, King of Colen, to kill his Father, and caused him afterwards to be Massacred by his own Domestiques. He compelled Carric and his Son (we know not in what Countrey they Reigned) perhaps it was at Triers or Arras) to enter into Holy Orders; and being informed that the Son expressed some threatnings, he sent, and caused the Throats of both to be cut. He cleft in two the Heads of Ragnacaire, King of Cambray, and Riquier his Brother, with a Battle-axe, they being both delivered into his hands by their own Subjects, and his Satellites assassinated Rignomer, King of Mans, in his own City.

He dyes himself at Paris, the 26th of November, in the year 511. and is interred in the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, which he Built; and where St. Genewiefue had been buried the same year: his Reign was 30 years, and his Age 45. Some have made him parallel with Constantine the Great, and find great resemblance betwixt them both, for Good and Evil.

He had four Sons living, Thierry, Clodomir, Childebert, and Clotaire: the first by a Concubine, the other three by Clotilda, and by the same also a Daughter, named Clota, or Clotilda, who Sixteen years afterwards married Amalaric, King of the Visigoths in Spain.

Under his Reign the French wholly freed themselves from the Roman Empire, and became their Allies on equal terms; till then, as I believe, they had been stipendiaries, or tributary to them. That part of Gall which reaches from the Rhine to the Loire, was called France. The French measured those Lands, and took the third or fourth part, which they shared amongst themselves. There were but two sorts of People, or Conditions amongst them, the Free-men and the Slaves; all the Free-men bore Arms. Gall, which was almost a Desert, began to be re-peopled; and to rebuild their Towns. The Galls paid a Tribute to the French, but the natural French paid hardly any thing but their personal Service. These lived according to the Salique Law, the Galls Conformed to the Roman Institutions. These were called Romans, all the other Nations which flocked thither from beyond the limits of the Empire, were named Barbarians.

They were bred to the exercise of War, from their greenest years, of a good shape and stature, enured to Labour, strong, and so nimble, that they were upon the Enemy almost as soon as the Dart they had thrown against them. They had left off the use of Arrows, and employ'd in their stead for offensive weapons, the Sword, the Angon, which was a Dart of moderate length, having an Iron bearded Head, and cheeks of Iron, and the two-edged Axe, which they called Francisque. This might be darted as well as the Angon, but neerer at hand. For defensive Arms, unless it were their Commanders, they had only the Buckler, which they managed very dextrously to shelter, and Tortoise-like, cover themselves when they went to make a Charge or an Assault. Their whole Armies were Infantry; or if there were some few Horse, they served only to attend the General, and carry his Orders.

They retained a good part of the establishment, made by the Romans, as the manner of raising Imposts, but much lesser, of providing Magazines for the subsistence of their Forces, of maintaining Horses and Carriages for Travellers on the great Roads, of publick Sports, Horse-racing, and combats of wild Beasts; and their Kings believed themselves as absolute as Emperours, created Dukes, Counts, and great Masters of their Militia, nay, even Patricians, and perhaps the Mayers of the Palace held the Office of Præfetti Prætorii.

In the Fifth and Sixth age, the Gallican Church received few into the Church for Bishops but Saints, or such as they made so. They were for the most part, the greatest Lords of the Countrey, who to secure themselves from the suspicions and jealousies jealousies the Visigoths and French might have against them, cast themselves into the Church, as a safe Harbor or Asylum.

They reckon amongst the most Holy, Honorat d' Arles, being of the Monastery of the Isle of Lerins, which bears his Name to this day; Hilary his Successor, and Eucherius of Lyons, coming from the same place, German d' Auxerre and Loup de Troyes, Palladius, or Palais de Bourges, Brice de Tours, Agnan d' Orleans, Simplicius de Vienne, and Mamertus his Successor: This was he who instituted, or rather revived those Processions or Litanies we call Rogations, which all the Church hath received. All these did not survive the one half of this Age, unless Loup or Lupus, who lived a long while after.

In the Second, lived Apollinaris-Sidonius of Clermont, Aicimus Avitus, the Successor to Mamert, Eleutherius of Tournay, Remy de Reims, the true Apostle of the French, and Vaast of Arras; these three survived a long time after Clovis. We should not omit the illustrious Virgin Genevieve, who even in her life time was the Patroness of Paris, and remaineth so still; nor St. Maximin, or Mesmin, Abbot of Micy, near Orleans, which Place now bears his Name, and from whence came about Eighteen or Twenty good Friars, who spread themselves in several Countreys, where they are all at present prayed to as Saints; nor the good Hermit Severin, whom Clovis, being long sick of a Fever, caused to come from the Monastery d' Againe, that he might be healed by his Prayers; Nor that other, named Maixan, who had his little Cell in that part of Poitou, whereon there is built an Abby, and at length a Town of his Name.

Clovis resettled the Bishopricks in Belgica, bestowed great Possessions on the Church, and built many. The French who were Converted, imitated his Pious Examples. I do not know, whether before his Reign there were many Parish Churches in the Countrey, but since his time we find great numbers, and likewise many Oratories, in which the Sacraments were not administered.

We need not tell you that the Titles of Pope, of Father of the Church, of Beatitude, and of Beatissimus, of Holiness, of Sovereign-Priest, of Servant of the Servants of God, of Apostolique, were common to all the Bishops; nor that almost every one of them erected Monasteries in their Episcopal Cities. They often elected Widowers and Married Men, provided, they had been so but once, and to a Maiden. The Vote of the People passed in these things for a Call from God: they were bound to obey, and to live with their Wives as with their Sisters: if they had any Children, or Nephews that were Wise and Learned, they often succeeded them. Their Election was made by the Clergy of their Church, and by the People; the Confirmation by the comprovincial Bishops, principally by the Metropolitan, and never without him: They were to have regard only to Merit, oftentimes they considered his Birth: and even in those early days there were some wicked enough to make use of Bribes and Corruption.

Simony is the most antient or first, and will be the last of Heresies; In all Ages it hath stuck like Rust on the Church, the others did not make any great mischief in Gall during this age. That of Eutyches did not extend so far, but the Condemnation of him by the Council of Chalcedon was sent by Pope Leo I. who before had demanded the Suffrages of the Bishops, the more to authorize that celebrated Letter, which he wrote to the Council.

The Monk and Priest Leporitis hatched an Heresie, almost the same as that which Nestorius maintained since; but having been for that reason expelled from his Church at Marseilles, he retracted in Writing Anno 425. That of Pelagius, a Monk of Great Britain, who began to dogmatize towards the year 412. was first discovered by two of the Gallican Bishops, named Heros and Lazarus, who prosecuted his condemnation, first in Palestine, afterwards in Africa.

After St. Augustin had trampled that proud Heresie in the Dirt, which made the Salvation of Man depend upon his own strength; no body in France durst openly embrace it. But in Provence there were Priests and Monks who framed a middle Opinion, between that Error, and the Doctrine of this great Bishop: they were called Semipelagians.

As for Councils, they were often held by Order from the Emperours and Kings. Sometimes the desire of the Pope, the request of a Metropolitan, that of a single Bishop, or the least occasion caused them to assemble. It is not known in what place that was held which Anno 429. sent St. German, and St. Lupus into England, to op-pugne the Errors of the Pelagians; nor that which Anno 444. deposed Cbelidonius, Bishop of Besançon, because he had been married to a Widow, and had been assisting in judgment, of matters criminal; but it is well known, that the Council at Riez was held in 439. The first at Orange in 441. That of Vaison in 442. That of Angiers in 443. The second of Arles, towards the year 452. The third of the same place, Anno 455. That of Tours, 461. That of Vannay, 465. The fourth of Arles, 475. That of Agde, Anno 506. and that of Orleans, (the first that was celebrated under a French King) Anno 511.

All these Councils were composed only of the Bishops of the Province where they were held, excepting that of Agde, and that of Orleans; whereof the first comprehended the three Aquitanes, and the two Narbonnoises, as yet subject to Alaric, King of the Visigoths; and the other of the three Aquitanes, newly conquered by the French, and the second, third, and fourth Lyonoises; for the first belonged to the Kingdom of Burgundy.

At the third of Arles, that Error was condemned which they call the Predestinati; and there was another called at Lyon for the same purpose: but both by the pursuit of Faustus de Riez, who was a Semipelagian.

At the fourth of Arles, was Treated concerning the difference of Faustus, Abbot of Lerins, with the Bishop Theodorus, and there they made for the first time, a notable breach upon the Authority of the Bishops, in limiting their power over Monasteries; they had ever had it entire, even to that degree, that they had the power of placing Abbots, and to chuse them out of any of the Clergy.

In these Councils, several Canons were made for Ordinations, to prevent the encroachments the Bishops made upon one another, to preserve the Rights, the Privileges, and the Goods belonging to the Church. To regulate the Functions of the Clergy, hinder them from Pleading before Secular Judges, Repress Usury, and the liberty of running out of their Dioceses. To preserve the Chastity of Virgins, and Widows; touching Homicides, and false Witnesses; touching Penances, and the Penitents; touching the Holiness and Celibacy which the Priests and Deacons ought to observe. To the same end tended the Epistles of the Popes Innocent, Zozimus, Boniface, Celestin, Leons, Simplicius, Felix, Gelasius, Anastasius, Symmachus, which they generally directed to the Bishop of Arles, as their Vicar, to be sent to the other Gallican Bishops.

As there were no great Bishopricks in Gaul, the Gallican Church was much more submissive, and subjected to those Bishops of Rome, then the Eastern ones, or those of Africk, but yet much less then the Italians. There was often recourse had to them; upon the greatest occasions they were consulted withal, touching the usages and meaning of the Canons: and afterwards when they found that their Answers were held for Decisions, they Ordained what they thought good, even before they were consulted withal. They made themselves immediate Judges of all Disputes between Bishops, before the Cause had been brought to the Metropolitan, intermeddled in bounding their Territories and Jurisdictions, deposed those that were not well Ordained, or were Criminal, and compelled them to trudge to Rome to prosecute their business before them. The Power they had by the Primacy of their Sec, to cause the Canons to be duly observed, advanced them to this great Authority, but the Bishops took great care they should not be infringed, and themselves acknowledged they were obliged to walk by them.

Thierry, King of Metz, or of Austrasia, aged between 28 and 30 years. Clodomir, of Orleans, aged 16 or 17 years. Childebert of Paris, aged 13 or 14 years. Clotaire of Soissons, aged about 12 years.

511. These four Brothers divided the Kingdom betwixt them, and drew their shares by Lot; Thierry had all Austrasia, and the Countreys beyond the Rhine; the other Three had Neustria; they were all equally Kings, and without dependence upon one another: yet nevertheless all these parts together, made but up the body of one Kingdom. The Historians count their Succession by the Kings of Paris, because that City, hath since been the Capital of all France.

512. &c. Five or six years successively these Princes lived in quiet; the three Sons of Clotilda being yet young, and perhaps the two last under the Government of their Mother; it seems a little after the death of their Father, the Visigoths regained from them the Countrey of Rouergue, and some other Lands in the neighborhood of Languedoc.

France then began to be divided into Osterrich, or the Eastern part, called by corruption, Austria, and Austrasia; and into Westrich, or Western part, and by corruption, Neustria. Austrasia comprehended all that is between the Meuse and the Rhine; and even on this side the Meuse, Rheims, Chalons, Cambray, and Laon. Besides antient France, and all those people subdued beyond the Rhine, as the Bavarois, the Almains, and a part of the Turingians depended upon it. Neustria extended from this side the Meuse unto the Loire. Aquitain was not comprised under the name of France, nor Burgundy, not even after it was conquer'd, nor Bretagne, Armorick, at least the lower, because it was an independent Estate.

516. Gondebaud, King of Burgundy, dyed in the year 516. He had compiled, or written a Law, called by his Name, the Law Gombete, which was long in use amongst the Burgundians, as the Salique was amongst the French. He had two Sons, Sigismund and Gondemar: The first succeeded him in all his Dominions; and having been Converted many years before, by the Instructions of Avit, Bishop of Vienne, he abjured Arrianisme, at his first coming to the Crown, and brought all his People over with him to the Orthodox Faith.

518. towards 519.

A Danish Captain, named Cochiliac, exercising Piracy, had made a Descent on the Lands belonging to Thierry's Kingdom, near the mouth of the Rhine; when he would have gotten on Ship-board again with his Plunder, comes the Prince Theodebert, eldest Son of Thierry, who assaults him, kills him, and having stained both Land and Sea with the Blood of those Pirates, regained all what they had seized and stolen.

Sigismund

Sigismund had at his first Marriage espoused Ostrogotha, Daughter to King Theodorick of Italy, by whom he had a Son named Sigeric. After the death of that Queen, he took one of his Servants into his Bed, who having conceived a Step-mother's hatred against the young Prince, made him seem criminal in his Father's Eyes, by her frequent calumnies, who caused him to be strangled with a Napkin as he was sleeping: but immediately he was so struck with Remorse, that he retired himself for a time to weep for this crime, into the Monastery of d' Agaune, which he himself had built, or much enlarged, in Honour of St. Maurice and his Companions.

522.

The Divine Justice, as may be well believed, stirred up the French Kings to chastise him, though he had married his Daughter, Sister to Sigeric, with King Thierry; the other three Brothers forbore not to conspire his ruine, being incited thereto by their Mother Clotilda, who yet cherished in her bosom, the desire to revenge her Father's death. If at least we may suspect such a thing from so pious a Princess.

523.

In few days they made themselves Masters of a great part of Burgundy, either by the gaining of some Battle, or the defection even of the Burgundians. Sigismund fearing to be delivered up by his own Subjects, disguises himself like a Monk, and retires to the top of an inaccessible Mountain; he had not long been there, but some of those he thought his most faithful Servants, went and found him, and advised him to quit that place, as not safe, and betake himself to St. Maurice's Church, the most Sacred Asylum of all those Provinces; when he was come almost to the Gate of that Monastery, the Traitors delivered him into the hands of the French; Clodomir carries him away with his Wife and Children, and shuts them in a Castle not far from Orleans.

As for Gondemar, having saved himself by flight, he awhile afterwards, gathers up his Brothers Wrecks, and puts himself in possession of the Throne. Clodomir could not endure it, and Leagued himself with Thierry his elder Brother, to compleat his overthrow. Before he set forth, he was resolved to rid himself of Sigismund. St. Avey, Abbot of Micy, endeavoured in vain to prevent him by his Pious Arguments; adding, In the Name of God, the threats of a Reprisal on his Head and his Family: but he Treated him in Ridicule, and caused Sigismund to be cruelly Maltreated, with his Wife, and Children, and their Bodies to be thrown into a Well.

The prophetick threatnings of the Holy Abbot, soon had their effect. It was impossible but Thierry must in his Soul have a just Resentment for the death of Sigismund, his Father-in-law; so that when he beheld Clodomir far engaged in the medley (which was, in a Battle they fought against Gondemar near Autun) he forsook him, and suffer'd him to perish. The Burgundians knowing him by his long Royal Locks, cut off his Head, and fixed it on a Lance; but that spectacle, instead of terrifying the French, inflamed their Courage and Fury: they revenged his death by a horrible slaughter of the Burgundians, and conquer'd a part of that Kingdom, to wit, that which lay nearest the Kingdom of Orleans.

Clodomir was aged some Thirty years, he left three Sons, then but Children, Theobald, * Gontair, and Clodoaldo, whom Clotilda their Grand-mother took care to breed, hoping that when they came to be of age, their Uncles would restore their Father's Kingdom to them. Clotaire his younger Brother presently married his Widow, she was named Gondiocha; so little the Princes of this First Race had any consideration for their Blood, being as brutish in their Amours, as in their Revenge.

* Or Gontier.

524.

The Kingdom of Burgundy was not shared amongst these Brothers, till some years afterwards, and Thierry had no part of it.

Theoderic, King of the Ostrogoths, and Visigoths, the greatest Prince amongst the Barbarian Kings, had he not been an Arrian, being in the end become a persecutor of the Catholics, died at Rome the second of September; he left his Kingdoms to two Sons of his Daughters, that is to say, that of Spain, or the Visigoths to Amalaric, and that of Italy, or the Ostrogoths, to Athalaric, who was under the Tutelage of his Mother Amalasuinta: To this last he likewise gave Provence, which in those times comprehended the Second Narbonnois, part of the First Viennois, and all the Fifth; and to the other, the First Viennois, otherwise called Septimania, and which even at that time was also known to the French, under the Name of * Gothia, because it was poss'd by the Goths.

Emp. Justinian, Son of a Sister to Justin, Created by his Uncle, in April, R. 38 years, 7 Months, * Languedoc.

528. Amalaric re-established in his Kingdom, dreading the Power of the French Kings, desired their Sister Clotilda in Marriage.

The King of Turingia (perhaps it might be Basin) had had three Sons, Hermenfroy, Baderic, and Bertier. The First married Amalabergue, Daughter of Amalafrode, who was Sister to Theoderic, King of the Ostrogoths, and Widow of Trasimond, King of the Vandals, at the instigation of this wicked and ambitious Woman, not content with having taken away the Life, and part of the Kingdom from Bertier, he was besides, Leagued with Thierry, King of Metz, and by his assistance, had in the same manner, Treated his other Brother Baderic. This year 531. Thierry, angry that he gave him no part of this last Conquest, as he had promis'd him, made an agreement with his Brother Clotaire, to over-run Turingia. Hermenfroy meets them, and fights them; at the first they were in some little disorder, their Horses falling into pits, covered with Branches and Turfs; but having gotten out of the snares, they drove him as far as the brink of the Ousestrud, where there was so great slaughter, that the dead Carcasses made a Bridge over the River. He narrowly made his escape out of this danger, and with much ado shut himself up in a Fort.

531. The Kingdom of Turingia wholly Conquer'd and Extinguished, remained to Thierry, Clotaire satisfied himself with the Spoil and Captives, amongst whom was found the Prince Amalafroy, and the young Radeconda, Children of Bertier. He caused Radeconda to be carefully brought up, and Married her some years after; but by the Council of some wicked People, he caused Amalafroy to be slain, and Radeconda afterwards parted from him, and went and Founded the Monastery of the Holy-Cross at Poitiers, where she piously ended her days.

Mean while Thierry being returned to his Kingdom, allured Hermenfroy to his Court, having sworn he should be in all security; then barbarously falsifying his Faith, as they were one day walking together upon the Walls of Tolbiac, there came a fellow and thrust him down from top to bottom. Amalabergue, the cause of all these Tragedies, made her escape into Africk to her Mother.

531. The same year upon a false report blown abroad, that Thierry had been slain in the Wars of Turingia; Arcadius, one of the Senators of Auvergne, invited Childebert to seize upon the Town of Clermont, which belonged to Thierry's share. The People and Lords being well contented to be rid of the Government of the Austrasians, submitted easily to his; but after finding that Thierry returned victorious, he quitted Auvergne, and marched into Septimania, to make War upon Amalaric, King of the Visigoths.

531, and 532. His pretences for this War, were the Outrages that Arrian Prince used towards his Sister Clotilda, in hatred, for that she constantly persevered in the Catholick Religion. Amalaric lost the Battle not far from Narbonne, which was his Royal Seat; and when he thought to fly to his Ships, he was killed, either in that City, or in Barcellona, by the French, or by Theudis himself, who succeeded him. Clotaire nevertheless gained nothing but some plunder, and the honour of having revenged his Sister, who died on the way as he was bringing her back: For Septimania still remained in the hands of the Visigoths; but their Kings, naturally timorous, transferred their Royal Seat to Toledo, to be for the future at a more safe distance from such like irruptions.

534. Childebert and Clotaire being associated, go on to pursue Gondemar, take him prisoner in a Fight, lock him up in a Tower (where in all probability he ended his days) and invaded all that was left of his Country. Thus the First Kingdom of Burgundy was extinguished, after it had subsisted Four score and ten years, and became united to France; but it retained its Name, its Laws, and its particular Magistrates. Its Governours were ordinarily stiled Patricians.

534. The two Brothers desiring to share Burgundy between them, sent to the Queen Clotilda their Mother, that she should let them have the three Sons of Clodomir, to put them in possession of their Fathers Kingdom; Clotilda did the more easily believe it, because in effect, they had not yet divided it amongst themselves: but when they had these poor innocent Creatures in their hands, they most inhumanely massacred the two eldest; the Third, named Clodoald, or Cloud, was saved by his Fathers *Bravo's, and after he had lain some time concealed, he secured his Life by cutting off his Hair, and then confining himself in a Holy Sanctuary, or Retreat at the Borough of Nogent, near Paris, which keeps even to this day, his Relicks and Name.

Because

Because Thierry of Metz refused to accompany his two Brothers against Gondemar, the French Austrasians, angry that they should not have their share in the plunder of Burgundy, threatened they would own him no longer; In the First and Second Race they have often given themselves this liberty: He was forced, that he might appease them, to lead them into Auvergne, who were revolted from him, to give themselves up to Childebert, whence they brought away an innumerable multitude of Captives, and all that was portable.

A Lord named Munderic, reckoning himself of Blood-Royal, acted the part of King, and made the Mobile follow him as such. Thierry at his return from Auvergne, besieged him in the Castle de Virry, and seeing he could not gain it by force, he makes use of Perjury: Aregisa, one of his Captains engages his Faith that he should be well received; and when he was come out of the place, he gave a Signal that they should fall on him. Munderic perceiving it, prevents him, and kills him with a Dart; and afterwards taking his sword in hand, together with such as had follow'd him, he sold his Life at a dear rate.

The same year saw an end of the Kingdom of the Vandals, and Africk, with the Islands of Corfica and Sardinia, and the Baleares returned to the Empire, after they had been cut off from them 107 years. The Emperor Justinian, under pretence of taking in hand the Defence of King Hilderic, whose Kingdom Gilimer had usurped, sent the great Captain Belisarius thither, who made an end of that Conquest in less than Six Months, having happily overthrown those Arrian Barbarians in some Battles; taken Carthage, and received the Tyrant Gilimer upon Composition, who had sheltered himself in a Fortress.

The Visigoths during the Wars of Burgundy and Turingia, had taken divers places of Septimania. The Princes Gontier and Theodebert, who were Sons, the former of Clotaire, the latter of Thierry, had Orders from their Fathers to recover them. Gontier returned without doing any thing; Theodebert took some Castles in the Country of Beziers, but suffered himself to be taken also by the Beauty of the Artificious Deuteria, Lady of Cabriere, who received him into her Castle, and into her Bed.

From Septimania he carried the War to Provence, reckoning to have a better Market of the Ostrogoths. When he had sorely shaken it, and already received some Hostages from the City of Arles, he received news that his Father was very sick at Metz: he goes away in all diligence, and arrived there some few days before he died.

Thierry Reigned a little more then 23 years, and had lived about 55. He had no Son but Theodebert; but a Learned Historian gives him likewise a Daughter, named Theodechildus; he believes it to be her that was Married to Hermegisle, King of the Varni, of whom Procopius relates a memorable Adventure, and who being returned into France, amongst many pious Works, built the Monastery of St. Pierre le Vis, near Sens.

It is fit we observe that the * Bavaois, or Bojarians, were under his obedience, since in their Estates, or General Assembly at Chaalons, he put their Laws in Writing. They were originally of Germany; it is not certain of what Canton, but that they had the same Language as the Lombards. About the time of the death of Odoacer, King of Italy, they were come to possess that part of the * Norica which lies on the Banks of the Danube; and in time they also gained the Mediterranean part, and Rhetia Secunda, which was situate betwixt the Rivers L'Ocin and the Lec, so that they were bounded by Pannonia, Swevia, Italy, and the Danube. Perhaps Clovis subdued them at the same time he subdued the Almans, but they had always retained their Laws, and a Duke of their Nation, who was confirmed by the King of Austrasia, he was to be of the Race of the Agilolfingues, or Descendents of Agilolfse, who in all appearance brought them into that Country.

in Austrasia.

The Uncles of Theodebert were prepared to invade the Kingdom of his Father, his diligence broke their measures. After he had agreed with them by a Peace, which he bought, and that he in appearance had tied the knot of a strict amity with Childebert, who promised him the Succession, because he had no Children, he sent for Deuteria, and publicly Married her, despising Wisgard, the Daughter of Wis-con, King of the Lombards, whom he had betrothed in the life time of his Father Thierry.

534. In this year they place the Erektion into a Kingdom, True or Fabulous, of the Countrey of Yvetot in Normandy, which was done, say they, by King Clotaire, in satisfaction for his having with his own hand in the very Church, and on a * Holy Friday, killed one Gantier, who was Lord of the Mannor.

* Good Friday

Athalaric, King of Italy, dies in the age of Adolescence. Amalasuinta his Mother, espouses Theodad, Son of Amalafrede, Sister to King Theoderic, and sets him on the Throne: but shortly after the Ingrateful makes her away, upon a suspicion of Adultery.

The death of Amalasuinta caused the ruine of the Ostrogoths. Justinian, with whom she had always kept in amity, gave Command to Belisarius to revenge her death, and to recover Italy. At first Dalmatia, the Islands of Sicily and Sardinia, after that Abbruzzza and Lucania, the Campagna, or Terra del Lavor, surrenders to him without any resistance; and the City of Naples is surprized by a way thorough an Aqueduct. Theodad sends an Army under the Conduct of Vitiges his * Officer; but the Ostrogoths who had a hatred for him, elect this Vitiges; who to secure the Diadem for himself, puts Theodad to death, and marries Mattasuinta, Daughter of Amalasuinta.

* Great Master of his Horie.

536. When Theodad dyed, he was in Treaty with the French, and proffer'd them Provence, and Two thousand pound of Gold, if they would embrace his Defence. Vitiges being pressed by Belisarius, and finding himself not strong enough to resist the Imperialists and the French, put in execution what his Predecessor had projected, and deliver'd Provence, and the Money to the French. If we must believe Procopius; Justinian confirmed this Cession by his Letters Patents. It seems they divided it into two Provinces, that of Marseilles, and that of Arles.

537. Theodebert made no scruple to take off both Parties, that he might be the better enabled to ruine them both; He had caused Ten thousand Burgundians to slip into Italy, who having joyned with Oria, one of Vitiges Chiefs, had helped him to retake Milan.

539. When he believed both parties to be much weakned, he entred the Milanois with Two hundred thousand Men. The Roman Army, and that of the Ostrogoths were encamped one just over against the other neer Pavia; either of them thought he came to their assistance, and his design was to surprize them both. He therefore Assaults and Defeats the Ostrogoths, and then comes thundering upon the Romans, and cuts them all in pieces: But a Plague and Famine soon revenged them upon him for this perfidiousness. When he found his Men perished by thousands, he repass'd the Mountains with all speed, for fear lest Belisarius, who was in Tuscany, should come and attaque him.

539. Afterwards Vitiges being Besieged by Belisarius in Ravenna, omitted not to crave help of the French, who promis'd to come to his assistance with Five hundred thousand Men; but before they were arrived, he had compounded with Belisarius, and was gon to Constantinople, where of a King, he became an Officer to the Emperour. The Visigoths in his stead chose Theodobaldus Governour of Verona; and he being slain three years after, they substituted the famous Totila, who Took, and Sacked the City of Rome twice, in 547. and in 550.

540. The Queen Denteria became so furiously jealous of her own Daughter, because the King her Husband began to look on her, that she made her away in a cruel and ingenious manner, having caused untamed Bulls to be harnessed, to draw her Chariot, who precipitated her from off the Bridge at Verdun into the Meuse. The French, who during the Two first Races, and a good while in the Third, had a right to concern themselves, and to intermeddle about the Marriage of their Kings, offend-ed at so unnatural an act; and besides, touched with a just sence of pity for Wisgard, whom Theodebert had contracted seven years before, obliged the King to repudiate Denteria, and take Wisgarda. This lived but two years, and made room for a third Wife.

541. The following year Childebert's Uncle and he, fell unawares upon Clotaire; he had only time to retire with what people he could get together to the * Forrest d'Ar-lanne, (neer the Banks of the Seine, and to stop up the Avenues with great Trees, cut down and laid across. When they were ready to force him in this Post, the Heavens moved by the Prayers of the Queen Clotilda, excited a miraculous Tempest, which not hurting the Camp of Clotaire, and thundering upon theirs, did so astonish them, that they sent to him to desire a Peace; and his Amity.

* It is not well known what Forrest this was.

Theudis

Theudis Reigned then over the Visigoths; the French being ever their mortal enemies: Childebert and Clotaire palled the Pireneans, and ravaged all Arragon. The City of Saragossa being besieged, the Inhabitants bethought themselves of making a general Procession round their Walls in the habit of Penitents and Mourners, carrying, instead of a Banner, the Vest of St. Vincent, Martyr, their Patron. This extraordinary Spectacle amazed Childebert, and mollified him; insomuch as he accepted of some Presents made him by the Bishop, amongst which was the Robe of St. Vincent, which he brought to Paris, where he built a Church in Honour of that Martyr, and put that precious Relique there in Depositum.

543.

The Spanish Authors say, that upon their return, the French were beaten at their passage to the Mountains, by one of the Generals of the Visigoths, who was called Tedisile: If this be so, there is some likelihood that they made two Expeditions into Spain at different times, yet soon after one another.

It is now St. Germain des Prez.

In the year 548. Theudis, King of the Visigoths was killed in his Palace, and this Theudisile set upon his Throne; but within two years after he was Treated in the same manner, and Agila put in his place.

544. or 545.

Whilst the Imperialists and the Ostrogoths were engaged with each other, Theodebert, who was already master of Rhetia, of Vindelicia, and of Suevia, would needs take his advantage of that War, and by his Lieutenants (Hamingue was the Principal) made himself Master of the lesser Italy, that is to say, what they have since called Lombardy. After which, Justinians Forces having gained some advantage over his, That Emperour had the vanity to thrust in amongst his other Titles, that of Francia, which is to say, Conquerour of the French.

Theodebert not able to suffer it, would cross over Pannonia, and Mese, and bring all his Power into Thrace, to let him see the French were not vanquished. As he was preparing for this Expedition, a mournful accident took away his Life. Being one day a Hunting, (an exercise fatal to many Princes) a wild Bull pursued by his Hunt-men, whom he waited for with a Javelin in his hand, broke down a Branch, which hit him so rudely upon the Head, that a Fever seized him, whereof he dyed in the 14th of his Reign, and about the 43 of his Age. He had one Son and one Daughter, Theodowal, or Theodebaldus, and Bertaire; Theodebaldus born of Denteria, succeeded in his Estates; a Prince of a weak Mind and Body, who became impotent and benumbed from his Waste downwards. Bertaire kept her Virginity, and served the Church with great Devotion.

About the time of the death of Theodebert, hapned that also of Clotilda, who piously ended her days at Tours; She retired her self thither, to pray to God on the Sepulchre of St. Martin, where in those times were the greatest Devotions of the Gauls and French.

As Theodebert had been a Prince of vast Undertakings, he had mightily burthened his Subjects with Imposts, even the French. Partenius had been the chief Author and Minister; he was a terrible Glutton, as most of those Men or Cattle generally are, who took Aloes to digest his Meat, wherewith he cramm'd himself, and so emptied his Belly more Beast-like then he filled it. The French Men being stirred up to do Justice upon him, he besought two Bishops to convoy him to Tryers; he was in no more safety there then at Metz, the People seeking for him to murder him, and having haled him out of a Church Chest, where those Prelates had concealed him, affronted him by a thousand Outrages, and after tied him to a Post, where they stoned him to death.

THEODEBALDUS,
Aged 13 or 14 years, in Australia.

Ambassadors from Justinian solicited Theodebaldus to abandon the Defence of the Ostrogoths, and to make a League with the Empire; he refuses the one and the other, and nevertheless sends his to Constantinople, to Treat of some difference concerning the Cities he held in Italy. They had full satisfaction from Justinian, but could not prevail with him, whatever instances they urged, upon the requests of the Italian Bishops, to restore to their Sees, Pope Vigilius, and Datius, Bishop of Milan, whom he detained, and Treated very ill.

A Civil War being broke out amongst the Visigoths, between King Agila and Athanagildes, this last had recourse to the assistance of the Emperour Justinian, who failed not to make use of so good an occasion. The Patrician Liberius having conducted several Forces there on his behalf, seized on several Towns, and was going to regain all Spain, as Belisarius had Africk, if the Visigoths had not killed Agila, and Elected Athanagildes; which did not however prevent the Romans by the Alliances they made in the Countrey, and with the assistance they received from time to time, to maintain themselves there about 90 years, till the Reign of Suintila, who drove them quite out from thence.

Totila, King of the Ostrogoths, too proud of the Victories gained over the Romans, is Defeated, and slain in Battle by Narses the Eunuch, Lieutenant to the Emperour Justinian. Teia his Successor hath the same misfortune a short time after, and Narses brought under the Imperial Laws, the greatest portion of what that Nation possessed. Thus the Kingdom of the Ostrogoths was extinguished, in Italy, where it had subsisted but 58 years.

The remainder of the Ostrogoths having implored the assistance of the French, two Alman Lords, who were Brothers (they were called Leutarus and Bucelinus) by the permission rather than by Order of Theobaldus, descend into Italy with 75000 Combatants, partly Almans, and partly French, and ravage it both on the Right and Left, even to the further end of the Countrey.

The Army of Leutarus, which had pierced as far as Otranto, thinking to bring their Plunder to some safe place, was beaten near Fano, in the Province Emilia, * and from thence, being Retreated by very difficult ways into * Venetia, which then belonged to Theobaldus; when they thought to rest themselves in a little Town, the small and unwholsome Lodgings bred so furious a Contagion, that it destroyed them all, not one Soldier escaping.

That of Bucelin, who staid in the Countrey de Lavour, being already weakned very much with the like Plagues, was made an end of in a Battle which Narses gave them near Capoua, from whence only Five Men escaped. The year following the Duke Amingua, another General of Theobaldus, being joyned with the gleanings of the Ostrogoths, whom the Count Vidin had gathered up, had the same fate as Bucelin; there remained nothing to the French in Italy, but the passage of the Alpes.

After such bloody Losses, Theobaldus ended his languishing Life, being in the 20th of his Age, and the 7th of his Reigh. He had Married but one Wife, Valde-trade, or Valdrade, Daughter of Wacon King of the Lombards, by whom having no Children, his Succession returned to his Two Great Uncles. But Clotaire who was the strongest, because he had Five Sons, all bearing Arms, seizes upon it immediately, and on his Wife likewise, whom he Married. As touching the Kingdom, Childebert, who had none but Daughters, durst not then speak a word; but as for the Wife, the Bishops made him so many Remonstrances about that Incest, that he quitted her, and gave her in Marriage to Garibald, Duke of Bavaria.

The Saxons, who were Tributaries to the French, even from the time of Thierry of Metz, having heard of his death, took occasion to Revolt conjoynly with the Turingians. Clotaire straightway goes thither, and having beaten them near the Weser, plundered the Countreys both of the one and the other.

556.

The following year they revolt again, but when they saw him on the Frontiers, they sent Deputies to implore Mercy, and to submit to any Conditions. The French would give no Ear, but resolved to chastise them; and because he refused to lead them on, they tore down his Tent, and forced him to go in the Front; and indeed they were beaten with a horrible slaughter, and the King gladly proffer'd the Saxons that Peace which had been denied them.

His Brother Childebert, jealous of his prosperities, incited them a third time to take up Arms against him, and at the same instant, set his own Son Chramne to rebel against him. Clotaire had bestowed on him the Government of Aquitain, where he had behaved himself so tyrannically, that great Complaints were brought against him; his Father had therefore recalled him to Court, to give an account of his actions: he having refused to come, he sends his two other Sons, Charibert and Gontran into Aquitain, to compel him to Obedience; and in the mean time marches against against the Saxons, whom he brought under by several Defeats, and imposed a Tribute on them of 500 Oxen.

While he was in Saxony, a rumour was spread that he was slain; Childebert falls into Champagne, and ravages it; the two young Brothers being affrighted, retired into Burgundy; Chramne pursues them, and from thence comes to Paris, where he engages himself by an Oath to Childebert, never to reconcile himself to his Father.

Childebert returning from Champagne, was struck with a troublesome malady, which having made him languish for some time, ended not but in death. St. Germain, Bishop of Paris, buried him in the Church of St. Vincent, which he had Erected. Amongst his Virtues, he was eminent in his Charity towards the Poor, and his Zeal for Religion. The first made him part with all his Gold and Silver Plate, to bestow it in Charity; the other was signalized by the several Foundations for pious Uses, and by his care to propagate the Faith, and preserve its Purity. For he made an Edict to demolish all the Pagan Temples; and the Pope Pelagius being suspected guilty of the Errors, condemned by the Council of Chalcedon, he sent to him to know his Profession of the Faith, that he might take some course against that scandal.

His Wife Ultrogoth survived him a long time, and led a Holy Life, with two Daughters she had by him; they were named Chrotberge, and Chrotseinda; they never Married. Their Uncle Clotaire, whether in hatred to their Father, or for fear lest they should pretend to the Succession, detained them in prison with their Mother, till he had secured himself of the Kingdom.

This is the First Example of the Salique Law, in favour of the Males to the Crown. Clotaire succeeded, to the exclusion of his Nieces; and he was so happy, that having survived his three elder Brothers, he rejoined in his own person, the entire Succession of the Grand Clovis.

POPE,

JOHN III. 559. In March S. 14 years, Two only under this Reign.

560. THe Prince Chramne, destitute of the protection of Childebert, reconciled himself to his Father; but soon after he flies off again, and retires into Bretagne to Conobert, one of the Princes of that Countrey; for there were divers, and such as did not depend upon the French. His Father hotly pursues him, and fought him neer the Sea-side; History does not exactly mark out the place, but that the Bretons were defeated, Conobert killed in the Fray, and Chramne taken prisoner. The cruel Father orders his People to burn him, with his Wife and his Children, which they presently executed on the spot, putting Fire to a place filled with Straw, where they had locked them up.

560. So cruel an action caused in him a cruel Repentance, in vain he strove to appease that remorse by his Devotions, and great Donations to the Church. Coming back from a great Hunting in the Forrest of Cuise, a burning Fever seized on his Bowels, whereof he died at Compiègne. He was in the 61 year of his age, and about the end of the 49th of his Reign.

561. His four Sons conducted his Corps with great Pomp, the Priests Singing all the way to the City of Soissons, where they buried him, as he had ordained, in the Church, and before the Altar of * St. Mydard.

* Vulgarly,
St. Mydard.

He had four or five Wives, amongst the rest, he kept two Sisters together at one time, Ingonde and Haregonde, by the First he left three Sons, Cherebert, Gontran, Sigebert, who Reigned, and a Daughter named Clodofuinda, who Married Alboin, King of the Lombards. By Haregonde he had Chilperic, who Reigned likewise; and by Ghinsine, the unhappy Chramne. Many Authors, antient enough, give him a Daughter named Bliilda, and Marry her with the Senator Ansbart, whom they make paternal Grandfather to St. Arnold. Some modern Critiques have maintained, that the Chronology did not agree; but there is no appearance that so many Authors should, or could have invented such a Fable without any necessity, or ground to move them to it.

POPE,

JOHN III. S. Ten years under this Reign.

CHEREVERT, King of Paris, aged Twenty years.
GONTRAN of Orleans, and of Burgundy, aged 36 years.

SIGEBERT of Austrasia, aged
Twenty five or Thirty years.
CHILPERIC of Soissons, aged
Twenty, or Twenty five years.

THe Kingdom was for the Second time divided into Four, for his four Sons, which was the cause of infinite Civil Wars, Murthers, Treasons, Plunderings, and Calamities.

Before their shares were settled, Chilperic the youngest of them had seized upon all the Fathers Treasure, which was at Bresne, and afterwards that at Paris; but he was driven thence by the other three. This done, they drew Lots which gave the Kingdom of Paris to Cherebert, that of Orleans, and a good part of that of Burgundy to Gontran, (he resided at Chaalons) that of Austrasia to Sigebert, and that of Soissons to Chilperic.

Besides this, each of them had a share in Aquitain, as the four Sons of Clouis before had, and also in Provence; that so each of them, and altogether, might be obliged to maintain them with their joyned Forces.

The Austrasians had nominated for the Office of Mayre of the Palace, a Lord named Chrodin; he refused to accept of it, considering, that all the Grandees of the Countrey, being his Kindred, would have thought they might have taken the liberty of committing all sorts of violence on the People with impunity; and that he could not have the severity to punish them for it. He therefore advised them to make another choice, and they relying upon his probity, he recommended Gogon to them, who was of his Educating, and taking him by the Arms, he puts them round his Neck, in token that he owned him for his Superiour.

The Avars, a People of Hun, flying the Tyranny of the Turks, who were of the same Nation, had forsaken their Native Soil, and were come to the Service of the Emperour Justinian. After his death, being slighted by Justin, they sought their Fortunes elsewhere, and having penetrated into the heart of Germany, they ravaged Turingia, which belonged to Sigebert. This King not fearing these Barbarians, who were reckoned so terrible, attacked them neer the Banks of the Elbe, and having mated them in a great Battle, he sent them back again with shame to the Danube, from whence they were come.

Chilperic in the mean time falls upon his Territory, and ruined all the Countrey of Rheims. Sigebert being come back, repels him most vigorously, and took his Son Theodebert prisoner, with the City of Soissons. In this same year the quarrel ended in a Peace, followed with the liberty of the young Prince; but not a perfect reconciliation.

In 570. began the Kingdom of the Lombards in Italy, their King Alboinus being Crowned at Milan this year, after he had conquer'd all the Countrey from the Alps to Tuscany, excepting only the Exerchat of Ravenna, which yet remained in the Empire. The name of Lombards came either from their wearing of long Beards, or that they were armed with long * Bards; which was a kind of Axe. Their first Habitation was on the further Banks of the Elbe, whence coming forth, and having often changed their Dwellings, Four hundred years together, they in the end fixed themselves in Pannonia, in the days of the Emperour Justinian. From thence their King Alboinus, a very War-like Prince, and brought some Forces into Italy for the Romans Service, in the time of the Frunque haarfes. Now they had taken such delight in the Habitation of so rich and fruitful a Land, that that Great Captain being dead, they all went thither with their Wives and Children, in the year 568, under the Conduct of that King. He likewise carried thither Thirty thousand Saxons, who were willing to follow him, and the remainder of the Gepides, whose Kingdom he had extinguish'd in Pannonia.

570. The Neighborhood soon set them together by the Ears with the French, and begot a mortal Enmity between them. As they were huge covetous, and pulled up with their Victories, they were not satisfied with the spoils of Italy, but made frequent incursions into Rhetia and Provence. In that very year, some numbers of them, in a body, without a Head, were fallen into the Countrey of Valais, but instead of carrying away Plunder, they lost their Lives.

571. The year following, they marched much stronger into the Kingdom of Burgundy, and at the first, in a bloody Battle, defeated the Army which King Gontran had sent against them, and slew their General. This was Amat Patrician or Governour of the Province of Arles; but when they would needs come again the Third time, and had ransacked the Countreys about Ambrun, the Patrician Mummole, Succellor to Amat, inflamed, or surrounded them; and having stopped all the ways, by felling of huge Trees, charged these Robbers so smartly, that he destroyed almost the whole Army, or made them prisoners.

562. and the following. There was nothing more disorderly then the liberty which these Four Kings of France took in their Marriages. Gontran after he had choien a Servant for his Mistress, belonging to some Courtier, from whom he had forced her, espoused Marcetrude, Daughter of Magnachaire, whom he rejected in a short time afterwards, to take one that waited on her; she was called Austrigilda Bobilla. Chilperic had repudiated Queen Andovere, though he had three Sons by her, for the love of Fredegonda, one of the Women belonging to his Chamber. Cherebert put away Ingoberge, whom he had Married in the life time of Clotaire, and Married with Mereslede, Daughter to one that worked in Woollen; and then afterwards with her Sister Marcovefe, though she were under the Holy Veil, and likewise with Theodegildus, Daughter to a Shepherd.

King Sigebert on the contrary, desiring a lawful Marriage, and one well qualify'd, espoused Brunecild, or Bruneband, Daughter of Atanagildus, King of the Visigoths. Sometime afterwards Chilperic follow'd his example, and having for a short while quitted his Amours to Fredegonda, demanded likewise Gelasuinta, Sister to Brunecild. The Father consents to it, but not without a great deal of repugnance, and the obliging both himself, and the chief Lords his Subjects, to swear by many Oaths, that he should never take any other whilst she was living.

570. Cherebert being gone into Xaintonge, which was in his Lot, dyed in the Castle of Blaye on the Garonne, and was buried in the same place, within the Church of St. Roman. He was little less then Forty nine years, and had Reigned Nine. He had but three Daughters, Berte by Queen Ingoberge, and Bertselede, and Crodielde by some Mistress. These two last were Veiled; but very vain Nuns. Berte was Married to Ethelbert, King of Canterbury in England, and the most potent of all the English Kings. She was bestowed upon him, on condition she should have the free Exercise of the Christian Religion: and to this end she took a Bishop along with her. She was a very Beautiful, and yet a more virtuous Princess, who wrought upon the mind of her Husband to embrace Christianity, and who insinuated Civility, and Politeness amongst the English, who were very barbarous till then.

Chilperic

Chilperic, King IX.

GONTRAN in Neustria and Burgundy, at Chaalons. SIGEBERT in Austrasia, at Mets. CHILPERIC in Neustria, at Paris.

570. Cherebert's three Brothers immediately re-divided the Kingdom amongst them, and even the City of Paris, and put in this Condition, which they confirmed by Oath, upon the Relicks, or at the shrine of some Martyr, That neither of the Three should go in thither, without the consent of the other two, and he that should offer it, was to forfeit his share in that City, and in the Kingdom that was Cherebert's.

571. Chilperic, notwithstanding his solemn Oaths, soon joyned again with his Fredegonde; and that he might have liberty to Marry her, he caused Gelasuinta to be strangled in her Bed. His Brothers conceived a horror for this Crime, and made War upon him; Sigebert, more hotly then the other, being incited by his Wife Bruneband, to whom he was forced to give up for reparation of this Murther, the Countreys of Bourdelois, Ly-mosin, Quercy, Bearn, and Bigorre, which he had given to his Sister for a Marriage Portion, and which he had seized on afterwards.

The Avarois broke the Treaty, and made a Second irruption into Turingia; Sigebert presenting himself to give them Battle, upon the nick of the On-sett, instead of Weapons, they made use of Diabolical Enchantments, and caused hideous Fantaimes, or Spirits to appear, most dreadful to the French mens Sight; perhaps they had ugly Vizards on, or had blacked their Faces. Whatever it were, it dismayed them so much, that it put them to the rout, and drove them into a corner, where they hemmed them in on all sides. Sigebert could not get out from this extremity, but by the power of Money, and by furnishing them with Provisions, which they had great need of.)

572. Going from hence, he made War against Gontran, to get from him the City of Arles, and joyn it with those of Aix, Avignon, and Marseilles, which he held in Provence. Firmin Count d'Auvergne, and Andover, drawing near with some Forces, the Burghers easily surrendered to them, and then drove them out again with more ease. For as soon as Celse the Patrician of Arles, appeared on the behalf of Gontran, they perswaded them to go forth and Fight him, assuring them, that whether Victors or Vanquished, they would receive them again into the Town: but when Celse had repulsed them, and they desired to be let in, they kept the Gates fast shut against them. Thus their Men were all cut off or drowned in the Rhosne, and they made prisoners. Sigebert having missed his Design, agreed the more easily with Gontran.

574. Anno 574. Alboinus, King of the Lombards was poisoned by Rosamond his Second Wife, cruelly enraged, for that he had constrained her at a Feast, to drink out of the Skull of Cunimond, King of the Gepides, her Father. Clepbns having succeeded him; and a while after he being also assassinated by one of his own People, the Lombards would have no more Kings, and committed the Government to Thirty Dukes, each of them having a City. Three of the most potent, undertook to Conquer, upon the score of conveniency, that part of Gauri, which lies between the Alpes and the Rhosne, and entred upon it with three several Bodies of Soldiers. But the Patrician Mummole beat them in several Rencontres, and drove them out all three.

Upon the dividing the Kingdom of Cherebert, Touraine and Poitou fell to Sigebert, Chilperic burned with a desire to accommodate himself therewith, at what price soever. This unjust desire caused a cruel War, the desolation of many Provinces, and in fine, the death of Sigebert; King Gontran their Elder, endeavoured all he possibly could to prevent them, and when he could not, he sometimes went along with the strongest.

574. and the following.

After two or three Ruptures, and two or three Agreements, Chilperic, who would not let fall his design, allured Gontran to his Party, took up Arms again, and fell into Champagne; whilst on the other side, his Son Theodebert entred into Poitou. Sigebert hearing of it, took a positive Resolution to pursue him to the death. Having therefore drawn together all those fierce People from beyond the Rhine, he penetrated without opposition, even to the Banks of the Seine. At the same instant he sent Gontran-Boson, and Gondegilus to Poitou, to drive out Theodebert thence. That young Prince being forsaken by his Men, would nevertheless Fight, but he was Taken, Slain, and Stript by Order of Gontran-Boson, who afterwards being afraid of Chilperic's wrath, took Sanctuary in St. Martins at Tours.

With the lamentable news of the death of his Son, Chilperic received notice likewise of the agreement between Gontran and Sigebert. The same hour, overwhelmed with grief and astonishment, he went from Rouen, whither he had retired himself, and snut himself up, together with his Wife and Children in Tournay. Everything surrendered to Sigebert, Paris opened her Gates to him, and his Wife Bruneband animated by revenge, came presently thither with her Children to establish her Throne, and push forward her Husbands resentment against Chilperic. For this purpose he dispatches away a part of his Army which besieged him in Tournay; and he with the other Body encamped at Vitry, where he took the Oaths of the Neustrian Lords, who having abjured his Brother, acknowledged him for their King, and lifted him up on their * Target or Shield; or set him on the Throne.

* Pavois.

Nothing was left for Chilperic, but the determinate Courage of Fredegonde, this was enough to save him. She by her flattery and caresses, knew so well how to Enchant a couple of Citizens of Teroenne, Men robust and bruitish, that they coming to Sigebert, under pretence of entertaining him with some affair of great consequence, did stab him in his Tent, where they were soon cut in pieces by his Soldiers, as she wished.

Sigebert was very near the 44th year of his age, and about the end of the 14th of his Reign. He had a Son but four years and eight Months old, named Childebert, and two Daughters, Ingond and Clodovinde, the first was Married to Hermenigildus, the Son of Lenuigildus, King of the Visigoths; the Second betrothed only to Recaredus, elder Brother to Hermenigildus. His Body was interred in St. Mards at Soissons, near his Father, by whose Order he had finished that Church.

The death of Sigebert was followed with a suddain and general Revolution, the Austrasians raised the Siege of Tournay, and having joyned with those who were at Vitry, they retired in confusion: the Neustrians returned to the Obedience of Chilperic; and Bruneband found her self surrounded and cooped up in Paris, where she then was with her Children, and knew not how to get thence. But the wisdom of the Duke Gombaud, the greatest Lord of Austrasia, found out a way to save the Pupil Childebert, having let him down over the Walls in a Basket, and put him into the hands of a faithful Person, who himself carried him into the City of Metz.

Already some of the Austrasians had made their Composition with Chilperic, but the rest being assembled together in great numbers, according to their custom, set the young Prince upon the Royal Seat on New-years-day, and put him under the protection of Gontran; so that Chilperic lost his hopes of invading that Kingdom: but he seized upon that of Paris, and banished Bruneband to Rouen, and her two Daughters to Meaux.

He had sent Meroveus his eldest Son by Queen Andovere, to seize upon Poitou, which belonged to the Kingdom of Childebert. Meroveus, instead of putting this design in execution, went to Tours, and from thence to Rouen, where he suffered himself to be so much surprized with the charms of Bruneband, as then aged at least 28 years, that he Married her; Pretextat, Bishop of Rouen, God-father to the young Prince, making the Marriage. The Father hastens thither, and having by deceitful words drawn those so newly Wedded out of a Church, where they had taken shelter, he set a Guard upon Bruneband, and carried his Son away with him.

Mean

Mean time the Austrasian Lords, who were come to submit to him, returned again to Childebert: Godin amongst others, who to carry somewhat with him that might bid him welcom, armed the Champanois and made himself Master of Soissons, where he wanted but little of surprizing Fredegonda. Chilperic was quickly there, vanquishes him, and re-takes the Town: but Fredegonda believing that Godin had not undertaken so bold an enterprize without the participation of Meroveus and Bruneband, obliged her Husband to confine that young Prince, and a while after to force him to turn Priest, and send him to the Monastery of Aunisse, which is called now St. Calais, the name of its first Abbot.

The Austrasians demand their Queen Bruneband with so much earnestness, that he sent her to them; and yet he could not forbear to invade the Lands of Childebert. His Son Clovis took the Town of Saintes: but the Duke Didier going to besiege that of Limoges, met in his way the Patrician Mummole, whom Gontran sent to defend the Country belonging to his Pupil: the Fight was so obstinate that there were slain Thirty thousand on both sides, three parts of them were Didier's, who saved himself with much ado.

About the same time Meroveus escaped from the Monastery, and secured himself in the Church called St. Martins of Tours, prompted thereto by Gailen his most intimate Confident, who was come to visit him, and drawn by Gontran-Boson, who had sheltered himself in that place, as we have related. The Step-Mother Fredegonda favoured this Boson, for the same reason that Chilperic would put him to death, and maintained a private Commerce with him, that he might destroy Meroveus, as he had made his Brother Theodebert to perish.

The young Prince having notice that Fredegonda sought by all means to take away his life, did not find himself there in security: He goes out from thence accompanied with this Boson, whose treachery he knew not of, and would go to find out Bruneband, but the Austrasians refused to admit him: he remained then some time concealed, and a Vagabond in Champagne. After which, this Boson and Giles Bishop of Rheims, upon the pretence of delivering up the City of Teroenne to him, made him fall into their Ambuscades, surrounding and taking him Prisoner in a Village, of which they gave immediate notice to Chilperic: he went thither with all diligence, but found that his unfortunate Son was dead, he had been Poynarded by the order of Fredegonda, who made him believe, that apprehending he should be put to tortures, he had borrowed the helping hand of Gailen his favourite to dispatch him.

A while before the Bishop Pretextat his Godfather, was accused before the Bishops assembled in Council at Paris, where no proofs appearing strong enough against him touching what was alledged, he suffers himself to be induced by two false Brothers, upon an assurance the King would pardon him, to confess more than they could desire, for which he was banished to an Island near Constances: but with hopes of returning, because he pretended he had not been degraded, though they had placed Melanctius in his See.

Death having snatched away the two Sons which Gontran had by Austrigilda his second Wife, although he were not above the age of getting Children, not being above Fifty, he desired the Austrasians to bring his Nephew Childebert to him, and Adopted him, having placed him in his Royal Seat. These two Princes being thus allied, sent to Chilperic to demand their part of the Kingdom of Paris, and declared War against him: Chilperic did but scoff at them, diverting himself in building of Cirques (or places for publick Spectacles) at Paris and at Soissons, where he would have entertained the People with Chariot-races, could he have found Charioteers that had skill enough.

The Bretons about the year 441. had possessed themselves of Vannes; afterwards Clovis had taken that place again, and likewise the Cities of Nants and Rennes, at that time governed by Roman Captains. This year 578. Waroc or Guerec a Count of Bretagne had the boldness to seize again upon Vannes, which appertained to the Kingdom of Chilperic, and march up to the French who were encamped on the Banks of the River Vilain. They had some Companies of Saxons or Sesnes-Bessins in their Army; one night he passes the River and beat up their Quarter; but three days afterwards finding himself too weak for so potent an Enemy, he desires Peace, swore fealty to the King, and renders up the City of Vannes, upon condition he should remain Governor. A short while after he again seizes it, and so long as he lived put the French to a great deal of trouble.

Chilperic

* The 7th or 8th part of a Muid, and the Muid is a third part of a Tun.

Chilperic and his wicked Wife Fredegonda over-burthened the People with Imposts: they had taxed an Amphore of * Wine upon every half Acre of Vineyard, several other Charges upon things of another kind, and a Tribute upon the head of every Slave, and indeed a kind of Poll-money for every Freeman; insomuch that their Subjects ran away out of the Kingdom, as a place of Torment, and peopled that of Gontran and Childebert: wiser in so doing, than those of Limousin, who having opposed a Referendaire (or Lord Chancellor, so named in those times) who was going to settle the Taxes or Duties in that Country, and having burnt his Registers, left themselves exposed to the Sanguinary Avarice of an Intendant (or Judge) whom Chilperic sent thither to chastise their Sedition.

This year Sampson, eldest Son of Fredegonda died: the following year Chilperic was tormented with a long and continual Fever; as he was upon Recovery, two other Sons whom he had by that Woman, were afflicted with a Dysentery, which was rife all over France, and affected Children most generally. Fredegonda believed this Sickness of her Children was inflicted by Heaven, who thus avenged the sufferings of the oppressed People: she was stricken to the heart, and wrought so far upon her Husband by her arguments and intreaties, that he threw the Lists of all the Tax-gatherers into the Fire, and recalled those that were sent abroad to collect them.

But this forced Repentance did not save the life of her two Sons; as on the other hand these Afflictions laid upon her, only made her the more wicked: she was pierced with sorrow for the loss of all her Children, and with jealousy that there was one of her Husbands yet alive, begotten on Queen Audovere; his name was Clavis. This Prince seeing himself necessarily the Successor, let fall some words of Resentment and Threatning imprudently; By this she well foresaw what must become of her if he Reigned, and resolved to prevent it: she therefore accuses him to his Father for having poisoned her two Sons, and pre-possessed him so far with this Calumny, that he gave up his only Son to her Vengeance. The wicked Woman causes his Throat to be cut, and the Body to be cast into the River, and afterwards the unfortunate Audovere to be Strangled, though she wore the Sacred Vail, and her Daughter Rafina to be locked up in the Monastery of Portiers, after her Sattelites had deflowered her. A Fisherman having found the Body of the young Prince, and knowing it to be his by the long Hair, buried it under a Monument of Turf, from whence King Gontran afterwards transferr'd it to St. Vincent's Church in Paris.

Two years before Chilperic had sent Ambassadors to the Emperor Tiberius, to congratulate him, as I believe, upon his promotion to the Empire, and make up some kind of League with him against the Lombards. This year they brought him back all imaginable satisfaction and very rich Presents, amongst others were Medals of Gold a pound in weight.

The Kingdom of Austrasia and Childebert's Person being under the Government of Queen Brunebaud, the Lords of the Country despised the Commands of a Woman, and lived in excessive Licentiousness; Those that gave her the most trouble, were Ranchin, and Gontran-Boson, Orson, Bertefrey, and Giles Bishop of Rheims, who associated together and oppressed whom they pleased. Long Duke of Champagne, a faithful Servant to his Prince and Master, as Wise as Just, was insufferable to them because of his good qualities: they took up Arms to destroy him, and he got his Friends together to defend himself. The Queen had all the trouble imaginable to prevent their coming to blows, even to the enduring outrageous words from Orson: but after all she could not so well secure the Duke from their fury, but he was forced to quit the Kingdom, and take refuge with Gontran.

The most dangerous of these Factional Spirits was the Bishop of Rheims: as he was secretly engaged and wedded to Chilperic, of which he had given testimonies, having formerly treacherously delivered up the City of Rheims, and drawn Meryman into the fatal snare: he caused his Faction to act so powerfully, that the Austrasian Lords, to the prejudice of the Alliance their King had made with his Uncle Gontran, obliged him to make a League with Chilperic against him; The Lure was, That Chilperic having at that time no Son, promised the Succession to him.

This League being made, Childebert sent to demand the half of Marseilles of his Uncle, who very far from restoring it, made himself Master of the other, by the treachery of Dynamius Governor of Provence for Childebert. After this fear Dynamius goes over to Gontran, as in revenge the Patrician Mummole, pushed at by some intrigues of Court (ever fatal to great Commanders) forsakes Gontran to be of Childebert's side, and fortifies himself in the City of Avignon, which that King without doubt had put into his hands for his security, and that from thence he might make incursions in the Enemies Country.

The business of Marseilles caused an absolute Rupture betwixt the two Kings; Chilperic who desired this, presently falls upon Gontran's Countries, and the Duke Didier by his order invades Perigord and Aginois, without much opposition.

Another of his Dukes by name Bladast was not so fortunate against the Gascons; 581, or 82. For having undertaken to seek them out in their own Country to chastise them for the frequent Irruptions they made into the third Aquitaine, he was hemm'd in, and his Forces cut in pieces. The Gascons then inhabited upon the Confines of Cantabria, between the Countries of the Visigoths and the French, and by their Excursions made themselves formidable both to the one and the other, carrying away whatever they could meet withall, and afterwards sheltering themselves again on their Mountains.

There was only Chilperic that made open War upon Gontran: but the Patrician Mummole with the secret support of the Lords of Austrasia, was contriving a dangerous Design against him; There was a certain Person named Gondebaud who pretended to be the Son of King Clotaire, and he might well be so, considering the multitude of Wives that King had. This Gondebaud not having been able to get his pretended Brothers the Kings to acknowledge him, had retired himself to Constantinople, Tiberius the Emperor then living; It happened that Gontran-Boson made a Voyage into those parts, it is not mentioned upon what account, and he persuades this Man so much that the French wished for him, and that Gontran and Chilperic having no Children, he might safely come to the Succession, that he resolved to return into France. Tiberius having a prospect of what he might possibly attain to one day, assisted him with great Sums of Money: he comes ashore at Marseilles, was received by the Bishop, and afterwards Entertained at Avignon by Mummole. But the same Gontran-Boson who had persuaded him to return, having set himself now to persecute the Bishop and such as favoured him, he wisely withdrew himself into an Island at the mouth of the Rhone: and then the Traitor seized on all his Moneys, and took a Commission from King Gontran to besiege Mummole in Avignon. Childebert being informed of it, sent one of his Dukes, who quashed that Design.

The Provinces suffered most horribly by the cruel Discord of these Kings, the Soldiers who marched every where, plunder'd, burnt, and put all to the Sword. There was no Discipline, but so uncontroul'd a License, that the Soldiers would fly in the faces of their own Officers, if they did but question or forbid them, as soon as on the meanest fellow.)

(With this cruel Desolation, Heavens sent a cruel Epidemical Disease which raged over all France, but most fiercely over Paris and that Vicinage: it was called, Lues Inquinaria, because it appeared in those parts: it burnt those that were tainted with it, with great pain, and made an Escar in a short time like a Caustery: the most part died howling and shrieking most horribly, and there was no cure found but in the Churches, and especially that of our Ladies.)

Chilperic had besieged Melun, and commanded three of his Dukes to attack Bourges: the Berryvians came forth to meet them, and gave them Battle, which was very bloody to both Parties; Gontran who went in his own Person to fight Chilperic, having met with a Body of his Men, who had left the rest to get Plunder, cut them all off; Chilperic much cooled with this Rebuke, caused some Propositions to be made towards an Accommodation: and Gontran who was of a mild and peaceable Temper, receives them with joy.

Chilperic thought with himself that now he should get him to joyn to oppress Childebert, in whose Kingdom he had great intelligence by the means of the Bishop of Rheims: but maugre all the intrigues of those Factional Spirits, Gontran and Childebert were reconciled, the Uncle restored that part of Marseilles which began the breach to his Nephew again, and they formed a League together to recover at their joyn't Charges and Expence, those Cities belonging to Cherebert's Kingdom, which Chilperic had gotten from it.

Upon the point when Childebert was preparing himself to assault Chilperic, the Emperor Mauritius for the Sum of 50000 Crowns of Gold, ready Money, obliges him to carry his Forces into Italy against the Lombards who held the City of Rome besieged. The young Prince but Fourteen years of Age went in Person; Their King Autaris did not oppose Force with Force, but putting his Men into several places, let the Torrent run on: and that it might for ever be turned another way, he yielded up his Kingdom to the French, and became their Tributary.

It is fit we understand that in the year 584. the Lombards perceiving that the Emperor Mauritius would needs endeavour by all means to root them out of Italy, they thought the best way to preserve themselves was to restore their State to a Monarchy again, and made Autaris the Son of Clephus King; But nevertheless their thirty Dukes kept as their Propriety, and as Hereditary the Titles to those Cities they then held: but so that they should be obliged in certain Services to him, particularly to obey and follow him in time of War. This is perhaps the true Original of that Knights Service, or Fee, so much searched after by the Curious: at least it is said they were settled or establish'd according to the Custom of the Lombards.

584. After many Wars, Chilperic thinking to enjoy some rest, was Assassinated in the Court of his Palace of Chelles in Brie, which hapned towards the end of September. One Evening in the twilight, as he was alighting from his Horse, being come from Hunting, accompanied with but few, a Murderer gave him two Stabs with a Knife, one under his Arm-pit, the other into his Belly. An Author attributes this unhappy blow to Brunehaud, but others accuses his Wife Fredegonda, who was obliged, say they, to prevent him, because he had discover'd her Adultery with a Lord named Landry.

History describes this King to us Proud, Inhumane, Malicious, Dissembling, and a great Projector of Imposts: but Crafty, Patient, Magnificent, and instructed with good Learning. In our days have been found (it was Anno 1643.) a couple of Tombs just by one another, under ground at the entrance into the Church of St. Germain des Prez; the name of Chilperic which was written upon one of the two, hath made it to be conjectured that it was his, and the other his Wife's: however it be, that other Tomb in the same Church, whereon we see his Statue, is a Cenotaph which hath been placed there in these last Ages.

Of so many Sons as he had gotten on divers Women, there remained but one, who was but four months old, and had as yet no name: he caused him to be Nursed at the Burrough of Vitry near Tournay for fear they should destroy him by Poyson or Witchcraft, as he believed they had done the others.

He had likewise a Daughter by Fredegonda (she was named Rigunsa) who was then on her way into Spain to meet with Ricaredo the King, eldest Son to Leuwigildus, to whom she was betrothed. When she was gotten to Thoulonsa the news came of her Fathers Death: Didier Duke of that Country rifled all her Equipage, so that she went no farther, but returned to her Mother, to whom she gave a great deal of trouble, being much like her in Humour and ill Qualities.

GONTRAN in Burgundy } CHILDEBERT } CLOTAIR II. Aged four and part of Neustria. } in Austrasia. } or five months in Neustria.

584. The Conscience of the Crime and the fear of Childebert, who was at that time at Meaux, terrified Fredegonda so much, that leaving part of her Treasure at Chelles, she flies to Paris, and thrusts her self for Sanctuary in the Church of Notre-Dame, under the Protection of the Bishop.

Gontran having heard of the death of his Brother, came presently with great Company; Childebert was set forward likewise to have gotten in, but finding the place was possessed, he retires to Meaux, and sends Ambassadors to him, to demand part of the Kingdom of Paris, and then again some others to pray him to deliver up Fredegonda to him to punish her for the Murder of her Husband, and of Meroveus and Clovis. To the first he Replied, That all the Kingdom of Paris belonged to him, because his Brothers Sigebert and Chilperic had forfeited their shares by violating the Treaty of Agreement made between them three: and as for the other, he would refer it to an Assembly of the Estates, which was to be held on a day appointed.

He remained two months at Paris, in which time Fredegonda knew so well how to soothe him, that he took her and her Son into his Protection, and ordered the Lords of Chilperic's Kingdom to repair to Vitry, and acknowledge that Son for their King, and to name him Clotair, however he appropriated most of the Kingdom of Paris to himself, only the City of Paris excepted, which he left to the young Child.

He afterwards employed himself in doing Justice to those that made complaints of the several Violences of the deceased Chilperic, and of all the Grandees belonging to that Kings Court, who being unjust and griping to the utmost extremity, had suffered all manner of Robberies and Spoil in them. In fine, believing himself Master of all France, during the Minority of his Nephews, he took possession of their Lands in Neustria as he pleased: but in Austrasia his Power was not owned.

The hatred they had against Fredegonda did not diminish, she durst not come out of her Asylum of Notre-Dame, wherefore he sent her to Van de Ruil near Rouen; Being there in more security, she began afresh to make use of Poyson and Poyniard, they did several times apprehend and discover some Assassines which she was sending to Murder King Childebert and Brunehaud; That Queen having detected one especially amongst the rest (it was a Clerk) after he had been put to many Tortures, tures, sent him back again to her in derision: and she for shame and madness, caused the Feet and Hands of this miserable Wretch to be cut off.

Two years after the beforementioned Gondebaud, who was come from Constantinople, had kept himself close and concealed in an Island at the mouth of the Rhône, Gontran-Boson, the Patrician Mummole, Didier Duke of Thoulouze, Bladaste, who had been beaten by the Gascons, and some other Faction Heads sworn Enemies to King Gontran, had persuaded him to take the Title of King, lifting him up upon the * Target at Brive la Gaillarde: The Lords of Childebert's Court, several Bishops of Aquitain, Brunchaud her self, who desired him for her Husband, favoured him openly enough, and all the Country beyond the Garonne obeyed him.

* They set up their new made King on a Shield or Target, and so carry'd him before the People.

The thing did particularly concern King Gontran, he feared his Nephew Childebert might assist this Conspiracy, which aimed at no less than to strip him: it was by this Motive that he desired he would come to him, and that he confirmed the Adoption before made, putting his Javelin into his Hand; At the same time he caused an Army to march into Aquitain under the Conduct of Leudegisle, and the Patrician Egila. Gondebaud knowing they approached, shuts himself up with good store of Ammunitions in the strong City of Lyons de Cominges: he was there besieged a while after. The Fifteenth day of the Siege, Mummole ever perfidious, and the other Lords delivers him to the Besiegers, thinking to purchase their Lives with the price of his; In effect he was kill'd upon the place; but they fared never the better for that, Mummole was treated in the same manner as well as Bishop Sagittary, as soon as they had orders from the King; The City was sacked and destroy'd, and remained buried in its Ruines, till about the year 1005. when Bishop St. Bertrand, whose name it bears, Rebuilt it in the very same place: but of a far less Circumference than before.

That War ended, Gontran came to Paris to hold the little Clotair at the Font, which was not performed this time, Fredegonda keeping the Child at a distance, and fearing that he desired to see it only to seize upon it, and to shave it, for he could not believe it was his Brothers Son; so that to cure him of this doubt, she sent him three Bishops, and three hundred Notables, who affirmed upon Oath, that this little Prince was Legitimate.

The Prince Hermenigilda second Son of King Leuvigilda, had Married Ingonde Daughter to King Sigebert: The young Princefs having Converted him to the Catholick Religion, Goisuinte her Mother in Law used her outrageously; Hermenigild her Husband had taken Arms against King Leuvigild his Father, and being Leagued with the Sueves and the Greeks, had trusted his Wife in the hands of these last; Now, not being able to resist his Father, he had surrendered to his Mercy, and the Father kept him miserably confined in close Imprisonment. The Greeks seeing him detained, retained his Wife also, and Embarked her to transport her to Constantinople. Her Brother Childebert, that he might obtain her Release of the Emperor, sent a puissant Army to make War upon the Lombards: but it being made up half of French and half Almains, the Discord betwixt those two Nations made them trudge back again as they went, without so much as seeing the Enemy.

Immediately after this, it was known that Ingonde was dead in Affrick, and that Leuvigildus had caused her Husband to be Strangled. King Gontran animated with a just Resentment against those Arrian Barbarians, undertook to drive them out of Languedoc; His Forces of the Kingdom of Burgundy besieged Nismes, and those of Aquitain, Carcaffonne: but there was so little Order and so much Licentiousness in both these Armies, that they reaped nothing but shame, nor did they make any feel the effects of War but their own fellow Subjects, plundering and killing all the poor Peasants: and indeed at their return the lower Countries being utterly destroy'd, and the Bridges broken down, some of them perished for Hunger, others in passing over the Rivers, nay above five thousand by their own Swords, in the Contests one Company had against another almost every hour.

Leuvigildus broken with Age, spared not either Prayers or Presents to obtain a Peace with Gontran: but that King would never hearken to it, he could not so soon forget the ill Treatment they had shewed to his Nephew, nor the Affront he had received the year before from Recarede, who had made Inroads and taken some Places in Provence.

587.

Some while after this Leuvigildus dies, but had before renounced Arrianism, and his Recared or Richard professed the Catholick Religion, and Established it amongst his People.

Before

Before his Death he had practised some Intelligence with Fredegonde, to rid themselves of their common Enemies: he meant Childebert and Gontran, who at that time were firmly united; For Gontran having again declared Childebert his only Heir, without making any reckoning of Clotair whom he counted a Bastard or one foisted in, Fredegonda mortally hated them both, and sought to thrust them out of the World: Two Clerks were apprehended whom she had sent to assassinate Childebert with Poysoned Knives, they were put to death by Torments, their Noses, Hands, and Ears being cut off.

Every hour were such like Plots found out contrived by that wicked Woman; Pretextat had been restored to his Bishoprick of Rouen by King Gontran, she could not behold him without rage, in so much that having one day had some words with him, (for she was come from Val de Ruel to Rouen) she hired a wicked Slave, who upon Easter-day wounded him to death, whilst he was at the Altar in his Cathedral Church; The Murderer (for she was compell'd to deliver him up to a Nephew of that Bishop to do what he thought good with him) confessed that she and Melantius, with the Archdeacon of Rouen, had given him Money to commit the Parricide; and that none might doubt of this truth, she put Melantius into that Episcopal See.

King Gontran by good fortune avoided three or four Attempts she made against his Person; and notwithstanding, either out of faint-heartedness, or because the Neustrian Lords jealous of their Authority, would not have suffered him to undertake any thing against the Mother of their King, he did not do so much as he ought to secure his Life by the Chastisement of this Megera.

When Childebert had attained to the age of Fifteen years, he began to make himself to be feared by some examples of severity, having caused Duke Magnoald to be killed, whom he had invited to his Palace to see a Combat of Wild Beasts, and Arrested Gontran-Boson, to Punish him according to what Judgment King Gontran should pronounce, who very well knew the Treachery of this Villain, and indeed did not pardon him.

The other Grandees of Austrasia, particularly Ranchin, Ursion, and Bertefroy took the alarm at it: Fredegonda by her secret Correspondence encreased their Apprehensions, so that in Confort with her, they conspired to kill their King, and make his two Sons to Reign, the eldest of which was but two years old. Childebert having had notice hereof from Gontran his Uncle, sent for Ranchin, and caused him to be knocked on the Head going out of his Chamber; Ursion and Bertefroy who had sheltered themselves in a Church were handled after the same manner.

The Emperor Mauritius had for some time solicited King Childebert upon very advantageous Conditions, to make a Descent into Italy, for the driving out the Lombards: at length Childebert to acquit himself of his Promise and the Sums he had received, went thither with a powerful Army. Autari knowing by experience that Money drew the French thither but would not drive them back again, did not profer them any, but resolved in himself either to Conquer or else to dye with Honour; The Fates were favourable to him in a great Engagement at the entrance to the Alpes; Childebert having been soundly beaten, retired.

What ever Intreaties Recared could make to King Gontran, he could not obtain a Peace; on the contrary, he was obstinately bent to continue the War against him: but he only encreased his Shame and Losses. Duke Boson, whom he had sent into Septimania, despising the Enemy and minding nothing but to Debauch, suffered himself to be drawn into an Ambuscade, where most part of his Army was defeated by a very small number of Visigoths.

589.

The Strife and troubles between the Nuns of the Abby of St. Croix of Poitiers did puzzle King Gontran as much as if it had been a business of greater moment; amongst them there were two Princesses, Crodiel Daughter of King Cherebert, and Basine Daughter of King Chilperic: Crodiel having a fancy in her own Head to Command, accused Lubovere her Abbess of many Irregularities to make her be put out; After that she went away with forty Nuns of her Cabal, to make complaint to King Gontran: then being returned to Poitiers, she seized upon St. Hilary's Church with a Troop of Pick-pockets, who committed a world of Villanies and lewd Actions there: They were fain to make use of the Regal Authority and Power to punish those Rascals, and call an Assembly of the Bishops to judge of the Accusation against the Abbess: She was declared Innocent, and Crodiel and Basine Excommunicated; which was again confirmed by another Assembly of Bishops of the Kingdom of Gontran: but at the Intreaty of the King's, the Council of Mets gave gave them Absolution. Basina went again into the Monastery, Crudeild stubborn in her Disobedience, had leave to dwell in a Country-House which King Childebert had ordained for her.

590. A second Army which Childebert sent into Italy against the Lombards, did most of it perish there by Famine and Sickness: but withall struck King Autaris into so much dread, that he promised the French, if they would leave him in Peace, that he would every year send them some Presents.

Childebert discovered again another of those Assassins whom Fredegonde sent to Murder him; This new Attempt, giving him occasion to examine and inquire into the old Conspiracies, they apprehended Sonnegifile who had been concerned in that of Ranchin: This Person accused Giles Bishop of Rheims, and the King gave order to lay hold on him: but upon complaints made by the Bishops, that they should treat a Prelate thus without hearing him, he released him to bring it to a formal Trial. For this end he calls a Council at Mets the Fifteenth of November, and there this unhappy Wretch convicted by Witnesses, and his own Confession of Treason, and Lose Majestatis, and of his having been the Firebrand of the Civil Wars, he was deposed from his Bishoprick and banished to Strasburgh, the King having given him his Life upon the Petition of the other Bishops.

The Count Waroc and other Princes of Bretagne, notwithstanding the Oath they had given two or three times, ransacked the Bishopricks of Remes and Nants, which belonged to King Gontran; he would once for all punish their audacious Attempts, and commanded his Forces in the Kingdom of Burgundy to march that way. They had two chief Commanders, Ebracaire and Boubeleine, who could not accord together: The first of these left his Companion with the best part of the Army upon the point of the business; however Boubeleine defended himself valiantly for two days together, but on the third he was overwhelmed and perished with almost all his Men. Ebracaire being returned to Court was deposed of all his Estate and Goods to the King, who awarded them to the Heirs of Boubeleine.

590, or 591. King Gontran Hunting one day in the Vosges, perceived that some body had killed a Buffalo; The Keeper accused the Chamberlain to the King: and the Chamberlain denying the Fact, Gontran compels him to justify himself in Combat, as the custom then was in doubtful cases. His Champion and the Keeper kill each other; and he, as being Convicted by the death of his Champion, was tied to a Stake, and Stoned.

592. From the same Principle of levity of mind, which caused these violent Fits in Gontran, proceeded his Inconstancy and Apprehensions, which turned him sometimes on one side, sometimes on another: He could not but mortally hate Fredegonde, and yet nevertheless upon her intreaty he came to the Palace of Ruel, and held the young Clotaire her Son at the Font for his Baptism in the Church of St. Genevieve of Nanterre, which gave great Umbrage and cause of Complaint to Childebert his other Nephew.

593. The following year, or according to others, two years after, this Prince being at Chaalons, where he kept his ordinary Residence, and had caused the Church and Abby of St. Marcel to be built, he fell Sick, and died the 28th of March, being in the One and thirtieth or two and thirtieth of his Reign, and above the Sixty eighth of his Age.

Of several Children he had had by several Wives, but one survived him, which was a Daughter named Clotilda, who was veiled. It appears, he left all his Lands to Childebert, and little or nothing to Clotaire, though he were his God-father.

He was beyond comparison the best of the four Brothers, pious, Charitable, a lover of Justice and of publick good, respectful to the Church and Prelates, taking a particular care the Canons should be observed: but Inconstant, Timorous, Suspicious, and easie to be caught by Flatteries, and transported with Choler, which but too frequently gave him cause to repent.

CHILDEBERT in Austrasia, and CLOTAIRE in Neustria, Burgundy, and part of Neustria.

Childebert, Valiant, powerfully Armed, and enriched by the Succession to Gontran, whereof he went immediately to take Possession, thought to have an easy task of Clotaire a young Child, and his Mother Fredegonde, who was hated by all the French: but this Woman, Subtil and Courageous, sparing neither Flatteries nor Money, nor Promises, regained the most alienated Minds, and tied them to her Service.

Service. She appeared every where, carried her Son about with her, and holding him up, sometimes in her Arms, shewed him to the Soldiers, and crouds of People, and did animate them with compassion of his innocence.

Thus with their faithful assistance, and with the Conduct of her Landry Mayre of the Palace, she obstructed the progress of the Enemy, having surprized and defeated his Army by stratagem, in a place of Soissonnois which they called Truac. The Dukes Gondouand, and Wintrion Commanded it; There was slain 3000 Men on their side, which did not a little confirm the Crown to Clotaire; but could not however prevent Childebert from tearing away some Towns at the further part of his Kingdom.

The Warnes, Garues, or Guerins, were a People of Germany, whose first Habitation had been in that Countrey, where is at this day the Duchy of Mecklenburgh (where there is a River which they yet call Warne, which passes by Rostoc.) From thence they issuing out with the English, the Saxons, and the Heruli, were come to Lodge in Friesland, and in Batavia; on the North of those Countreys, the French held beyond the Rhine; and there had settled a little Kingdom: but I believe they had been conquered by Theodebert, or by Clotaire I. and subjected to the Kingdom of Austrasia. Now having Rebelled this year 594. against Childebert, they were utterly extirpated, either by the Sword, or led away into Captivity; inasmuch, as since that time the name of them hath never been heard of.

About the Month of October, in Anno 595. Childebert and his Wife were both snatched out of the World by Sickness, near the same time; perhaps it was by poison from Fredegonde's Shop, or of Brunehauds preparation, Fredegonde being their avowed Enemy, and Brunehaud put beside her Authority by her Sons age, which she might possibly endeavour to recover in the minority of her Children. Childebert dyed in the 25th of his age, and the 20th of his Reign. I know there are some Chronologists that allow him three years more; as also 33 years Reign to Gontran: but let us leave them to handle these Bryers and Thorns. He had two Sons, Theodebert and Thierry, who succeeded him; Theodebert had Austrasia, Thierry had Burgundy, and the Kingdom of Orleans.

CLOTAIRE II. In Neustria, aged Eight years, under THEODEBERT, and THIERRY, King
FREDEGOND his Mother, King of Austrasia, aged Nine or Ten years. Eight or Nine years.

BROTHERS.

Under Brunehaud their Grandmother.

Thus in all the Kingdoms of France, they were but Children that had at this time the Titles of Kings, and which was worse, two Women versed in all manner of crimes, held the reins of Government. Brunehaud ruled those of her Grand-Children by her self, and by her Confidants, she resided in Austrasia with Theodebert, whose Seat was at Mets, as Thierry's was at Chaalons on the Soane.

Fredegonde more Fortunate, and also more Active than she, betook her to the Field to regain Paris, and the Cities on the Seine, which Childebert had taken from her. The Austrasians came to meet her, and there were the three little Kings to be seen, of whom the eldest was but Eight years, at the Head of their Armies. The Victory fell to Clotaire, with the Cities for which he fought.

Soon after Fredegonde, Victorious and Triumphant, but more Illustrious, yet for her Crimes, then by her good success, dyed, aged 50 or 55 years, with this advantage, that she left her Sons affairs in a condition to defend themselves alone.

This year or the following, the Huns made inroads upon Turingia, passing thorough the Behemans, or Bohemians Countrey, (a Slavonian People) who were their Subjects. Brunehaud durst hazard nothing against them, but removed them by force of Money.

This Princess was not less cruel and vindictive than Fredegonde; and besides that, very covetous, and who making her Revenge ever tend towards the filling of her Purse, took away the Lives of the Richest to get their Wealth. Amongst others, she caused the Duke Wintrion to be killed, who had great Treasures; he was Father of that Glosina, who much against his Will, did shut her self up in a Monastery at Mets, where she is to this day venerated as a Saint.

598. This Conduct of Brunebaud became so insupportable to the Austrasians, that they haled her by force out of the Royal Palace, and led her even to the Frontiers of the Kingdom, where they left her all alone, clothed only in Rags, nigh the Castle d' Arcies, upon the River Aube, which parted the Kingdoms of her two Grand-sons. A poor Man knowing whom she was, conducted her to Chaalons upon the Soane, to her Son Thierry, who received her both with joy, and indignation at once. Her Conductor for his reward had the Bishoprick of Auxerre.

The two young Brothers could not forget the loss of Paris, and other Cities about the Seine, which Clotaire had forced from them; their Grand-Mother provoked them to call him to account, and invade his Kingdom. Knowing their design, he comes boldly to meet them, even near the Frontiers of Burgundy. The two Armies fought nigh the Banks of the little River Aronne, which glides betwixt that of Tonne and Loing, and falls into the Loing, close by Moret. Clotaire lost the Battle, and almost Thirty thousand Men, and saved himself by speedy posting to Paris. But he durst not stay there long, for the Victors being advanced as far as Essonne, he retired into the Forrest of Arelanne. In fine, he was constrained, lest he should lose all, to yield up to them, the greatest part of his Kingdom; to Thierry, all that was between the Loire and the Seine, as far as the Sea, and to Theoderet the Dutchy of Dentelen, which was between the Oise and the Seine, or perhaps between the Somme and the Oise.

600. During the controversy between the Cousins, the Gascous took occasion to come and plant themselves in the Countrey of Oleron, of Bearn, and of Soule. The two Brother Kings thought it to better purpose, having vanquish'd them, to make them become Tributaries, then to drive them quite away, and gave them a Duke to Govern them, he was called Genialis. But as they are a stirring People, during the Civil Wars of the French, they gained all Aquitania Tertia, which because of them is named Gascogne.

601. Brunebaud had all the power in the Court of young King Thierry, having made him taste the pleasure of Women, and Love betimes, to keep him from meddling with business of State by charms of voluptuousness, and out of fear, lest a lawful Wife, if he should take one, should induce him to retrench her Authority, by gaining the Affections of her Grand-Son from her. This year he had a Son by one of his Mistresses, which they named Sigbert.

Emp. Phoca, chosen by the Army; kills Maurice in Novemb. R. 18 years.

Though Brunebaud were a Great-Grand-Mother, she was not exempted from Love, nor from inspiring it in others, by the opportunities she had of bestowing the greatest Favours, but this she did most commonly at the expence of the richest, whom she fleeced by her Calumnies, and her assassinations. The precedent year she had taken away the Life of Egila, Patrician of Burgundy, to enrich her self with his spoil.

She loved amongst others, a young Lord named Protades, of Roman extraction, that is to say, Gaulois, and had already made him Duke des Transjurains: (this was not enough, she must raise him to the Office of Mayer of the Palace) But Bertoald, who then executed it, must first be put out of the way. To this end she sent him to gather up the Imposts in Neustria, newly taken from Clotaire, and as yet not well subjected. Landry, Mayer of the Palace, soon chafes him, pursues him even to Orleans, and Besieges him. King Thierry being informed thereof, Mounts on Horseback, the Battle was fought at the passage over the River of Estampes, most part of Landry's Men were cut off; but Bertoald was slain there, as Brunebaud had wished, and she gave that Employment to her Protades.

603. At the same time King Theodebert had taken the Field, to run upon Clotaire; but the two Kings being there present, Theodebert, grants him a Peace, desiring to preserve him for a time of need against his Brother Thierry; who likewise, and perhaps upon the same consideration, did in a while after, make his accommodation with Clotaire.

604. The Old One had not forgot the Outrage she had received by Theodebert, or rather the Austrasian Lords; she infinitely desired Thierry might make himself Master of that Kingdom, that she might execute her Revenge. She made him believe therefore that Theodebert was not his Brother, but that he was the Son of a Gardiner. Was it that she would have it meant he had been Supposed, or Changed; or that the Queen Faileube had committed Adultery with some person of that condition? Upon all occasions she and her Favourite thundered it in the Ears of Thierry, and laid hold of every little subject of Pique, to exasperate the Spirit of that young ambitious and violent Prince: Inasmuch as that in fine, he took up Arms to deprive his own Brother, both of his Crown and Life. One day as the two Armies were encamped near each each other, the Lendes or Vassals of the Kings, detesting this impious War, endeavoured an accommodation; Protades opposing it, those that belonged to Thierry gathered together, and notwithstanding the Intreaty and Commands of that Prince to the contrary, went and slew him in his Tent, where he was playing at Chefsi.

In time Brunebaud found means to sacrifice all those that had procured his Death, to the Manes of her beloved Friend. But notwithstanding, instead of one Gallant she chose many, and those the handsomest of her Court. The scandal was so great, that St. Didier, Bishop of Lions, was obliged by his Pastoral Office and Duty, to make some publique Remonstrances of it to her. They wrought no effect upon a Soul so plunged in the Mire of her Lust; but they acquired the Crown of Martyrdom for this Holy Prelate. This Second Jefabel having first caused him to be degraded, and banished by an Assembly * of Bishops, devoted to her passion; then two years after stoned to death by her Satellites.

* At Chalons.

Some remembrance of Conscience having touched Thierry, he would needs take a lawful Wife, and caused Hermenberg, the Daughter of Bertric, King of the Visigoths, to come out of Spain, that he might Marry her: (But Brunebaud by her Witchcrafts, as it was said, hindered him from consummating the Nuptials, and even perswaded him to send her back, and most unjustly detain all that she had brought with her for him.

The disorders of this Court were at such a height, that it was to ruin ones self not to approve of it. Nevertheless, the H. Abbot Colomban, who feared nought but God alone, spared not to conjure King Thierry, to put an end to his Debauches, by a legitimate Marriage, and refused to give Blessing to his Bastards, boldly assuring him, that God would never suffer the Sons of Sin to Reign. This Christian liberty thwarted too much the Interests and Pleasures of Brunebaud; she ceased not from irritating the King her Son against the Saint, till he had caused him to be plucked out of his Monastery with violence, and turned out of his Kingdom.

At that time when she her self was driven from the Court of Austrasia, she had left one of her Servants there, bought with the price of Money, named Bilechild, a Virgin of much Wisdom, and more Beauty: Theodebert having Married her, the kindness that Prince had for her, begot the aversion of Brunebaud. It hapned that this year she dyed by some ill beverage. It was not known from what hand it was directed, whether that old jealous Woman, or her Husbands, who was grown weary of her, and would have another; as indeed he Married Theodechild, one of the same quality and condition.

But her death was imputed to Brunebaud, as well as the War that was kindled betwixt the two Brothers. Theodebert, a Prince more stupid and cruel then valiant, began it to his own misfortune, having taken Alsatia, and the Countreys of Suntgaw, from Tergow and Thierry, alledging for a pretence, that he reclaimed them, as pieces belonging to the Kingdom of Austrasia. They had been so indeed; but Childebert had cut them off by his Testament, to joyn them to Burgundy.

The Lords of both Kingdoms prevailed with the two Brothers, to meet with Ten thousand Men apiece at a Castle situate on the Rhine, between Savern and Strasbourg, to refer all the differences between them to the French. Thierry came innocently thither with the numbers agreed to, but Theodebert brought a great Army, and beset his Brother; inasmuch as he was constrained, that he might get himself out of this Net, to yield up to him that Countrey which was in question.

After this, Thierry inflamed with a desire of Revenge, which was more blown up by Brunebaud, easily perswaded himself, that he was not his Brother, and vowed to pursue him to the death.

The end of this detestable War was, that Thierry having vanquished his Brother in two Battles, the most bloody and furious that can be imagined, the First hard by Toul, the Second at Tolbiac: he destroyed him with his whole Race. Some say that the Ribarols when he had made his escape to Colen, cut off his Head, and stuck it on the top of a Pike, to get the better Composition from the Conquerour; others tell, that he was taken beyond the Rhine, and carried to Brunebaud, who having first caused him to be shaved, Murthered him some few days after, as well as his two Sons, Clavis and Meroveus, which last she brained against a Wall. He Reigned 16 years, and Lived 25.

When Thierry had resolved first upon this fatal War, he made an agreement with Clotaire, that he might have no Enemy behind his back, and promised to restore the Dutchy of Dentelen to him, upon condition; he would not concern himself in this quarrel.

612. This War finished, Clotaire according to the Treaty, put himself in possession of the Dutchy of Dentelen; but Thierry naturally violent, and grown more insolent by his Success and Victories, sent to him to withdraw his Garrisons, otherwise he would over-run his whole Countries with Armed Soldiers. And indeed Clotaire having scoffed at his threatening words, he made all his Forces march that way, when a sudden death put a period to all his Designs, and made his Armies retire again into their own Provinces.

612. His Brother had left a Daughter, named Bertoaire, who was about Twelve years old, he took a fancy to Marry her, Bruneaud strove to dissuade him, shewing him that it was not lawful to Marry with his Niece; upon this he flies out into fury, even to the reproaching her, that she was then a wicked and unnatural Woman, who had caused him to Murder his Brother and Nephews; and had he not been withheld, had at that time run her through with his Sword; but she cunningly dissembling it, took a fit opportunity to give him poison, which brought a Disentery upon him, whereof he dyed in violent Torments. He is allowed 17 years Reign, and to have lived 26 years.

He had Six Sons, all Bastards, Sigebert, Childebert, Corby, Meroveus, and two others, whose Names are not known. Sigebert was 11 years old, and Childebert Ten. He left Austrasia to the First, and to the Second he gave Burgundy.

Bruneaud imagined that she should Reign still, under the name of her Great Grandsons; and to this end she would needs make one King of Austrasia, and the other King of Burgundy. But the Austrasian Lords, amongst others, Arnulph and Pepin, who could no longer endure this abominable Conduct, were more willing rather to submit to Clotaire; who much unlike his wicked Mother, had many Virtues of a good Prince. Those of Burgundy were likewise drawn into the same Conspiracy by their Mayer Varnaquier. Clotaire assured of their Suffrages, pushed forwards with his Forces into Austrasia, as far as Anderuac, which is betwixt Bonne and Coblentz: She sends to warn him out of the Territories of her Grand-Son; and he answers, that the Succession after Thierry's death belonged to him, to the exclusion of Bastards, and protests to stand to the Judgment and Award of the Lords of those Kingdoms.

But she being rather willing to trust to the chance of War, then their Judgment, caused Sigebert to mount on Horseback, who got together those People beyond the Rhine, as Varnaquier, who had not declared himself, did those of Burgundy. Sigebert was advanced to defend the Frontiers of Austrasia, as far as the Plain of Chaalons, near to the River d'Aisne: there when the Armies were in a posture ready to come to blows; Sigebert's Men, upon a signal given, instead of sounding a Charge, sounded a Retreat; Clotaire pursues gently, without pressing upon them; and when they were got to the Banks of the Soan, they delivered up to him Sigebert, and his Brothers Corby and Meroveus. Childebert saved himself on a nimble Horse; it is not known what became of him, a brave subject for the Genealogists, who would oblige some Family with his illustrious Pedigree.

613. When Clotaire had got these Children, he went and encamped at Rionne, upon the brink of the Vigence, which disgorges into the Soan. Bruneaud was retired with Thudelain, Sister to Thierry, to the Castle of Urbe, in the Country of the Transjurains; she was immediately taken, and brought to Clotaire: the same moment he had her in his power, Sigebert and Corby had their Throats cut; Meroveus, who was his God-Son had his Life spared: but he must dye as to the world, by taking Sacred Orders upon him.

That done (the French were called together in a Military Assembly, to judge the miserable Bruneaud, Clotaire himself became her Accuser, and represented all her Crimes, nay, even more then ever she had committed, for he reproached her even with with the death of Ten Kings, though he himself had killed two of them that very hour, and his Mother at least four. All cried out aloud, that she deserved death, and the most exquisite Torments; and this voice of the French Nation formed her Sentence. She was wrackt three days together, afterwards they led her through the whole Camp upon a Camel, then they fastned her to the Tail of an unback'd Mare, who beat out her Brains, and dragging her over Stones and Briars, tore her in pieces. Others say she was drawn in pieces by four wild Horses; the Flames consumed her Carcass that was left, and the Wind sported with her Ashes. A terrible Judgment, which God, the Sovereign of Kings, caused these Men to execute upon her.

CLOTAIRE II. called the GREAT;
remains sole King, Aged 32 or 33 years.

Thus for the Second time were all the parts of France restored to one hand; but Clotaire himself Governed only Neustria; for Austrasia and Burgundy would needs retain the Title of a Kingdom, and their distinct Officers: Varnaquier was Mayer of Burgundy, Radom of Austrasia, and they Ruled as Vice-Roys.

He had given the Office of Patrician, or Governour, in the Dutchy Transjurane to Duke Herpin, a very good Man, to settle things with Order and Justice. The Grandees of the Country fearing the Reformation might extend to them, caused him to be slain by the People. Clotaire going expressly into Alsatia, punished that crime, by the death of many that were guilty.

The Patrician Alecia had tampered in it with Count Herpin, and Lendemon, Bishop of Sion: beside, he grew so impudent, as to send to tempt the Queen by that wicked Bishop, to throw her self into his Arms with all the Kings Treasure, endeavouring to make her believe the King would dye that year infallibly, and that he being of the Royal Blood of the Burgundians, would recover the Kingdom of Burgundy. The Queen sad and alarmed, having related this feigned Prophecy to her Husband, the Bishop made his escape into the Monastery of Luxeu. He had the good fortune to obtain his Pardon, by the intercession of the Abbot Eustaise; but Alecia being Commanded to Court to give an account of his actions, could not justify himself, and paid down his Head for it.

Clotaire heaving no more Enemies, made it all his business to regulate his Kingdom, and establish Law and Justice. All those that had unjustly been thrust out of their Estates he restored again, he abolished all Imposts, that had been made without the consent of the French People, by Bruneaud and Thierry; revoked all excessive Grants, and resumed all that had been Usurped, or Alienated from the Demesnes of the Crown; enlarging the Fountain of his Revenues, at the same time when he eased his Subjects, for he had learned by Bruneaud's example, that those people can easily forsake that Prince who oppresses them.

And likewise that he might keep Peace abroad, he released the Lombards of the 12000 Crowns of Gold which they owed him for Tribute; provided they paid him down in hand, what was due for three years only.

Queen Bertrude, a very good, and most amiable Princess, being dead, Anno 620. he espoused Sichilda; of whom he became so jealous, that he caused a Lord named Boson to be killed, who he imagined held too great a correspondence with her. His eldest Son, whether by Bertrude, or by some other, was then about Twelve years old. He placed him under the Tuition of Arnulphus, or Arnold Bishop of Metz, to instruct him in good Literature and Virtue.

The Book of the Gifts of Dagobert relates, how one day this young Prince Hunting a Buck, and that Beast taking Cover in the place, where as then were the Reliques of St. Denis and his Companions; a Divine power withheld the Dogs, so that they could never break into the place; That Dagobert some while afterwards, having incurred the indignation of his Father, because he had chastised the insolencies committed against him, by Sadragisile, Duke of Aquitain, who was made his Governour or Tutor, and remembering this Miracle, put himself for security into the same place; and that he found the same effect against those Men the King his Father sent to take him thence: In acknowledgment of which miraculous protection, he took the Holy Bodies out of that little Chappel, which was then but ill adorned, and much neglected, and built them a magnificent Church and a fair Abby. This Narrative, to say no more, is much suspected of falsity.

Austrasia more exposed to the Barbarian Nations than the other parts of France; needed to have a King upon the place; Clotaire gave this Kingdom to Dagobert, under the Regiment of Pepin the Old, who was Mayre of the Palace; (the Moderns call him *Pepin de * Landen*;) and Arnold Bishop of Mets; but reserved to himself all the *Ardenne*s, and the Vosge, with the Cities of Aquitain; which the Kings of Austrasia had possessed.

DAGOBERT
his Son in part of Austrasia, aged 15 years.

Dagobert was 15 or 16 years of age when he began to Reign, whilst he followed the wise Counsels of Pepin and Arnold, and afterwards of Cunibert Bishop of Colen; his Life was an exemplar of Wisdom, of Contineny, and of Justice.

The Nation of the Vencdes and Slavonians, inhabited originally that part of the European Sarmatia, which is at this day called Prussia; from whence in process of time, they spread from the Scythian Sea even as far as the Elbe, and from the Elbe as far as Bavaria, and Hungary, nay even into Greece; and occupied Dalmatia, and Liburnia, which from their Name have to this day the appellation of Slavonia. There were above Thirty people Slavonians; those who possessed Carinthia, Carniola, and the other Countreys along the Danube, were under the Dominion of the Avarois, who were gotten into the Lands which the Lombards had forsaken, when they passed over the Alpes. The places near Italy obey'd the Lombards, there were some of them free; those that were under the subjection of the Avarois, finding it heavy and tyrannical, cast off the yoke, and chose for their King one named Samon, a French Merchant, Native of the Bishoprick of Sens, who Traded into their Countrey, and appeared to them to be a Man of a good Head-piece. It is believed he resided in Carinthia, and that from thence he extended his Kingdom to the Elbe, and at length to the confines of Turingia.

The 4th. of Dagobert.

The fourth year of his Reign, Dagobert is sent for by his Father, who Marries him with Gomatrude, Sister of Sicbilda his Wife. The Nuptials were kept at the Palace of Clichy, where his Festival ended in a quarrel between the Father and Son. The last would have what his Father reserved to himself, of that which belonged to the Kings of Austrasia. The business put to a reference of Twelve French Lords, the Son gained what he demanded, except the Cities of Aquitain.

St. Arnold quits the Court and his Bishoprick, to retire into Solitude, where he passed the remainder of his most happy Life. Cunibert Bishop of Colen, a Prelate of great Merit, took his place in the Councils of Dagobert, and the friendship of Pepin.

Varnaquier was Deceased, and his Son Godin killed by the Kings Command, upon an accusation of the crime of Lese Majestatis, brought against him by his Fathers Wife, whom he had Married, but was forced to part withal, because such Incest was punishable with death; Clotaire assembles the Estates of Burgundy at Troyes, and asked whether they would Elect another; they made reply, that they desired no other but him; and since that they were a long time without any.

Those of Saxony were a potent People, it comprehended divers of different Names, and they had Dukes in each Countrey. Those that owed Tribute to the French, were this year revolted against them, Dagobert making War upon them was wounded with a blow of a Sword, which took off part of his Helmet, and a little of the skin of his Head, with some of his Hair. It is said, that having sent these Tokens to his Father all bloody, who was Hunting nigh *Ardenne*s, the King moved by his good nature, got what Forces he could together, and having passed the Rhine, attacked the Saxons, encamped on the other side of the Wefer, where he slew Bervold their Duke with his own hand; and after scowring over all the Countrey, he did not leave any one of them alive, that was taller than his Sword.

In the Assembly of the Estates of Neustria and Burgundy, which was holden at Clichy, there arose a great quarrel. Eginare, Intendant of Ariberts Palace, the Second Son of Clotaire, having been killed by Egina's People; the Favourite of this King, the young Prince and his Uncle Brunulp would revenge his death. Egina encamps with his Friends upon the side of Montmercu, or Montmars, at this day Mont-marre

Mont-Martre. But the King having commanded the Burgundians to fall upon the first that began to stir, it cooled the hottest amongst them.

After Adalald King of the Lombards, and Son to King Agilulf, had been poisoned by his People, Arivald was raised to the Throne upon the consideration of his Wife Gundeberge Sister to Adalald; who nevertheless being accused how she intended to Poison him, that she might Marry Tasin Duke of Tuscany, he had kept her Prisoner for three years. King Clotaire, to whom she was of Kin, took compassion on her; and commanded his Ambassadors to reproach that wicked Husband. One of these having upon his own head proposed to the Lombard King that it would be well to put the decision of so important a matter to the Judgment of God by Combat, two Relations of Gundeberges brought a Champion, who vanquishing Adalulf (so was the Accuser called) asserted and recovered the Honour and Liberty of that Princel.

This year is remarkable for the Death of that famous Impostor, and most false Prophet Mahomet, whose abominable Religion composed partly of Judaism, and partly of the Whimsies of several Hereticks who were retired into those parts, and accommodated to the Sensualities of Corrupt Nature, was embraced by such Robbers and wicked Varlets as knew neither Justice nor the Deity. The greatest part of our Hemisphere hath submitted to the Tyranny of that Law; and had it not been for the Valour of the French, they had divers times made themselves Masters of all Europe.

The Era or manner of accounting and Calculating the time by this Sect, commences at the year of the Egyra, or the Retreat of Mahomet to the City of Medina, which hapned the 26th of July in the Six hundred twenty second year of Jesus Christ; But it must be noted that they are Lunary years, consisting but of 354 days, whereas those amongst Christians are solary of 365 days, without reckoning the Bissexile.

The Death of Clotaire hapned Anno 628. in some House of his near Paris: He was buried at St. Vincents, at this time St. Germain des Prez; The time of his Reign in Neustria, within four months of the time of his Age, was about forty five years, and his Reign over all France, after the death of Thierry, was fourteen.

We know the names of two of his Wives: the one was Beretrude, the other Sicbilda; perhaps he may have had some other before these. He left two Sons, Dagobert and Aribert, of what Mothers we cannot tell certainly, but only that they were not both of one and the same Bed.

He was an affable Prince, very different from the cruel and brutish ferocity of his Predecessors, just, Pious, instructed in good Learning, and Liberal, especially towards the Church and such as professed a Monastick Life.

Their Kings were always chosen of the Blood of the Reigning Race: three Conditions were required in them, their Birth, (it mattered not whether they were Legitimate) the Will of the Father, and the Consent of the Grandees; the last did ever almost follow the two first. After the death of Clotvis (as I believe) they added to the ancient Custom of lifting them upon the Target*, that of seating them on the Throne or Regal Chair; which had neither Arms nor Back, for a King must support and sustain himself by his own strength; The Regal Ornaments were long Hair or Locks pleited, the Purple Mantle and Tunick, and the Diadem or Headband enriched with Precious Stones.

When they left Children that were in Minority, if they had not allotted their shares, the Queen-Mother and the Grandees ordained as they thought convenient, and had the Administration of Affairs, and the Education or Bailiffs of the Minor Kings. From hence these Lords were called Nourricers; (* Nursers) but there was one amongst the rest that bore this Title.

When a King undertook any Expedition, they held up their Hands in token of the Assistance which they promised him; Peace might be made without them, but War could not. In Civil Discords they made themselves Arbitrators between the Princes, and obliged them to agree.

The first day of March they held an Assembly in the open Field under Tents, where the Militia was often sent for; Because of the day on which they met, it was called the Field of Mars. The Kings presided and consulted with the Lords concerning the Affairs of that year either touching Peace or War; These Assemblies gave them the Command of the Armies, which was not necessarily tied to their Persons, at least till the time of Clotvis. They ever had about them a certain number of Braves or Barons who guarded them, and for their safety exposed themselves to all manner of dangers.

The

The most eminent Offices of the Kingdom were the Prefect or Mayre of the Palace, who was elected by the great ones or Grandees, and confirmed by the King; The grand Referendary, who had the Royal Seal, and under him several lesser or petty Referendary's, and also great numbers of Expeditioners, whom they called Chancellors, because they did their business Intra Cancellor or Lattices; The grand Apocriary who was the chief of the Priests and Clerks of the Court (in the second Race he was called Arch-Chaplain:) The Count of the Palace who was Judge, the Chamberlain * who gave all Orders in the Kings Chamber, the Count of the Stable who took care of the Stables and perhaps of the Equipage. I cannot tell whether they had in those times a Provost or grand Seneschal of the Table, as there was since under Pepin the Bref. The Children of Lords were bred in the Kings House, or in the Houses of great Officers, and Trained up to all noble Exercises, more honourably then Pages are in these days.

* Cubicularius.

The Kings Revenues consisted in Lands or Demeasins, and in Imposts which were taken only of the Gauls, for it was thought odious to take any of the French; Some of them were levied in Moneys, others in Goods. When they made the Division of Lands into Acres, or Furlongs, the Kings for their shares had much of the best, especially about and near the greatest Cities; They made their Residence and built them Palaces in the most pleasant places, and especially near some great Forests: for they delighted in Hunting, and made a general one every Autumn. In all those places which they called *Ville Fiscales, they had Officers or Servants, who were named Fiscalins, and he that commanded them, Dom-stick. There they laid in Stores of Provision, as Wines, Wheat, Forage, Meat, especially Venison and Pork. Amongst the Lords they always chose out some to eat at their Table; and that was one step towards the highest Employments. They only took the Quality of *Illustrious, which was common to all the Grandees of the Kingdom; Sometimes the Title of Dominus was given them, which was likewise ordinary to all that were any way considerable, also of most Glorious, most Pious, most Clement, and Precellentissime. The Kings wrote their names under that of the Bishops when they wrote to them. On the contrary Pope Gregory I. and the Emperor Mauritius preposed theirs before that of any Kings, Gregory II. did not do so. The Popes and Councils stiled them sometimes their Sons, and sometimes the Sons of the Catholick-Church; Their Male-Children in their young age were named * Damoiseaux; and at their Birth they gave some Fiscalins their Freedom in all the Lands and Houses belonging to the King their Father.

* Regie.

* Vir illustre.

Queens were stiled most Pious and most Clement.

* Domicelli.

They oft took Wives of mean Birth and servile Condition, on whom they did not bestow the Title of Queen till after they had born Children, nor always then neither. The Daughter of a King had that Title as soon as they were Married: They had their Dower in Lands, some Possessions in proper which their Kindred inherited, their share of the Household Goods, and great Officers just the same as the Kings had. Oft times the Sons of France before they came to Reign were called Kings, and the Daughters Queens.

There were but two Conditions of Men, the Free or Ingenuous, and the Slaves; Amongst the Free there were Nobles, who were so by Blood, and by Antiquity, not by Exemptions, and amongst the Nobles the Grandees optimates. I believe that those they called Majores were the Noble, and the Minores those that were not so.

One knew not then what People of the Gown or Robe meant, all the French made profession of bearing Arms: Justice was rendred by People Armed, their Battle-ax and Buckler hung upon a Pillar in the midst of the Malle. In the Kings House it was the Count of the Palace that administered it, sometimes the King himself took the Seat together with the Bishops and the Grandees, and having heard Causes of highest concern, pronounced Sentence himself; In Villages the Centeniers, in Cities the Counts and Dukes that gave Judgment without any thing of Pleadings or Writings. They were called in general terms Judges and Seniors; The Kings gave them these Offices for time, and frequently continued them for Money. Sometimes it was left to the People to chuse them, and perhaps it was their Right. There were no Degrees of Jurisdiction, all judged without appeal, because they took Cognisance of nothing but what was proportionable to their Degree; It is true the Parties had a way of carrying their Complaints to the King, if they believed they had not been judged according to Law: but if the Complaint were not made good, they were condemned, if * Persons of Quality to a pecuniary Mult, the other other to be * Whipp'd. The Counts and Dukes had Viguers, or Lieutenant-Generals who did Justice in their absence, and several petty Viguers which administered it in the Country. They had Assessors whom they called Racibourges; they sat on every eighth or every fifteenth day, according to the multiplicity of Affairs; But the Dukes held the Grand Assizes from time to time, where the Bishops of the Province were bound to be present; There were likewise a kind of Commissary's or Envoys, some for the King, others for the Dukes, who went about to visit the Provinces; In their Proceedings and Publick Acts they counted their Terms by Nights. As the Galls governed themselves according to the Roman Rules and Laws, they were forced to have Judges that understood them: and the French might perhaps imitate and follow them in many of their Contracts, for the Salick Law was not extensive enough to comprehend and regulate every particular case.

* Majores personae, Minores personae

The same Counts and Dukes, as judged the French, led them to the Wars: There were no other Soldiers but the Militia: They commanded those of the nearest Provinces, or of any Province as they thought fit; those that failed were put to a Fine; they gave Letters of Dispensation to such as were grown over-aged in the Service. In all the Provinces and particularly on the Frontiers they had Magazines of Provisions and Forage, but as I believe they had no pay but their Plunder, which was brought together and so shared always equally amongst them.

They put those into the condition of Slaves or Servants whom they took Prisoners of War, as likewise such as were sent them for Hostages, if they broke their Faith.

The great ones that were accused of any Crime, were judged Militarily by their Equals, the Execution was performed with a Sword, or Battle-Ax, sometimes by Dukes and Counts themselves. Often times their Kings would not wait till Judgment was given, their Wrath or Covetousness made Death go before any Sentence; As for the People of a meaner Stamp, they were extended on a Stake, and were either Strangled or Whipp'd. In some places they were Hanged on a Gallows, or they were branched upon a Tree; For lesser Crimes they were condemned to grind like Mill-Horses, to dig Vineyards, to work in Quarries, and sometimes they were Branded with a hot Iron. When a Man was accused for a Crime of State, they tore off his Military Girdle and his Clothes, and dressed him all in Rags. Between Private Persons, they might seek their satisfaction with their Swords, and do themselves justice, whence proceeded infinite Murthers, if the King did not prevent it. Murderers bought their Lives with their Money, and the punishment of most Crimes, unless they were Crimes of State, were pecuniary and determined by the Law. The whole Kindred were liable to the payment, if the guilty Person were insufficient. When the Parties wanted Evidence to prove the Fact, they came to a Combat, either in Person, or by those Champions they could procure; This they said was to determine a Cause by the Judgment of God Almighty. The Ordeal-Trial by red hot Irons, or Brads, that by boiling Water or cold Water, and another likewise by presenting themselves before the Cross, were in use also by the approbation of the Bishops. Such as had any Quarrels and Contests gave their Oaths for caution and security in publick, which were made upon the Shrines of Saints or on their Tombs. This was also the way to purge or clear themselves of any Crime when accused in a Court of Justice; and the Accused in certain cases; as Adultery and the like, when it could not be fully proved, was allowed to bring several of their Friends to make publick Oath, either Men or Women, according to their Sex.

As for Marriages they took the liberty to repudiate or cast off their Wives when they could not endure them; Their Kings had sometimes several at the same time, and the Proximity of Blood or Degrees of Parentage never hindered them from satisfying their Desires; When it pleased them the Children of their Mistresses succeeded them, as well as the Legitimate.

They made Money of the Gold they found in their own Country, and Coyned it more fine, and of a much higher value than the Visigoth Kings, a Mark of the Excellency of their Royalty above all others. Payments were made as much with Gold and Silver not Coined as Coined. But we shall elsewhere more amply Discourse and Explicate the Manners and Customs of this Nation, and all the Orders they observed in their Judicatories, their Wars, and in their Government.

The natural Language of the French was the Teutonick or German: the Austrasians, at least those nearest to the Rhine, kept to it ever, and use it still, but much changed or corrupted. Those the most distant on this side, and the Neustrians left it by little and little for that of the Galls, which was the Romanick, or Romanciere, otherwise called the Rustick Latin, engendred of the Rust and the Corruption of the Roman or Latin, wrested and turned according to the genius of the Nation, and the Idioms of the several Provinces, as well for the inflexion and signification of Words, as the Air, Accent, and Phrase.

The Church.

Notwithstanding the Conversion of Clovis and all the care of the Prelates, who by Authority of the Kings pulled down the Temples, there were yet a world of Pagans, especially amongst the French, and those of the most Principal; and as for those that were converted, they had much ado to wean them from their ancient Superstitions: they bore a Reverence still to the places where the Gentiles had Worshipped and Adored, and still retained some remainders of their Ceremonies, their Festivals, Augures, and the Witchcrafts of Paganism, which they mingled with the Exercises of the Christian Religion.

Since the Baptism of Clovis the Gallican Church not only enjoyed in all liberty the Gifts the Galls had bestow'd upon her, but likewise acquired much greater ones by the liberality of the French. Her excessive Riches begot envy in the Ambitious and the Covetous; To enjoy them, they Courted and Caball'd for Bishopricks, which they would not have desired, if there had been nothing but Study and Labour. The Grandees of the Court renounced the noblest Employments for a Miter, where they met with Honour, Authority, Riches, and assurance against Disgrace; There was no need of forbidding them to chuse Lay-men against their Wills: but rather not elect them when they used underhand dealings to obtain it. There were few chosen but of noble Race: and the Elections were ever made with the Kings leave, never against his Will. Oft times he forced them by his absolute Commands, or prevented them by Recommendations, which were all one as a Command. The Bishops knew well enough this was to violate the Canons: but the fear of bringing things to greater disorder, Interest and Complaisance shut up their Mouths and tied their Tongues. The only Man Leontius of Bordeaux had the courage or boldness to call a Council at Saintes to thrust out one Emerius a young Youth who had been named for Bishop of that Church by Clotaire I. but King Cherebert his Son received him but very scurvily that was put in his place, and caused him to be carried into Exile in a Chariot full of Thorns.

These unworthy Elections and Intrusions bred most infinite Disorders, publick Simony, which spread it self from the Head even over all the Members, the Non-Residence of Bishops, their servile and perpetual adherence to the Court, a disgust to Christian Vertues and the Functions of their Ministry, the love of Vanity and the things of this World, which led them into all manner of Pleasures and Secular Employments, as Feasting, sumptuous Cloaths, Hunting, and the use of Arms. From hence arose the scorn of the People towards these false Pastors who were crept in at the Windows, and in the Civil Wars a wonderful desire and itch to invade the Wealth and Goods of the Church, as esteeming it only the taking from such as were wholly unworthy of enjoying them, thereby to correct their excess by paring away what was superfluous.

It cannot be denied but there were some extreemly irregular, as Salonius d' Ambrun, and Sagittarius de Gap, who should rather be termed Bandits then Bishops, Giles de Rheims a perfidious and factious Firebrand of Civil Wars, Saffarac Bishop of Paris, and Contumeliosus of Riez, both of them, as I think, guilty of Uncleaness, and Deposed for that Crime, and that Cautin of Tours, of whom Gregory recounts most horrible wicked things.

But in Recompence there were a great many, who having edified their Flocks by a most Religious Conduct, have left their Names and Memory in great veneration amongst all the Faithful.

In the beginning of this Age flourished Remy de Reims, and Vaast d' Arras, whom I have mentioned in the last, but were still in being, Gildard of Rouen, Aquilin d' Eureux, Contest de Bayeux, Melaine de Rennes, Avite de Vienne, Cesarius d' Arles, Venne de Verdun*; a little after Ageric or Agroy of the same City, Lubin de Chartres, Firmin d' Uzès, and Macarius or Malo first Bishop of Quidalet. This City having been ruined, the Bishoprick was transferr'd to another, which was raised out of its Ruines, Ruines, and bears the name of this holy Prelate. About the middle of the same Age, were Nicetius de Treves, Paul de Leon in Bretagne, Felix de Nantes, Aubin d' Angers, Lauto or Li de Contances, Medard de Noyon, Saulge d' Alby, Germain de Paris. This last died Anno 579. and was Interred in the Church of St. Vincent, which was likewise called St. Croix, and is at this day St. Germain des Prez; And about the latter end lived Gregory de Tours, who hath written the History of the French, till within a year or two of the time of his Death: it hapned, as I believe, Anno 595. Sulpicious de Bourges, whom they surnamed the Severe, to distinguish him from the Affable who since sat in the same Bishoprick, St. Gall de Clermont, Milleard or Millard de Sees, * Avigla de Nevers, and Sanson de Dol.

* Agricola.

Amongst those most holy for a Monastick Life, we find Queen Radegonda, Institutrice of the Monastery at Poitiers, and Glodesina or Glosina of that which bears her name at Metz, she was Daughter of Duke Guintrion; Maur the Disciple of St. Bennet came to dwell in France about Anno 540. and brought his Order which in time increased so much, that it abolished, if we may call it so, all the others. Clond or Clodold lived in the Diocess of Paris, Leufroy in that of Eureux, Calais * in that of Mans, Cibard * in Perigord, Leonard in Limousin, the Hermit Victor at the Diocess of Troyes, Celerin in that of Sees, and Senoc in Poitou.

* Carilese.
* Sparchius.

The Church of Rome had in Gaul, as in divers other Countries, a certain Revenue in Lands, which she called her Patrimony; and the Popes had a Vicar, who failed not to set a value on his Power, to make this Commission of the higher value. It was the Bishop of Arles (from whom they had taken almost all the Rights and all the Authority he pretended to, as well for the Antiquity of his Church Established by St. Trophime Disciple of the Apostles, as from the preheminance of his City, which the Emperor Honorius had made the capital of seven Provinces) they pitched upon (for fear he should make his too great a See) to be their Vicar in Gaul; and so he held two during pleasure, which he might have held in chief, and that Superiority which his Bishoprick gave him over the seven Provinces, was absorbed by that which they gave him over the whole seventeen.

Moreover they favourably received all those that appealed to Rome; Leo X. restored Chilidonius of Besancon, deposed by Hilary of Arles his Vicar, and Agapet restored Contumeliosus whom John II. his Predecessor had judged very Criminal.

As they had a right to see the Canons observed and the ancient Customs, when any one desired any Prerogative or any License, they applied to them, so that by little and little it brought them to allow some small favour, even in things of little weight, but at length even to dispence with the Canons. Pope Gregory I. amongst others gave it to several Churches; which induced others to desire it also, and sometimes pretend that his Predecessors had before granted them the like.

The question concerning Images made a noise in France even in the days of that Pope. For he reproved Serein Bishop of Marsilles, for having broken them down, but however applauded his Zeal from having hindered the People from adoring them: because they might be used as Books to instruct the ignorant, but not as the Objects of Divine Adoration.

We observe in this Age near forty Councils; I shall quote those of whom we have any Canons or Acts. The first of Orleans, which we mentioned before, was assembled in 511: in the Reign of Clovis; The second in 533. to abolish the remainders of Idolatry; The third five years after; The fourth in 541. and the fifth in 549. These four in the Reign and by the Authority of Childebert, who likewise called another at Arles, (which was the fifth) Anno 554. There were two held in the Reign of Sigismund King of Burgundy, that of Epaon, Anno 517. and the first of Lyon in the same year: This last upon the account of * Estienne his Intendant, who had Married Palladia his Cousin-German, and was upheld in it by that Prince. There were two Convocated at Arles; to wit, that which is reckoned the fourth in Anno 524. by the consent of Theoderic King of the Ostrogoths, to whom the Province at that time obeyed, and the fifth above-mentioned in the Reign of Childebert. Three met in the Countries of Atalric King of Italy, that of Carpentras in 527. of which there is but one Canon remaining; the second of Orange two years afterwards: and the third of Vaison in the same year. There were two in the City d' Auvergne, (that is Clermont) the first with the consent of King Theodebert in 535. and the second of his Son Theodebald in 549. Four at Paris, viz. the second Anno 555. the third Anno 557. the fourth Anno 573. and the fifth Anno 615. The second and third were by order of King Childebert, and the first of these two, to review the Process against the Bishop Saffaricus, who had been condemned and deposed (the Sentence was confirmed); the other to confirm some Canons touching the Discipline. The fourth was held by the consent of Chilperic I. to suppress the attempt of Giles Metropolitan of Rheims, who had ordained one Promotus Bishop in the City of Chasteaudun, though it depended on the Bishoprick of Chartres, and had never been made an Episcopal See. The fifth was summoned by order of Clotaire II. for Reformation of Abuses. I do not speak of that in the year 577. where Pretextat of Romen was condemned, having suffered himself by a credulous and weak condescension to be induced to confess such Crimes which he had not committed: no more than that of Valence, Anno 584. which confirmed all the Grants King Gontran, his Wife, and his Daughters had bestowed on the Church. There were three at Lyons, the first under Sigismond before noted, the second in 567. and the third in 583. Two at Mascon, the first Anno 581. the second four years afterwards, all these four by the Authority of King Gontran. One at Tours, Anno 567. in the Reign of Cherebert, which ordained many things, and confirmed the Religious Congregation of Virgins instituted by St. Radegond. One at Auxerre, Anno 578. where none met but the Bishop of the Place, (his name was Aunaquaire) with his Abbots and Priests. King Recarede called one at Narbona, Anno 589. Clotaire II. one at Metz, Anno 590. and one at Paris, which was the fifth, Anno 619. as we have already hinted. In that of Metz, Giles Bishop of Rheims was condemned for the Crime of Treason, deposed and banished to Strasbourg.

Of all these Councils there was only that of Orange that meddled with Controversies, having fully discussed the points of Grace, according to the Judgment of St. Augustin, and of the Holy Chair. The rest spent their time to compose Quarrels and Disputes, or about Discipline, and especially such particulars as we have already mentioned. This History not allowing us to quote more than some necessary Articles.

In the reading of these Councils, one may observe, that there were great multitudes of Lepers and of Jews in France; (perhaps the Jews had brought in and spread abroad that Leprosy.) That the Bishop took care to relieve the first, and prohibited all manner of Communication with the other.

The Church had a particular care of the Poor, of Widdows and Orphans, the first being made as it were of the Family, the rest under their Protection: insomuch that they espoused their Cause in Courts of Judicature, and the Judges never gave Sentence in any Cause of theirs, but he first acquainted the Bishop thereof.

In her Judicature she followed that Order Established by the Roman or Written Law. The Canons concerning Degrees prohibited, were different according to the different Countries. In the beginning, in some Churches they hardly prohibited the Marrying with two Sisters, or two Brothers; But the Council of Agde, the third of Orleanse and other following Councils, extended it to a Niece, to the Aunt, to the Brothers Widdow, and the Uncles, to the Wives Sister, to Cousins and Cousin-Germans.

There were Sanctuaries in the most famous Churches, which the Bishops made good to the utmost of their power. Their intercession often times obtained Pardon for the greatest Criminals; and whatever failings themselves did fall into, they most commonly came off only with Degradation or Banishment, their Brethren most times persuading the Kings to spare their Lives.

St. Augustin had began to persuade the Faithful to give the Tithe of their Goods for the relief and support of the Poor, grounded upon this Principle, That Christians were obliged to a greater Perfection than the Jews, who had allowed it to the Levites. The Prelates of the second Council of Tours exhorted the People to pay them to God, according to the example of the Patriarch Abraham. The second of Mascon ordained it, as being a Right and Duty Established in the Old Testament, and which they affirmed had been of a very long time observed by the Christians. The Temporal Lords to whom they primarily belonged, bestowed much upon the Monasteries, little on the Bishops and Curats; to whom notwithstanding, in case they were of Divine Right, they ought to belong.

There were few Festivals observed as Holy in all Churches, except Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide. The nobles of the Dioceses were obliged to keep them in the Episcopal City: the Country Curates the same, as likewise to meet at the Synod which which was yearly held at a time certain. The King solemnised these Holy-days in what City he pleased; and the Bishops ambitiously courted and strove who should have that honour in his own Church. Since, that Method being altered, and the Charms of the World being stronger to allure the Bishops to Court, than the Duties of Christianity were to draw the Court to the Church: the Kings celebrated those Festivals in their Palaces, and the Bishops forsaking their Flocks went thither in greater Crowds than was desired.

New Cells or Hermitages were not suffered to be made, nor new Congregations of Monks without the Bishops allowance. An Abbot durst not run forth nor absent himself from his Monastery; when he fell into any fault, the Bishop might displace him, and give him a Successor; and if he were rebellious he was not admitted to the Communion. Shame alone could not confine and keep those in their Monasteries who had Vowed and Dedicated themselves to God, but the Church compell'd them to continue by all the Penalties that were in her power.

No Tribute or Tax was raised upon any thing belonging to the Church, neither upon their Foundations, their Goods, nor their Persons; and neither the Judges, nor the Kings Receivers could exercise any Power or Jurisdiction on their Lands. But those Bishops and Abbots who desired to obtain the King's, or the Grandees favour and protection, having begun to make them Euloges or Presents, this Custom grew into a necessary Right and Duty, which was afterwards exacted from them, when they failed to do it voluntarily.

Dagobert

Dagobert I. King XI.

P O P E,

HONORIUS I. Who S. nine years and an half during this Reign.

DAGOBERT I. Aged Twenty six years, in Neustria, Austrasia, and Burgundy. ATRIBERT, Aged Thirteen or fourteen years, in part of Aquitaine.

629.
* Aribert, Caribert, and Cheribert are the same Name.

Prince * Aribert being with King Clotaire when he died, it might be thought that in the absence of his Brother Dagobert who was in Austrasia, he might with his Fathers Treasure have raised Men and Friends enough, to have seized on the Kingdom: but as he was young, and perhaps his Father had bequeathed him no part in the Kingdom, by his last Testament, it was in vain that Brunolph, his Mothers Brother, endeavoured to stir up the Neustrians in his behalf. Dagobert used such diligence, that he made himself secure of the Kingdoms of Neustria and Burgundy; so that Aribert with his Uncle were constrained to go and meet him, and to submit. It was in the beginning of the Seventh year of his Reign in Austrasia.

629. Nevertheless as it were out of pity, and according to the counsel of the French Lords, he gave him Saintonge, Perigord, Agenois, Thoulousain, and all the third Aquitaine. Aribert settled his Royal Throne at Thoulouse.

As soon as he was acknowledged in Neustria, he went to visit Burgundy, which in many years had not beheld a King, but was governed by Mayers, neither had they had any Mayer since the death of Varnaquier.

Being at St. John de Laone, he heard the complaints of his People, rendred Justice to all his Subjects, took a care to compose all their Disputes: but it seems all these fair appearances were but to cover a Villanous Murther, for which purpose perhaps he had undertaken this Journey. For one Morning going into a Bath, he commanded three Lords of the Court to kill Brunolph who had followed him, though he were guilty of nothing, unless being affectionate to the Interest of his Nephew Aribert, they might apprehend he would be again stirring and acting something for him.

It seems the Neustrian and the Austrasian Lords did each of them struggle, who should possess the King. The first carried it from the others, by taking him on the blind side, and flattering him in his Passions. The Queen Gomtrude was an Austrasian of Kin to Cunibert and Pepin, who were present at her Wedding, the Neustrians who knew the amorous inclination of their Prince, persuaded him to repudiate her upon the pretence of Barrenness, to Marry Nantilda one that served him.

By this means Egi Mayer of the Neustrian Palace, got the highest place in the young Kings favour, who presently dismissed Cunibert, but retained Pepin still at Court; not to make use any more of his Counsel, but for fear he might cause the Kingdom of Austrasia to revolt, his Office of Mayer of the Palace and his Vertues giving him too great a power.

Nantilda was soon deprived of the Affection of her Husband by another Woman. Being gone into Austrasia, and delighting to shew himself in his Royal Habit to those Provinces, with great Pomp and a splendid Court, he in her room took a very beautiful Virgin named Ragnetude. Sometime after he Married two more

Women,

Women, Wifegunde and Bertechilde, (for Kings thought they had this Privilege of having several) and took as many Mistresses as the desire and gust of change could wish for, which is infinite.

After he had thrown off his two prudent Governours, who kept him within compass, he let himself loose to all the heats of his Youth, and the violence of his Sovereign Authority. The first cast him into all sorts of Pleasures; The second made him heap up Money, and lay his griping Hand upon his Subjects Treasure, as if all had been his own. It was natural to see a Prince of Twenty six years to be amorous: but it was a prodigy against nature, that at that age he should have such a covetous heart, as nothing could satisfy. Nevertheless being in himself at the bottom very good, the Remonstrances of St. Amand Bishop of Tongres, somewhat allay'd the heat of his Covetousness; He took Nantilda his first Wife again, and lived with her the rest of his days.

Mean time he had a Son by Ragnetude the same year that he Married her. He sent to pray his Brother Aribert to come and hold it at the Font. Both of them met at Orleans for that Ceremony, and the Child was Baptized by the Bishop St. Amand, and named Sigebert.

Aribert was no sooner returned to Thoulouse, but he died; and his Son Chilperic who was yet in his Cradle, survived him but a few days. It was suspected that Dagobert had contributed to the death of that Innocent, to regain Aquitaine by seizure, as he presently did.

DAGOBERT I. Sole King.

It is certain this King had a singular Devotion for St. Denis, and his fellow-Martyrs, and that he Erected a Church in honour of him, to which he joynd a rich Abby. But the subject or cause which we related elsewhere, passes amongst the Criticks but for a Fable; I cannot tell whether it be a truth that he unfurnished several other Churches of their most precious Ornaments to enrich this same.

It hapned this year that some French Merchants who Traded with the Sclavonians were Robbed: King Samon having refused to repair this Wrong, Dagobert would needs right himself by the Sword. The King of the Lombards and the Duke of the Almains, the first of which was Allied, and the other Subject to France, attacked them jointly on the one hand, whilst the Austrasian French assaulted them on the other.

The first got the advantage and slew a great many of them: but the Austrasians who were discontented with Dagobert, because he had preferred his Residence in Neustria before that of Austrasia, behaved themselves very cowardly. For having besieged the Castle of Vagastburgh, wherein the bravest of the Enemies had put themselves, they raised it the third day, and retreated in great disorder.

After this the Sclavonians were emboldned to make Incursions in Turingia, and other Countries belonging to the French. And Debuon or Dervan, Duke of the Sorabes (they were a People of Sclavonia who inhabited Misnia) drew himself off from the Obedience of the French to put himself under Samon.

There had been of a long standing a Colony of Bulgarians who had taken up their Quarters in Panonia, where they were Allied or become Tributaries to the Avars, who possessed the greatest part of that Province with that of Dacia. It is disputed whether the ancient Bulgaria was in Sarmatia Asiatica, along the River Volga, otherwise called Rba, or else in the European on the borders of the Euxine. Now the Bulgarians being entred into a War with the Avars were vanquished and so trodden under foot, that there were left but nine thousand, who were forced to forsake the Country with their Wives and Children. These Wretches having besought Dagobert to give them an abiding in some Corner of his Dominions, he sent orders to the Bavarois to receive them and to quarter them separately in Villages and Burroughs, till the Estates of the Kingdom had ordained how to dispose of them.

The Estates found the best Expedient would be to cut the Throats of them all in one Night, and that was put in execution but too punctually. One of their Chiefs having got some wind of it, made his escape with seven hundred of them into Sclavonia, that Country is yet called the March of Wenden, between the Rivers Save and Drave.

The Visigoths in Spain made and unmade their Kings as they pleased. This year the Government of Suinthila who had Reigned ten years, being uneasy and displeasing to them, they cast their Eyes upon Sisenand, who implored the Assistance of Dagobert, promising him in Recompence the great Golden vasa or Vessel, weighing 500 pounds and enriched with Jewels, which Aetius had bestowed upon Torismund for helping him against Atila. Sifenand being instated in his Throne by the assistance of the French, could not refuse this Vessel to the Ambassadors: but the Visigoths Way-laid them and took it away again from them by force. Dagobert was offended and threatened; the business was canvassed, and in the conclusion he was contented with two hundred thousand pieces of Silver.

As he was raising great Forces to stop the Incurfions which King Samon with his Slavonians made into Turingia, the Saxons came and profer'd to repel them at their own Peril and Charge, if they would forgive them the Tribute of Five hundred Beeves which they owed to France. The profer was accepted, and they were relied upon to make good their Promise; but either they wanted strength, or perhaps faith to perform it and secure Turingia as was expected.

Thus it continued still exposed to the insolency of those Barbarians. The Neustrians were too remote to defend them, the Austrasians should have done it; and they had strength more then enough to have accomplished it, but being ill affected, they did not much trouble themselves about it. It was necessary therefore to regain their hearts and affections to give them a King that should reside amongst them.

DAGOBERT in Neustria and Burgundy.

SIGEBERT his Son
in Austrasia.

633. Wherefore Dagobert having Assembled the Prelates and the Lords of this Kingdom at Metz, he by their Advice, and with their Consent makes his Son Sigebert King of Austrasia, furnished him with a Royal Treasure, that is to say rich Moveables, Precious Vasa's or Vessels, and Silver Coyn, and left the Conduct of his Education, of his Court, and his State to Cunibert Bishop of Colen, and to the Duke Adalgise. Then the Austrasians counting themselves restored to their Liberty, because they had a King, stood up for their Honour, and valiantly repelled the Slavonians.

634. The following year he had a Son born by Queen Nantilda, who was named Clovis. Nantilda considering that if her Husband should come to die without settling the Succession, this Son would have no share, solicited him so earnestly, that he sent for the Lords of Austrasia, and made them understand that he meant and intended that Neustria and Burgundy should belong to the Infant that was newly born: but that all the Cities of Aquitain, of Provence, and of Neustria, which had been joyned to the Kingdom of Austrasia should so remain united, excepting the Dutchy of Dentelen, which Theodebert the Young, had taken from King Clotaire.

635. The Gascans who had possessed one part of the Novem-populania, or third Aquitain, had again began their Robberies after the death of Caribert. There were sent twelve Dukes with the Militia of Burgundy, and several Counts without Dukes to bring them to their Duty. They sallied forth out of their Rocks and their Fastnesses, and set upon the French with wonderful alacrity: but after all they found it better to make use of their agility to save themselves then to Fight; They were pursued without stop or stay, and Fire and Sword flew after them even into their strongest Retreats; till there being no other security left them but the Mercy of their Prince, they promised to fall down at his Feet and submit to all his Commands.

I know not where some Authors have found how Aquitania Secunda was concerned in their Revolt, and that Dagobert having gone thither in Person, razed the City of Poitiers and sowed it with Salt in token of its Desolation. If this were true, it must have been because of the too heavy Imposts upon Salt, that the Poitovins Rebelled.

635. The lucre of Plunder had likewise incited the Bretons to run upon the French Territories. Eloy, who was since Bishop of Noyon, went and demanded Reparation of their King Judicael or Giquel Son and Successor of Jugel. He found it no difficult thing to persuade that Prince, that he were better come and wait on the King then have his Country over-run and plundered by the Forces that were returning Victorious out of Gascogne: he brought him to the Palace of Clichy, where he humbly craved Pardon of Dagobert, promised him for the future to prevent the like Disorders, and submitted both himself and Kingdom to his disposal.

The

The Gascen Lords, with their Duke Aigbina came to the same place, as they had promised the foregoing year, to surrender themselves up to the mercy of Dagobert; and because they dreaded his wrath, they had recourse to the intercession of St. Denis, and put themselves into Sanctuary in his Church. The King in honour to that Saint, gave them their Lives and Fortunes, and they in acknowledgment laying their hands up on his Altar, swore an eternal Fidelity to him, to his Sons, and to all his Successors, Kings of France.

The whole Kingdom was in peace, both within and without at this time; Dagobert did not enjoy this Repose very long: for the Second year he was taken with a Dysentery at Espinay, which was one of his Royal Houses upon the Seine, a little below St. Denis. His Sickness increasing, he made them carry him to that Abby, where he dyed the 17th of January, in the year 638. being very near 38 years of age. He Reigned in all but 16 years, as I think, that is, Six in his Fathers life time, and Ten after his death. At his dying he earnestly recommended his Wife Nantilda, and his Son Clovis to Ega, Mayre of the Palace of Neustria, and to such Grandees as were then present.

The great Donations he made to the most famous Churches of France, deserve the unparallel'd Encomiums of the Clergy, who have allowed him all the qualities of as Virtuous, as Wise, as Valiant, and as much accomplish'd a Prince, either for Peace or War, as any that ever Reigned over the French.

The Chronology begins to be very confused and uncertain in this Reign, for some will have it that he dyed An. 639. others, that it was in 643. Some reckon the Sixteen years of his Reign from the death of his Father, others, from the year that he made him King of Austrasia. I am of the opinion of the latter.

Gold and Silver had been very scarce and rare in France in the Reign of Clovis and his Children; but since then, the Expeditions they made into Italy, the Pensions they drew from the Emperours of the East; and as it is credible, the Commerce they settled with the Nations in the Levant, brought great quantities of those precious Mettles, as likewise precious Stones, and rich Vasa's, and Ornaments; insomuch, that the Bravery and Luxury of the Court of France, was not inferiour to the Emperours.

WE shall now henceforward behold the Royal Power in the hands of the Mayres of the Palace, and all the affairs of State, governed according to their capricious Fancies and their Interests. Pepin delivered by the death of Dagobert, who had always kept him near himself, upon some Honourable pretence, got again into the administration of his Office of Mayre of Austrasia. Dagobert having committed the Government of that Kingdom to Duke Aldagise; that Lord gave it up to him, either willingly or by compulsion, and he gave notice thereof to Cunibert the Bishop, his old friend, who was Governour to Sigebert. It was perhaps for his sake that he transferr'd the Court, and Royal Seat of Austrasia, from the City of Metz to that of Colen.

638.

At the instance of the Governours of Austrasia, who required that the Fathers Treasures should be divided betwixt the two young Kings; the Grandees both of the one, and the other Kingdoms assembled at Compiègne, to make the estimate, and to share it.

639.

A year after Pepin's return into Austrasia, he fell sick and dyed, having held the Office of Mayre Seventeen years: a Man as great for Honesty as Policy, being one according to the Heart of God and Man: By his Wife Ita, whom some do name Juberge, he had three Children, a Son named Grimoald, and two Daughters, Begghe and Gertrude; The First Married Ansegise* the Son of St. Arnold, and Father of young Pepin; and being a Widow, Devoted her self to God in the Monastery of Nivelle, with her Mother who built it, and her Sister Gertrude.

* Ansegise, Ansegise, An-
chijus.

Grimoald, with the assistance of Cunibert, got himself into possession of the Office of Mayre of the Palace: but Otho, who was Bail, or Fosterer of the young Prince, and for that reason, very powerful in the Kings House, disputed it with him for three years. In fine, Grimoald, to enjoy it quietly, caused him to be slain by Lentaire, Duke of the Almain. This is the First time that Office descended from Father to Son; hereafter we shall find it Hereditary.

640.

During this Discord, and the minority of Sigebert, Radulfe, or Raoul, Duke of Turingia, sets up for Sovereign; having allied himself with the Slavonians, and made a League with Fare, who would needs revenge the death of Chrodoald his Father, whom King Dagobert had caused to dye for his Crimes. The Austrasian Lords led the Forces of their Kingdom, and the King himself thither, to chastise their Rebellion. At first, Fare having dared to come and meet them, was discomfited, and laid dead dead upon the spot, with the best part of his Men. But the end was not answerable to the beginning. Radulfe being retreated with his Forces, resolved to undergo all extremities, in a Castle built of Wood, which he had furnished with all sorts of Provisions, upon a Hill, nigh the River Onestrud; and Sigebert having Besieged him, a difference hapned amongst his Commanders, some would immediately assault it, others would give the Soldiers time to refresh, and recruit themselves. The First persisted obstinately, and went up to make their Attaque, the rest foreseeing what the event would be, found fit to remain in their Camp, and keep about the King's Person. Radulfe comes forth to meet those that were climbing up to assail him, beats them back, and tumbled them down the steep Hill head-long with great slaughter, the young King who was on Horseback could do nothing more then weep, to behold them cutting the Throats of his Men in his sight. Those who were about him, grew so much afraid, that they sent to demand permission of Radulfe, that they might retire, and had leave from him as a singular favour.

Ega, Mayre of Neustria being dead this year of a Fever, at the Palace of Clieby; Erchinoald, who was of Kinn to King Dagobert, by his Mothers side, a person who had all the virtues that could be desired for that great Office, was substituted in his place.

It was in the Lords of the Kingdom to elect the Mayre, and in the King, or his Guardian to confirm him. Since the death of Varnagier, who ended his life, An 607. there had been none in Burgundy. Queen Nantilda having held an Assembly of the most Principal at Orleans, which was become the Capital of that Kingdom, recommended Floachat her neer kinsman to them, who was chosen for the place.

This good Queen ended her life soon after, having Governed in Neustria four years and a half, without any trouble.

While she was alive, there arose some jealousy in the Governors of Austrasia, against those of Neustria and Burgundy, because those would fain have joyned these two Kingdoms to their own, and have put all France under the Empire of Sigebert, as it had been under that of Clotaire: Erchinoald and Floachat understanding their design, united themselves more closely together, and promised each other mutual assistance.

Floachat made use of this Union to ruine Villebald or Guillebaud, Duke of the Transjurains, his Enemy. They had reconciled themselves, and sworn, and given mutual Faith to each other on the Tombs of Saints, and divers Holy Relicks: Nevertheless Floachat did not forbear, having caused Guillebaud to come to an Assembly which was held at Autun, to fall upon him in his Lodgings; Guillebaud defended himself very bravely, at length he was over-powered and slain, with a great number of his friends, and his Equipage rifled by Erchinoald's followers. But the Murderer, as by Divine Judgment, was seized with a burning Fever, going down the Saon, of which he dyed.

The Sarrazins, a People of Arabia, who were known even in the days of Pompey the Great; and who had since served the Romans in their Armies, were rethred into their own Countreys, and had frequently made incursions upon the Empire. As they were addicted to Robberies, and had neither Law nor Religion, they easily embraced the Mahometan, which was propagated by the Sword.

That Impostor lived but Ten years after he had declared himself Legislator, and made no great progress, having only small numbers of Soldiers, rather like a Captain of Thieves, or High-way Men, then a Prince. But in a very short time his Successors raised themselves prodigiously. Abubecre, the next after him broke into Syria, Ann. 635. his Successor Omar took Damas, with all that fair Province, Ann. 636. and in a few years afterwards Phoenicia, Palestine, Egypt, and Persia it self; the last King whereof was Isdigerd, infecting all those Countreys with the Superstitions of Mahomet. Their Sovereign Commanders were Heads of their Religion, as well as of the State; and they were called Caliphs; an Arabian word, which signifies Lieutenant, that is to say of God, whom they pretended to represent both in Spirituals and Temporals.

A great Famine which afflicted Neustria, obliged Clovis to take the great Plates of Silver, which cover'd the Tabernacle or Chappel of St. Dennis his Shrine, to buy Provisions for the feeding of the Poor; a pious and just Act, for which, nevertheless the Monks say, that God did severely punish him, having weakened and stupify'd his Spirits. It is true, he had a weak Brain, and all those that defended from him, were tainted with that Defect; but at that time he was not above 14 or 15 years of age at most.

The indigency of Authors of those times is so great, and the stile of such as are yet left of them, so confused, that we can hardly tell any thing of certainty, neither as to their actions, nor to the time. Some Chronologists place in Ann. 650. the First day of February, the death of Sigebert, King of Austrasia, who lived but little above 21 years. His Merciful Humour, his Devotion, and Ten or Twelve Abbeys which he built in his Kingdom, have acquired him a room in the Roll of Saints. His Body was buried in the Abby-Church of St. Martin, which he had erected in the Suburbs of Metz, from whence it was transferr'd to Nancy; when the French demolished it, to maintain the Siege against the Emperour Charles V. in the year 1552.

He had but one Son, named Dagobert, aged at most but two years: Grimoald his Mayre of the Palace published, that before he had that Child, he had adopted his Son, named Childebert. It is not credible that he could despair of having any at the age of 19 years, unless that he had made a vow of Continence, and afterwards had broken that Vow again. But perhaps Grimoald proclaimed this, to have some Title to usurp the Kingdom, as he did, when he thought he had disposed things so as he might undertake it.

CLOVIS in Neustria and Bur-
gundy.

DAGOBERT an Infant
in Austrasia.

651.

In the mean time Dagobert the Son of Sigebert, bore the name of a King a year and an half or two years, in which time I meet with nothing considerable, or memorable.

Towards the year 653, Grimoald imagining, as it is probable, that he had duly taken all his measures, caused him to be shaven by Didon, Bishop of Poitiers, and banished, and transported him into Ireland, under the Guard of some people, whom we may believe, had all the care imaginable to keep him concealed, and confined in some remote Monastery. It was a long time before any news could be heard of him; the Queen Imnechild his Mother, sheltered her self under the protection of King Clovis, with whom, as afterwards with Childeric II. his Son, she had great Interest and Power.

652.

This done, Grimoald confidently sets up his Son upon the Throne; there are proofs of some Royal Acts he did: but this attempt lost him all the veneration the Austrasians had for the memory of Pepin, and gave them such horror for their Mayre and his Son, that having taken them in some Ambuscades laid for them, they led Grimoald to Paris to King Clovis, who caused him to be put to death, or as others will have it, confined him to perpetual imprisonment; however there was no more heard of him. It is not said what became of his Son, nor whether the Austrasians elected another Mayre. Perhaps Erchinoald executed that Office in all the three Kingdoms: for since the Decease of Floacat, the Burgundians had created none.

CLOVIS II. Solus.

653. &c.

In these Minorities there being no Authority great enough to curb the Grandees, they audaciously undertook to do any thing what pleased them best, and most commonly deciding their quarrels by the Sword, they put all the Kingdom into a combustion.

655.

The Authors of those times accuse Clovis with giving himself up to the Debauchery, or pleasures of the Mouth, and Women, and make a mighty noise for his having plucked off an Arm from the Body of St. Denis, to place it in his Oratory. They say he immediately fell into a fit of Madness, as if he had been smote from Heaven, and attribute to this attempt, which at the worst, was but an indiscreet Zeal, all the mischiefs that afflicted the Kingdom of France during the Reigns of his Successors.

655.

The same year this King, aged only 21 or 22 years, but having his Brain much shaken with frequent Convulsions, dries up at the Root, and dies in the spring of his age. He did not Reign Seventeen years, if we leave out that whole year wherein Dagobert dyed; as the Authors of these times usually do: but if we account from the very day he succeeded him, he was entering into the Eighteenth; he was interred at St. Denis.

His

His Mayre Erchinoald had amongst his Domestiques, a young English Maid, named Batilda, * of a rare Beauty, but whom he had bought out of the hands of Pyrats, who had stolen her away amongst some other Captives, for in those days they brought great numbers from those parts: he bestowed her upon this young Prince for a Wife, about the year 548, or 49. and of his Slave, made her the Wife of his King. It was given out, that she was of the Blood of the Saxon Princes, who Reigned in England.

* Vulgarly

548.

By this Batilda, Clovis had three Sons, Clotaire, Childeric, and Thierry; Clotaire was saluted King of Neustria and Burgundy, under the Government of his Mother, and Erchinoald, and Childeric made King of Austrasia; whither he was Conducted and left, he and his Kingdom, under the management of Ulfad, Mayre of that Kingdom: Thierry had no share, perhaps, because he was but yet in his Cradle.

THe Government of the Mayre Erchinoald ended with his Life, which hapned in a few Months after the death of Clotir, the II, or as others say, a short time before. Some, with probability enough, make him the prime stock of the House of Alsatia; whence is issued that of Lorraine of these days, which for Nobility, yields to none in Christendom, unless that of France.

The French bestowed that Office upon Ebroin, a man active, valiant, and who being greatly in friendship with the most Holy Men of those times, and Founder of some Churches, was held a good Man; and he lived in that Reputation many years.

Queen Batilda Governed with as much Goodness, Prudence, and Justice, as any wise King could have done: And indeed for Ten years together there hapned no Trouble in her Sons Reign. Before her time, the Gauls, as well those Infants that lay in their Cradles as their Fathers, paid a great Tribute by Poll, which restrained many from Marrying, or obliged them to expose their Children: the good Queen discharged them from it, and forbid those Jews that used to buy such poor innocent Children, and send them into Foreign Countreys, to deal any longer in so inhumane a Trade. Nay, she bought several that those Infidels had already purchased; and likewise such as had been stolen away by Thieves, and sold for that purpose: but she exhorted them to put themselves into Monasteries, which she very greatly desired might be well Peopled.

She had a very particular care for all that concerned the Church: For some time past the Princes had taken Money for Spiritual Promotions; and the Bishops sold by Retail what they bought in the Lump: She forbade that Sacrilegious Traffick.
Besides, she enriched divers Monasteries, with Possessions, and precious Ornaments, obtained immunities for them, and exemptions from Tribute; built two famous Monasteries, one for Women at Chelles, the other for Men at Corbie, on the Somme, and invited many Holy persons to Court: but to tell truth, she gave too much access to the Bishops, either for the good of the Church, or her own Reputation.

Amongst the rest, there were two in very great credit and esteem, Leger, whom she had made Bishop of Autun; and Sigebrand, we cannot tell of what place. This last extremely proud of the Queens Favour, which gave occasion of much jealousy and ill report amongst the envious, did so highly dislike the great ones, that they put him to death, without any form of Process or Trial. After this attempt, whether they apprehended the Resentments of that Princess, or had slandered and bespattered her on purpose, to make her incapable to Govern; they besought her so importunately to retire, that she was obliged to condescend. Even those whom she had most gratified with her Goodness, were of the party: Some of the Grandees conducted her to her Monastery of Chelles, where of a Queen, she became only

664, or only a simple Nun, and yet was more illustrious in her Humility, then she had been in her exalted Greatness. She lived till the year 686.

It is to be believed, that Ebroin the Mayre had managed all this contrivance, that he might be left sole Governour; for when the Reyns were off, his Pride, his Avarice, his Cruelty and Treachery began to appear bare-faced. He seized the Goods, he took away the Offices, he hunted away the Greatest that were about the Court, and forbid any others to come in there without his leave. Above all, he hated Leger, the Bishop of Autun, because he was a Creature of Queen Batilda's, and more able then any other to make head against him, and to bring many more to joyn with him.

665. &c.

King Clotaire having been about three years in the hands of this wicked Minister, dyed the 14th of his Reign, An. 668. He had no Children, but was capable of having some, being 17 or 18 yearsold. Some say he was buried at Chelles, others at St. Denis.

After such an insolent Deportment, Ebroin could not hope that the Grandees of Neustria and Burgundy, whatever King they should Elect, would confirm his Office of Mayre; and therefore upon his own Head, and without waiting for their Assembling or Consent, which was necessary in this case, he takes Thierry, and sets him upon the Royal Throne, according to custom, that this young Prince might have no obligation but to himself alone.

This attempt gave them together, both apprehension and indignation. Fear might have had the upper hand, and made them acquiesce, if he would at least but have suffer'd them to come and congratulate their new King, and make their Court to him; but having sent them a Command not to stir forth of their Houses, their indignation prevail'd, they communicated their Grievances and Discontents; the Bishop of Autun got and kept them together, and they sent a dispatch to Childeric, to proffer him the Kingdom of Neustria.

Childeric comes greatly accompanied; Ebroin is forsaken of all the World, and found no Sanctuary, but the Horns of the Altar. The French, touched with an imprudent Mercy, content themselves with Shaving, and Confining him to the Monastery de Luxeu, to do Penance. His King Thierry is likewise Shaved and sent to the Monastery of St. Denis, not to play the Monk, but to be prisoner there. He had Reigned almost a year in Neustria.

For the Fifth time, the whole Monarchy of France was re-united under one single King. Wlfoad was Mayre of Austrasia; and Leger, if he did not bear the Title, did at least bear the Office in Neustria, and in Burgundy.

They had very much changed the Laws, which the best Kings and the wisest Magistrates had made to deal Justice impartially: honest people desired they might be restored, or revived; their Demand was granted, and it was ordained amongst other things, that the Judges, Counts, and Dukes, should observe the antient Customs of the Countrey, and that those Employments should not be perpetual, lest they should become Tyrannical.

But

But some wicked persons having gotten the ascendent over the young King, and plunging him into the Debauches of Wine and Women, soon brought him to a breach of all these Ordinances, and to do many unjust actions, without the knowledge, or against the opinion of Leger. The Prelates enemies imputing all these faults to him, he was obliged, that he might justify himself, to speak somewhat freely to him, even to the threatening him with the wrath of God.

The young Prince was at first touched with his Remonstrances, or seemed to be so; but when he was confirmed in his Vice, he conceived a Mortal hatred against him: and those Courtiers that had pretended to be Leger's best friends whilst he was in greatest Favour, were those that threw most Oyl upon this Fire.

Childeric was gone to celebrate the Festival of Easter at Autun, where one certain Heitor, Patrician of Marseille, being arrived some days before; they persuaded the King, that those two Lords were met only to plot against him: so that upon the Easter-Eve, being troubled, and having his Head full of the fumes of Choler and Wine, he ran into the Baptistry to kill him. The Holy Prelate, and Heitor perceiving his wrath, endeavoured the following night to avoid it by flight, but they were pursued. Heitor was killed on the way, and the Bishop brought back to the King, who with much ado gave him his Life, and confined him to Luxeu. There he found Ebroin, who reconciled himself to him: The Wolf and the Lamb dwelling together under the same roof, for fear of a more terrible power, and because they had nothing there to decide betwixt them.

In those days Flavius-Vamba was King of the Visigoths. Three Lords of Septimania, a Count, a Bishop, and an Abbot, having revolted against him, he sent the Duke Paul with an Army to chastise them. But that General proving unfaithful to his Prince, joyned with them, taking advantage of their Rebellion, and the assistance of the French and Gascons, to get himself to be Electd, and proclaimed King in Narbona. His Ambition had a shameful end: Vamba having retaken all the Cities he had seized upon, besieged him in the Sands of Nîmes; and the unfortunate wretch surrendered to the Kings Mercy, who led him in triumph thorough the Cities of Spain, and caused his Eyes to be put out. But he durst not break with France: on the contrary, he loaded all those French whom he had taken prisoners, with Gyves, though they had sided with that Rebel.

Childeric's Debauches and Excess easily led his ill nature to the highest Cruelties; he sent two Dukes to Luxeu, to drag out the good Bishop Leger, and hurry him to Court, to be sacrificed to his revenge: and about the same time it hapned, that he caused a Lord, named Bodillon, to be tied to a Post and whipped. The Great ones of the Kingdom resented this Outrage, as if themselves had felt the blows, and wickedly conspired to Treat him as a Tyrant, who Treated them like Slaves. The business being agreed upon, they wait for him at his return from Hunting, in the Forest of Lochoitia, which is perhaps that of Lybons: Bodillon, the most furious of all, revenging himself with his own hand, Massacres him, and with him the Queen Bilechild, who was great with Child; and also a Son of theirs, but very young. The Mayre Wlfoad made his escape, it is not known how, from amidst the swords of these Furies, and retired into Austrasia.

Bilechild is by some Authors, said to be Sister of her Husbands Uncle: but which, they say nothing, nor whether he left any Children, unless we will believe a Chart, or Manuscript, wherein that Daniel Chilperic, whom we shall mention hereafter, is called his Son. The time of his Reign is not agreed upon. The most probable opinion is, that it was Fifteen years in Austrasia, and Three in Neustria and Burgundy, which is about Eighteen years in all.

Some years since, as they were repairing the Church of St. Germain des Prez; they found two Stone Tombs, side by side, in the one lay the Body of a Man, and in the other a Womans, with a little Child. The Inscription bearing the Name of Childeric, and some Regal Ornaments which were therein, discovered that they were the Tombs of this King and his Queen.

An Inter-regnum of some Months.

This Tragical Death was followed with an Inter-regnum, and universal Confusion in all three Kingdoms. The Dukes that had haled St. Leger out of Luxeu, asked him pardon, and conducted him to his City of Autun; where the Burghes and the the Lords of Burgundy made a League to defend him, in case they should attempt upon his Life, during this Inter-regnum.

It is credible, that amidst these Divisions, all the Anstrafians, or at least, part of them, by the perswasion of Queen Imnichilda, Widow of King Sigebert II. and who had had credit in the Court of King Childeric, desiring to have a King that they might not fall under the power of the Neustrians, recalled her Son Dagobert, whom Grimoald had shaven, and banished into Ireland, and acknowledged him for King of Austrasia, where he Reigned many years.

The Lords of Neustria and Burgundy, that they might not fall into an Anarchy, went and drew forth Thierry from the Monastery of St. Denis, where he had time to let his Royal Locks grow again, and set him on the Throne, giving him for Mayre of the Palace Leudesia, or Liutera, the Son of that Erchinoald, who had that Office under Clovis II.

EBROIN having quitted the Monastery of Luxen, after he had wandred a while with a small Band of Men, grew so Confident as to throw off his Clerical Habit; which was in those times esteemed a most horrid thing, though a Man had even been compelled to put it on. His design was to seize upon the Government again: to this end he got together all such as were banished, and such as were Enemies to Leger, whose opposition he most feared, and made a League with Wlfoad Mayre of Austrasia, who mortally hated the Holy Bishop.

With this Crew of Rascally Villains and Anstrafians, he takes the Field, and in an instant falls into Neustria to surprize Thierry and Leudesia his Mayre. The first was passing his time at Nogent in the Country of Laonnois, and the other was in a Palace on this side the Oise. His Enterprize having failed him, because they got away with all speed, he applies himself to fraud; and having, under colour of an Accommodation, engaged Leudesia to come to a Conference, he laid an Ambuscade for him by the way, where he was Assassinated.

All this notwithstanding did not restore him to the Office of Mayre, King Thierry hating him the more, it was not likely he would admit him. He bethinks himself therefore, when he was returned to Austrasia, as he was advised by two evil Bishops who had been Deposed, Didon-Desiree of Chaalons, and Robon of Valence, to spread the Report abroad that Thierry was dead, and to impose a false or pretended Clovis whom he said was Son to Clotaire III. This Statue being set up, he forces the People to take an Oath of Fidelity to him, and ruins all those Countries that refused so to do.

But principally he Assaults Leger in Autun by Vaimar Duke of Champagne, who was accompanied by the two wicked Bishops. He believed with much reason that this was the most stout Opposer of his Tyranny, and that having vanquish'd him, he should easily overcome all the others. The City being besieged and in danger to be forced, this good Prelat could not be persuaded to betray that Faith he owed the King, and on the other side would not expose his Flock, for whom a good Shepherd ought to expose his Life. He therefore went voluntarily out of Autun, after he had broken all his Silver Plate to give to the Poor, and delivers himself to Vaimar. That wicked Man caused his Eyes to be plucked out, and shut him up in a Monastery.

tery. In Recompence for so good a piece of Service, Ebroin instals him in the Bishoprick of Troyes by fraud and violence, and Didon invaded that of Autun; but both the one and the other perished soon after by the same Tyranny, of which they were the Ministers.

Immediately after this, the *Grande*s of Neustria and Burgundy, as if they had left their hearts by the imprisonment of Leger, who indeed was the greatest Genius of that Court, accepted Ebroin for Mayre of Thierry's Palace; and then he having no more need of his false Clouis, took off his Vizard, and returned him to a private Condition.

Being in this high Power, his Tyranny had no bounds, he sacrificed all that had opposed him to his Revenge, and to his Covetousness those that possessed fair Estates, or great Employments: but all under the pretence of some imputed Crime, which deprived them of their Honour, before he robb'd them of their Lives. The most wary saved themselves in time, some in Aquitain, others in the utmost skirts of Austrasia.

678. That he might have a specious Pretence to extend his Cruelty as far as he pleased, he set himself upon a discovery of all those that had any hand in the Death of Chil-deric, for which, it was well known, he rejoiced more than the Actors themselves. He failed not to bring in and involve Leger and the Count Guerin his Brother; These two Lords being brought before him, he caused the latter to be Stoned to death at a Stake, and the other to have the Soles of his Feet torn out, and his Lips cut off, then put him into the Custody of one of his Sattelites, who kept him near two years in the Monastery of Fescamp.

* Owen. The most part of the Bishops flattered him in his Injustice, because they either dreaded him, or had some interest in it. Didon himself, otherwise * Ouin Bishop of Rouen, and one that has a Place in the Kalender of Saints, was his Friend and one of his principal Counsellors. This Man clapt St. Filibert Abbot of Jemies in Prison, for having made some Remonstrances to the Tyrant; And afterwards perceiving that such Violence was too odious in the Eyes of honest People, he banished him to Aquitain, under colour of building a Monastery in the Isle of Herio; Indeed he did Erect one there, whence it took the name of Noir-moustier.

The Exemplary Vertue and Christian Liberty of a few Prelats made the Tyrants Procefs: he undertook to make theirs, and dishonour them to justify his own Conduct which they had condemned. This could not be without the Sentence of their Brethren. To this purpose he therefore calls an Assembly of some that were most devoted to him in one of the Kings Palaces in the Country. They began (thereby to gain a good opinion of their Justice and Impartiality) with two Bishops who deserv'd it very well. These were Didon and Vaimier, who had offended the Tyrant, it is not said wherein. Both these were Degraded, and afterwards delivered over to be put to Death. Didon perished by the Sword, and Vaimier by the Cord.

That done they proceeded against Amat de Sens, Lambert de Tongres, and Leger d'Autun: the two first retired into Monasteries: but as for the other, the Fathers of the Council, or rather the Slaves to that Tyrant, tore his Garment from top to bottom, that was the manner of Degradation; then he was put into the hands of Crodebert Count of the Palace, who having with grief carried him into the Forest d' Iveline, caused his Head to be cut off.

679. About this time died Dagobert King of one part of Austrasia. I know there are some Authors that make him live many years longer, and bestow a Son, and many Daughters upon him: but in my mind it is upon very doubtful proof, and if he had any Son, we cannot say that he outlived his Father, unless some Modern Genealogist have need of it to make up his Account.

680. A little before, or a little after him, Wlfoad his Mayre ended his days, having enjoy'd that Office near twenty five years. The Austrasians having no Prince of the Blood, and refusing to obey Thierry out of hatred to Ebroin, put the whole Government of the Kingdom into the hands of Martin and Pepin; They were Cousin-Germans issued from two Sons of St. Arnolds, the first from Clodulph, the second from Anchisa and Begga the Daughter to Pepin de Landen. To distinguish these, some of our Historians call this Pepin the Gross, others Pepin de Herstal; which is a Village upon the Meuse between Jupil and Liege, where he had been brought up.

THIERRY in Neustria.

MARTIN and PEPIN Princes in Austrasia.

THE two Cousins foreseeing Ebroin would come upon them, went out to attack him first, and gave him Battle near the Forest of Locasao * at the entrance into Neustria. The Tyrant gained the Victory, and they escaped by flight, Martin to the City of Laon, and Pepin a great way in the Kingdom of Austrasia.

Ebroin with his Army approaches Laon, and finding the place impregnable by force, gives out Propositions of Accommodation. Two Bishops, Engilbert of Paris, and Rieul * of Rheims would needs be Instruments of the fraud. They persuaded Martin to go and meet him in his Camp; and for security gave him their Oaths upon the Shrines of some Saints, which they carried about them, but out of which they had taken the Relicks. Martin having forgotten the Example of Ludefia, relies on the Faith of these Prelates; When he was come into the Camp, Ebroin's Soldiers surrounded and cut him off with all his Men. Thus all the Government of Austrasia remained in Pepin, who made advantage of his Enemies Crime, and the defeat of his Cousin.

This great success pushed the insolence of Ebroin to the highest degree. But Treating the French more tyrannical then ever, a Lord named Hermenfroy, whom he had stripp'd of all his Estate, and whom he threatned with Death, delivered France from that Monster: He watched him one Morning before break of day at his going from home to the Church, and cleft his Head with a Sword; afterwards he made his escape into Austrasia.

In his place the French made choice of Varaton a wife old Man, who immediately Treated with Pepin, and gave him Hostages. He had joyned with him in that Administration, a Son of his (named Willimer *) able, crafty, and undertaking: but rough, cholerick, and one that had nothing more in view then the honour of Commanding; This unnatural Child grew weary of being his Fathers Companion, he would be his Master and dispossest him of his Employment.

Presently after he breaks the Treaty with Pepin, and having raised a great Army, marched as far as Namur, where he catches some of his Enemies with the lure of an Hypocritical Faith, and caused them to be slain. At his return from thence he was seized with a Distemper, whereof he died, not without Divine Punishment, being but entred upon the second year of his Office. The old Man was restored to the Place, and Death dispossest him again a year after.

Berthier who had Married a Daughter of his Wives, succeeded him by Election. This was a little fellow, Ill-shaped, Hair-brain'd, Unjust, Proud, Covetous, and in fine much the same as Willimer, only he had neither Wit nor Judgment. The greater part of the Neustrians finding themselves despised and controuled by so contemptible a Creature, conceived so much scorn and hatred for him, that they forsook him the very next year to Ally themselves with Pepin.

This Lord both Generous and Politick took in hand the Cause of those that had been banished by Ebroin, and whom Thierry treated still as Criminals, that he might have some colour to detain their Estates. He advised them to send to that King to implore an Amnesty and Pardon for what was past in the most submissive manner: and after their Supplications had been rejected, he brought them back into their own Country with an Army, and spared not to assault Thierry and his Mayre; He fought them at Tertry, which is between St. Quentin and Peronne. Heavens having favoured him with a compleat Victory, he seized on the Royal Treasure, then on the City of Paris and Thierry's own Person who had sheltered himself there. After which Berthier, whose evil Counsels had occasioned all these mischiefs, was knocked on the Head by Combination of almost all the Neustrians, and the instigation even of his Wives own Mother.

Some, not without reason, do here put an end to the Reign of the Merovingians, because in truth and in effect they never had after this but only the vain and empty Title of Kings, their whole Kingdom, and even their Persons being in the Power of Pepin and his Children. He was owned Mayre of the Palace through all France, and he took the Title of Duke or Commander of the French, according to the ancient usage of the Germans; that is to say they gave him all Authority in the Armies without dependance upon the King, but under whose name notwithstanding all Acts were passed; and that was the sole honour that remained still in him.

Austrasia environned with fierce and rebellious People, wanted the presence of Pepin: He durst not take King Thierry with him, lest he should displease the Neustrians, but he left a Lord with him called Nordbert who disposed of all, and gave him an account.

687. The French found no prejudice by this change, the interest of a new Prince who desired to Establish himself, being to gain the Affections of the People: and indeed, he repaired all the Breaches that he possibly could, which had been made in the foregoing Reigns, restored what had been ravished from the Church, the Bishops to their Sees, the Grandees in their Dignities and Lands, resolved upon nothing without the Advice of the Lords and Prelates, defended the Cause of the Oppressed, of Widdows and Orphans, and applied himself to give vigour to the Laws, which are the only Shields for the weak against the mighty ones.

688. The second year of his general Command, he drew the French Militia together, and by the Advice of the great ones carried the War into Frisia, and compelled the Duke or King Ratbod who revolted, to render him Obedience, and to pay him Tribute.

At his return he called a Council, the place is not named, wherein they Treated and Considered of the ways and means that should be taken to repress Disorders and Violence, and for the defence of the Church, of Widdows and Orphans. He knew there were no greater Charms to make them love his Government, then Piety and Justice.

Poor Thierry being stripp'd of the real part of his Royalty, which is his just Power, and reduced to be contented with a moderate Revenue in Lands, ended his days, but not his shame, in the year 690. or 91. They allow him Thirty nine or forty years of Age, and his Reign to be Seventeen entire, that is Thirteen before Pepin's Victory, and four under the Power of that Mayre.

He had two Sons, Clovis and Childebert, and two Wives Clotilda and Doda, unless that name of Doda * were an Epithet of Crotilda, who perhaps was so called because she was fat and plump. His Tomb and that of this Doda are to be seen at St. Vaast of Arras.

IF there had been two Kings, there must have been two Mayres, but Pepin would hold that Office alone: besides he could not suffer any King in Austrasia, because he held that as properly his own: for this reason he gave to Clovis, which was the eldest of Thierry's two Sons, the Title of King in Neustria and Burgundy, but himself kept the whole Administration.

Perhaps the French according to their ancient Right, had conferred upon him the Sovereignty of Austrasia: but it is certain, that all those People who were Tributary's to that Kingdom, as the Turingians, the Frisians, the Saxons, the Almains shook off the Yoak and made themselves Independents. On the other hand, the Aquitains, and likewise the Gascons created each a Sovereign Duke of their own, and the Bretons enlarged their little Frontiers.

Clovis, according to some, Reigned but two years, others more probably give him four compleat. He died about the end of the year 694. or in the beginning of 695. being Aged Fourteen or fifteen years, and neither had seen nor done any thing that was Memorable in his Reign.

In these days Egica King of the Visigoths had War with the French, towards the borders of the third Aquitain; the success we know not.

Norbert who was the sub-Mayre and Lieutenant to Pepin in Nensria, being deceased, Pepin caused Grimoald his young Son to be elected Mayre of that Kingdom, and gave the Dutchy of Champagne to his eldest Son Drogo, whom he would keep near him.

Ratbod King of the Frisians, notwithstanding he had given his Faith and Hostages, revolts a second time, and is again beaten by Pepin near Dorstat.

There was nothing observable in the eight or nine following years.

Pepin, besides his Wife Plestrude, who was already old, had taken a Concubine, or if you will a lawful Wife; for the French, notwithstanding the sacred Canons and the Prohibitions of the Church, repudiated their Wives when they pleased, and Wedded others. The Kings themselves, according to the ancient Custom of the Germans, had often many at one time. This same was called Alpaide: Pepin had a Son by her named Charles, and since surnamed Martel. Lambert Bishop of Liege, a Zealous Defender of the Christian Truth, having dared to reprove him several times, and called that Conjunction Adultery in public: Dodon the Brother to Alpaide Assassinated him by consent of Pepin. Soon after, the Murderer being eaten with Worms, and enduring horrible Torments a while, cast himself into the Menfe. This infection of Worms was very frequent, and as it were Epidemick at that time, as have been St. Anthony's Fire and some other odd Diseases.

Not long after Pepin lost Drogo or Dreux his eldest Son, who left two Sons, Hugh and Arnold, by his Wife Austrude, who was the Widdow of the Mayre Berthier.

The

Childebert II. King XVII.

The Almans and Souabues made now but one People; governed by the same Duke, who appertained to the Kings of Austrasia, or held of them: But Godfrey the now Duke had cast off the Yoke to make himself independent; Being dead Anno 709. Willehaire succeeded him. Pepin in two Expeditions which he made thither, vanquished him, and triumphed over his Pride. He could not wholly subdue it though, so that it was found necessary to send a third Army into that Country: but when they were just ready to march in, he was obliged to recall it because of the Death of Childebert.

711.

The last of this Kings days was the 15th of April, Anno 711. He was Aged about Twenty eight years, and had enjoyed the Title of King Sixteen or seventeen years. He was buried at the Church of St. Stephens at Coucy.

711.

Though he had not the opportunity of doing any Act himself, being as it were Tethered by the Authority of Pepin: nevertheless they gave him the name of Just, rather to distinguish him from the other Childebert, then because he deserved it.

Some give him two Sons, Dagobert and Childeric. The first Reigned, the other was bred up to Learning or Clerkship, and surnamed Daniel. There are those that will make him to be the Son of Thierry the First.

The Piety of Gontran, the Mildness and Justice of Clotaire, and the Tranquillity of his Reign after the death of Bruneaud, turned the genius of the French, already very Devout, to be highly Religious, and inclined them more generally to Reverence holy things, and such as they believed to have a more frequent Communication with Heaven. The Kings and Grandees outvied each other, who should bestow most Gifts upon the Churches: They deposited in those sacred Treasuries even to their very Girdles, their Belts, their Precious Vessels, their Apparel when they were rich and set with precious Stones, or Embroidered, their Household Furniture, and any other Rarities which were more for Ornament then use. It was then who should build most Churches and Hospitals, and who should found the noblest Monasteries.

Church.

The Kings strove to exempt such as they founded, from all Temporal Jurisdiction and Charges, and to ascertain the full and free Possession of all what they bestowed. And therefore because of the assumed power the Bishops had to lay hands on all those Goods, and that they disposed of the Donations and Offerings which were made to any of the Churches within their Diocess, and for that besides they took some certain Duties for Blessing the Chrisme, for the Consecration of Altars, for their Visiting, and sometimes for Ordinations: they obliged them to free them from all such Impositions, and even not to meddle with any Monastery, but to leave the Correction and Government of the Monks to the Abbot, excepting in case he had not power enough to compel Obedience, and withall to confer the Sacred Orders to such Monks as should be presented, without exacting any thing.

The Princes on their part did likewise freely bestow many the like Immunities, which exempted them as well from Contribution for their Lands, and from all Imposts on their Goods, as from New-years-Gifts, Lodging and Expence of Judges, which they claimed from all other People wherever they went to hold their Courts.

Now these Exemptions were agreed to by the Diocesan, but with the consent of his Brethren of the Clergy. That of St. Denis, the oldest now remaining, was conceded by Landry of Paris, upon the intreaty of King Clotaire II. Anno 659. in the Assembly of Clichy: it containeth many more things then the Protocole or Deed of Marculfe. That of Corbie was given by Bertefoy of Amiens, Anno 664. at the request of Queen Batilda. It makes mention, that there had been the like heretofore granted to the Monasteries of * Agaune, and * Lerins, and Leuxen.

Pope Adeodat in the year 672. confirmed that which had been granted to St. Martins at Tours, saying, That divers others in France had obtained the like, without which he would not have given his consent, it being contrary to the Canons. There was the like granted to * Fontenels by Ansbart of Rouen, in a Council which he called for that purpose in that City, 682. In fine, there were few great Abbies that did not obtain the like; and ever the last gained something more, and enlarged themselves as I may say, to the prejudice and cost of the Hierarchy, who lent them her Authority to destroy her self, and them likewise, since the Perfection of a good and holy Monk consists in Obedience and Humility.

I hardly find any Age wherein the heat for a Monastick Life reigned so greatly as in this. Such as were prompted with that Spirit, went from one Country to another, wandering in every corner to seek out Forests and Mountains; which were the more and sooner peopled by how much they were the more solitary and melancholly. Ireland, Scotland, and England sent great numbers of these good Monks into France. Colombanus the most renowned of all, Irish by Birth, having been very well received by King Contran, then by Childebert, built the famous Monastery of Luxeu, in the Mountain of Vosge; His Reputation spreading over the three Nations, drew thither a vast number of People; and the Sentence of the Council of Mascon in the year 627. who undertook the defence of this Institute, against the Monk Agristin who would oppose him, gave him such a Vogue, that it spread all over France, going an equal pace with St. Bennets, and producing most eminent Servants to God, as Emery, Deile, * Eustasius, and Gal, Disciples of Colombanus. Eustasius was Abbot of Luxeu, and Gal who was likewise an Irishman, went and built a Monastery in the Country of the Swissers, about which was afterwards raised the City of St. Gall.

* Deicola.

St. Vandrille built one in the Diocess of Rouen, at that place called Fontenelle. St. Riquier one in Vimieu. St. Vallery and St. Josse two others in the Diocess of Amiens upon the Sea-coast. This St. Josse was younger Brother of Judicael King of Bretagne, and had for Brother Vinok and two more who all chose to lead the same Life. St. Ghislain one in Haynault, Romarc one for * Nuns in the Vosge, in the place where stood his Castle of *Romborg, St. Tron one in the Country of Liege, St. Bavon one at Ghent, St. Goar one on the River Woker near the Rhine; All these Monasteries to this very day bear the names of these Saints.

* Remiremont.* Trudon.

The Princes or Grandees gave them Ground whereon to build them, together with the assistance of devout People, and sometimes some of them did build at their own Charge and Expence. Sigebert King of Austrasia erected twelve; A Lord named Bobelen four in the neighbourhood of Bourges; Clovis II. or rather an Archdeacon of Paris, St. Maur des Fosses; The Queen Batilda two very famous ones, viz. Corbie for Men, and Chelles for Women; King Thierry St. Vaast of Arras, as an Expiation for having consented to the death of St. Leger; St. Ouen or Owen filled his Diocess with a great number, the most illustrious of them are Fontenelle, Fescamp and Gemieges. This last, as likewise that of Noir-moustier in an Island of Poitou was the work or production of the care of that Philebert whom we have mentioned. St. Eloy amongst many others built one at Solignac in Limousin, and one for Virgins at Paris, of which St. Aura was the Abbess; At this time it is the Church of St. Eloy before the Palace inhabited by the Barnabites.

Nor was there ever in France such prodigious multitudes and swarms of Monks who lived a most admirable Life in the Eye of all the World. For besides those I have mentioned, there was likewise Ame whom Colombanus had brought from the solitude of Againe, Bertin who made a Monastery at Sitten: 'Tis there where at present is the City of St. Omers. * Germier who has given his name to a small City within twelve Leagues of Lyons: Fourfy a Scotchman who erected a Monastery at Lagny: Landelin who began that of Lobe upon the Sambre: St. Sor a Hermit in Perigord, and divers others, whose Memories the Church does Celebrate with Veneration.

* Baldomer.

We must acknowledge that these Flocks of Penitents were very useful to France, yea, beneficial to the Temporal Advantage; For the frequent and long incursions of the Barbarians having destroy'd and laid it waste and desolate, it was yet in many parts over-run with Thickets and Woods, and in the low Grounds, drowned and Boggy. These good Monks who had not devoted themselves to God to live an idle life, wrought with their hands, to clear and drain, and Plant and build, not so much for themselves who liv'd in great frugality, as to maintain the Poor, so that of Barren, Woody, overflown drowned Desarts, that were frightful to look upon, they made fruitful and delightful places, the Heavens with its sweetest influences favouring those places that were cultivated by such pure and disinterested Hands. I shall not mention how that all what is remaining of the History of those Ages has been preserved by them also, and derived to us.

The weaker Sex had not less strength and resolution to lead this Penitent Life, then the Men. The noblest Virgins sought for * Husbands in the Cloister, and Widows found their greatest Comforts there; Princesses built some expressly for their own Retirement. Queen Batilda, or Baudour made one at Chelles in Brie; Fare

* Vowed or Marry'd themselves to Chastity and Devotion.

Fare or Burgundofare Sister to the Bishop St. Faron another in the same Country, which is called Fare-moustier; Gertrude a Virgin, and Begge her Sister, Widdow of Ansegise Son of St. Arnold, both Daughters of Pepin, retired to that of Nivelle, which their Mother Isa had founded; Aldegonda and her Sister Vaultrade erected one at Maubeuge on the Sambre; And Saleberge another in the Town of Laon.

In all these Ages (which we shall observe once for all) a great many of the Bishops were taken out of Monasteries, or made their retreat thither after they had served the Church some years. Amongst those holy Pastors who most enlightened the Church by their Life and Doctrine, we find in this, Romain of Rouen, who is said to have quelled and overcome a prodigious Dragon, in memory whereof his Shrine hath yet the privilege to save every year one Murderer from Execution, Faron de Meaux, Magloire de Dol, Archard de Noyon, two Didiers, one of Vienne Martyr'd by Bruneaud, the other of Cahors promoted to that Bishoprick by Dagobert I. whose Grand-Treasurer he was; Arnold of Metz, Cunibert de Cologne, Oudrille * de Bourges, Amand the Bishop of Tongres or Liege, Audoen surnamed Dadon, vulgarly St. Owen, Successor to Romain before-mentioned, and Eloy de Noyon after Archard. These two were illustrious in the Court of Clovis II. the one for his rare Goldsmiths Works; the other in the Office of Chancellor or Referendary, and for his Counsel, both these were Consecrated on the same day in the Reign of Clovis II. and this Character gave them the greater Authority with the King. At the same time lived Landry of Paris, Paul de Verdun, Leger * d' Autun, * Prey or Priet de Clermont, who was not much his Friend, no more then Owen or Ouin; Omer de * Terrouenne, Sulpitius the Pious after Oudrille. About the end of this Age or Century, Robert first Bishop of Salzburg in Bavaria, Remacle Bishop of Tongres, who was a Monk both before and afterwards, and Wilbrod who took the name of Clement, an English Priest, in whose favour was first Established the Arch-Episcopal See at Virecht, Anno 697. Amongst all these I observe four that made most generous Remonstrances to their Princes against their excess, Amand to King Dagobert, Didier to Bruneaud, Leger to Childeric, and Lambert to Duke Pepin; These three last sealed the Christian Truths with their Blood.

* Ansegisus.* Leodecarius.* Præjellus.* Andomatius.

The Kings favour having the greatest influence in all Elections, we must not wonder if those that attained to a Bishoprick by that means, were either People of the Court, or became so; and if by the advantage of Study and Learning they had a little more knowledge and insight then others, the Princes would keep them there to serve in their Councils. But we may observe that the Court Air was no less dangerous to them, then contrary to the Duty of their Residence, since Arnold himself retired from thence to do Penance, and that those who passed for the most holy, as Owen and Leger, had their Interests, their Cabals and their Passions there. What can we believe of others who were less Vertuous, but they committed all sorts of Irregularities, which sometimes led them into the most enormous Crimes, of which they were the Instruments, and many times the Actors and Executioners. For proof of this, we need but call to mind that wicked Bishop, who undertook to suborn Queen Beretrude, those two Flatterers of Ebroin who forswore themselves upon the empty Cafes or Shrines to bring Martin to Butchery, and those two false Councils, whereof the one condemned Didier of Vienne, the other St. Leger d' Autun, without ever endeavouring afterwards to interpose by Petitions and Prayers for saving their Lives, which those Kings never refused them.

Because of these Disorders and those the Civil Wars produced, which much troubled France, the Councils were much less frequent then in the foregoing Age. We have already mentioned the Fifth of Paris *. There was one assembled at Mascon in 627. which approved the Rule of St. Colomban, much opposed by the Monk Agristin revolted against him. Anno 630. there was one at Reims concerning Discipline, one at Chalons, Anno 650. and one at Autun called by St. Leger, Anno 670. for the same purpose. In that of Chalons, Agapius and Bobon, who, as I believe, were Concurrents, were deposed. There was one at Orleans in the year 645. which confuted a Greek Monothelite Heretick, and drove him most shamefully out of France. We have the Canons of that of Paris, of Reims, and of Chalons, and some of that of Autun, which are most of them no other then a Confirmation of such as had been made by the foregoing Councils.

* See Page the 51.

France had no share in the Controversy of the Monothelites, who mightily disturbed the Eastern Church. The shame that Grecian met with in the Council of Orleanse, who thought to have introduced that Heresie, hindred others, as I suppose, from coming to Preach or cry it up, and the French from being infected with it. Which without doubt encouraged Pope Martin not to be daunted with the Threatnings of the Emperor *Constance, nor the endeavours of Paul Bishop of Constantinople, who had undertaken to obtain the Reception of that condemned Opinion, and had joyned all those to his Party that adhered to the Doctrines of Severus, of Eutyches, and of Manes. And indeed we find that in the year 649. he sent the Articles of the Council of Rome to Clotiv II. and desired him and also King Childebert to depute some of their Bishops to Rome; that they might accompany and countenance the Legation he intended to send to the Emperor upon that Subject.

Dagobert II. King XVIII.

POPES,

CONSTANTINE, Three years in this Reign.

GREG. II. Elected March 714.

S. sixteen years nine Months and an half, of which one year in this Reign.

DAGOBERT II. Called the Young, PEPIN, Mayre in Neustria, and So-Aged Eleven or twelve years. Pe veraign in Aultrasia.

Childebert being out of the World, Pepin made choice of Dagobert his eldest Son to wear the Bauble, and instaled him in the Royal Throne, by the Counsel and Approbation of the Estates. Where having caused him to preside, after he had received the Gifts or Presents from the French, after he had recommended the care of the Rights of the Church, of Widdows and Pupils, renewed the Decree against Rapine, and given Command to the Army to hold themselves in readines at a time appointed to March where Affairs required: he sent him back to one of the Royal Houses to be Bred and Entertained with great Respect in outward appearance, but without any Power or Function.

The first year of his Reign, Pepin undertook a fourth Expedition against the Almans; who were this time so battered, that they could not stir again for many years.

After many Wars, having not been able wholly to bring under him Ratbod Duke of the Frisons, he not only came to an Agreement, but likewise allied himself with him, by Marrying his Son Grimoald to that Kings Daughter.

The Sarrazins who were Masters of Africa, did not let slip the fair occasion that presented to invade Spain. The Children of King Vitiza had been Excluded the Kingdom by Roderick, (whose Fathers Eyes Vitiza had caused to be put out) and had retired themselves to Julian, Governor of the Visigoths in the Province of Tingi, who was himself likewise much offended for that this new King having Debauched his Daughter would own her but for his Concubine. These three Lords having joyned their Resentments, addressed themselves to Maza Lieutenant in Africa under Valis or Ulit Caliph, or chief Sovereign of the Sarrazins; He gave them some Forces, over whom Roderick, getting the better, he again sent others commanded by Tarac (this was he that gave the name to Gibal-Tar) to the Mountain Calphe, where he built a Fort, whence likewise the Straights-mouth hath its denomination. At length there hapned a great Battle betwixt him and Roderick, where that King was overcome and slain with all the flower of the Visigoths.

Within two years all Spain was subjected to the Tyranny of the Sarrazins, the remainders of the Visigoths fled part of them into the Mountains of Asturia and Galicia, part into France, from whence they by degrees came all to Prince Pelagus, Son of Fasla and Grandson of King Chindasuint, who yet preserved to himself a petty Principality amidst the Mountains of Asturia, which in process of time and by assistance of the French, increased so much that it consumed the Sarrazins in the end.

While Pepin was at Jupile, he fell into a long and troublesome Distemper. His Son Grimoald going to Visit him, passing by Liege to make some Prayers for him on St. Lamberts Tomb, this was in the Month of April, he was Assassinated by a Rascal named Rangaire, a Frison, for which reason an Author hath pretended, that it was done by the command of Ratbod his Father-in-Law.

Pepin being Recovered, severely revenged the Death of his Son upon all the Accomplices he could lay hold on. This was the dearest to him of all his Sons, he had likewise a great regard for his Bastard, named Theodoald, and obliged the Neustrian Lords to elect him for their Mayre.

Some months after he relapsed more grievously then before, in so much as he died of it the 18th of December, having held the Government of all France from the Battle of Terry, which was in 687: even to his Death, with great success, and with much greater Vertue, of which the most eminent, and which gained him most the favour of Heaven, was his Zeal for the propagation of the Faith, not having spared any thing to plant it in Germania, Secunda, and beyond the Rhine, where all the Inhabitants were at that time Idolaters.

Besides Drogon and Grimoald, he had two more Sons, Charles Martel and Childebrand. It is unknown by what Woman he had the last, but a very exact Historian hath proved that this Robert le Fort, (the Strong) who was the Paternal Great, great Grandfather of King Hugh Capet, was descended from him by the Male Line.

Now be it that Pepin left the Mayrie of Austrasia to Arnold, who was the Son of Drogon, as that of Neustria to Theodoald, or changing his mind a little before he died, had bestowed it upon Charles for all the three Kingdoms, or perhaps only the name of Prince of the French, which seems to be above that of Mayre; Plectrude his Widow seized upon the whole Government, and got Charles by a wife into her hands, keeping him Prisoner at Colen, where she made her usual abode.

But the Neustrians already tired with the Domination of the Austrasians, were yet more impatient of being ruled by a Woman. They therefore Armed themselves, and put their King Dagobert in the head of their Forces, to prevent her from coming under the name of Theodoald a Child and a Bastard, to usurp the Government of their Country.

The Army that brought Theodoald being near Compeigne, the Neustrians went to meet them, and put them to the rout: All the Austrasians could do, was to save Theodoald. After this Victory they chose Ragenfroy, or Rainfroy for their Mayre, being one of the most considerable and most valiant Lords amongst them: who to perplex the Austrasians the more, made a League with Ratbod Duke of the Frisons, and led King Dagobert to ransack Austrasia even to the Mense.

It then hapned that the Austrasians being in a great consternation, Charles happily made his escape out of Prison, and having gotten his Friends together, was received with incredible joy by all his People.

About the end of the same year died Dagobert King of Neustria, after he had been a property to the Mayres for four or five years. He left one Son named Thierry, who was yet in his Cradle, and who had afterwards the surname of Chelles, because he was brought up there.

Immediately upon this Rainfroy that he might have a name under which he might still hold the Government, took Daniel out of the Monastery, caused him to be instaled in the Throne by the Grandees according to custom, and named him Chilperic. It is not certainly known whose Son he was, some believe him to have been Childeberts, others Thierry's, and others again the Son of that Childeric who was Assassinated by Bodillon, Anno 673. If these last are in the right, he was at least Forty four years old when he began to Reign, and indeed he must have been of some years, since he had been a Clerk, and had staid time enough to let his Hair grow long again.

Chilperic II. King XIX.

P O P E,

GREGORY II. Who S. six years during this Reign.

CHILPERIC II. King in Neustria, part of Austrasia.
with Rainfroy his Mayre.

CHARLES, Mayre or Prince in one THEODOALD, Under the Regency of Plectrude in the other part.

BY vertue of a League contracted the foregoing year, Rainfroy and Ratbod did both assault Charles on each side, Ratbod being entred into the Country as far as Colen, met him in his way, it was in the month of March. The Battle was very bloody on either hand; but disadvantageous to the last; and this was almost the only misfortune or defeat he met with in his whole Life.

After this Victory the Frisons and the Neustrians joyned their Forces, sacked all the open Country and besieged Colen. Plectrude who was in the Town with her Nephews, found means to make them withdraw again by giving them Money. In the mean time Charles having rallied his Men together, laid an Ambuscade for Rainfroy at his return, where he beat and plundered a Party of his Army. This was in the Ardennes at the place named Amblave from the River which passes there near the Abby of Staulon.

The following year he in his turn made an irruption into Neustria. Rainfroy with his Childeric came against him, and gave him Battle at the Village of Vincisc, in Cambresis, upon a Sunday the 20th of March. The success being a long while doubtful, ended in favour of the last; he put Rainfroy to the rout, and pursued him very near to Paris.

At his return Austrasia owned him for their Head, Colen opened him her Gates, and Plectrude was constrained to give him up his Father Pepins Treasure, together with his Grand-children Theodoald, Hugh, and Arnold, whom he kept under a strong Guard.

Though he had all these Advantages, he yet wanted the name of a King: he therefore gave that Title to one Clotaire who was of the Blood Royal. Some make him the Son of Thierry III. not long since deceased, perhaps he might be the Son of Clouis II. Son of Dagobert.

RAINFROY, Mayre.

CLOTAIRE, in Austrasia.

CHILPERIC, in Neustria.

CHARLES MARTEL, Mayre.

Rainfroy finding little Assistance from the Frisons, had recourse to the Aquitains, who during these Troubles had taken to themselves the liberty of electing a Duke; his name was Odon or Endes. This Duke and Rainfroy having joyned their Forces nigh Paris, took their March to find out the Enemy in Austrasia. Being come near Soissons, they were much amazed to hear that he was come to meet them himself, and was very near at hand; And indeed, he charged them so furiously, that he routed them, and gave them Chase even to Paris. Endes retired himself into Aquitain, and carried carried Chilperic and his Treasure with him. Charles pursuing him over-ran Orleannois and Tourrain at his pleasure. This Victory put the whole Kingdoms of Neustria and Burgundy into his hands.

719. His Clotaire did not long bear the Title of King, he died the same or the following year. His Tomb is at Coucy in Vermandois.

After his death Martel governed some months without any King: but knowing the People were too much accustomed to that name to be without it, he sent to Eudes to profer him a Peace, and to send back Chilperic: Eudes accepted the Conditions, and sent him to him with many Presents. Charles causes him to be owned for King thorough all the three Kingdoms, that so he only might be Mayre. Pope Gregory II.
calls him Duke and Mayre of the Palace of France; which shews that he held himself as an Officer of the Kingdoms, and not of the King.

CHILPERIC alone. MARTEL sole Mayre.

OF all the People who being Tributary's to the French had revolted, the Saxons were the most Potent: They had not only thrown off the Yoak, but had likewise imposed it upon the Bructeri, the Atuari, and the Toringians. Martel carried his Forces thither three or four times to quell them: but that honour was reserved for Charles the Great. It is worthy our taking notice, that they were divided into several distinct People, and that they had almost as many Dukes as there were several Countries belonging to them.

721. The Saracens pretended that Septimania, or Narbonensis Prima, having been part of the Kingdom of the Visigoths, ought to be an Augmentation to their Conquests.
Zaman Governor of Spain under the grand Emir, Isic or Gizit, took Narbonna and put in a Garison: but having besieged Thoulouze, Duke Eudes began to bestir himself, defeated his Army, and drove him bravely thence. Ambissa Succellor to Zaman conquered Carcaffonna, Nismes, and all the rest of Provence as far as the Rhosne.

721. Chilperic did not live two years after his Re-establishment, and Reigned in all but five or six, dying in the City of Noyon either in this year 721. or in the year before.
He was buried in the same place.

Thierry

Thierry II. King XX.

POPE S,

GREGORY II. Who S. near
Ten years; during this Reign.

GREGORY III. Elect 731.
in Apr. S. Ten years Three Months; of which about Seven in this Reign.

THIERRY II. named de Chelles, CHARLES, Duke and Maire aged about Six years. of France.

Immediately after, Charles, who would ever have an Image wherewith to amuse the People, caused Thierry, or Theoderic the II. Son of King Dagobert the II. to be Installed by an Assembly of the Grandeess.

Rainfroy was abandoned by Eudes, but had not yet laid down the Title of 722. Mayre of Neustria, and for this cause Charles besieged him in Angiers. He secured himself for this bout by the strength of the place; but the year after he was forced and slain; or at least degraded of his Mayership, and reduced to a private condition.

During these Four or Five years, Charles had divers Wars with the Saxons, the 733. Almans, and the Bavarois. In the year 725. he reduced Hubert, Duke of Bavaria,
725. and all that Countrey, and carried away with him Bilistrude, and her Neece Bilichilde.
Some are of opinion, that this Bilistrude is the same before-mentioned Pleistrude, that had retired her self to this place, to procure him fresh troubles. She must needs then have been very aged; but it appears rather that she was Sister to Odillon Duke of Bavaria, and Widow of some Lord of that Countrey, as yet very beautiful, since Martel would take the trouble of bringing her; unless it were some affection he had for the Neece, whom indeed he was Married unto some while after.

After divers Wars against the People beyond the Rhine, of which we have no par-
730. ticulars, hapned that against Aquitain, Duke Eudes had broken the Treaty made with Charles, and made a League with the Sarracins Munnuxa, (giving him for pledge of this Union, his Daughter Lampagne, one of the most beautiful Princesses of those times. This Munnuxa was Governour of the Spanish Countreys on this side the Hebrus, but was revolted from Isam, who was Caliph. Charles, who was ever on Horseback, having had intelligence that Eudes moved, falls immediately into Aquitain, and having sacked it all as far as the Garonne, severely chastised him for his breach.

But he was not quit for all this, for at the same time as Charles went out, *Abdi-
731. racman*, or Abderame, Lieutenant-General of the Caliph Isam in Spain, being entred in another way, after he had vanquished, and taken Munnuxa prisoner in Cerdagne, with his new Spouse, traversed Aquitania Tertia, perhaps not without fighting the Gascons who held it, and forced and sacked the City of Bordeaux. In this manner it was that Eudes drew the Saracens into France; which hath given occasion to some to write that they were called in.

Now he durst not wait for them beyond the Rivers, but was retreated on this side the Dordogne: and there being reconciled with Martel, he assembled his Forces, staying for him to come and joyn him with his French Men. Abderame would not allow him the time, but pressing still forwards, passed the River to attaque him in his Camp.
732. The Duke stood his ground, and fought him as bravely as could be; but in the end was overcome with inestimable loss of People. However some small portions of this great wrack were left him, with which he made his Retreat, and came and joyned Martel's Army, which had passed the Loire and were Encamped, some say near Tours, upon the River of Cher; others a little on this side of Poitiers.

M

732.

Abderame following his blow, after he had sacked the City of Poitiers, marched directly to Tours, to plunder the Sepulchre of St. Martin; in his way he meets with Martel, who puts him to a full stop. The two Armies having looked with threatening countenance upon each other seven days, beginning first with several skirmishes, at length came to a general Battle, which was given upon a Saturday in the month of October. The Saracens being light and nimble, charged with much briskness; but being ill Armed, broke themselves against the great Battallions of the French, who were sheltered under their Bucklers. There were great numbers slain, but not 375000, as hath been said, for in their whole Army there were but 80 or 100000 Men. Abderame himself the General perished there. The night parted the fray, and favoured the Infidels, who not daring to abide another day, Engagement, Retreated by long Marches into Septimania: the French perceived, very late, that their Camp was forsaken; but fearing some stratagem, and withal, being busy in getting together, and sharing the Plunder, which was very rich, they did not endeavour to pursue them.

This great Victory secured Christendom, which would have become a prey to the Barbarians, if they had gained France, which was its only Bulwark: but it seems Charles did not make good use of this great advantage, no more then of all those others that Heaven bestowed upon him: when he gained his ends, he set himself upon persecuting every thing that cast but the least shadow upon his Grandeur; even the very Prelats, whom he banished, and imprisoned, taking away, not only the Treasures and Revenues of the Churches, to pay his Captains; but likewise bestowing on them Abby's and Bishopricks for their reward; so that there were many without Pastors, and Monasteries were filled more with Soldiers then with Monks. The Churches of Lyon, of Vienne, of Auxerre, were destitute of their Bishops, and dispoiled of their Goods, which he had given to his Martial Officers, as if they had been a Prize taken from the Enemy.

Upon his return from Aquitain, he banished Eucher, bishop of Orleans, with some of his Kindred, first to Colein, then into the Countrey of Herbain, because he defended the Rights and Possessions of the Church with too much courage. Five years before he had also banished Rigobert, Bishop of Reims, who had refused him his Gates when he marched against Rainfroy.

The Kingdom of Burgundy did not as yet own his Commands; perhaps Arnold, the Son of Grimoald, whom some believe was their Duke, thought to hold the Sovereignty. When he had conquered the Saracens he marches directly to them, and brings all the Countrey into subjection.

734.

With the like expedition he vanquished the Frisons, killed their Duke Popon, who succeeded Ratbod in a great Battle, subjugated afterwards the Ostergow, and the Westergow, these are two Countreys in West Frisia, pulled down all their Temples, their Sacred Groves, and their Idols, and covered all the Land with slaughter and destruction, and the rubbish of their Ruines.

The year following a new War was kindled betwixt him and the Duke of Aquitain; this Duke having been compelled to make a very disadvantageous Treaty with Charles, to procure assistance against the Saracens, as soon as the danger was over, scorned to keep his word; Therefore Martel marches a third time into his Countrey, and having followed him at the very heels with his drawn Sword from place to place, without being able to catch him, returned home laden with spoil.

The same year Death ended the misfortunes of that Duke, but not those of Aquitain. He had two Sons, Hunoud and Hatton; some add Remistang, who to others appears rather to be his Wives Brother. He bestowed upon Hatton the County of Poitiers, for his Portion; Hunoud had all the rest of the First and Second Aquitain,* of which he took possession, as if it had been an Hereditary and Independant Estate. Charles, who would have no other partaker, soon returned again with his Army, and marching quite thorough to the Garonne, seized upon Blaye, and some other places; so that Hunoud was constrained to submit to his Will, and receive the Duchy from him as he had before from his Father, giving his Oath both to him and to his Son Pepin.

His Celerity and his Valour did let nothing escape; the same year he beat the Aquitain Forces, and went and settled the Governours that had disturbed the City of Lyon, and a part of Burgundy, and proceeding forward, made sure of Provence, and put Governours into Arles and Marfeilles. From thence he turned upon the Saxons, beyond the Rhine, and brought them so low, that they did not afterwards make any attempt for divers years.

As

As Martel was an Usurper, every Governour thought he had reason enough to disobey him, and acted like Sovereigns. Maurontus, Governour of Marfeilles, that he might make himself Independent, craved the assistance of the Saracens, and delivered the City of Avignon up to them, whence they spread themselves over Dauphine, Lyonnois, and if credible, even as far as Sens, with a horrible defolation of all those Countreys.

The Barbarians did not hold Avignon long, Charles sent thither his Brother Childebrand, who having made them quit the Field, besieged them in that City. Soon after he came thither himself with the gross of his Army, gave an Assault by Scalado, and forced them; part of the City was burnt; and all the Infidels that were within it put to the Sword.

This done, he crosses over Septimania, and goes to besiege Narbonne, resolved to have it what ever it cost, thereby to shut up that passage into Gall.

Athim, Governour of the City, and perhaps of all that Countrey for the Saracens, was gotten into the Town: Those in Spain, informed of the danger the place was in, made great Levies of Soldiers, and put them aboard some Vessels to relieve it. There is a Lake between Narbonne and Ville-Salse, at whose Mouth the little River of Bere discharges it self into the Sea; it is called the Lake Oliviere: there it was their Boats came into Land those Forces they had brought; Amoroz, Governor of Terragonne was their General. Martel leaving his Brother with part of the Army to maintain the Siege, went thither to them, and gave them Battle nigh Sigrae. It was very obstinate; but in the conclusion, Amoroz was overthrown upon huge heaps of his slain Men, and most of the rest that fled into their Boats, Drowned, or put to the Sword.

Athim's courage increased by this ill success, and he defended himself so bravely, that Charles left him there, and turning his Forces towards more easy Conquests, made himself master of Besiers, Agde, Maguelonna, and of Nismes, all which he dismantled.

About the year 738. hapned the death of Thierry of Chelles, about the 23 year of his age, and the 17th of his imaginary Reign. Now Charles Martel, having perhaps the design of taking up the Title of King, as he had the Authority, put no other in his stead, nor his Sons neither, till a year after his death, so that there hapned an Interregnum of Five years.

Interregnum.

Charles Martel, Maire. and Duc of the French.

Popes,
Greg. III.

A Second time Maurontus calls the Saracens into Provence; Jusep, Governour of Narbonne, Besieged and Took the Town of Arles, and from thence over-ran, and ransacked all Provence. Charles summons Luitprand, King of the Lombards, to joyn with him against this Enemy. Luitprand, who did not desire to have them so near Italy, and who besides was a friend to Martel, presently marches to joyn him; the Infidels dare not stay for them, but retreat to Narbonne without striking a blow. Maurontus likewise forsakes Marfeilles, and retires amongst the Rocks; so that Provence remained peaceably in the hands of the French.

The power of the Saracens which threatened to overwhelm all Christendom, being as it were upon its ebb, the Spanish Princes recovered themselves by little and little again, especially with the assistance of the French; and yet nevertheless, they were above Seven hundred years in regaining what they lost in three years time. This year Charles Martel sent them a considerable assistance, which helped them more then a little towards settling their affairs.

In Spain they called the Saracens Moors, because indeed they were come from Mauritania, which they had conquer'd, and because most of their Forces were composed of Men from that Countrey.

The

The dispute about the worship of Images caused a pernicious and bloody Schisme in the Church. The Emperour Leon upon the reproaches the Saracens and Mahometans had made him, that it was Idolatry to adore Stone and Wood, would needs pull them out of the Churches, the Popes at the same time contending to keep them there. Gregory II. stood up stoutly in this Cause; the Dispute went so far, that An. 726. not looking upon Leon as his Sovereign, he wrote him Letters that were very haughty and full of new Maxims, stop'd the Moneys he was raising in Italy, and turned the People from that Obedience they owed to him. Gregory III. his Successor went yet farther, and Excommunicated him. On the other hand, the Emperour turned every Stone to revenge it: but all his endeavours proved fruitless, and a shame to himself in the end.

Whilst affairs were in such a condition, that the Pope could hope for no assistance of the Emperour in his occasions, it hapned that he offended Luitprand, King of the Lombards, by giving Retreat to Trafimond, Duke of Spoleta; and making League with Godefric, who had invaded the Dutchy of Benevent: That King pressing upon him with his Army, and having seized some Towns within the Dutchy of Rome, he had recourse to the protection of Martel, and wrote two or three very moving Letters to him, in the Titles whereof he called him his most excellent Son, and gave him the Title of Sub-King, or Vice-Roy.

Charles was a little hard to be moved, the Letters having operated no great matter; he sent him a most remarkable Embassy, which carried as a Present, the Keys of the Sepulchre of St. Peter, and the Bonds wherewith that Apostle had been tied; and after that came another, which bestowed and conferred upon him the Sovereignty of Rome, and the Title of Patrician.

He was not now any more in a condition for great enterprizes, a troublesome and lingering distemper which undermined him by little and little, forwarned him to think of his Death, and the settlement of his Family: He had three Children Legitimate, Carloman, Pepin, called the Breif, and Griffon; the two first by Chrotude, and the other by Sonichilde; and besides these, three Bastards, Remy or Remede, Hierosme, and Bernard. Remy was Bishop of Rouen, Hierosme and Bernard Married. The First had a Son named Fulrad, Abbot of St. Quimins, which he built. The Second had three Sons and two Daughters, the two eldest Sons were Adelard and Vala, both Counts at Court, then successively, Abbots of Corbie, and the Third named Bernier was likewise a Monk. The two Daughters Gondrade and Theodrade, vowed themselves to God in a Religious Life: the first in her Virgin State, the other in her Widdow-hood.

Now Prince Charles dividing the Estate between his three Legitimate Children, as if he had been the lawful Sovereign, gave to Carloman, who was the eldest, Austrasia, Souabe, and Turingia; (Bavaria had its Dukes, Frisia and Saxony were Revolted) to Pepin, Neustria, Burgundy, Septimania, and Provence; and to Griffon, a Portion betwixt his two Brothers, made up of some parcels of the three Kingdoms. The Son of the Duke Eudes held Aquitania Prima & Secunda, and the Duke of the Gascous the other.

Shortly after, on the 26th of October, he ended his Life in the Castle of Carissy * upon the Oyse, within three Leagues of Noyon. He had ruled about three years in Austrasia, and 28 in this Kingdom and in Neustria. The Martial Courage and Spirit which inclined him to have always his Sword in hand to finite his Enemies, acquired him the name of Martel in History, and an immortal Fame: But the Ecclesiasticks, whom he had rudely handled, sullied his Memory, and would not forgive him in the other World. For they affirmed, according to a Revelation of St. Eucher, Bishop of Orleans, that he burned both Body and Soul in Eternal Flames, and that his Tomb having been opened, there was nothing to be found in it, but a huge Serpent and a stinking Blackness, the marks of the ill condition of his State, or Salvation.

How little soever the share was which Griffon had, his two Brothers could not endure it; they Besieged him in the City of Laon, shut him up in Chasteauneuf in Ardenna

Ardenna, and having seized on his Mother Sonichilde, allotted him the Abby of Chelles for his Subsistence and his Prison. At the same time Theodebald Son of Grimoald, whom Martel had left in Peace after he had strip'd him, was taken out of the World, perhaps because he had some intrigues with Sonichilde.

All those People, whom Martel had brought to their Duty by the power of the Sword, imagined, that after his death it would be easie for them to cast off the yoke: Particularly Thibaud, Son of Godefroy, Duke of the Almans, and Hunoud Duke of Aquitain. This last being the most dangerous, the two Brothers joyned their Force against him. They handled him so roughly, having driven him beyond Poitiers, and forced the Castle of Loches, that he desired a Peace, the conditions are not specified. Before the two Brothers left Aquitain, they shared the Kingdom betwixt them, or rather what they had taken from Hunoud, which they did at the place called The Old Poitiers, between the Clain and the Vienne, near Chastelleyard.

Besides these two Expeditions, the year was remarkable for the Birth of Charles called the Great, or Charlemain, the Son of Pepin, and Berte his Wife, who was born into the World in the Palace of Ingelheim upon the Rhine, this year 742.

742.

The same year Carloman passed the Rhine, marched into the Almans Countrey, as far as the River Lee, which separates them from the Bavarians, and brought them so low, that their Duke Thibaud, Son of Godefroy, gave him up Hostages for pledge of his Faith, and the tribute he was to have from him.

742.

It seems to have been in this year, or at least the next, that the two Brothers be-thought themselves of filling the Royal Throne, in appearance, which had been vacant five years, and putting Childeric in it, who was surnamed the Witless, or * Senseless, as being either really such, or so represented to the People. Some make him to be the Brother of Thierry de Chelles, others of Clotaire III.; and if so, he must have been at least 17 or 18 years of age; but many think him the Son of Thierry, and then he could be but 10 or 12 at most.

Those Princes that had Revolted in the time of Martel, obeying his Children but unwillingly, made a powerful League to break and throw off the Bonds of their subjection. Odillon Duke of Bavaria was the Head, instigated, no doubt, by his Wife Chiltrude, Daughter of Martel, and Sonichilde, who two years before, having stolen away from her Brothers, went into that Countrey and was Married to him. The Saxons and Almans assisted him with Men; and at the same time, while the two Brothers were on their way thither. Hunoud, Duke of Aquitain falls upon Neustria, and descends as far as Chartres, which he forced, and buried almost under its own Ruines.

Odillon was encamped with his Army on the brink of the River Leog, which he had Palisadoed with strong Timbers. The two Brothers having staid Fifteen days right over against him, without attempting to pass; one fair night, a kind of impatient Spirit prompting the French, they forced their way over, with the loss of many of their Men, who were drowned, and brought a terror to his whole Camp: All his Men betook themselves to flight, and left their Baggage, and the two Brothers their full and free liberty to range over the whole Countrey of Bavaria for two Months together.

From thence Carloman marched against the Saxons, gained the Castle of Hochsburg, upon Composition; and Theoderic Duke of that Countrey, who solemnly gave his Faith to him; and yet he nevertheless broke it again presently, and obliged Carloman to return thither the very next year, to the very great damage of his Countrey.

But it was not till after the two Brothers having ravaged Aquitain, had constrained Hunoud to crave their pardon the third time, and redeem his fault with the price of many great Presents made to them.

He had the courage of a Woman, quarrellsome and weak, and consequently suspicious and cruel. His Brother Hunton being come to see him upon the security of his Word, he put him to death, and a short while afterwards, either upon some Motions of Repentance, or lightness and giddiness of Brain, he made himself a Monk in a Monastery, in the Isle of Rhe, having left his Duchy to his Son Gaisfre, about the age of 18 or 20 years.

Prince

Prince Carloman, after he had struck his last blow against the Almans, whose pride he had abated by the blood of a great many of the most mutinous, which was in the year 746: resolved likewise to quit the World, either by a powerful and efficacious inspiration of God, or the terror of those most dismal Stories they spread of his Fathers Damnation.

746.

The Fifth year of his Principality, having given up his Estate, and his Son Dragoon, or Drun into the hands of Pepin; he went to pay his Devotions at St. Peters in Rome; from thence he went to take the Habit of St. Benual at Mount Sorade, or Mount St. Sil, and some while after, because he was too much importuned by Visitors, he retired to Mount Cassin.

Pepin allowed no share of his Dominion to his Nephew Drun, nor his Brothers other Children: but the same year, and perhaps at his request, he set their youngest Brother Griffon at liberty. Treated him Honourably in his Court, and gave him some Counties for his allowance.

The ambition of this young Prince, not being tamed by a Prison, could not be so by kindness, he made his escape, and went and stirred up the Saxons in his quarrel. Pepin followed him close, the Sorabe Slavonians, who were divided from the Turingians by the River of Sals; the Alrodites and other Slavonians, who were spread all along the Frontiers of France, brought him 10000 Fighting Men. Inasmuch as the Saxons Nordsgaues, overwhelmed with his numbers, submitted to his pleasure, and received Baptisme. Griffon with the other Saxons, was Encamped and intrenched on the other side of the River Ouacre; fear seized upon them, they deserted their Post in the night time, and their Countrey remained exposed to the mercy of the French: so that not finding himself any longer in safety there, he leaves them to make their Peace, and retired to Bavaria; where he seized on that Duchy, usurping it from the young Tasillon, aged but 6 or 7 years, who was the Son of his Sister Chiltrude and Odillon.

This Countrey no more then that of Saxony, could not protect him from the pursuit of Pepin, who joining Gold and his Favours, with his Sword and Threats, soon unhinged his Party. The Bavarois made their agreement; Landfroy Duke of the Almans, and Suidgard Earl of Hirsberg did the same; and he finding himself alone, was compelled to follow their Dance, and come to his Brother. He receiv'd him most kindly, and assigned him the City of Mans, and Twelve Counties in Neustria: but the very self same year he made a third escape, and cast himself into the Arms of Gaisfre Duke of Aquitain.

Pepin having gained the better over all his enemies, had no more left him to do, but to sit down in the Throne, a thing his Father durst not undertake. He saw all the power in his own hands, with the Treasures of the Kingdom, and the Affections of the French, and there was no other Prince of the Merovingian Race remaining, but one young stupid and witless Man. He therefore assembled a Parliament, which being wholly Devoted to him, were very willing to confer the Title of King on him; but he was glad that he might be disengaged from his Oath of Fidelity, to consult with the Pope, who had great authority over the Galican Church, and whose Answers passed for Oracles, though not for Laws.

He who sat then in the Holy Chair was Zachary, a most intimate friend of Pepins, who wanted his assistance against the Lombards, and who could well apprehend, that what was desired of him, was a most favourable prejudgment for the Popes against the Emperours. Besides, it seemed reasonable and just that France, after so many Idols and Shadows, should now have a King in reality; and therefore he could not but answer favourably to the point that Pepin propounded, and consulted him about; and his Reply was certainly of great weight. It is in this sense, according to my opinion, that we must understand some Authors of those times, who tells us, that Boniface set him upon the Throne by the Command of Zachary. Otherwile we should say the French did not truly understand their own Right, and that this Pope attributed to himself what did not belong to him.

Upon this Answer, the French having called another Parliament at Soissons, degraded Childeric, and elected Pepin. There is some likelihood that this was done in the general Assembly, which was held in the month of March. The Bishops were there in great numbers, Boniface, Arch-Bishop of Meurs being in the head of them, who declared to them the validity of the Popes Answer; and indeed this King and his Successors, as if they had some obligation to the Clergy for their Royalty, gave them a great share in the Government.

By the same Decree Childeric was shaved and made a Monk at *Sitten. There are some affirm, that from thence he was removed to the Monastery of St. Himeran at Ratisbonne, and his Wife being veiled to that of Comhiliac. But others believe he was not Married, though he were of an age ripe enough for it.

Thus endeth the First Race of the Kings of France; who if we reckon from the year 418. to the year 751, had Reigned 333 years, and had 21 Kings, only accounting those of Paris: but Thirty six, if we take in all those that had the Title, as well in Austrasia, where there was but one that resided at Metz, as in Neustria, while sometimes three of them at the same time had their Seats at Orleans, at Soissons, and at Paris. The first Four of these Kings were Idolaters, and all the rest Christians. But their Baptisme did not quite purge away their Barbarity, they were Savage and Bloody till Clotaire II. Those that followed were more Benigne, Merciful, and Religious, excepting Childeric II. But all being either shallow-Brain'd, or Minors, they fell necessarily under the Government of others,

HIS Second Race is commonly called the * Carlian, * Or Carlovinian Race. We know not whether it took line, that denomination from Charles Martel, or Charles the Great. After it had been raised to a great height by the Vertue of its Five first Princes, to wit, the two Pepins, Charles Martel, Charlemain, and Lewis the Godly, and had extended their Empire much beyond the Bounds of the First; It began to decline under the Children of that Lewis, and in the end was reduced to so narrow a compass, all the Lords having made themselves Masters in their Governments, that their last Kings had nothing left which was properly their own, but the Cities of Laon, and that of Reims.

It is observed, That they had much resemblance with the First Race, in that they had a very fair beginning, and an unhappy end; That Charles of Lorraine their last Male, was deprived of the Crown, as Childeric had been; and that they had several stupid and fenceless Princes amongst them: But this held one Advantage above the other, That they Reign to this day in all Europe, by the Males in the House of France, and by the Women in that of the other greatest Princes. Insomuch, that the Carlovinian Blood is held for the most Noble in all the Earth; whereas there is not any remaining of that of Meroveus.

After the Estates of Soissons had Elected Pepin, and, as it is believed had lifted him on the Pavois and upon the Royal Throne, he would needs add the Ceremonies of the Church, to consecrate his Royalty, and render it more august: Boniface Archbishop of Ments Crowned him in the Cathedral of Soissons, and anointed him with holy Oyl, according to the Custome of the Kings of Israel, that thereby the Word of God, Touch not mine Anointed, might become a Buckler to him and his Successors.

The Anointing and Crowning began from this time to be practised at the Inauguration of the Kings of France, and hath been continued to this day.

Being of a very low stature, the Lords had not all that respect for him which they should. Having perceived it, he would needs let them see by experience that he had more Courage and Vertue than those great bulks who very often have nothing but an outward appearance of bravery. Those Kings took much delight in Combats of Wild Beasts, and not only pleased themselves with the divertisement of such Spectacles in those Publique Entertainments they gave the People, but many times in private in their own Palaces. One day being at the Abbey of Ferrieres, a furious Lion having grappled with a Bull, whom he held fast by the Neck, he said to some Lords that were about him, That they must needs make him let go his hold. Not one had the Courage to undertake it, the very proposition affrighted them. After he had observed them all, and plainly perceived their astonishment, he leaped down from the Scaffold, his Back-Sword in his hand, went directly to the Lion, and at one stroak managed with as much skill as strength, divided his head from his body, his Sword entring even a good way into the Neck of the Bull. After this wonderful blow turning himself towards his Lords, Do you not believe, said he with a kind of Heroick Pride, that I am worthy to Command you?

His first Warlike Expedition, after his Coronation, was in Saxony, where he constrained constrained the Saxons to pay every Year Three hundred Horses for a Tribute, and to bring them to him into the Field of Mars or General Assembly of the French.

On his return from that Country, he heard of the Death of Griffon his Younger Brother. That unquiet Spirit being come out of Aquitain whither he had retired to Duke Gaisfre, was assassinated in the Valley of Morienne going into Italy, either by some People of Pepins, says our Author, or by some of Gaisfres, who conceived some Jealousie for having been too familiar with his Wife.

To Childebrand Grandson of Luitprand King of the Lombards, degraded by his Subjects, Rachis Duke of Friul succeeded by Election: who professing himself a Monk in the same Covent with Caroloman Brother of Pepin, Astolphus his Brother had taken his place. He finding the Emperour Constantine Copronimus full of Trouble, had seized on the Exarchat of Ravenna and Pentapolis, which till then had been held by the Exarchs or Vicars of the Emperour. Besides, he had got into his power even under the very Walls of Rome, several Towns, belonging to several private Lords who had made themselves as it were Sovereigns in the time of the distress and disorders of the Grecian Empire; and finding all things submitted to him, he had likewise a great desire to make himself Master of Rome, pretending and maintaining, That the Exarchat he had conquer'd, gave him all the Right and Title the Emperours had enjoy'd in Italy, and therefore Rome and the Popes being in subjection to the Empire, were now under his.

By vertue of this pretence he marched with his Army towards Rome, and sent to Summon the Romans to acknowledg him, and to pay him a Crown in Gold for every head. Pope Stephanus much amazed at this enterprize, beseeches him to leave the Lands belonging to the Church in Peace, hath recourse to the intercession of the Emperour Constantine, and afterwards comes himself to Pavia to see the Lombard. But finding his Intreaties, nor the Emperour's Request had no influence upon him, he implored the Assistance of Pepin and his Protection, as Gregory III. had done that of Martel. So that, after he had prepared and disposed him by some Ambassadors sent before-hand, he went from Lombardy into France, to the great astonishment and vexation of Astolphus, who however durst not detain him.

The King being unable to go so far as Morienne, as he had made him hope, sent to intreat him to come to Pontigon a Royal Castle near Langres; Charles his Eldest Son went above fifty Leagues to meet him. The Pope arrived at Pontigon the sixth day of January: the King with his Wife and Children, received him about a mile from the place, and treated him with all manner of respect and honour; But not to that degree as to walk on foot by his Horses side, and hold the bridle, as Anastasius hath written, who in some places hath spoken of ancient times, rather according to the Practice and Customs of the days he lived in, then according to the naked truth.

After several Conferences both publique and private, Pepin promised him all manner of assistance, as soon as he had put his own affairs into some order, and wished him in the mean time to go and repose himself in the Abbey of St. Denis in France. Stephanus hath written, That being fallen desperately ill, and causing himself to be carried into the Church under the * Bells to begg his recovery of God, he beheld St. Denis in a Vision, together with the Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, who miraculously restored him. Which could not but be very pleasing to the French, who had a singular Veneration for that Saint, and to Pepin himself, whose Father, either out of devotion, or to do like other Kings, had acknowledged he was greatly beholding to the intercession of those Holy Martyrs.

A little while after his being recovered from his Sicknefs, which was in the Month of July, he Crowned and Anointed Pepin and his two Sons with his own hands, exhorting the French to keep their Faith, and from that time Excommunicating them, if they ever chose a King of any other Race. Some say that this Ceremony was performed in the Church of St. Denis, before the Altar of St. Peter and St. Paul, which the Pope did on that day dedicate, in remembrance of the recovery of his health. Others believe it was in the Abbey-Church of Ferrieres. Wherever it were, the Ceremony being ended, Stephanus declared him * Advocate Astolphus well foreseeing that the Pope would bring the French upon him, had by Threats obliged the Abbot of Mount-Cassin to send the Monk Carloman into France to bring Pepin his Brother, upon pretence of demanding the Corps of St. Bennet, which had been stolne, and convey'd to the Abbey of Fleury upon the Loire, which from thence was named St. Bennets: but it was to oppose the endeavours of the Pope, and countermine his Designs in those Undertakings. In effect the Monk pleaded the Cause of Astolphus so stoutly in the Parliament of Crecy, that it was agreed some Ambassadors should be dispatched to Astolphus to endeavour an accommodation.

The Lombard received and treated them as coming from a Great and Potent State. He was willing to lay aside his pretences to the Sovereignty of the City of Rome and its dependences; but would reserve the Exarchat he had conquered, by the Sword. The Pope on the contrary maintained that it belonged to him as being the spoiles of an heretick; and he solicited Pepin so effectually, that that King promised to assist him in the conquering of it.

754. Mean time Carloman for having espoused the Interest of the Lombard too far, brought himself to an ill pass: for the King and the Pope consulting and contriving together, shut him up in a Monastery at Vienne, where he dyed the same Year, and his Sons were shaved for fear they should one day claim the Estate their Father had once possessed.

755. The great Preparations for War, and a second Embassy being not sufficient to remove Astolphus from his firm resolution of detaining the Exarchat and the Pentapole, Pepin caused his Army to march that way. His Van-Guard having seized the Cluses or the Passages of the Alps, and beaten off those Lombards that thought to defend them, Astolphus retires into Pavia, where presently afterwards he was shut up by Pepin.

The havock, the ruine, and firings the French made use of round about that City, could not draw him into the Field. The Pope in the mean while grew weary and melancholy at the desolation of Italy, and he also feared lest Pepin should make himself absolute Master, if he took that Place by force. He therefore condescends to an Accommodation at the earnest intreaty of the Lombard; and it was easily obtained, for he then promised him to give up the Exarchat, and the Justices of Saint Peter; which in my apprehension were certain Lands within the Bishoprick of Rome.

756. So soon as the French-men backs were turned, the Lombard instead of performing those hard Conditions, resolves to revenge himself upon the Pope, and the following Year went and laid Siege to Rome, where he made such spoil as declared his cruel resentment. This infraction obliged Pepin to repass the Mountains. Upon the noise of his March, he decamps from before Rome, which he had much straitened, and retreats the second time to Pavia. Pepin besieges him and presses on so close, that having no other means to save his Life and Crown, he is compell'd to take himself for Judge and Arbitrator of the differences between him and the Pope. It was not possible but Pepin must judge in favour of the last. And indeed he would grant no Peace to Astolphus, but upon condition he should make good his former Years agreement, and moreover give up Comachio. This was treated and negotiated in the presence of the Emperour's Ambassadors, who being come to that Siege to demand those Countries for their Master, the Lombards had taken, suffered the displeasure and shame of a refusal.

The Exarchat comprehended Ravenna, Bologna, Imola, Faenza, Forly, Cesenna, Bobia, Ferrara and Adria.

The Pentapole held Rimini, Pesaro, Conca, Fano, Senigalia, Ancona, and some other lesser places.

756. A Chaplain of King Pepin's received all these Towns, brought away Hostages, and laid the Keys upon the Altar of St. Peter and St. Paul at Rome, with the draught of the Treaty, to signify that Pepin made a donative thereof to those Holy Apostles. Some do imagine he did it in the Name of the Emperour Constantine Copronicus, Copronicus, who indeed would not consent to it; and they believe that it is upon the equivocation of this name, that the Popes have founded their fabulous donation of Constantine the Great.

Astolphus dyed the Year following by a Fall from his Horse, Didier his Constable had a Party strong enough to Elect him King. But those for the Monk Rachis Brother to King Luitprand, who had left his Cloister, puzzled him very much. He betakes himself to Pope Stephanus, promising him to make good the restitution Astolphus had agreed to. Pepin's Ambassadors were of Opinion that he should assist him in it; so that he constrained Rachis to return and betake himself again to his Monastery. Stephanus dyes some Months after, Paul I. succeeded him, Didier and he lived well enough with each other.

The Emperour Constantine had not yet lost all hopes of recovering the Exarchate by means of the French; and he endeavoured to regain it by the force of Presents and fair Words. Amongst other things he sent a pair of Organs to the King who was then at Compiene. These were the first that had been seen in France.

Tassillon Duke of Bavaria, Son of Duke Utilon or Odillon, came to the same place to take his Oath of Fidelity to King Pepin, rendring Homage to him, his hands * within the Kings, and promising him such Service as a Vassal oweth to his Lord; which he confirmed by Swearing on the Bodies of St. Denis, Saint German of Paris, and Saint Martin at Tours. * Se commen- dans per manus.

This Year they changed the time of the General Assembly which was held in March, and was now put off till May. And so it was no longer called the Field of Mars, but the Field of May.

Pepin thought to take some rest this Year, when Intelligence was brought him, that the Saxons were revolted. Though they were embodied in an Army, and had made Retrenchments upon all the Passages into their Country, he gained them all at the first attempt, and forced them to give him their Oaths and to pay Tribute.

The Kings of this Second Race Celebrated the Festivals of Christmas and Easter with great Solemnity, cloathed in their Royal Ornaments, the Crown upon their heads, and keeping open Court: and for this reason the Authors of those times never fail to put down every Year the place where they solemnized those holy Feasts.

The City of Narbonna was yet held by the Saracens. This Year Pepin having besieged it, the Citizens who were Visigoths and Christians, flew the Infidel Garrison, and delivered the place up to him, upon condition that he should suffer them to live according to their own Laws; that is to say, the Roman Law, which had ever been observed by the People of Septimania, and is yet to this day.

There remained of all the Countries that had been subject to the Kingdom of France, none but Aquitain, that was not brought to their duty. Their Duke Gaifre did not acknowledg Pepin; and moreover he, or the Lords of his Country, retained what belonged to those Churches the French had in Aquitain. This was a plausible pretence for Pepin to quarrel, by demanding restitution of the Poors Patrimony. He expected that Gaifre would refuse to do right; thereupon he gets his Militia together and marches into Aquitain, to the place they call Theodad, where was an Ancient Palace of their Kings. Gaifre who was not prepared for so sudden an Expedition, was so much astonished, that he promised him full satisfaction, and gave him up some Hostages.

It was to be feared that the Saracens in Spain would bring assistance to this Duke, and that he might be persuaded to deliver some places into their hands for Security and Retreat, which would have given them footing in France: Pepin provides against this, by pretending to desire the Alliance of their Caliph; to whom he sent a splendid Embassy. The Caliph looked on this proposition as very honorable coming from so great a Prince, agreed to all what was desired, and sent back; the Ambassadors laden with rich Presents, whose Voyage thither and home again took up three Years time.

Instead of performing his promise, Gaifre sent out his Forces, who ravaged all about Chaalons upon the Soane. Pepin extraordinarily offended at this Infidelity, resolves to make a perpetual War upon him, till he were quite ruin'd. This Year he he conquered Bourbon, Chantelle, Clermont, and divers Places in Auvergne, and from thence descends into Limofin and took Limoges, having defeated and slain in a great Battle Chilping Count d'Auvergne, and Amingue Count de Poitiers, who would have hindered him. His Eldest Son Charles began his first Apprentiship of Warr in this Expedition.

762. The following Year after he had held the General Assembly at Carisy, or Crecy upon the Oyse, he entred for the third time into Aquitain, and by force took the City of Bourges and the Castle of Tours.

763. At his Fourth Expedition, which was after the Sitting of the Parliament of Neuers, he pierced as far as Cahors. But the Duke Tassillon his Nephew, whom he carried along with him, having made his Escape and got into Bavaria, he feared that Young Prince might have some League with the Saxons and with Didier King of Lombardy, whose Daughter he had married.

764. Therefore returning again into France, he let slip one Year without taking the Field: during which time nothing was done, but sending and receiving Messengers from Bavaria and Lombardy, concerning Treaties with Didier and Tassillon.

765. When he had made sure of them by some agreement, he undertakes afresh his design of Warr upon Aquitain. Gaifre had dismantled most of his Towns, as not having Numbers sufficient to maintain them: Pepin Repairs them, and places good Garrisons, then made himself Master of Angoulesme, Saintes, and Agen.

766. The Year after he fortifies Argenton in Berry, and according to some Chronickers, took the Town of Limoges, which by this reckoning must have been taken twice.

767. Anno 767. After the General Assembly of Orleans was over, he enters into Septimania, and gained the Cities of Nismes, Maguelonne, Beziers, Thoulouse, Albi, and the Country of Givaudan. We cannot find by what Title these Cities could belong to Gaifre; and if it be said, They were in the hands of the Visigoths, what reason had Pepin to take them from those People.

He must of necessity have made all this long March in the Winter time, since he kept his Easter Festival at Vienne, held the Field-meeting of May at Bourges, and in the Month of August descended from thence as far as the Borders of the Garonne, clearing all the Country of such of Gaifres Garrison Soldiers as skulked amongst the Rocks and in the Caves of Auvergne and Perigord.

768. After the Celebration of the Christmas Festival at Bourges, he crossed Aquitain as far as Saintes. In his way he took Remifang, Brother, or Uncle by the Mothers side, to Gaifre, whom he caused to be hanged for having broken his faith to him Three Years before; and while he was at Saintes, they presented to him the Mother, a Sister and a Niece of the same Dukes.

This Unfortunate Man fled still before him, sometimes into one Town, then into another. In fine, the King after he had kept his Easter at Selles in Berry, divided his Forces in two Bodies, that he might be hemm'd in. So that Gaifre being put to a full stop near Periguenx, was constrained to stake his last Fortune in a Battle: but he lost it and his Life soon after, being slain either by the French, or even by his own men, who were willing to put an end to their Troubles, and the desolation of their Country.

Thus all Aquitain was entirely subdued, saving only they permitted the Gasccons to have a Duke. Pepin had but life enough just to finish this Conquest: for being come back to Saintes, he fell sick of an Hydropisia. As they were conveying him to Paris, he paid his Devotions and made his Offerings on the Tomb of St. Martin de Tours; and being brought to perform the same duty at St. Denis in France, he resigned up his Soul the 24th of September, in the Year 768. Aged 52. or 54. Years, of which he had reigned Seventeen and a half, if we reckon from the day of his Election, supposing that was made in the Field of Mars, Anno 751.

768. He married but one Wife who survived him, which was Bertha, whom the Historians have surnamed Great Foot, Daughter of Caribert Count of Laon, by whom he had four Sons, Carloman, Charles, Pepin and Gilles; and three Daughters, Rotaide, Adelaide, and Giselle. Of his Sons, the Youngest was thrust very young into into the Religious Monastery of Mount Soracte; Pepin dyed when three years old; The Kingdom was left to the other two, who were Crowned in the Month of October following, Carloman at Soissons, and Charles at Noyon. As for the Daughters, the two Eldest Rotaide and Adelaide, dyed young, Giselle married to a Cloister and was an Abbess. Some Genealogists bestow five or six Sons more upon him, and as many Daughters, of which, say they, Berte was married to Milon Count of Angiers, and Father of the invulnerable Orlando, and Chiltrude to René Count of Genoa, who was the Father of Oger the Dane.

The two Brothers being in dispute about their partition, the Lords interposed to bring them to an agreement, and obliged them till all should be determined, by way of provision to take, Charles all Neustria, and Carloman Austrasia.

In the Reign of Pepin, God began to make Christendom feel the strokes of the severest scourge that was ever laid upon them. I mean the insulting Turks, which to this day threatens to overwhelm us. They were not unknown in Pliny's time, who reckons them amongst those who inhabited along the Palus Meotides. There may have been some likewise amongst the Messagetes and elsewhere, as we have observed of some other Barbarians. In the time of the Emperour Justin, they were even then so potent, that they over-awed the Avari and other Neighbouring people. The Emperour Heraclius made use of them against Cosroes, and they made a mighty diversion being entred into Persia, a great part whereof paid them Tribute divers Years afterwards. But in the Year 763. they fell upon Armenia, and so spread themselves very far into Asia, where they subdued even the Kingdom of Persia, An. 1048. Nevertheless they had no Sovereign, nor Chief General, but only many Colonels, till the first Croisado of the Christians in 1196. at which time they made choice of one to be the better united for their own defence and preservation.

During the Discord between the Two Brothers, which lasted some Months, Old Hunoud the Father of Gaifre who had put himself into a Monastery, throwes down his holy Frock to take up the Title of Duke of Aquitaine, and endeavoured to make that Province Revolt by the assistance of his Friends, and a League he made with Loup Duke of Gasconny. Charles, to whose share this Province fell, intreated his Brother to help him in quenching this Flame of Rebellion. Carloman joyns Forces with him: but in the mid-way, either of himself or by the suggestions of some busy-bodies, he conceives a Jealousie against his Eldest Brother, and leaves him there. Charles however continues on his March.

Upon the noise of his approach Hunoud flies, and goes to hide himself in the farthest parts of Gasconny, where he thought to find an Asylum. But there is none against too great a Power. The Duke of Gasconny fearing the Threatnings of Charles, proved no more a Faithful Ally, then he had been a Faithful Vassal, but comes to meet Charles, submits intirely to him, and delivers up that Unfortunate Man to his disposal; who notwithstanding a short while after having made his Escape, got into Sanctuary at Didier's King of the Lombards. Thus ended the Dutchy of Aquitaine, which about Eleven years afterwards was Erected to a Kingdom by Charlemaine for Lewis the youngest of his Sons.

In this Expedition he built Franciac, which is to say, the Castle of the French upon the River Dordogne. It is now called Fronsac.

Pepin

Pepin in his Life-time had married his two Sons; it is not mentioned to whom, perhaps they were only betrothed; but if they were compleatly married, we must say they afterwards were divorced: for their Mother obliged them to take other Wives. Carloman espoused Berthe or Pertrade, whom the old Annals make to be the Daughter of Didier King of the Lombards. (Charles) likewise was married to Hildegard another of that King's Daughters, notwithstanding the great opposition the Pope made, even so far as to represent to him, how the Lombards stunk, and were infected with the Leprosie.

Carloman his Brother was of an odd humorous spirit, which gave him a great deal of trouble. But death happily delivered him in the Month of November of this Year 770. having cut the thrid of his Life in the Palace of Montfugcon nigh Langres, at the beginning of the Third year of his Reign, and the 28th of his Age. His Brother caused his Corps to be conveyed to the Abbey of St. Remy of Reims, which he had greatly endowed. He had one Wife named Berthe, and two Sons.

While Charles held a General Assembly at Carbondac, most part of the Lords and Austrasian Prelats came thither to acknowledg him for their King. They might do so; and it must be granted, that if he had not had that right, he had been an Usurper. The Widow of Carloman apprehending they might proceed further, took her Children and went her way to Tassillon Duke of Bavaria.

Some Spanish Chroniclers, to whom I know not what faith we are to give, have written, that besides Gaifre and Hatton, Eudes Duke of Aquitaine had a Son named Aznar, who considering the misfortune of his Brother, passed the Hebre, and having in Battle slain four petty Kings, or Saracen Generals, became the First Earl of Arragon. It was at that time but a small Territory between two Rivers of that name, whereof the City of Jacque was the Capital.

One cannot hear the Name of this Prince, without conceiving some great Idea. He was of a tall and becoming stature, seven foot in height, well shap'd in all his Limbs, unless his Neck, which was somewhat too thick and short, and his Belly strutting out a little too much. His gate was grave and firm, his voice of the shrillest. His Eyes were large and sparkling, his Nose high and long, his Countenance Gay and Serene, his Complexion fresh and lively, nothing of effeminate in his gesture and carriage, his humour sweet, facile and jovial, his conversation easy and familiar. He was humane, courteous and liberal, active, vigilant, laborious, and very sober, although fasting were prejudicial to him; an enemy to Flatterers and vanity, who hated huffing and new modes that were strange, cloathing himself very modestly, unless it were on some publique Ceremonies, where the Majesty of the Kingdom ought to appear in their Sovereign. At his Meals he made some read to him the History of the Kings his Predecessors, or some Works of St. Augustine's; took two or three hours repose after Dinner; interrupted his sleep in the Night, rising three or four times; heard all Complaints, did Justice at all Seasons even at his time of dressing himself.

The Spring and Summer time he spent in War, part of Autumn in Hunting, the Winter in Councils and the Management of his Government. Some certain hours both of the day and night in the Study of Learning, as Grammar, Astronomy and Theology. And in truth he was one of the most Learned and most Eloquent of that Age; the Works he left behind him to posterity are undeniable proofs of it. With all this clement, merciful, charitable, who maintained the Poor even in Syria, Egypt, and in Africa, who employ'd his Treasure in rewarding Soldiers and Schollars, in building publique Structures, Churches and Palaces, repairing of Bridges, Cause-ways, and great Roads, making Rivers Navigable, filling Sea-Ports with good Vessels, civilizing Barbarous Nations, and carrying the Honour of the French Nation with much Credit and Lustre into the remotest Kingdoms. And who above all other things had the greatest care to regulate his People with good and wholesome Laws, and bent all his Actions and Endeavours to the Welfare of his Subjects, and the advancement of the Christian Religion.

Amongst the rest he had four very Potent Enemies to deal with, the Saxons, the the Huns, the Lombards, and the Saracens. The Saxons a most Warlike and as yet Idolatrous Nation, compounded of several People, and such as had been invincible, had they acted by a mutual agreement and consent, gave him work and exercise enough for above Thirty Years; during which time he made divers Expeditions against them always with advantage. He never denied them Peace, and they broke again as soon as he was out of their sight: But his Piety constant as their Malice, was never wearied in forgiving them; not so much out of a desire to allure them to his obedience, as to bring them under the Yoak of Christ Jesus; The highest part of his Care having no other end but the propagation of Religion.

He entered into Saxony therefore this Year, and would try to terrify those Rebels by Fire and Sword: but they were not afraid to bid him Battle somewhat near Osnabrug. Their Confidence was punished by a huge Slaughter of their men; those that remained made their escape beyond the Veser. He pursuing his Victory, took in the Castle of Eresburgh, demolished the Famous Temple of the false God Irmensul; and broke his Idol; It is supposed to have been the God Mars, whence Mers-purg took its name. He afterwards pass'd the Veser, compelled the Saxons to give him some Hostages, and having rebuilt Fresburgh, put a French Garrison into it.

King Didier not able, or willing, to give over the Design his Predecessors had formed to abate the Power of the Popes, to make himself thereby Master of all Italy, sowed a Schisme in the Church of Rome whereby to discompose and weaken them. Pope Paul being dead Anno 767. Toton Duke of Nepes at his instigation enters into Rome, and forced the Clergy to Elect his Brother Constantine who was not in Orders. The following Year another Cabal, Enemies to this Violence of Constantine's, sets a Priest in the holy Chair, named Philip; But Crestofle Primicera (this was the highest Dignity in the City, next to the Presbiter) constrained both the one and the other to renounce the Popeship, and caused Stephanus to be duly elected, a Priest of St. Cecil's, who was the fourth of that name.

Didier bethinks him of another method, in the Year 770. he goes to Rome upon pretence of Devotion, and by force of Presents, gained Paul Afiarte, Duke or Sovereign Judge in Rome, to cause this Crestofle to be put to death, and to banish, or imprison for colourable reasons all such Roman Citizens as he knew to be most able and disposed to thwart his attempts. Afiarte did according to his desire: but Adrian, who was chosen after Stephen, stopt those unjust proceedings, and not only eluded all the vain essays of the Lombard; but was likewise the cause of his utter destruction.

After all other Experiments, Didier employs Force, seizes on several Cities of the Exarchat, ravaged the Neighbourhood of Rome; and the Year after, to tumult the Pope, advances towards him, upon pretence of Visiting the Sepulchre of the holy Apostles; carrying along with him the Sons of the late King Carloman, to oblige him to Crown them. The Holy Father flatly refuses him, and failed not to make use of this Motive to exasperate Charlemaine the more against the Lombards.

Betwixt these two Kings there were already some other causes of Enmity. For in the Year 771. Charles had repudiated Hildegard the Sister of Didier, saying she was infirm; A pretence that did not please a great many good people, particularly Adelard the King's Cousin, who for this reason retired from the Court into a Monastery. And Didier on his side had given a reception to Carloman's Widow, and promised her his assistance and support to restore her Sons to the Inheritance or Kingdom of their Father. These offences having inclined Charles's Mind to hearken to the Pope's Intreaties, he was the more easily induced to pass over the Mountains, but with so great and numerous Forces, that it was evident it was not meant so much to assist him, as to conquer Lombardy.

Having therefore Rendezvous'd his Army at Geneva, he divided it in two Bodies, his Uncle Bernard with one took his way by the Mount Jou, and himself led the other by Mount Cenis. Didier had fortified the Passages; and in case they should be worsted, himself was advanced with all his Forces near Turin, and in the Valley of Aost; to observe and oppose the French even to the hazard of a Battle: but some of their Army having stollen by him very silently, and charging them in the Rear, he was so much afraid of being hemm'd in, that he cast himself into Pavia, and Adalgise his Son, whom he had made Partner of his Crown, into Verona.

Tho

Those of Spoletta and Rjetta had already forsaken him to joyn with the Pope. When his Retreat was known, all the Marca Anconitana, and many other Cities followed their Example. Charles with a part of his Army encamped before Pavia, and sent the remainder before Verona. And to demonstrate he did not intend to go thence till he had them in his power, he ordered his new Wife Hildegard, Daughter of Childebrand Duke of Suevia, to come to his Camp, and passed the Winter there even till Christmas, at which time he goes to Verona to press that Siege forwards. Adalgise apprehending to fall into his hands, abandoned that City, and fled to the Emperour of Greece. The Veronese soon after yielded, and gave up Carloman's Children and Widow; they were carried into France, what afterwards became of them, is not mentioned that I know of.

Nothing remained but Pavia. The Siege spinning out in length, Charles had a desire to go and pay his Devotions at Rome, at the good time of Easter. The Pope made him a magnificent Entrance; such as was accustomed to be made for the Exarchs. He in return confirms all the Grants made by his Father, and besides, say some, added that of Sovereign Justice and absolute Power in all those Countries. So that, to speak properly, the Popes before this time, held what they had from the French Kings, from whom it must be owned they derive the best portion of their temporal Grandeur.

In length of time Pavia became so straitened, not by any Attacks, but by Famine, and the people so ill disposed, Humond the Fire-brand of this War, having been knock'd on the head by the Women, that Didier surrenders himself with his Wife and Children to Charles. He was conveyed into France, Cloister'd and Shaved, and died soon after. Thus was the Kingdom of Lombardy in Italy extinguished, after it had lasted some 204 Years.

Before his return into France, Charles made a second Voyage to Rome, where the Pope with 150 Bishops whom he had summoned to honour his Reception, and likewise the Roman People, conferred upon him the Title of Patrician, which was the Degree the nearest to the Empire. It belonged to the Emperours only to bestow it: but they being now no longer acknowledged in Italy, the Pope and Romans attributed that Power to themselves: and which is more, agreed, That Charles should have the power of the Investiture of Bishopricks, and even to Nominate the Popes, to prevent those Cabals, and the Disorders that hapned upon Elections. The Italian Authors assure us that he remitted this right to the Romans: but however he at least reserved to himself that of Confirming them, which the Emperours had enjoyed without the least contradiction, for above Three Ages. After this there was a very great and strict Friendship betwixt Charles and Adrian.

Upon his Return Charles was Crowned King of Lombardy, as the Kings of that Nation were used to be; at the Burrough of Modece near Milan, by the Archbishop of that Great City, who Anointed him, and put the Iron Crown upon his head. It is so called, because indeed it was made of a Circle or hoop of Iron, but cover'd over with a Plate of Gold. It is said, That the generous Tendelaine, Daughter of Garibald Duke of Bavaria, she who about the Year 593. converted the Lombards from Arianism had it made for the Coronation of her Husband Agilulf.

The Order he established in Italy was thus. To the Pope he left the Exarchat, the Pentapolis, (they were since called Romandiola) the Dutchies of Perusia, of Rome, of Toscana Ulteriora, and Campagna. He gave the Dutchy of Benevent to Aragisi Son in law to Didier, that of Spoletta to Hildebrand, and that of Friuli to Rotgaud, upon conditions only of Homage and Service, and to revert again to him for want of Heirs Males.

He gave the Earldomes and Captainries of those Countries upon the same conditions. The rest he reserved for himself, viz. Liguria, Emilia, Venetia, and part of the Alpes, and setled Counts there to govern them, and do Justice. He imposed a certain Tribute on the Cities, and would have the Salique-Law be in force there; so that they had three sorts of Laws, the Lombard, the Salique, and the Roman; and the Subjects were permitted to live, and observe, and make any Contracts according to such of these Laws as they best liked. Since that, this Conquest hath been called the Kingdom of Italy, and it extended to the River Ansidus, or Ofantus, Puglia and Calabria together with Sicilia, belonging then to the Grecian Emperours.

During his absence the Saxons had unchained themselves, and put all in the 774. Countrey of Hefie to Fire and Sword. About the latter end of the Year he sent four Squadrons of men thither, who Attacked them in four several parts, and brought a great deal of booty thence.

775. The following Spring, he went amongst them himself with greater forces, took the Castle of Siegeburgh, rebuilt that of Eresburgh which they had demolished, drove them upon the Veser, and having beaten them soundly, forced them to quit the Post of Brunsbere, where they had fortified themselves.

He after this divided his Army in two Bodies, and chased them to the River Onacre, and there he received the oaths and hostages of Prince Halsen or Helsis, and of the Ostfals or Ostrelands, which is to say Easterlings; then upon his return at the place named Buki, those of Vitiking, and the most considerable of the Dutchy of Angria.

In the mean time the other part of his Army had like to have been surprized by other Saxons near the River Onacre, of whom he took so severe a revenge by Fire and Sword, that these likewise cried him mercy, and gave him up hostages.

During all this, Adalgise Son of Didier, whom the Emperor had honoured with the Title of Patrician, got an Army at Sea to recover his Kingdom of Lombardy, and debauched Rotgaud Duke of Friul, who was very unwilling to obey a stranger. Charles hastens thither with all diligence, defeated Rotgaud in a great Battel, caused his head to be cut off, and having chastised those that supported this Rebellion, gave that Dutchy to a French Lord by name Henry, together with Stiria and Carinthia, placing Counts and Garrisons in the Cities.

nymus, in Sept.

Years.

In his absence the Saxons fly to their Arms, surprized and razed the Castle of Eresburgh: but thinking to do the same to that of Siegeburgh, they were repulsed by the French, who pursued them with slaughter to the banks of the Lipp. With this misfortune they had intelligence likewise that Charlemain was in their Countrey, looking out for them; they came with all humility to prostrate themselves before him, together with their Wives and Children, desiring his Pardon and Baptism. Their submission and conversion though dissembled disarmed his wrath.

777. In the Month of March following they all came from their several quarters to the general Assembly of Paderborn, excepting the Valiant Vitiking Duke of Angria, who had retired himself into the Countrey of Danemark, which the Authors of those times call Normandy. Thither likewise came the Saracen Ibnalarabi Governour of Sarragossa, with some other principal persons of the same Nation, who implored the protection of Charles. He easily granted it, and would lead his Army thither himself, rather to defend and encrease the Kingdom of Jesus Christ, than for his own honour or augmentation of Empire.

There had been Nine or Ten Lieutenant Generalissimo's in Spain belonging to the Caliph, who resided at Damas; whence he ruled all that vast Empire extending from the Indies to the Pyreneans. There were two very potent Families amongst the Saracens, that of Humeia and that of Alevaci. The first had held the Sovereignty for 150 years, and there had been Fourteen successive Caliphs of them: the other pretended to be descended from Fatima the Daughter of Mahomet; and for that reason had their claim. Now it hapned that Abulgucase, who was of the Alavaci, revolted, and having vanquished and slain Meroiane the last of these Fourteen Caliphs, and undertaken the task to destroy the whole Race; Abderame flying from that Persecution, had saved himself in Spain, and freed that part from the dominion of the Caliph, by making it a distinct and independent Kingdom. But in this revolution other Governours had also fallen off from his obedience; and amongst these was Ibnalarabi, with the rest that came along with him, who wanted the assistance of the French to maintain them in their Usurpation.

The great Forces raised by Charles, being divided in two Bodies, marched two different ways. The first with whom he went in person, passed thorough Bearn into Navarre, and laid Siege to Pampelune. This was the longest and the most memorable that ever the French had undertaken. At last the place surrendered upon composition.

From thence he marched towards Sarragossa, where the other part of the Army who had taken their way thorough the Countreys of Rousillon and Cerdagne joyned him. Ibnalarabi, and the other Saracen Chiefs came to meet him, and tendered him hostages and other assurances of their fidelity.

We must know that till this time the Christians on all those Frontiers, as well as those of Spain had been subdued by the Saracens, to whom they paid a Tribute. Charlemain delivered them from that Slavery, and made them joyn in a League with these petty Moorish Princes who had put themselves under his Protection. It is said that he also sent some Forces to Alphonso the Chaste, to help him to throw off the Yoke of Vassallage and Tribute to which he had been hitherto compelled: Which these Divisions of the Moors made the more easie to be effected. Thus do the Spaniards owe their first Enfranchisement to the Assistance of the French.

The Gascons about the Pyreneans, who carried on the Trade of Theft, rewarded him but very ill for all his generous help; As he returned into France, passing by Pampelune which he dismantled, these Banditi lying in Ambuscade in the narrow Passages about Roncevaux, took all the Baggage which was in his Rear, and slew many of his brave Lords; amongst the rest, that Famous Rowland his Nephew, his Sisters Son, who was Marquis of the British Seas; that is to say, Governour of the French Coasts along that shoare. The Lords of those Countreys fearing his just Anger, delivered up many of those Robbers to him, that they might suffer such punishment as he would have inflicted on them.

The Spanish Authors triumph of this Defeat, and cry they have Vanquished Charles the Great and his Twelve Peers. But certain it is that Navarre, Aragon, and all that is between the Pyreneans and the Hebre, was at that time brought under the dominion of this King; and that he placed Counts at Girone, Ampuries, Urgel, Barcelonna, Ribagorra, and other places. This Extent of Land was called the Marches * of Spain.

When he returned he placed French Counts in all the Cities of Aquitain and of Septimania, to keep those People the better in obedience. Some others will have this Establishment to have been in 781. at the time when he bestowed the Kingdom of Aquitain upon Prince Lewis.

In his absence Vitiking had re-inflamed the Fury of the Saxons, who made most terrible havock as far as Ments and Colen. As soon as he was come back, he sent away Three Squadrons of his Army, who soon beat them off; and the following year went thither in Person. They had the confidence to wait for him near the River of Lipp, and to give him Battle: but he overcame them, and afterwards reduced Westphalia, Eastphalia and Angria; and the next year went outwards as far as to that place where the River Hore meets and joyns with the Elbe, and received many of their People, amongst others those that are called Nordleudes and Bar-dogaves. Then having given the necessary orders to secure these new Conquests, and bridle the Sclavonians who were on the other side of the Elbe, he returned into Neustria.

Now fearing lest Italy, wont to have a King, and who besides were molested with the Huns by Land, and the Saracens at Sea, should receive Adalgise, or give the Crown to some other; He makes a third Journey to Rome under colour of Devotion. He celebrated the Feast of Christmas at Pavia, and that of Easter at Rome. The Pope baptized his second Son Pepin, and was his God-father, and afterwards Crowned him King of Italy, and Lewis his younger Son King of Aquitain: This last was scarce three years old. His Kingdom contained the Dutchy of Aquitain, that of Gascogne, and the Marca of Spain. The King gave not any to Charles his eldest Son, because he would keep him near himself to manage the Affairs of France and of Germany.

HE sent Lewis to Orleance under the Tutelage of a Bail, or Governor, named Arnold, and left Pepin in Italy, where he kept his Royal Seat at Milan, but yet was frequently at Ravenna. Though he had been already Crowned at Rome, yet he would be again Crowned at Modete.

Tassillon Duke of Bavaria had suffered his Faith to be shaken by Luisperge his Wife, Daughter of King Didier. Whilst Charles was at Rome, the Pope had agreed with with him to send a couple of Bishops to that Duke, to put him in mind of his Oaths. The Pope failed not, and Tassillon having taken Hostages for his Security, comes to Wormes, and gave Twelve on his behalf.

782. For some Years Charles held his General Assembly in Saxony: This was held at the Spring-head of the Lippe, where he gave Audience to the Ambassadors of Sifroy King of Denmark, and those from Cagan and Ingurre, Princes of the Huns. The Assembly being ended, he repassed the Rhine, and then Vitiking, who upon his former approaches had saved himself in Denmark returned to his own Country, and caused part of the Saxons to rise up again.

The Sorabi, a People that inhabited the Country between the Elbe and the Saal, were of the Confederacy. Three of the Kings chief Commanders who were ordered to observe and oppose them, leaves them, and goes against the Saxons; and falling rashly and disorderly upon them, without staying for Count Thierry, who was of Kin to Charlemain, because they thought all the honour of the Victory and Success would be attributed to him; they were surrounded, and most of them cut off and destroy'd. The shame for this rebuke and loss enraged the King so highly, that for this time he would not forgive the Saxons, unless the Country would deliver up Four thousand of the greatest Mutineers to him, all whose heads he caused to be struck off upon the Banks of the River Alare.

783. This Severe bleeding did not yet qualify them so much as to hinder them from rising in Arms again the next Year, not one part of them, but all as one. Their Courage was so undaunted, that they gave him Battle, and their Forces so numerous, that having lost it, they had yet enow left to fight him the second time, wherein they were as unsuccessful as at the first.)

Before he took the Field, Charles had the unhappiness to lose a very good Wife Queen Hildegard, who died on the last of April, on the Ascension Eve.

The very same Year he married another who was named Fastrude, Daughter of a French Count called Raol.

784. All the following Year the King with a Flying Army, and Charles his Eldest Son with another, did only scowre and make Incursions upon the Saxons, sometimes upon one side of the Country, sometimes on another: and it was resolved in Council, That he should never give over till he had wholly subdued them.

785. Though he had much broken them, yet they failed not the Year after to take the Field again, with the assistance of the Frisons their Allies: but they were as ill handled as before. In fine, their two Bravest Leaders Albion and Vitiking being disheartened by so much ill success, gave ear to the Friendly persuasions which the King, being touched with a real esteem for their great Courage, had made use of to bring to their duty. Having taken their Sureties, they appeared before the Estates at Paderborne, and thence followed him into France, where they were Baptised in his Palace of Atigny. He gave the Duchy of Angria to Vitiking, who from that day forward led so good and Christian a life, that some have placed him amongst the Saints. From him many do derive the descent of the Race of the Capetine Kings.

785. At this Assembly of Paderborn, Lewis King of Aquitaine, came to his Father with all his Forces. He often sent for him and his Brother Pepin, either when he wanted them, or to call them to an accompt, thereby to keep them in subjection.

786. After Easter in the Year 786. the Army went and fell upon Bretagne, whose Princes thought themselves independent, and had their little Kingdom apart. These likewise were compell'd, after they had lost divers strong Places, to submit to the Grandeur of Charles, and to send several Lords to him to take their Oaths of Fidelity; But not believing themselves bound to do so, they kept them no longer, then till they found an opportunity to violate their Faith without danger.

786. In the mean time Adalgise, Son of the unfortunate Didier, was at Sea with an Army, soliciting his Brother in Law Tassillon to fall into Italy at the same time as he should land, for the same purpose having made sure of Aregisa Duke of Benevent who married his Sister; Charles to prevent the execution of their Designs, passes the Mountains the fourth time, and having taken Benevent and Capova from Aregisa, who would be called King, forces him to give sufficient Pledges, and renounce that vain Title.

786. He had seen the Pope at his passing by Rome, upon his return he saw him again. In this Voyage to please himself, he brought into France the Gregorian Singing, and the Liturgy or Mass that was used at Rome, and would needs abolish the Mu-lick and Service of the Gallican Church. This change begot many difficulties, and stirred up Persecutions against the Ancient Galls, who persisted in keeping their own Customs: This good Prince was so wedded to this Singing, that he made it a considerable business, and a main point of Religion; whereas several of the Ancient Fathers held it as a very indifferent thing.

787. Whilst he was last at Rome, Tassillon's Ambassadors came thither to intreat the Pope to reconcile Charles perfectly to him. The holy Father and the King willingly hearkned to it. But when the King press'd them to name the time wherein their Master would perform what he promised; they replied, that they had nothing in Commission but to carry back his answer: So that the King perceiving he did not walk uprightly, resolved when he got again into France, to make him speak clearly. Having therefore held the Estates at Wormes, he drew three Armies into the Field, his Son Pepin's in Italy, one of the Eastern French, and a third which himself Commanded.

787. When Tassillon saw them all upon his Frontiers, the first in the Valley of Trente, the second on the Borders of the Danube, and the other under the Walls of the City of Angsburch, not knowing which way to turn, he came with all humility to begg his pardon, and delivered up Thirteen Hostages, whereof his Eldest Son, Theudon was one.

Yet the hatred he had for the French, and the correspondence he held with Adalgise his Brother in Law, still prompted him secretly to sollicite the Bavarian to take up Arms, and to joyn in League with the Huns his Neighbours who held Pannonia; which is Hungary and Austria. Part of these were led by his persuasions, but the rest apprehending the Calamities of War, gave the King notice hereof. For which cause this Duke being a second time summoned to the Assembly of Estates which met at Ingelheim, and there accused by his own Subjects, and convicted of Treason, was by his Peers condemned to lose his Life. Howbeit the King, in favour of him as being neer of Kin, commuted that punishment; so that both he and his Son Theudon were only Shaved and sent to the Cloister of Loresheim, and then to Jumiege. And at this time The Duchy of Bavaria was Extinguished, and divided into several hereditary Counties.

788. Out of these ruins sprung a more powerful Enemy. The Huns angry for the loss of their Allie, and that the French were become their Neighbours, began a most bloody War with them, which lasted for Eight Years together. This Year let them however know what the Event was like to be, for they lost three Battles against them, one in Friul, and two in Bavaria.

At the same time Adalgise having obtained some Forces of Constantine the Emperor of Greece, who was netled for that Charles had denied him his Daughter Rotrude in Marriage, descended into Italy by Calabria, imagining the rest of the Lombards would take up Arms in his Quarrel. But he was mistaken in his reckoning. Grimoald Son of his Sister, and Aragise Duke of Benevent, whom Charles had gratified with the Duchy after the death of his Father, Hildebrand Duke of Spoleta, Vinigisa who was so after him, and some other of King Pepin's Captains, fought him at his going forth of Calabria, and obtained an entire Victory. That unfortunate man falling into their hands alive, was cruelly put to death, as generally most Princes are that endeavour to regain their own, when they suffer themselves to be taken.

789. Of the German People, there was hardly any but those that Inhabited along the Baltick Coasts, who did not acknowledge Charlemain, or held themselves Enemies to the French and their Allies. Those nearest to his Frontiers were the Wilses, seated on the further side of the Elbe, in the Southern part of the Country. He built a Fort upon that River, which he strengthened with two Castles, and having made an inroad even to their Principal City, which they called Dragawit, brought such astonishment amongst them, that they all submitted without striking one blow; Their chief Head, named Viltzan, coming forth together with the most eminent of them to take the Oath of Fidelity, and offer him pledges for Security.

790. He spent the Year 790. in his Palace of Wormes, without undertaking any Military expedition. He addicted himself to works of Piety, sent great Almes to the Christians in Syria, Egypt and Africa, who groaned under the Saracen yolk, and besought the amity of those Infidel Princes, thereby to oblige them to treat the Christians more mercifully.

This

790. This very Year was begun, as some do hold, that indissoluble Alliance between France and Scotland. Charles having sent four Thousand Men in assistance of King Achinus, who made him a present (say the Scottish Authors) of Claudian Clement, and Alcunus an Anglo-Saxon, two learned Men for that Age. It is added that they came to Paris, and erected some publick Schools, Beginning of that Famous University, the Mother of all those that are in Europe.

791. France having at this time no other Affairs, Charles thought it was time to take his Revenge of the Huns: but so as it proved a blessing to them, by their being subdued to embrace the Christian Faith. They had, say some Authors, seven Ringues, or Vast Enclosures, lock'd within one another, and wonderfully Palli-faded and strengthened with Rampires, into which they made their retreat with their Spoil, which they had practised above two hundred Years. Charles having passed the River Emms, which divides Bavaria from their Country, went forwards with his Forces who marched along the two sides of the Danube, attended with a Fleet which sailed on the same River; and at the same time another Body of Eastern French-men entred upon them from Bohemia. Upon his arrival they all fled, and left two of their Ringues to him, and afterwards he made his way and ravaged as far as the River Rab. Had it not been for a great mortality which almost destroy'd all his Horses, he would have push'd his Conquest further.

We must observe, That the Country of those Avari, which lay on the East of Bavaria, was by the French, because of their Situation Eastward in respect of them, called Oosterich, whence comes the name of Austria.

792. An eminent danger wherein he found himself the following Year, prevented his return thither as he had projected. The French Austrasian Lords, offended at the lofty behaviour of the Queen Fastrada, conspired to be freed from her to ridd themselves of their King her Husband, and to set up one of his Bastards, named Pepin, in his stead, who had a handsome face, but crooked, and as malicious as it was possible. The plott was discover'd by a poor Priest, who being accidentally in the corner of a Church, where they met for this purpose, over-heard them discoursing of the design. Charles by Sentence of the Estates, caused several to be beheaded, some their Eyes to be put out, others hanged, and his Bastard to be shaved and thrust into the Abby of Prom, which is in the Bishoprick of Triers.

793. This Year Liderick de Harlebec Great Forester of Flanders, was made Earl of it, but not hereditary; though from him are descended the Earls of that Country.

793. The same Year a Tumult was raised in the Dutchy of Benevent, contrived perhaps by Grinoald and the rest of the Lombards, which proved so dangerous, that Lewis King of Aquitaine went into Italy with his Forces to assist his Brother Pepin.

793. Whilst Charles was at Ratisbon, and had laid a Bridge over the Danube, to go and subdue the Avari; A Design was propounded to him which would have proved of great benefit in that War, and for ever after to all Europe. Which was to make a Communication between the River Rhine and the Danube, and by consequence between the Ocean and the Black-Sea, by cutting a Channel from the River Almus, which discharges it self into the Danube, to the River Redits, which falls by Bamberg into the Meine, which does afterwards run into the Rhine near Ments. To which end he caus'd a world of men to work: but the continual Rains that hapned, filling up his Trenches, and over-flowing and washing away his Banks, ruined that brave and useful Undertaking.

Besides, he was diverted by two accounts of ill tydings; one, the revolt of the Saxons, who having kept themselves quiet seven or eight years, now threw off again both the Yoke of Obedience and of Religion; The other, that the Forces Commanded by his Counts in the Marea of Spain, were defeated by the Saracens.

794. Felix Bishop of Urgel had in his answers to Elipand Bishop of Toledo, published a most dangerous heresy: That Jesus Christ as Man, was but the Adopted Son of God the Father; And although about two Years before the King having sent for him, obliged him to recant, and to go to Rome to abjure his Errour: nevertheless he began began anew to dogmatize. Wherefore he caus'd a Council of French Bishops to assemble at Francfort, as also several Bishops of Germany and Lombardy, who all condemned that Error in presence of the Pope's Legat: They also rejected the Second Council of Nice, which had ordained the adoration of Images, and pronounced that it did not deserve the title of Oecumenique.

Whilst the King was at Francfort, died Queen Fastrada his third Wife.

From thence he went and fell with all his Forces upon the Saxons Country, his Army being divided in two, whereof he Commanded one part himself, and his Eldest Son the other, struck so great a Terror thorough all those Provinces, that instead of running to their Arms, they came running to him to begg for Mercy; and this good Prince sparing the blood of those obstinate People, contented himself with the taking away of one third of all such as were capable of bearing Arms, and transporting them to the Sea-Coast of Flanders.

Upon his Return he passed away his Winter in the Country of Juliers, where having discovered some hot Baths, he built a fair Palace and a Church to the honour of the Virgin Mary. For which reason that place was called Aix la Chapelle. These Baths had in former times been accommodated and adorned with handsome Structures by some great Lord, or Roman Governor, whose Name was Granus, (it is not well known in what time) from whence in Latin it takes the name Aquis Granum.

But I should have told you, that before this Year was expired, the Saxons had once more play'd the enraged Devils, cutting in pieces an Army of the Abodrites in the Passage to the Elbe, as they were marching by the King's Command upon an Expedition against the Avari. Vilzan who Commanded them was slain; which put the King into so great Wrath, that he gave up all Saxony to the mercy of the Sword; and at this time there were slain at the least Thirty thousand of those People bearing Arms.

Pope Adrian his intimate Friend being dead, Leo was Elected by the Senators and the Principal of the Clergy at Rome. He sent him an Ambassadour to give him notice of his Election, and to carry the Keys of St. Peter's Church, with the City Banner and other honourable Presents to him, desiring him to send one of his Princes thither to receive the Oaths of Fidelity of the Romans, a certain proof, that the King in quality of Patrician, held the Lordship of the City of Rome.

The Two most potent Princes of the Avari-Huns were so strangely bent to destroy one another, that both of them perished in that Civil War. Henry Duke of Friuli, taking his opportunity when that Nation was weakened by so much loss of Blood, enters the Country and makes himself Master of their principal Ringue, where he found Vast Treasures which those Robbers had heaped up, out of the plunder of all their Neighbouring Provinces for at least two Ages. He sent all to Charlemaine, and Theodon one of their Princes came to him almost at the same time, and was Baptised; but being sent again to Rule in those Countries along the River Raab, he did not keep his Faith long. And so he was slain by the French and Bavarians.

The other Avari thinking to restore themselves, Elected a * Kan, (that is to say, a Commander, for so they called all their Princes) but he was likewise Slain in a Battle by King Pepin; all the Country conquer'd from the River Raab to the Dravus, and from thence to the Danube, and all those Barbarians put to the edge of the Sword, or driven over the River Tissa.

There was a continual War between the French and the Moors, beyond the Pyreneans. The City of Barcelonna, which was sometimes the ones, sometimes the others, fell into the hands of Zad a Saracen Prince, who fearing he should not be able to keep it, came and paid Homage to King Lewis: but upon the first occasion broke his Faith with him.

Charlemaine spent this Year and almost the two following in compleating the Conquest of the Saxons, who broke all Agreements as soon as they had made them, and sometimes signalized their Treachery by some base and mean Cruelties; As they did Anno 798. having killed the King's Commissaries or Judges, who did not leave that Crime unpunished. He built some Cities within their Country, amongst others Heristal upon the Weser.

The Astronomers of those times, observe that the Planet Mars was not visible in the Heavens, from the Month of July in the Year 797, untill the same Month of the Year 798.

Some Roman Officers Kindred of the deceased Pope Adrian, and Enemies of Pope Leo, having made a great Faction, fell one day upon him, whilst he was at a Solemn Procession, and endeavoured to tear out his Eyes, and cut out his Tongue, afterwards dragging him to a loathsome Prison. But he escaped being so mangled as they supposed him to be, and he found friends that contrived his escape to the French Ambassadors, who were lodged at Saint Peters: they conducted him to Spoleta, and thence sent him to the King, well guarded, who at that time was in Saxony. The King having heard his sad complaints, sent him back again to Rome with the same honour as he had received him, promising he would soon be on the place to do him justice.

The Islands called Baleares, * gave themselves up to France, that they might be protected against the Saracen Pyrats.

799. The Saracen Aza, who had made himself Sovereign of Huesca, that he might have the protection of the French, sent the Keys of his City with Presents to Charles the Great, proffering to deliver it up to him when ever he desired it. But when they would have taken him at his word, he failed them, and they did very well in keeping the Forts in their own hands which were erected opposite to Huesca and Sarragossa. Count Aureolus Commanded them.

799. The Avari after several vain attempts to recover their Liberty, were entirely subdued, all their Nobility cut off in the several Battles that had been fought, and the remainder of their Wealth carried away by the French, who became very rich, and began to adorn themselves with Ornaments of Gold even to the very common Soldiers.

799. Guy Count of the Marches of Bretagne wholly submitted that Country, and brought the Shields and Arms together with the Names of all the Lords and Commons that were become Subjects to the King. So that all that Country was for a time under the Dominion of France.

800. The Danes, Normands and Saracens began their Piracy and robbed the Coasts of France, these in the Mediterranean, the others in the Ocean. Charlemaine visited them all, gave Orders to build Vessels, and to raise Forts in several places; and amongst others, to repair the Tower d'Ordre * at Bonlogne, an ancient Building which had been erected by the Romans.

logne.

The Piracy of those Infidels was not only an effect of their inclination to get Wealth and Plunder, but likewise of their false Zeal against the Christian Religion. Idolatry being hunted and pursued from one Country to another, and drove beyond the Rhine, had taken refuge in Saxony with her false Priests, together with all those that struggled in their defence: And then being hotly attacked by the French, had thrown themselves beyond the Elbe and in Denmark, as their last Bulwark. From whence those Exiles and their Offspring, burning with the cruel desire of avenging their Gods and their loss of Liberty, made perpetual Excursions, and principally exercised their bloody malice upon such Priests and Monks as they could light upon, as being those that had destroy'd their Superstitious Temples and false Gods.

Luitgard fourth Wife of Charlemaine dies at Saint Martins de Tours, whither she was gone to pay her Devotions.

From Meins, where he had called a Parliament, he went into Italy, as well to take cognisance of those Outrages committed against the Pope, as upon some vehement suspicions that they were contriving with Grimoald Duke of Benevent, not well affected, and the Inhabitants of Friuli, who had slain their Duke Henry, to revolt from the French.

800. Passing by Friuli, he punished the Authors of that Murder. Being at Rome, he admitted Pope Leo to justify and purge himself by Oath, no body then appearing to accuse him. He afterwards ordered Process to be made against those that had attempted him so basely, who were all condemned to death: but the Pope imitating the Mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ, interceded and obtained that both their Lives and Limbs should be spared. For in those times it was so common a punishment to Mutilate, that even some Abbots used it towards their Monks.

The Pope in retribution of so many favours which this King, his Father and Grand-father, had conferr'd upon the Holy Chair, and to gain that protection which the Grecian Emperours were incapable to give, obliged the Romans to demand him for their Emperour, and Crowned him upon Christmas Day in Saint Peter's, the People crying aloud three times, A long and happy Life and Victory to Charles the August, Great, and Peaceable Emperour of the Romans, Crowned by God.

This

This was in the Year 800, beginning the Year on the First day of January; but 800.
801, if we account Christmas Day the first of the New Year, as the French Authors of those Times are wont to do. (After the Ceremony the Pope adored the Emperour New Emperour; that is to say, Kneeling down before him, and acknowledged him Constantine in for his Sovereign, and caused his Portraiture to be exposed in publique, that so the East.
all the Romans might pay him the same respect.) If we give credit to some of the And Annalists of those Times, he did not seek for this honour, and the Pope surprized Charlemaine him when he besought him to accept of this Title. And indeed, it was so far from in the West.
bringing him any advantage, that it made him now hold that only by the Election of the Romans, which he before held by the power of his Sword.

By this means the West had an Emperour again: but one that had no connexion now with that in the East, as formerly it had.

As the New Emperour was returning into France, being at Spoleta, there was a 801.
furious Earth-quake, accompanied with horrible Noise which shook the Country thereabouts. Neither was France and Germany free from it. But Italy felt it most:
a great number of Cities being thrown down and destroy'd: and this Prodigy was followed with Furious Tempests, and afterwards with divers Contagious Maladies. This Year Charles made no Military Expedition: but his Son Lewis made himself famous by the taking of Barcelona.

When the petty Saracen Princes upon the Frontiers of Spain feared they should 801.
be oppressed by the King of Cordoia, who was Generalissimo of Spain, they made an Alliance with the French, but the danger once past, they fell again to their wonted Treachery. Zad Prince of Barcelona studying some Treason against the French, was nevertheless so imprudent, thinking the better to conceal his Design, as to come to King Lewis at Narbonna, who caused him to be seized. The Sara-cens Elected one Hamar of his Kindred in his room, resolved to defend themselves to the uttermost.

Whilst this hapned the Gascons revolted, because Lewis had set up at Efsensac a Count they were not pleased with. After he had severely chastiz'd them, he undertakes the Siege of Barcelona. The King of Cordoia takes the Field to Relieve it: but being informed there was a Body of an Army to hinder his passage, he bends his Forces against the Asturians. The besieged after a Twelve-months resistance, surrendred themselves up to Lewis, who came himself to hasten forwards the Attaques, he settled a Count in it, named Bera, who is said to be the Stock of the Earls of Barcelona.

The Haughty Aaron King of Persia, who despised all other Princes in the World, votion for the Holy Land, and the City of Jerusalem, he gave him the Propriety of them, reserving to himself only the Title of his Lieutenant in that Country, And two Years after interposed so earnestly in his behalf with Nicephorus, that he engaged that Emperour to conclude a Treaty of Peace with him very advantagious to France.

During this great Torrent of good Fortune, it had been easy for Charlemaine 802. to conquer all the remainder of Italy and their Islands; the Grecians having only a very wicked Woman in their Imperial Throne, it was Irene the Widow of Leo, who had caused the Eyes of her own Son Constantine to be put out. But to stop his progress she had the policy to amuse him with the hopes of marrying her, which would have put the Empire of the East into his hands.

This Negotiation was well advanced, and Charles's Ambassadors were at Constantinople to conclude it, when she was driven thence by Nicephorus who made himself Emperour. Nicephorus having chased away Irene
who were come to Treat with her, to make an agreement with Charles about Charlemaine.

802. Sharing the Empire. He agreed therefore that he should bear the Title of Emperour as well as himself, and that all Italy should be his to the Rivers of Ofantius *, and the Vilturnia, with Bavaria, Hungary, Austria, Dalmatia, and Sclavonia, the Gauls, and Spaines. For as to Germany, it had never been in subjection to the Romans: But Great Britain or England had been a Member, and by consequence ought to hold of Charlemaine.

802. Grimoald Duke of Benevent had revolted under the favour and with the support and of the Greeks. The French gain'd from him the City of Nocera: but soon after he retook it with Vinigisa Count of Spoleta who lay sick in the place. But when the agreement was made betwixt the two Empires, he sent him back again very civilly, and made his peace with the French.

804. The Saxons now revolted for the last time, especially those beyond the Elbe, incited by Godfrey, who was King of Denmark, and very potent at Sea. Charles being come thither with all his Forces, and having pitched his Camp near the River Elbe, that King advanced as far as Sliesforp upon the Borders of his Kingdom and the Country of Saxony, to confer with the Emperour: but some kind of Jealousie made him on the sudden turn back again: and so the Saxon Holfatians finding themselves abandoned, redeemed themselves from utter destruction by turning all Christians.

But he transported one part of them into Flanders, and another into the Helvetian Country, whence it is said the Swisse are descended, a People who are very free in their own Country, and yet serve in all others. He bestowed the Lands they inhabited beyond the Ebre upon the Abrodite Sclavonians; and he established a Council in Saxony in manner of an Inquisition, who had power to punish Mutineers, especially such as returned again to their Idolatry. This sort of Inquisition lasted in Westphalia to the 15th Age. Thus ended the long and obstinate Rebellion of the Saxons, who partly by consent, partly by force, submitted to the Yoak of Jesus Christ, and the Dominion of France.

804. In the Month of October of the same Year, Pope Leo's Ambassadors came to him at Aix la Chapelle, to let him know their Master desired to see and entertain him with some of the Miraculous Blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which was affirmed to have been found at Mantouia. The King sent his Eldest Son Charles as far as Saint Maurice in Chablais to meet him, and himself went and received him at Rheims, whence he had him to his Palace of Crecy * upon the Oise to pass his Christmas, and from thence to Aix la Chapelle, to consecrate the Church. The Holy Father having been there eight dayes, went back again to Rome thorough Bavaria.

* Cavissacum.

He had undertaken this Journey to complain how that Maurice Duke of the Venetians, and his Son John whom he had joyned with him, persecuted the Patriarch Fortunatus whom he had approved of, and honoured with the Pall; and also how they favoured the Grecian Emperours. The City of Venice was not yet built, and the Seventy two Islands that compose it, together with the Country and Towns upon the Shoars of the Gulph, were governed by Tribunes who counter-balanced the power of the Duke. Now those Tribunes (Beat and Obelier whom our French Authors of those Times call Willeric) had caused themselves to be Elected Dukes by one part of the People, and had driven away Maurice and John, who had recourse to the Assistance of the Greeks.

806. These therefore and John Duke of Zara, with some other Lords of Dalmatia, came to the Palace at Thionville to desire assistance of the Emperour, in case the Greeks should assault them.

Whilst he remained there, he shared his Estates between his three Sons, in such manner that either of them hapning to dye without Children, his Portion should be re-divided betwixt the other two; but if a Son were born, and that the People would Elect him to succeed his Father, the Uncles were to consent thereunto.

This partition was made, all his Sons being present, subscribed by the French Lords, and carried to the Pope, that he might likewise Sign it, not to make it the more Valuable, but to render it the more Authentique.

806. This Year the Navarois were reduced to the Obedience of the French, from whom they had withdrawn themselves (upon what motives is unknown) to put themselves under the dominion of the Saracens.

The

The Emperour's eldest Son employ'd himself without intermission in subduing the remaining Idolatrous people in Germany. The preceding Year he had gained a very great Victory over the Beheman Sclavonians, or * Behains, they are now called Bohemians, and slew their Duke named Lechon. This Year he had the like advantage over the Sclavonian Sorabes, who inhabited on the other side of the River Elbe. * Within 200 years Bohemia was called Bohaigne.

At the same time, his two other Brothers laboured each in his division to encrease their Limits upon the Infidels. Pepin made War against the Saracens at Sea, Ademar Count of Genoa lost a Battle and his Life: but Bouchard Count de PEstable obtained another very signal one. Lewis with his Aquitains made his Incursions to the further Shoar of the Elbe.

Nicetas Patrician of the East, sent into the Adriatique Sea by the Emperour Nicephorus, to recover Dalmatia, restored that Country to the obedience of his Master, and re-settled Maurice and John Dukes of Venice, who had been expell'd, and they soon expelled all those that had taken part with France. Pepin had resolved to attaque Nicetas; yet he made a Truce with him for some Months, perhaps because he had enough to do with the Saracens who infested the Tuscan Seas.

(This Year 807. was seen in the Heavens two extraordinary Phenomena, besides three Eclipses, two of the Moon, and the third of the Sun. For on the last day of January the Planet Jupiter seemed to enter into the Moon who was in her 17th day, and the 14th of March Mercury appeared in the disk of the Sun, a little above the Center, like a little black speck, which lasted so eight dayes.)

The Pyracies of the Normands, and their Descents and Landing on the Coasts of Neustria, and even in the Mediterranean, became more frequent and troublesome. Charlemaine one day being in Provence, and seeing some of them appear, was so touched with the Misery France was like to suffer by these Pyrats, that he could not refrain from Tears.)

The Ambassadors from the King of Persia brought him Rare Presents, Tents all of Silk, and a Striking Clock with wonderful Automata. They were accompanied by some Monks whom the Patriarch of Jerusalem (for Syria was then under the obedience of the Persians) had given them to be their Guides.

807.

In the East all acknowledged or honoured Charlemaine. There was none but Godfrey that countermined his Grandeur; and Charles desired to get into his Country, not to take possession of the Ice and barren Rocks of that Northern Region: but to bring those poor ignorant Wretches to the Knowledge of true Faith.

The Dans prevented him, and had the confidence to attaque his Country. At first he made a great bustle, drove before him Tracifcon Duke of the Abrodites, who was under the dominion of the French, took by Treachery, and hanged another of their Dukes, and made two thirds of those people become his Tributaries. Nevertheless having lost his best Men, and his Brothers Son upon the storming of a Castle, being informed that Charles eldest Son to the Emperour had passed over the Elbe, he retreated, and spoiled or ruined his Haven at Reric, whither much Goods and Merchandise had wont to be brought, for fear the French should fortify themselves there.

He designed likewise to shut up and cover his Country of Danemark, by drawing a line and making a great rampart just opposite to the Saxons Territory, from that Gulph of the Sea on the Eastern part to that on the West; and all along the Banks of the River Egidore or Egid, and in this part of his Earthen Wall or Work, he had but one Gate well flanked, for the passage of Carts and Soldiers.

Amongst divers exploits which were done in the Marches of Spain, Lewis King of Aquitain took by force of Engins and assaults the City of Tortosa in Catalonia. But Count Aureolus who had the Government of those Frontiers dying the year after, Amoroz a Saracen Prince of Sarragosa seized upon several Fortresses of the French, protesting notwithstanding he was ready to restore these places and his own person to the Emperours disposal. Whereupon a Treaty was begun, during which Abular King of Cordouia, to whom these Negotiations were no way pleasing, sends his Son Abderaman, who craftily seized upon Sarragosa, and constrained Amoroz to retire himself to Huesca.

The Truce being expired between the French and the Greeks, Pepin enters into the the Gulph of Venice, and gave Battel to Paul, who was Patrician and one of the Greeks Generals. Each side pretended they had gained the Victory.

809. The following year Nictas having presented him Battel near Comachio was rudely repulsed.

At the same time Charlemain desiring to repress the Danes incursions, sent orders and materials to build a great Fort on the River Sturia, at the place called Aselsch.

The Gascans were again revolted, Lewis being gone to Dags with a powerful Army ruined all the Countries of the most Factions and Stubborn, and gave quarter only to those that besought his Pardon. From thence finding he was so far on his way, he pushes on to Pampeluna, where he made some stay to assure himself of the fidelity of the Inhabitants of that Country, which was very uncertain. Before he Filed off his men throw the passages of those Mountains, he would needs be precautioned against the Robberies of those Gascen Mountaineers, some of them being already in Ambuscade, by seizing on their Women and Children, and hanging one of their Spies, who came on purpose to observe them, and give his Companions notice of their motion.

810. Being returned into Aquitain, he mightily laboured to reform that Kingdom, and especially the Ecclesiastical Order, which was so much deformed, the Prelates and Priests being all turned Sword-men, that there were no footsteps of any Discipline remaining. He not only restored it by his exemplary devout life, and by his good Rules and Orders, but also by the great care he took to repair or build Monasteries which were as the Seminaries of good Church-men. The Author who wrote his life, reckons no less than Five and Twenty, or Thirty.

810. Pepin not able any longer to endure the double dealing of Maurice and John Dukes of the Venetians who favoured the Greeks, and desiring to restore Obelier and Beat who were expelled, goes out of Chiaffi, which is the Port of Ravenna, with his Fleet, and enters the Lake of Venice. In the beginning he took all the little Towns which were upon the Shore, then turned towards the Island of Malamauca the Dukes Seat, which he found quite forsaken, Maurice and John his Son having withdrawn themselves into that of Rialto and Oliuolo.

The Venetian Authors relate that commanding his men to Attaque those Islands with floats of Boards or Timber, and the Army of the Dukes defending them, it hapned that wanting knowledge of the Channels and Depths, his Fleet received a notable repulse; That a great number of the French were slain, and stifled in the Mud; and that he himself who staid in the Island Malamauca with the least part of his Forces, Retreated to Ravenna carrying Obelier and Valentine, who had very unluckily engaged him in this enterprize, along with him.

In this Island of Rialto was soon after built a Palace for the Duke, and in that of Oliuolo another for the Bishop, and in time they joynd all those little Islands, near one another, by Bridges, so that all these together have made the City of Venice so renowned, for its wonderful situation, and more for the wisdom of its conduct.

In the mean time Godfrey with a Fleet of Two Hundred Sail, lands in Frisia, pillaged the Country, and exacted Tribute. He bragg'd also that he would give the Emperor Battel, who was encamped near the place where the Rivers Alare and Veser joyn together: but instead of coming forwards he retreats back into his own Country, where he was killed by a certain Son of his, in revenge for having repudiated his Mother. Heming his Brothers Son, who succeeded him, Treated a Peace with the French.

810. France had not their revenge for the affront received in the Gulph of Venice, because Pepin, a Son worthy of his Father, dyed at the age of 33 Years, the 29th of his Reign in Italy. He left only one Bastard-Son named Bernard, who succeeded him in that Kingdom, a young Prince not above Twelve or Thirteen Years old at most.

810. About the end of the following Year Charles the Eldest Son of the Emperor dyed likewise, who left no Children. But the preceding Spring his Father concluded a Peace with the Dane, and sent Three Armies, one against the Sclavonick, Hedimons beyond the Elbe; the second into Pannonia to make head against the Sclavonians, for they molested the Huns very much who were Subjects to the French: and the third against the Bretons, who renouncing that obedience they had sworn to him, had chosen themselves a King named Cornulph Muchon. The two first returned home laden with Spoil, and the last with the honour of having vanquished the Bretons and their new King.

Charlemain being already broken with Age and Labour, the loss of his two Sons made him more inclinable to have a Peace with the Saracens in Spain, with the Greeks, and with the Danes. Which was the more easie to be compass'd, for that Mahumed King of the Saracens in Spain being in War with Abdella his Brother, was the year following forced to let him have a share in the Kingdom in Greece, the Emperor Nicephorus was slain in a Battel against the Bulgarians, and Heming King of Denmark being dead there was a Civil-War about the Succellion between Sigifroy and Amulon or Hamildon, this Nephew to Hericold, and the other to Godfrey. They fought a bloody Battel, where both of them were slain together with Ten or Eleven Thousand men: but Amulon's Party remaining Victorious, Secured the Kingdom to Hericold and Rainfroy his Brothers.

Amidst the Multitude of Affairs which Charlemain had in all the three several parts of the World, he did not forget what concerned Religion. Upon the intreaty of Biorn King of Sweeden, he sent some Priests thither to instruct those People in the knowledge of the Gospel, Ebon a Man of a holy life established a Bishoprick there in the City of Lincopin.

Finding himself grow weaker day by day, he caused his Son Lewis to come to the Parliament of Aix, where he had called together the Bishops, Abbots, Dukes and Counts; he asked them all one by one, whether they would be pleased that he should give him the Title of Emperor. To which all having replied, yes, he declared him his Partner in the Empire, commanded him to go and take the Crown which was upon the Altar, and put it himself upon his own head.

In the same Parliament he likewise declared Bernard the Son of his Son Pepin, King of Italy, whither he had already sent him under the Conduct of Vula, or Galon Son of Bernard his paternal Uncle.

The death of this mighty Prince was preceded with all sorts of prodigies both in the Heavens and upon the Earth, enough to astonish even those that have but little faith in such presages and give least Credit to them. Whilst he was studiously employed in the Reading and the Correcting some Copies, or Manuscripts, of the holy Bible in his Palace at Aix, a Fever seized him and carried him out of this World the 28th of January, the Two and Seventieth year of his Age, at the beginning of the 14th of his Empire, and the 48th of his Reign. His Will and Testament which is yet to be seen, is one of the greatest Tokens of his Piety; For he left but one Fourth part of his Treasure and Goods to be divided amongst all his Children, and gave the rest to the Poor, and to the Metropolitan Churches of his Kingdoms. He was buried in the Church of Aix la Chapelle which he had erected.

He caused all the Laws and Customs of the several Nations under his Empire to be digested in writing; contrived several Capitulary's or Ordinances, he Collected all the ancient Poetry that contained the brave Acts of the French, to serve as Memoirs for a History thereof, which he did intend to Compose. He understood Theology so well, that he wrote himself against the Heresy of Felix Urgel, and about the controvery of Images. He made Speeches in their great Assembly's, and took as much care to make his Eloquence triumphant as his Arms. In the clearest Nights he pleased himself in the Observations of the Spheres and Planets; whereof there are many curious things in his Annals, which it is believed were made by himself. To illustrate his Language, which was the Dutch, he brought it under Rules and made the Grammer; and assigned names for all the Months in that Tongue, as likewise for every Wind, such as for the most part are retained to this very day.

In fine, hitherto no King of France hath had a life and Reign so long and so illustrious, nor a Kingdom of so large extent as he. His Fame would be without blemish, as it is beyond parallel, had he not been too much given up to Women, and too indulgent towards his Mistresses and his Daughters in their carriage.

He had at least Three lawful Wives, Hermengard Daughter of Didier King of the Lombards whom he repudiated the second year, Hildegard Daughter of Childebrand Duke of Suabia, and Fastrade Daughter of one Count Rodolph. The last brought him no Children: but Hildegard had Nine, Four Sons, and Five Daughters. The Sons were Charles, Pepin, Lewis, and Lotaire; these two last were Twynns. Lotaire dyed young, Charles and Pepin fell in the strength of their Age. Louis reaped alone the whole Succellion of his Father. The Daughters were named, Retrude who was promised to the young Emperor Constantine, Son of Leo the III. and Irene, she dyed when Marriageable: Berte who espoused Count Angilbert.

Angilbert afterwards Abbot of St. Riquier, Gisele who became a Nun, and Hildergard and Adelelaid who dyed in infancy.

Neither the number or names of his Mistresses are set down, who were not few: but amongst his Bastards there is mentioned Pepin the Crook-back, Hugo Duke of Burgundy, called the Great Abbot, Dreux Bishop of Metz; and amongst Seven or Eight Daughters, Tétrade Abbess of Argentuil, Euphrasia Abbess of Saint Laurence of Bourges, and Hildetrude who became scandalous in her Fathers House, by her actions.

The Church

The Gallican Church had never yet been in so great disorder as towards the latter end of the Seventh Age or Century, and to the middle of the Eighth, and indeed they were above Sixty Years without any Council. Nevertheless they had happily enough preserved their Temporal Estates under Pepin the young, who was a liberal and religious Prince; but Charles Martel his Son had not the same countenance, nor shewed the same respect as he had done. Many Prelates of Neustria and Burgundy, having favoured Rainfroys Party, gave him an occasion to squeeze them; and the Wars he had against the Saracens, furnished him with a pretence of taking away the riches of the Altars to defend them.

In some Countries he gave the Abbays and Bishopricks to Lay-men, who instead of keeping Clergy-men, maintained Soldiers: In others he took away their Lands and Tithes, and distributed them amongst his Warriours. The Priests and Monks that mixed with them laid down their Psalters to take up the Sword, some out of pure licentiousness, others to get a livelihood; For the same reason the Bishops and Abbots turned Soldiers and were made Captains. The whole Clergy was in extreme disorder, the most of them had Concubines, there were some Deacons known to have at least Four or Five in keeping. The least debauched married Wives and proceeded even to second Marriages. The Nuns neither kept their Cloisters, nor their Vows. In fine, there was no rule, no obedience of Inferiours towards their Superiours, little Divine Service, no Study, and great ignorance in things of Religion, and the Holy Canons.

This disorder gave opportunity to Boniface a Man very Illustrious in those days, as well for his exemplary Life, as his Activity and Zeal to strengthen himself with the Authority of the Pope, that he might apply some Remedy. He was an Englishman by birth, who by a particular inspiration, and emulation of divers holy men of the same Robe had gone from his Monastery, to sow the Seed of the Gospel amongst the barbarous Nations in Germany, especially the Frisia, the Turingi and the Catti, and had devoted his Service to the Pope so strictly and intirely, as to change his English name which was Winfred or Winifred, to that of Boniface: he had been first made Bishop by Gregory the II, then Archbishop by Gregory the III, and by him not only honoured with the Pall, but also with the Title of his Vicar. In this quality he divided Bavaria, where there was but one Bishoprick, into Four Diocesses. This was in the Year 739. The following Year he established Three in Germany, one at Wirtzburg, another at Buraburgb, and the third at Herpsford. These two last held not this honour long. But the Pope, together with the Title of Vicar had given him power to call Councils and to make Bishops in those Countries which he had Converted to the Faith, with Letters of Recommendation to those People, and to Charles Martel, praying him to take him into his protection, which he did; as likewise an Order to the Bishops of Bavaria and Germany to assemble together when he should call them, as being his Vicar.

Now Prince Carloman having declared he would restore the Ecclesiastical Discipline, Boniface embraced that work with much willingness; and as he was active and indefatigable, he advanced apace, but not indeed without somewhat diminishing the Liberty and the Dignity of the Gallican Church to the advantage of the Popes.

At his instance Carloman held a Council in Germany (the place is not mentioned) where he assisted with the Grandees of his Kingdom, and the Year after another at the Royal Palace of Leptines or Estines, just against Bincks in Hanault, which confirmed the Acts of the former. Pepin likewise Convocated one at Soissons An. 754. and subscribed it with three of the Great Men of his Country's, perhaps there might be one belonging to Neustria, one to Burgundy, and one to Aquitain. In all these Councils Boniface presided in quality of Legate from the Holy Chair. And in the first the Clergy Signed a Profession in writing, which obliged them not only to keep the Catholique Faith, but likewise to remain in Unity, subject and obedient to the Roman Church, and Saint Peters Vicar: which being carried to Rome and laid upon the Tomb of that Prince of the Apostles, was received with huge joy by Pope Zachary, and not without reason. Thus there, as upon all other occasions, he contrived things so, that all made still more and more for the Popes Severaignty, and tended chiefly to that end.

As to the Discipline, it was resolved that the Bishops should be re-admitted to their Sees, the Churches to the enjoyment of their Goods, and the Clergy to their Rules: but the two first particulars were not brought to pass till the time of Charlemain. The Canons which they made were principally to prohibit the Clergy from bearing Arms, or going in the habit and garb of Soldiers; and yet the Bishops could not be excused from going to their Wars and Armies, till Charlemain exempted them by a particular Capitulary: to take away their Wives and Concubines, to hinder and prevent Incests and Adulteries, the punishment whereof was left to the Bishops, and also to abolish and root up the remainders of Pagan Superstition. The Religious of both Sexes, were enjoined to walk by the Rule of Saint Benet which Wilfred Bishop of York had set up and caused to be observed in England. Till that time the Rules of Saint Colomban and Saint Cesarius of Arles, amongst many others, had born the greatest Vogue in France.

At the Council of Soissons were two men Condemned, who were Consecrated, but without any See, Adelbert a Gaul, and Clement of the Scotch Nation. The first was an Hypocrite and Frantick, rather than an Heretique, he made the ignorant people follow him, as having a particular Spirit of God, built Oratory's, and set up Crosses near Fountains, in Woods, and the midst of open Fields. The other Preached divers Errours, maintaining that Jesus Christ descending into Hell, Redeemed Pagans as well as the Faithful, that they ought according to the Jewish Custom, to marry their Brothers Widdow, and that which appeared more horrible, he would needs keep his Wife, and wear his Mitre at the same time.

At Leptines, Carloman caused it to be ordained, with the Consent of the Clergy either voluntary or extorted, that to carry on the War which he had on every side of him, he might take part of the Lands belonging to the Church, and bestow it during pleasure, or while that necessity lasted on his followers, who for every Mansion or House, should pay only a Crown in Gold, or twelve Deniers in Silver, and the Ninths or Tenths towards the reparation of the buildings, and that such as held these Precaries, or Leases during pleasure, hapning to dye, the Prince should give it to any other upon the like conditions.

In the Year 779. Charlemain made an Edict; wherein he ordains that such as held those Lands should pay the Nones and the Tithes to the Church. But moderates the Tax or Quit-Rent to a Sol for Fifty Manfes, and half a Sol for Thirty. Besides the Council of Francfort, and Lewis the Debonnaire in his Edict of 828. Charges the Possessours with the Reparation of Churches. This was the beginning of the Alienation of those Lands, by publick Act and Authorized by Law. There are some that maintain that those Kings did not only invest the Laity with these Church Lands, but the Tithes, and all the Rights and Revenues of the Altar, as the first fruits, oblations, distributions for * Masses and other Prayers, * Missa can-tania. and even with the right of putting in Priests, whence say they is derived the gifts and presentations claimed and exercised by many Lords in divers Churches: Hence they are called Patrons; a name found in the Council of Rheims held Anno 878.

It had been ordained in the Council of Soissons, that thenceforward a Council should be held there every year to stifle and suppress disorders, and heresies at their first birth. Likewise Pepin called one at the Royal Palace of Verberie Anno 752. where he would assist in person, one at Metz the year following, one at Vernon upon the Seine two years after, one at Compiegn about the same distance of time, and one at Gentilly right against Paris Anno 767. We have the Canons of the first four: but nothing of that at Gentilly, unless the two questions they propounded: to wit, Whether the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and the Son, which the Greeks denied, and whether we ought to adore Images.

We may almost put in the Rank of Councils the Conventus or Assemblies which the Kings often held, as that of Duria in 760. that of Neures, of Wormes, Atigny, Orleans, and Saint Denis, which were held successively from the year 763. to 768. In all which the Lords being joyned with the Bishops, they ordained such things as concerned the Polity and Government of the Church, as well as what concerned the Temporal and Government of the Kingdom. Of the decisions of Councils, and the Ordinances made in those Assemblies, partly Politique and partly Ecclesiastical, were Composed those Laws which are called Capitulary, the best and most holy that any Nation hath had since the Roman Law.

Never Prince had more affection for the Honour and the Discipline of the Church than Charlemain; There hardly passed any year in all his life but there were either some of these Assemblies or Councils for that purpose. I will not quote the years of the Councils held at Wormes, (which were Five) at Valenciennes, Geneva, Duren and other places, because we have only the names. But that of Frankford is very considerable. It might be called the Western Council: for the Bishops of the greatest part of Italy, with those of Germany and those of Gall, were there. It was called and appointed by Charlemain, who it seems presided in it, at least he reasoned and argued very learnedly against the Errors of Elipand, of Toledo, and Felix d'Urgel, who taught that Jesus Christ was the adopted Son of God the Father according to the Flesh. Those whimsies were Condemned, and that Great King refuted them, in a long Letter which he wrote to the Bishops in Spain, very amply and very learnedly.

They also discussed the questions about Images. The Council of Nice had ordained that they should be retained in the Churches and adored. In France they would have them allowed to be set up in Churches as things proper to instruct the people, but not to be adored. Wherefore the Fathers in this Western Council Assembled, disclaiming to acknowledge that for Oecumenick, rejected that Adoration in all respects and manners, and condemned it by common consent; and Charlemain wrote a Book to oppose it, to which Pope Adrian made a reply.

There remains nothing of that of Aix la Chapelle held in 809. but that the question concerning the Procession of the Holy Ghost was again debated, and no doubt but they agreed, That the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father and the Son; For the French believed that so firmly, that it was the cause of having it added as an express Clause in the Symbol * of Faith or Creed. The last year of his life, he Convocated Six, at Arles, at Ments, at Reims, at Tours and at Chaalons on the Soan, of all which the Canons are still to be found. Thus the Church of France could not miss the being reformed, and Pope Adrian would needs contribute towards it by giving several Reglements to Charlemain, drawn from the Councils of the Greek and Latine Churches, and the Papal degrees, which he sent to him in the Year 789, by Ingilram Bishop of Metz.

The Ecclesiastiques had their particular Judges for their Lands, where the Kings Judges had no inspection neither for things Civil nor Criminal, and as for their persons, they were judged by none but of their own Body. Now it was almost impossible to Convict them, for mean and reproachful people were not admitted to accuse them; and there were to be Seventy and Two Witnesses to Convict a Bishop, Forty for a Priest, Thirty Seven for a Deacon, and Seven for others of inferiour degree, all without exceptions, and if they were of the Laity, only such as had Wife and Children. This last condition was required in all sorts of Testimonies, at least in matters Criminal.

Charlemain excessively encreased the power of the Bishops, by renewing in all his Dominions the Law of Constantine the Great, quoted in the Sixteenth Book of the Theodosian Code, which allows of one of the parties pleading before a Secular Judge, to bring the Cause before the Bishops, and leave it to their Arbitration without Appeal, though the other party doth not consent thereunto. Which would have still continued perhaps, had they not corrupted the effects of so holy a Law by infinite deccits, and by appeals to the Metropolitan, and from thence to the Court of Rome, against the express terms of it.

It was in the Eight Century that the Metropolitans commonly took up the Title of Arch-Bishops; for there are none mentioned in the foregoing. Those that subscribed the Council of Chaalons, and to the immunity of the Abby of Saint Denis had not this Title as yet.

Towards the end of the same Age, or about the beginning of the Ninth, began the Devotion and Pilgrimages to Saint Jacques, * or James, the Great in Gallieia. This Apostle suffered Martyrdom at Jerusalem, however his body was immediately carried into Spain, and being hid in the times of the Pagan Persecution, was not found out again till about that time by the Bishop of Iria, near Compostella, where King Alphonfus built him a Church, at the recommendation of Charlemain, Pope Leo transferr'd thither the Episcopal See of Iria, and Two Hundred years afterwards Pope Calistus II. the Metropolis of Merida.

We find by the Ecclesiastical Capitulary's of Charlemain, that there were besides some * Chorevesques, and although they were only the Successors of the Seventy Disciples, they pretended nevertheless to do all the Functions of Bishops, who were Successors to the Apostles. There were indeavours for Five or Six Hundred Years together used to bring them to the just bounds they ought to have kept (it were difficult to describe it) and in the end, it was found much more easie to abolish, then to regulate them.

The ignorance amongst the Bishops was amazing, since they were enjoined even to learn to understand the Lords-Prayer, and Charlemain after so great a reformation had much ado to bring them only to make some little kind of exhortations to the People.

To dissipate these Clouds of Darknes, it was ordained there should be Schools in the Bishopricks and the Abbeyes: but they only taught the Psalter, Musick, to Compose, and Grammer. I find one Capitulary that enjoyns them to send their Children to study Physick, it does not mention at what place.

Under so ignorant a Prelacy the People could not but be blockish, unpolished and very illiterate, all their Religion was turned into Superstition; and there were a great many Soothsayers, Enchanters, * Tempestaries, and other such infamous Sorcerers, who were very wicked, because they thought themselves such, or would have others believe so.

We must not wonder if amidst such gross Ignorance, even the very Women would needs Usurp a Power in the Church. There were some Abbesses so vain, (without doubt because many of them were of great Families) as to give their blessing to people with the sign of the Cross, and Vail some Virgins with the Sacerdotal Authority.

Likewise the better to reform the Clergy, it was ordained that they should live by Rules and in common. The Superiours of those Communities were called Abbots, and they Chanons, which is to say, Regulars.

In those very times there were found to be certain Amphibies, if I may so say; Who put on the habit of the Religious, and yet would neither be Monks nor Priests. It was said they should be compelled to one of the two Professions, it being fit they should make their choice to be either one or other.

The Covetousness of the Clergy was not less apparent then their ignorance; all the Councils from the Fifth Century, and all the Capitulary's are full of Rules and Orders to Tye them up from Selling of Holy Things. They took Money for Ordinations, for Visits, for the Crisne, for Baptising, for Preaching, for Confirmation, and for every thing.

People of servile condition were not admitted to Orders: (which we should have noted before.) If such had been admitted their Masters had power to disband and turn them out of that sacred Militia, and bring them back to the Slavery and Chains of their former mean condition. Even the Free-men could not be admitted to enter into Orders, or into a Monastery without Letters from the King, because many were otherwise apt to creep in, either out of base Cowardise as afraid to serve in the Wars, or for want of understanding, being seduced thereto by such as had a mind to get their Wealth and Estates from them.

Because the Arch-Deacons managed the Almes and Offerings, the Laity would needs get that preferment; and this abuse had been introduced in the former Ages. Whatever Orders Pepin could make, they still held the most part of the Abbeyes and Bishopricks, and enjoyed the Revenue, allowing but a small portion thereof to the Bishops and Abbots. Charlemain did almost quite root out this abuse, and restored the liberty of Elections, at least his Capitularies bear it: however History makes mention that he often named and recommended people to Benefices.

Tithes were become obligatory, so that such were excommunicated who did refuse to pay them after three admonitions: and it was even exacted upon the increase of Cattle. Pious Donatives were not restrained, unless by one Law, which prohibited the Church from receiving any which disinherited Children and the next of Kin.

Charlemain had a very great care of the poor. Of every thing that was bestowed upon the Church, there was Two Thirds allotted for them, the other third only being for the Clergy, unless in some places where they were richest they shared them them equally, afterwards they made the Division in Four parts, one for the Bishop, one for the Clerks, one for the Poor, and one for Repairs.

The practice of publick Penance and Absolutions, was almost the same as in the Former Ages, I mean the third and fourth, as well as that of Baptisme, which was performed by dipping or plunging, not by throwing on or sprinkling of the Bishop, or the Priest, and this was only done at Easter and Whitsuntide, unless upon urgent occasions.)

The prayers for the dead were very frequent. Singing made up a great part of their Study and Employment, not only amongst the Clergy, but the Nobility also that were very devout. The French had brought this Passion towards Musick from Rome. Bells grew also mighty common, but they did not make any very great ones. The Churches as well as most of their other Buildings, were almost all of Wood. It was ordained that the Altars should be made of Stone.

* Judge of a Bishops Temporal Jurisdiction.

The Bishops and Abbesses had their * Vidames, the Abbots their Advoyers or Advocates; some Cities likewise had the same. They were as their Proctors or Administrators, in whose names all things were transacted, and who Treated and Pleaded every where for them. Every Bishop, Abbot and Count, had his Notary. Excommunications were so frequent as they even became an abuse. The person Excommunicated was Treated with great rigour, no body would keep any Commerce or Conversation with them.

The Gallican Church had not extended the degrees prohibited in Marriage but to the Fourth, in which Case it self they did not separate them, being satisfied with imposing a Penance on both the Parties: but the Popes extended it to the Seventh; and Gregory the II desired it might reach as far as any thing of parentage or kindred could be made out between the parties. But if so, it being notorious to Christians that all Mankind are of Kin in Adam, to whom should they marry? They likewise established the degrees of Spiritual Affinity between the Godfather and Godmother, and between the Godson and his Godmother, as well in Baptism as at Confirmation.

Saints.

Notwithstanding the Corruptions we have noted, the Church was not without her great Lights and Ornaments, I mean a good number of Holy Men, and some that were not Ignorant. Amongst the Bishops Sylvain de Toulouze, Wlfrain de Sens, who renounced the Miter to go and Preach the Faith in Frisie, where he Converted Ratbod the II, Son of that King of the same name, who was so obstinate a defender of Idolatry. Rigobert de Reims who was driven from his Seat by Martel. Gregory of Utrecht who was the Apostle of the Thuringians, and the Countries adjacent to Dorestat. Corbinien Native of Chastres under Montlehery near Paris, who was the first Bishop of Frisingen in Bavaria; as Suidbert the first of Verden, Immeran of Ratisbon who was a Poitevin by birth: Encher d'Orleans, who was banished by Martel, and lived a good while after him, as appears by the revelation he had how it fared with Martel after his death, as hath been observed in the life of Martel, if that were true. Gombert held the Bishoprick of Sens, and then retired to the solitude of the Vosge, Lobier * that of Sees, and after him Godegrand, doubly remarkable, both for his own Vertue, and for his Sisters Saint Opportune, who took upon her the Vows of Virginity, and lifted many more into her Muster-Roll, of whom she had the Conduct. But above all Boniface of Ments was eminent, whom we have mentioned; he suffered Martyrdom An. 754. amongst the Frisons; He was Founder of the Great Abbey of Fulda, in the Forrest of Buken, the most Noble of all that are in Germany.

* Lotarius.

In the monasterial retirements, we observe two Fulrads or Volrads, the one Abbot of Saint Denis, however a little too much taken up with Court Affairs and Negotiations for one that is dedicated entirely to God, the other Cousin to King Charlemain, and Abbot of Saint Quentin. Adelard of the same degree of parentage to the same King, who withdrew from Court for the reasons we have before noted, and was Abbot of Corbie, and from thence recalled into the Kings Council. Angilbert who exchanged the favour of Charlemain, one of whose natural Daughters he had married, for the austerity of the Monastery, and was Abbot of Cenabum. * St. Riquier, le * Pirmin, who is said to have quitted the Bishoprick of Meaux, and who having ving retired himself into a solitary place in Germany, built there that Celebrated Abbey of Riche-Nove, Angia Dives, and Nine or Ten other Monasteries in those parts and in Alsacia; and the learned Alcuin to whom Charlemain gave the Abbey of Tours in recompence of those inestimable Treasures of Learning and Science he brought into France, with Claud and John the Scotsman.

A great part of the Manners and Customes we described under the First Race were preserved under the Second. All the great Offices of the Kings House were still the same, unless the Maire of the Palace, in whose place it seems the grand Seneschal or Dapifer succeeded, but with much less authority, and different Functions. Hincmar sets down an Apocrisiare, a Count of the Palace, a great Camerier or Chamberlain, three Ministerial Officers, to wit, the Seneschal, the Butler, and the Count of the Stable, one Mansionary, that is, grand Marechal of the House, Four Huntsmen, and one Fauconer. The King had ever a Council of State, in his Train, consisting of men chosen out of the Clergy and Nobility. The Apocrisiary assisted in it, when he pleased, the other great Officers never went but as they were sent for.

Manners and Customes under the Second Race.

Those of the Clergy had a place apart to meet in, where they treated of Ecclesiastical Affairs, as the Nobility treated of matters purely Temporal; and when there was any thing of a mixt nature, they joyned all together to determine it.

In the Militia and Courts of Justice we hardly meet now with any Dukes, but only Earls; some of whom were called Marquesses, when the Care and Guarding of the Marches was committed to them, which ordinarily was in the new Conquered Countries; others were called Abbots, either because they possessed the Revenue of the Abbeys, or because they commanded some certain Company's near the King, and taught them their Discipline and Exercise, the Grandeas were called Princes, and we have light enough even in those dark times to see, that it was not in the power of the King to dis seize them, nor put them to death but by certain Forms and Rules, and the Judgment of their Peers and Equals where he presided, or in their general Assemblies.

I find three sorts of great Assemblies, the general Pleas of the Provinces; the May-Assembly whither came the Seniores & Majores natu of the French people, there they chiefly consulted about Warlike Affairs; and the Conventus, Colloquia, Parliaments where met together, the Bishops, Abbots, Counts, and other Grandeas, consider of Laws and Rules for their Policy, Justice and the Treasury, as well as the Discipline of the Militia both sacred and prophane. The two last kinds of Assemblies were after confounded in one.

The Kings had ever made use of Envoyez or Intendan, of Justice. But Charlemain made them ordinary; and I observe that there were Intendants fixed and perpetual, but no Intendants that were so. Neither do I find that they had any Aquitain nor in Lombardy. He most commonly joyned in such Commissions Count and a Bishop. Seldom do we find two of either of these qualities joyned in the same Commission; they were called Missi Dominici, and their Jurisdiction Missaticum. The People found them Lodging and a certain quantity of Provision; They took care chiefly to publish the Kings Orders and put them in Execution, to hear the Peoples Complaints and do them right, to punish the Count or Bishop if they were faulty, to reform and reverse unjust Judgments, and compel the refractory to obey. And if they wanted strength or power to effect it, they gave notice to the King. They likewise drew up into Writings and Dids such Grants of Lands as the King and the Church bestowed in Benefice. They rode their Circuits Four times a Year, in January, April, July and October. They could not keep Courts but in those Months, and in Four different places if they thought fit; They summoned the Counts, and were forced to let them hold all the rest. They Elected Sheriffs with the consent of the people, as also Aoyers and Notary's. The Sheriffs were, if I mistake not, the Assessors of the Courts.

Those that were Free-men were only obliged to be at Four Assizes or Pleadings a Year. This was a most Christian Method that the cause of the Poor was the first of all determined, the Kings business next, then what belonged to the Church,

Church, and last of all that which concerned the People in general. The Centesier had not power of Condemning to death. The King gave Audience one day in every Week, before whom were brought only such Causes as concerned the Grantees who had no other Judge but himself, or such whom the Commissioners or Counts had refused to do Justice to, or had adjudged contrary to Law.

The licentiousness in times of War had made most part of the Frenchmen turn Thieves and Robbers, and some of them false Coyners. The greatest difficulties the Judges met withal were to suppress these disorders. Those that made counterfeit Money had their hand cut off, the other accomplices escap'd only with a Whipping. They were forced to reduce all their Money to one sort of species, and to punish such as harboured a Thief with the same severity as the Thief himself; and that was the loss of an Eye for the first fault, the loss of the Nose for the second, and the third cost them their life.

Even in those days drunkenness was very frequent, particularly in the Armies, since they were fain to punish such as forced another to drink, and he that made himself drunk was Excommunicated and Condemned to the Penance of drinking Water only, for a certain time.

The Law permitting every one to take his own satisfaction or revenge for an affront or injury, unless he chose rather to accept of a certain Sum of Money Taxed by Law, Murders were very frequent. Charlemain Commanded the Judges to be very careful in agreeing such as had any thing of a quarrel, and if any appeared too obstinate to bring them before him.

There was three sorts of restraint, the one was imprisonment, another was a Guard set upon them, the third was bail or caution who obliged themselves to answer for the Parties.

Homicide committed on a Clergy-man cost them much dearer, then upon any other of equal condition; for they were to pay 800 Sols of Gold for killing a Bishop, 600 for murdering a Priest, 400 for a Deacon, and as much for a Monk.

* Used amongst the Moroccans to this day.

The Method of making War and arming themselves was much changed since the Reign of Clovis. They had as much Cavalry as Infantry almost; and they used great Launces * which they darted, or retained in their hands after they had struck their blow. They were Armed Cap a Pie, their very Horse were barded, so that a Squadron seemed to be all of Iron. The Infantry had no Cuirasses or Armour, but cover'd themselves admirably well with their Bucklers. They also began to learn the use of Engins in some Sieges.

Whoever deserted the Army without leave incurred Capital Punishment. Every one was obliged to carry Three Months Provision, and Arms and Cloaths for Six, to be reckoned from the time they went beyond the Marches or Limits of their own Country. This when they came from Aquitain hitherward was the Loire; to those that went thence into Spain, it was the Pyrrean: to those of Neustria, when they made War on Germany, it was the Rhine, and to those in the Provinces beyond that River, when they were to march far into Germany it was the Elbe, which were thus set as their Limits, or Frontiers. The Soldiers were allowed to take nothing but in an Enemies Countrey. Those Lords that led them were responsible for their pilfering, and they were disbanded presently in the Field if they did not justly punish them. When the Captains came to Court they were presented with some Gifts or Regalia; and it was the Queen's care and charge of such distributions, or in her absence the grand Chambrier or Chamberlain.

Though the Demeasnes of the King and those of the Church were inalienable, they had been necessitated either to reward such as had served them, or to retain such as could do them mischief, to bestow upon several, but it was only for life and by title of gratification; wherefore they were called Benefice, which term remains only in the Church. Which had of two sorts, the one of such Goods as are effected to such as deserve, which at the present we call a Benefice, and the other certain Lands which they gave to Seculars, to hold of the King during Life. There were even in those times Arts and crafty ways to confound the demesnes of the Crown with the Lands of particular People; and this subtraction was accounted for a Crime, since it was punished with Banishment and Confiscation of Goods.

There were besides another sort of Lands, which were called Dominicates, appropriated to Dominus which was the King, but which were Rented by particular Men, at about the Ninth * of the Profits. These were ordinarily only some little Farms or petty Portions of Lands perhaps lopp'd off from the greater ones belonging to the Crown, which could not all be set to the most advantage.

The Levying of Moneys was of three sorts, either by Poll, or upon the fruits and growth of the Earth, or Merchandize and Goods for Traffique; But of the last kind, the Carlovinian Princes took none but of the Trading Merchants. For every one besides sent his Goods up and down in Carts or any other ways for his own Families use without paying the least Toll, no more then those that supplied the Kings Household, or even those that went to the Wars.

We may again in some other place, according as occasion requires, take a summary Notice of certain Laws and Usages practised in the time of the Carlovinian Race.

menian,
And Louis I. Called the Debonnaire.

As the Court of that Prince whose Reign is at end, is ever an Enemy to that which is to succeed, it was to be feared there might be some Faction in that of Charlemain which would oppose the advancement of Lewis. He particularly dreaded Walla an undertaking person, who being a Prince of the Blood, and one that had a great hand in the management of his Fathers Affairs, might have aspired to the Succession, or have likewise have been incited thereto by the Daughters and Mistresses of Charlemain, who were confederated against Lewis, because he would reform their disorders.

The Forces he brought from Aquitain, and which he gathered up in his way dispersed the whole Faction, if any such were: Walla comes to him upon his Summons with an intire submission, and all the French Nobility made haste to go and meet him. He had a very great mind to purge the Court from Scandal, and to that end had Commanded Count Garnier to seize upon two Lords Odille and Tulle: who lived too familiarly with his Sisters. The first of these had the impudence to find out Garnier and murder him, but he was cut in pieces on the place, and the Emperor enraged at his insolence caused the eyes of Tulle to be put out.

After

After he had celebrated the Funeral of his Father, and divided the Goods with his Brothers and Sisters, he thrust out of the Court all those Women who were there only upon pleasure, and sent his Sisters to remain in those Abbeys which Charlemain had bestowed upon them.

The Ambassadors which his Father had sent to Constantinople, returned home in Company with some who came from the Emperor Leo, and brought with them a Treaty of Peace betwixt the two Emperors. He sent Lothaire the eldest of his Three Sons into Bavaria, and Pepin into Aquitain, but retained Pepin at Court with himself, because he was as yet too young.

Grimoald Duke of Benevent surrendered his Dutchy into his hands, that he might receive it again and hold it from him, upon condition of a yearly Tribute of Seven Thousand Crowns of Gold. Bernard King of Italy in obedience to his Command, came to wait on him, acknowledged himself his Vassal, and gave him Oath of Fidelity. He could not require this in quality of Emperor, nor as the first of the Family: It must be, in my opinion, that Charlemain had given it to Bernard, upon condition that he should hold it of his Uncle.

The Sons of Godfrey who had sheltered themselves in Sweden being returned to Denmark with their Friends, had given Battel to Heriold and Reginfroy, where the last was slain, but the others obtained the Victory. Heriold driven out of his Country came to Louis to implore his Assistance, and became his Vassal.

The French Counts who Commanded in Saxony, with the Abrodites, had orders to restore him again. They passed the River Egid with a potent Army. The Sons of Godfrey raised one more numerous, and withal a Fleet of Two Hundred Sail: but keeping themselves at Sea near an Island about Three Leagues from the Shore, the French could do no other mischief but only scowre and plunder the Country.

The same Year a Peace was made with Abulaz King of the Moors or Saracens in Spain; but that Prince being dead, and the Moors still pillaging the Coasts of Italy and its Islands, the Deputies of Calara in Sardinia obliged the Emperor to break it.

The Romans having Conspired against Pope Leo, he put some to death by his own Authority. The Emperor took those proceedings very ill as being contrary to his natural Clemency, and his Sovereignty over the City of Rome. He ordered Bernard King of Italy to go thither and inform himself of the full truth and particulars, which he did; the Pope on his part, sent his Legates into France to clear himself there: but the Romans were so dissatisfied at that cruelty, that Leo being fallen sick, they did not only seize upon those Lands he had usurped from them, but likewise ransack'd his Castles in the Country. Bernard was forced to send Vinigise Duke of Spoleta with an Army, to appease the Tumult. He took some of the most active and leading Mutineers and sent them into France.

The Sorabes having rebelled were reduced, after the taking their best Hold, by an Army of Austrasian, French and Saxons. The Gascons a giddy People, had also taken the Field, because their Count named Seguin was taken from them, who had shewed himself disobedient to the Emperor: They were punished for their insolence by the loss of two Battels, and compelled to renounce him whom they had Elected in the room of Seguin. We must observe that Gasconne was divided into a County and a Dutchy, and that the County held of the Dutchy, and comprehended the Country from the Pyrenees to the River of Adour, so that Dags was part of it.

Pope Leo being dead the 23d of May, Stephen the Deacon, was put in his place by Election of the Clergy. He waited not for the Emperors confirmation to be Installed, to whom nevertheless he made the Romans swear fidelity and afterwards came himself to him at Reims to tender his Devoirs. The Emperor gave order to his Nephew Bernard to accompany him as far as the Alpes, where divers Lords attended to receive him on his behalf; and when he was gotten farther into the Country, he found his Arch-Chaplain and Two or Three Bishops. The Emperor staid for him at Reims, received him upon his alighting * off his Horse, accompanied him to the Abbey Church of Saint Remy, which when they entered he took him by the hand to help him. The French Clergy sung the Te Deum, and the Romans made loud acclamations in the Emperors praise.

The Pope and the Emperor eat and drank some consecrated Bread and Wine together; then the Emperor retired to the City, and left him to lodge in the Abbey. They entertained each other with Feasting, and gave mutual Presents:

the Emperor began, and the Sunday following the Pope Crowned both him and the Empress Hermengarde, having purposely brought with him two gold Crowns: that for the Emperor was set all over with Jewels and Stones, the other being plain Gold without other Ornament.

817. Three Months after Leo went out of France, he died at Rome the 25th of January An. 817, and the Clergy Elected Paschal: this man knowing the softness of the Emperor, durst likewise take his Seat in the Pontifical Chair without waiting for his consent; and yet excused it to him by an Ambassador sent expressly. Though the Emperor was not very well pleased, yet he did what was required for his Confirmation: But he reprov'd the Romans, and admonish'd them never to fall upon such an attempt again. And yet if we believe the Partisans of the Court of Rome, Paschal wrought so far upon the Emperor that he yielded up his right of confirming Popes.

817. The Sons of Godfrey demanded Peace of the Emperor: It was taken to be only a pretence, and therefore great succours were sent to Heriold. Upon the demand of the Grecian Emperors Ambassadors, who were come for that purpose, Louis dispatched a Deputy to settle the Limits of Dalmatia between the two Emperors, together with Cadolac who commanded for him in those Marches, and the Slavonians that had some interest.

817. The 17th of February, during an Eclipse of the Moon, a Comet began to appear in the Sign of Sagittary.

817. Upon *Holy-Thursd*ay, as the Emperor was coming out of the Church belonging to his Palace, a Gallery fell down under him, twenty persons of Quality were hurt; but it prov'd to have more of fear than danger, for their bruises and broken-shinns were soon healed.

It seem'd Louis was Born rather for the Church, than for the World; For as he behaved himself he would have proved a better Abbot or a Bishop, than a King. Besides his perpetual exercise in Devotion (which does not always suite with the Activity of Government) he busied himself very much about the reformation of the Clergy; Amongst other things in the Assembly at Aix la Chapelle, he caus'd a Rule to be made for the Chanons, drawn from the Writings of the Holy-Fathers, commanded the Benedictins to observe theirs, sent Commissary's into the Provinces to prevent the Simony, Luxury and Pride, with such other like abuses of the Churchmen, and oblig'd the Bishops, in fine, to Reform at least in outward appearance, and throw aside their Belts, and Embroid'red Girdles, their Daggers with Hilts beset with Jewels, and glingling Spurs; which drew upon him the hatred of the Churchmen, amongst whom the greatest number were the worst.

In this assembly he Associated Lotaire his Eldest Son in the Empire, and gave Aquitain to Pepin, and Bavaria to Louis, both with the Titles of Kingdoms. Tegan Chorevesque of Treves hath written that he design'd Lotaire his Eldest to be Sole Heir; whether he did it before or after this partition, it was a great weakness.

Louis the Debonnaire, Emperour and King of France, Eastern and Western.

Lotaire , King of Italy , and As- sociate in the Empire.	Pepin , King of Aquitain .	Louis , King of Bavaria .
---	---	--

To this place they brought him intelligence of the defection of the Abodrites, and the conspiracy of Bernard King of Italy: both the attempts of the one and the other were suppress'd and stifled in their Birth. Bernard a young Prince had suffer'd himself to be possess'd with an opinion that he could dethrone his Uncle. This counsel came from the very Court of France, where he had divers abettors, who without all doubt persuad'd him that all the Kingdom was his, belonging to him as Son to the Eldest. His design was discovered before he had time to take his measures: the Forces to whom he had committed the defence or keeping of the passages to the Alpes, abandoned them upon the first notice of the March of the Emperors Army, and those that first set him upon this business, were the first that forsook forsook him. In this distress he took the most dangerous counsel, which made him come himself to Chaalons, and fall down at his Feet begging his pardon. This hindred not his being made a Prisoner, together with all those Lords that were in his Train.

The Emperor being returned to Aix la Chapelle caus'd their process to be made: The Seculars were all condemn'd to Death: The Bishops, amongst whom was Theodulfe d'Orleans, degrad'd and confin'd to a Monastery. Some of the first suffer'd the rigour of the Sentence, others had their eyes put out, whereof two of the most Eminent died, and Bernard himself lost his life within three days after. Whoever disturb the Peace of a Nation deserves death; but it was too extreme a rigour towards a young Prince of nineteen years, and an Uncle towards his Nephew. And indeed Louis had great remorse all his life, nor did the French forgive him that cruelty.

Bernard left but one Son named Pepin, and at his age, he could scarce have any more, at least Legitimate. This same begat three, Bernard, Pepin, and Heribert. From Pepin sprang The First Branch of Vermandois.

The Emperor apprehending his Bastard-Brothers, (Charlemaine had left several) might fall into the like Conspiracies, caus'd them all to be shav'd and thrust into Monasteries, and sent away Adelard Abbot of Corbie, and Valla his Brother.

The Bretons had created a King called Morman or Mo:van. The Emperor going thither in Person reduced all the Country in Forty days, and Morman being slain in his own Camp, either by his own, or by the French-men, he gave them a Duke of his own.

At this return from this Voyage he lost his Wife Hermengard. She died at Angiers, leaving him three Sons Lotaire, Pepin and Louis.

The Abodrites were Subjects and Tributaries to the French, who nevertheless allow'd them to have a King. He whom they then had was call'd Sclaomir; who having intelligence with the Enemies of France, was seiz'd upon by the Emperors Lieutenants, and being unable to justify himself before him, was banish'd, and his Crown given to Ceadragne Son of Tracifcon who had been cut off by the Danes.

Loup Centule Duke of the Gascons, guilty of the like Crime, being vanquish'd in a great Battel by the French Counts, and afterwards taken Prisoner, was likewise desitituted and exil'd. He withdrew himself into Spain to the Court of the King of the Asturias.

These Commotions shew'd enough the weakness of the Government, Liudewit Duke of Pannonia Inferiora, who sought pretences to revolt for grievances he alledg'd to have suffer'd by Cadolac Duke of Friuli, threw off his Masque in the end, and for three or four years gave a great deal of trouble to those Lieutenants that serv'd the Emperor in Dalmatia, Friuli and Bavaria, till at length he was quite driven out of those Countries. The same Year, upon his return from that expedition, Cadolac died upon the Frontiers, and Baudry succeeded in his place.

In the general Assembly held at Aix Bera Count of Barcelonna being accus'd of Treason, and thinking to justify himself by combat, fell under the Sword of his accuser, and should have shamefully forfeited his life according to the Law, had not the Emperor chang'd his Sentence of Death, for banishment.

It was ill counsel made the Emperor give his Sons their shares so young, as he had done: But it was worse after he had done so, to Marry a second Wife; But being resolv'd, notwithstanding his Devotion, to taste again the pleasures of the Nuptial Bed, he made choice of Judith Daughter to Helpon Duke of Bavaria, so much the more a trouble to his repose as she was Beautiful Witty and Gallant.

The Truce between the French and Saracens of Spain is broken, and the Saracens begin to range about the Coasts of Italy, Sardinia and Corfica.

Thirteen Normand Vessels having attempted to make a descent in Flanders at the Mouth of the Seine, went and pillag'd the Island of Amboium upon the Coasts of Poitou. (So great a Mortality hapn'd amongst Bulls and Cowes, that it almost destroy'd the whole Race of that sort of Cattel thorow all France.)

The Emperor confirm'd the partition he had made amongst his Sons, and oblig'd all the Lords that were present to Swear they would maintain them therein; and as though he fear'd his Family might want Princes, he made hast to marry them.

Lotaire with Hermengard, Daughter to Count Hughes, and the year after Pepin with Engeltrude Daughter of Thietbert Earl of Matric. Lotaire, when his Marriage was consummate, went into Italy, where the Pope Crowned him Emperor, and Pepin returned into Aquitaine.

We omit several minute things, as the Negotiations of Ambassadors from divers Princes, little exploits in War against the Abodrites, Bretons, Saracens, and others. But it is a very memorable thing, that Louis the Debonnaire touched with remorse for having put his Nephew to Death, and cloister'd all his Brothers and natural Cousins against their wills, made his confession to the Bishops, and did publick Penance before all the People at the general Assembly of Attigny. After which he gave liberty to all those he had caused to be shaven to quit their Cloister, and recalled Valac and Adelard to be of his Council.

823. Birth of Charles the Bald, and with him a world of Michiefs. Which one may say had been presaged by many terrible prodigies hapning this year: an Earthquake which shoke the Palace of Aix la Chapelle, Furious Stormes which spoiled the Corn and Fruits of the Country, a shovre of huge Stones which fell together, with Prodigious Hail, many Men and Beasts in divers places struck with lightning, a Girl that lived ten Months without eating, and after all these a most raging Pestilence.

823. The Authority of the French at Rome did much incommode the Pope; He knew what Emperors he had to do with, and sought under-hand to weaken them, and to render them odious and contemptible. It hapned that Theodorus Primicer of the Church, and Leon Donatour his Son in Law, were killed in his House, for no other reason, but because they had too much affection for Lotaire. He purged himself by Oath that he had not consented to this Murther: but however he would not deliver up the Murtherers, saying they were of the Family of St. Peter: And Louis too Debonnaire, or meek, puts up this injury, whereas he should at least have required Justice upon them.

824. Shortly after the Pope comes to die. Eugenius II. his Successor made some satisfaction to the French, and there were Judges established in Rome, all of the Emperors Palace, none of the Popes.

The Bretons as obstinate for their Liberty, as the Saxons for their Religion assayed to withdraw themselves from the obedience of the French, and Elected a Lord of their Country to command them. He was called Wihormac, or Guyormac, and was Vicount of Leon. The Emperor being entred into the Country with three Armies, whereof he commanded one, and his two Sons the two others, made so great waste in the parts belonging to those Rebels, that about the end of ten or twelve days they were glad to come and fall at his Feet, and give up the Children of the most Noted Families for a Pawn of their Submission. The following year the Principals, and Guyomare their Chief, came to the general Assembly at Aix, as making up now a part of the French Monarchy. The Emperor rewarded them all with rich Presents: but when occasion offer'd they made it appear they could swallow the Bait and yet avoid the Hook.

The Peace being broken with the Saracens of Spain, the French Earls, Guardians of the Frontiers had in An. 822. passed the Segre, and going a great way into the Country, brought thence very rich booty. The King of Cordona would needs have his revenge upon Navarre, and those Neighbouring Countries that were under the French. Those People could hardly receive any assistance: For the Saracens held Sarrageffa and Huesca, which hindred the passage of any succours that would go the lower way, I mean Catalonia: and the way thorow Gascony by Aspe and Roncevaux was very incommodious: infomuch that the Emperor could send only the Gascons, under command of the Counts Ebles and Aznar or Aznar, who were of that Country. When they had taken care to secure Pampelonna, and thought to retreat, they found the Saracens had cut off their way back. So they were forced to get the assistance of the People Inhabiting those Mountains to shew them some bye unknown ways: but those treacherous Villains led them into places where the Saracens lay in Ambuscade, so that they were cut in pieces, and Ebles sent in Triumph to Cordonia, but Aznar set at liberty as being of Kin to some of those false-hearted Robbers.

The Bulgarians had already signalized themselves by their Incurfions into the Territories of the Eastern Empire: The French began to know them when they came to be their Neighbours. Omortag their King sent Ambassadors to the Emperor to settle the Limits between the two Nations. He detained them above two years with him, and then sent them back without any answer.

By the assistance of the French, Heriold was received in part into the Kingdom of Denmark with the Sons of Godfrey. But those Princes out of hatred for that he and all his Family had received Baptism, drove him out of the Country: which broke the Truce made with the Dane. Soon after it was renewed, and Heriold forced to content himself with the Earldom of Rjusty which the Emperor had given him in Frisa.

The Normands Scouring the Coasts of Spain, took Sevil which they held a whole year.

The Affairs of France, being in a declining condition towards the Marches of Spain since the defeat of Ebles and Aznar, a Lord named Aizo, who had left the Emperors Court in discontent, seized by a wife upon the City of Offonna in Catalonia, and made a League with the Saracen King who gave him Powerful assistance: with which help he so tormented the Governors of places, that some quitted them, and others went and joyned with him. There was none but Bernard Earl of Barcelonna, that persevered in the fidelity he owed the Emperor.

826.

The next year Aizo got a very great re-inforcement of the Saracens, and the Emperor on his part gave Pepin an Army to chastise him, and to re-settle his affairs in those Countries: But the Infidels ransacked the Counties of Gironna and Barcelonna at their pleasure, before the French Forces were in condition.

827.

The negligence of their Commanders was the cause of this delay: which was most severely punished at the general Assembly of Aix, with the loss of their employment: And whatever other favour they held of the Emperor. This done to repair their fault, he gave a great Army to his Son Lotaire, who advanced as far as Lyons, but having conferred with his Brother Pepin, he went no farther, because the Saracens had made no new attempt.

This was the last Trial the French made for those Marches. For the following year, there being a division bred in the Royal Family whereof Bernard Earl of Barcelonna was the pretence, the Saracens and Spaniards too, made great advantages of the same; So that France could preserve only the Lower Marches, to wit, the Counties of Barcelonna, Ampuries, Roussillon, Cerdagne, Urgel, Paillars, Offonna and Ribagorce. The People of the higher Marches seeing themselves abandoned by the French bethought themselves of making a King; and chose Eneco or Innigo Earl of Bigorre; surnamed Arista, by corruption from Aristat, a word which in that Country Language signifies the bold, the resolute: By whose valour and the credit he had amongst the Gascons and the Inhabitants of the Pyreneans, they promised themselves assistance sufficient enough to make Head against the Saracens. As indeed he regained Pampelonna, and some other Cities from those Infidels.

'Tis here therefore we must assign the beginning Of the Kingdom of Navarre, and not 70 years earlier by one Garcia Ximenes. For all the Six Kings whom they place before this Innigo Arista, are fabulous; as well as the pretended Kingdom of Sobrarne where they tell us they Reigned. Now Sobrarne is a little Country between the Ancient Earldom of Arragon, and that of Ribagorce, which is within the precincts of the Kingdom of Arragon, not of Navarre, and hath but six Leagues of extent, and some Burroughs in a Valley, with the Abbey of Penna. Innigo Arista had for Son and Successor Ximene or Semenon * d' Innigo, and he had one Innigo de Semenon, and Garcia both Kings. D' Innigo II. was Son of Garcia II. who had two Sons which were Successively Kings, viz. Fortunius Garcia, and Sance Abarca the first of that name. After him the Succession of their Kings of Navarre is clear and indisputable.

The Bulgarians ransacked Pannonia Superiora as they listed, Balderic Duke of Friuli never stirring to repel them; But his cowardly neglect was punished as it deserved: He was devested of all his Honours, and his Dutchy was divided into four Counties.

The Emperor desperately fond of his Wife and of his Son Charles, bestowed Rhetia and part of the Kingdom of Burgundy upon that Child, his other Brothers present. But Trembling with jealousy and wrath,

Then all the rest of the Party that had been for King Bernard, the Relations and Friends of those whom the Emperor had put to Death, those whom he had Banished and sent away and afterwards recalled, Leagued themselves together, and taking this opportunity of the discontent of these young Princes, Heated and Animated the People with divers rumours and reflections.

The Emperor fore-saw the Tempest well enough by the gathering of these clouds; His Wife, as well to have the Absolute Government of her Husbands weak Spirit, as out of affection, increased his Apprehensions, and persuaded him to put an entire confidence in Bernard Earl of Barcelona whom she loved, with the Office of Chamberlain, that she might ever have him near her.

(Bernard's Pride and his too great familiarity with the Emperors bred envy and jealousy, which caused several other Lords to joyn with the contrary Party. All the discontented therefore address themselves to Pepin: And in the ill humour he had conceived against his Mother-in-Law, easily made him believe that Bernard was her Gallant, and that she had bewitched her Husband: and therefore it was a becoming Duty in the Son, to revenge those injuries Practised against his Father, and to restore him to his Honour and Witts again. He believes them, and takes the Field; The Emperor being informed that he approached permits Bernard to retire, sends his Wife to a Monastery at Laon, and comes to Compiene.

The Conspirators Seize the Emperess; she promises them to persuade her Husband to suffer himself to be shaved, or deposed: and upon this assurance they grant her the liberty to speak with him in Private. They having conferred together made an agreement that the Emperess should wear the Vail for a time, but that he should demand some longer time to consider and resolve them.

Mean time his Son Lotaire arrives from Italy, who confirmed all that had been done, shuts up his Father in the Abbey of St. Mard at Soissons, and appointed some Monks to instruct and advise him to put on the habit.

Some time after the Emperess was brought to her Husband and upon the Peoples clamours confined to the Monastery of St. Radegonde of Poitiers.

In this Miserable condition the Debonnaire passed the Spring and Summer-season, his Courage so sunk that he would have consented to turn Monk, if the very Monks themselves, who designed to take advantage of the opportunity, and by some methods bring the Affairs of Court into their management by his means, had not dissuaded him, and found a way for his escape out of that Captivity. One Gondoband amongst others stickled much in his service, and went in his behalf to his two Sons Pepin and Lewis, to entice them to embrace their Fathers Cause, to which they were already much inclined out of the jealousy of the growing power of their elder Brother, and his undertaking to govern all things according to his own fancy.

The Power of these two Brothers serving as a Counter-poise to that of Lotaire, there needed a general Assembly to settle the Government. The contrary Faction would have it in Neustria where they were the stronger, to degrade him, or at least to dissolve his Marriage with Judith, because she was of Kin to him: But yet he had Friends or craft enough to have the meeting held at Nimiquen. There making his Party the strongest by the help and addition of the Eastern French, he obliged his Son Lotaire to come and submit to him in his Tent, and give up the principals of the Confederates into his hands. All the Lawyers, and his Sons themselves judged them worthy of Death: He Pardoned them notwithstanding, and did only command the Laity to be shorn, and the Church-men to be shut up in Monasteries.

When he was got back to Aix, he recalled his Wife, and her Brothers who had been shaved at the beginning of the Commotion; but he would not admit her till she had cleared her self according to the usual manner, of every thing laid to her charge. In the Easter-Holy-days, he was so merciful, that in Honour of him who with his own Blood had Redeemed all Mankind and obtained Pardon for Sinners, He released and recalled likewise all those whom he had caused to be shorne, and and restored them to their Estates and Lands; but he sent his three Sons into their own Kingdoms. Bernard was admitted to purge himself by combat, and there appearing no accuser to oppose him, he purged himself by Oath.

After these broils neither of his three Sons shewed him a perfect obedience. Pepin and Louis, though he had enlarged their shares, did not leave vexing him; And Lotaire their elder did under-hand contrive all their practices. Pepin being sent for to a general Assembly at Autonne, came not till they were broke up, which made his Father keep him with him. At the same time almost Louis was making ready to come and visit him with too great an Attendance: But the Father going forth to meet him, made him retire, and pursued him as far as Augsburg. From thence he summoned him to be present at the Assembly of Frankfurt; to which he obey'd.

When he had done with one, another began anew. He had intelligence that Pepin was again Arming himself; he went therefore as far as the Palace of Logonriac in Limosin where he Assembled the Estates of Aquitaine. The rebellious Son was forced to appear there; And his Cause having been discussed, he was kept Prisoner. As they were conveying him to Triers he escaped, and as soon as his Father was out of Aquitaine, he got in again with the same evil Spirit. In fine, having been Summoned to appear at the general Assembly of Saint Martins, he not obeying, his Father punished his Rebellion by taking the Kingdom of Aquitaine from him.

It was said that Gombaud the Monk enraged because Pepin hindered him from Governing the Emperor, in recompence of his good Services; stirred up his Fathers wrath against him, and Judith with her Artifices compleating the Project, pulled the young Prince on to these extreams, that she might have his spoil for her own Son Charles; as in effect the Emperor did bestow it on him, and caused him to be acknowledged by the Lords of the Country, to the great displeasure of the other two Sons, who feared the like Treatment.

They therefore conspired all those afresh against him; and the two youngest leave the management of it all to Lotaire, who brings Pope Gregory along with him the better to Authorize him. They take the Field with a numerous Army; The Father on his side gets his Forces together at Wormes; for they were arrived nigh Basle. The Ambassadors he sent to his Sons, and the Pope, finding they urged the Pope to Excommunicate him, declared before his face, that if he came for that purpose, he might return Excommunicated himself, since he transgressed the Holy-Canons.

The two Armies remained encamped between Basle and Strasburgh Five or Six days, during which time the Emperor and the Pope had some conference about a Peace: But under the pretence of Treating, his men were debauched and persuaded to forsake him, and went to the service of his Sons; In so much, that himself was likewise compell'd to go over to them, having before Stipulated that his Wife nor his Son Charles should either of them forfeit Life or Limbs.

They immediately confin'd young Charles to the Monastery of Prom, but did not shave him, and banished the Mother to Tortona in Italy, maintaining that her Marriage was Null, because she was of Kin to their Father within the degree prohibited, which was truth. And that in those days was accounted a crime so great, by the Church, that they punished it with the utmost rigour. Add that the Prelats were mightily offended with her, for that she had caused Frederic Bishop of Trever, a man reputed to be of Holy-life, to be Massacred, because he had dared to reprove the Emperor publicly as he was eating at his own Table.

The Debonnaire, being thus detained, Pepin returned to Aquitaine, and Louis to Bavaria. Lotaire assigned a general Assembly at Compiene to be on the first of October, leaving his Father under a strong Guard in the Monastery of Saint Medard of Soissons. During the Assembly the French beginning to be touched with compassion towards their ancient Emperor, some Lords with some of the Bishops, who feared they should be punished if ever he were again restored, contrived wholly to exclude him, by degrading and condemning him to do publick Penance. Ebon Arch-Bishop of Reims, his Foster-brother and his School fellow, but Son of a Slave, was the principal Author and Promoter of this Counsel.

The Ceremony of this Degradation was as follows. The Bishops having remonstrated his Scandalous faults to him, he sent for his Son Lotaire, and his Princes, and made his reconciliation with him. Then they led him into St. Medards Church, where prostrated before the Altar upon a Sack-cloth, he confessed he had been been the cause of great mischiefs and troubles to France; and the Bishops exhorting him to name his Crimes openly, he repeated them according to a writing they had given him, containing amongst other things, that he had committed Sacrilege, Parricide and Homicide; in that he had violated the Solemn Oath made to his Father in the Church and Presence of the Bishops, consented to the Death of his Nephew, and done violence to his Relations. That he had broken the agreement made betwixt his Children for the Peace of the Kingdom, and compelled his Subjects to take new Oathes, which was Perjury; from whence proceeded all manner of mischiefs in the Government. That after so many disorders and infinite damages and losses to his People, he had again brought them together to destroy each other: For which he desired pardon of God. Then he presented a Paper to the Bishops, who laid it upon the Altar. After this they took off his Military Girdle, which was laid there likewise: And lastly they disrobed him of his secular Habit, and clothed him with a Penitential one, which was never to be quitted, when once they had put it on.

The People (that is say to the Soldiery) who would have trampled him under foot before he was deposed, now pitied him after his deposition. Louis King of Germany feeling some remorse, or thinking to Aggrandize himself if he restored him, Solicited Lotaire to deliver him, to which Pepin joyned his interest. But Lotaire not being inclinable thereto, and having transfer'd him thence to Compiègne, and then to Saint Denis, both of them brought their Forces into the Field, and appointed a place to joyn together nigh Paris. Lotaire observing they flocked thither from all parts, amuses them for some days with the Prospect of a Peace; then finding there was no safety for him, he takes his way by Burgundy, and retires to Vi-enne, leaving his Father at Saint Denis.

The Debonnaire being at liberty, would not immediately put on his Imperial Robes, but first desired to be reconciled to the Church by the Bishops: So that even in Saint Denis Church it self, they returned the Crown and Military girdle to him with the deliberation and consent, or Counsel of the French People. Some time after a couple of Bishops brought his Wife and his Son Charles to him who were set at liberty by those that were to guard him.

834. Lotaire had placed some Counts in the Cities above the Loire, amongst others Lambert at Nantes and Mainfroy at Orleans, who undertook to preserve those Countries for him. These Counts having with great advantage defeated those sent by the Emperor who went and unadvisedly Attacked them, did so importunately Solicite their Master to return thither and pursue the Victory, that he went to them immediately, having forced and burnt the City of Chaalons upon the Soane.

Pepin was come to the assistance of his Father with considerable Forces: So that they were much Superiour to him in strength. Nevertheless he came and Encamped right over against them, not far from the City of Blois, promising himself to withdraw and get away his Men, as formerly. But finding that on the contrary he was in danger of being forsaken by his men, and that he could not make his retreat without a hazardous Battel, he resolved to come and beg pardon; which he could never have obtained, had he been taken with his Sword in Hand.

His Father received him Sitting on a Throne which was raised very high in the midst of his Tent, where he would see him prostrate on his knees, and condescended not to pardon him and his, but upon condition he should come no more into France without his leave, but should remain in Italy; all the passages from which place he shut up after him with strong Garrisons.

834. The Princes party being thus abandoned and without support, Ebon Arch-Bishop of Reims, who had most contributed to the degradation of the Emperor, being taken as he was flying away with the Churches Treasure, was brought before the Parliament of Mets. And there the Emperor accused him personally, after his own restauration had been signed by all the Grandeecs. The unhappy Creature did not endeavour to make any defence, but as a favour desired he might be judged in private by the Bishops, and owned his Crimes in writing, whereupon he was deposed, and subscribed his own degradation. After this Ignominy he retired into Italy to Lotaire, whither many others had already faved themselves.

835. And 836. It had been much better for the quiet of France that Lotaire had never repassed the Mountains. But the Empress Judith desiring to have a support for her Son Charles after the death of the old Emperor, who was very Sickly and Infirm, endeavoured to reconcile them, and caused word to be sent, that he should come to Court.

Court. To which notwithstanding he durst not trust so soon; And besides he could not have come, being at that time fallen ill of an Epidemical distemper which brought him to extremity, and almost all the French Lords, who went thither with him, to their Graves. It carried off Valac esteemed the best Head-piece and the most powerful Genius of his Court, as it had been of Charlemains, and so many other of the most considerable Lords, that it was said it had left France naked both of Counsel and Strength.

In the year 836. the Emperor had a design to go and visit the Sepulchres of the Holy-Apostles in Rome: But the Rumour of the Normands falling upon Frisia, where they burnt Dorstat and Antwerp, detained him in France, where he called general Assemblies as was usual.

837. Towards Easter-day there appeared a Comet in the Heavens in the Sign Virgo, which having in 25 days passed thorough the Signs of Leo, Cancer, and Gemini, came and lost its Train and Globe of Fire, right against the Head of Taurus under the Feet of the great Bear. The Emperor who was a great Astronomer, did first discover it. There had been another Visible the preceding year, on the 11th of April, in the Sign Libra, which shewed its self but three days only.

The principal cause of the trouble and Rebellions of Debonnaires Children was the frequent alteration he made in the partitions and division of the Portions of his Sons. The Empress who feared Lotaire, and desired to gain him persuaded her Husband to send for him, and to propound to him the division of his whole Estate in two parts, Aquitaine and Bavaria not comprehended; whereof the Emperor should chuse one, or else that he should divide it, and Lotaire should take his choice. Lotaire refer'd the division to him; and that being done, he took the Eastern France from the Meuse upward, and left the Western to Charles his youngest Brother, obliging himself by Oath to defend him, and not to undertake any thing against the will of his Father.

838. The Normands ceased not from pillaging the Coasts of Flanders. They had gained a great Battel in the Island Walcheren, which makes part of Zeland, where the Count of that Country was slain; and having afterwards Fortified themselves in that Post, made great Ravage, till the French Army beat them from thence.

838. From the First of January a Comet appeared in the Sign Scorpio a little after the Sun-set. Some fancied it presaged the Death of Pepin King of Aquitaine, which followed in the Month of November after. He was Aged some 35 years, and had Reigned Twenty one. They buried him at Sainte Croix of Poitiers. He left by his Wife Engeltrude, Daughter of Thiebert Earl of Matrie, two Sons, Pepin and Charles, whose adventures we shall relate in due place, and one Daughter named Matilda who Married Giraud Count of Poitiers.

To have done as Charlemain; when a King had allotted his Children their division and that one hapned to dye, if this left any Sons, it depended on the People to Elect one in his stead, or to let his share be given amongst the rest of the Brothers. After the decease of Pepin there were two Parties in Aquitaine: One whereof a Lord named Emenon was Chief, would have the eldest Son Pepin to succeed him; the other, headed by Ebroin Bishop of Poitiers, refer'd it to the Emperor. Ebroin comes to him to know his Intentions, for which he was rewarded with the Abbey of Saint Germain des Prez. At the very time when the Emperor would have followed him into Aquitaine with an Army, he was drawn towards the German side.

839. After the partition made with Lotaire, Lewis was forbidden to take upon him the Title of King of East-France any longer: his interest and resentment made him take up Arms to preserve it. Now before he could put himself into a posture of defence, his Father passed the Rhine, and stuck so close to him, that he was either advised or compelled to come and ask his Pardon.

At his return from this Voyage, the Emperor goes into Aquitaine; and being entred as far as Clermont in Auvergne, hether met and gave reception to the Lords of the Country, whom Ebroin had disposed to obedience, and made them give their Oaths for his Son Charles. But young Pepin with his Friends, kept the Inheritance of his Father still by some corner or other, and held so fast and tugged so strongly against him, that he could not be dispossest in many years.

840. When the Emperor, after the Parliament of Chaalon, was returned to Aquitain, being at Poitiers to take some course to secure that Kingdom to his Son Charles, he had notice that Louis had debauched the Saxons and Turingians, that he had siezed all the Country without the Rhine, and then being come to Francfort had taken the Oaths of several Eastern-French. Never any business troubled him so greatly as this fame; Though he were indisposed by a defluxion upon his Stomach, and the Weather as yet very unseasonable, he went from Aquitain with the resolution of putting an end to that affair.

He left his Wife and his Son Charles at Poitiers, kept his Easter at Aix, passed from thence into Turingia, and held a Parliament at Vormes. Then his Malady encreasing, he went down the Meuse to Ingelheim near Mets, where lying in his Tents, his Heart pierced with grief, and his Stomach oppressed with an Impostume, he gave up the Ghost the 20th of June, having every Morning for forty days together received the Sacrament or Body of our Lord Jesus Christ. He was in the beginning of the 64. Year of his Age, and the end of the 27th of his Empire and Monarchy, before which time he had been King of Aquitain 32 years.

His Brother Dreux convey'd his Corps to Mets, whereof he was Bishop, and Intombed him in the Abbey of Saint Arnoul; who was the Stock of the Carolinian Family.

He was of a mild and sweet Nature, but too easy and too credulous, insomuch that sometimes his Counsellors could persuade him to unjust things. From his youth he had plunged himself into a profound Devotion; And if we may not say, that he gave too much credit to the Church-men, we may at least own, that he could not discern the good from the bad, or that employing them in his affairs, and bestowing too much wealth upon them, he spoiled them. His Fathers method had been much better, who never suffer'd one man to have more then one employment, or more then one Benefice at the same time. For the rest of his character, he was Laborious, Sober, Vigilant, Liberal, very knowing and Learned, both Speaking and writing Latine as well as any man in his Kingdom, and who together with the perfect knowledge and understanding in the Laws, had ever a great care to see them put in execution.

His first Marriage was with Hermengard Daughter to Duke Ingelram, by whom he had three Sons, Lotaire, Pepin, and Louis; and three Daughters, Adalais whose first Husband was Conrad Earl of Paris; her second Robert le Fort; Gisela, who married Everard Duke of Friuli, Father of that Berenger who was King of Italy; Hildegard married to Count Theodorus; and Alpais Wife of Count Begon. By his second marriage which was with Judith Daughter to Uelpon or Guelfe Earl of Ravensperg, he had Charles, whom they surnamed the Bald.

Lotaire Emperour and King of Italy.

Louis King of Germany.

Charles King of Burgundy and Neustria.

Pepin Fighting for the Kingdome of Aquit-taine.

Some few days before his Death, the Debonnaire had sent his Scepter, his Crown and his Sword, the tokens of Empire, to Lotaire his eldest Son, recommending to him the protection of Prince Charles, and enjoying him to preserve that share for him which had been allotted with his own consent. But Lotaire, or Lotharius was possessed in his mind that his Birth-right and his Quality of Emperor ought to make him Sovereign over his younger Brothers.

With this design he parts from Italy, comes to the Kingdom of Burgundy, where he designed to Rendezvous and bring his Forces together with his Friends, dispatches his Commissaries into all parts to sollicite the Lords to give their Oathes to him, passes from thence to Wormes, and draws the Saxons to his party. From thence Marches even to Francfort. But Louis coming to encamp close by him, startled him: and as he made more use of craft then strength, he made Truce with him till the 12th of November, at what time they were to meet in the very same place to decide their differences, in a Friendly manner if possibly they could, if not, by Dint of Sword.

Charles was then at Bourges where he waited for Pepin who failed at the Rendez-vous promised. From thence he dispatched one to Lotharius to intreat him to remember his Oathes, which he had made in the presence of his Father, and withal to render him all respect and submission as to his eldest. Lotaire amuses him with fine words, and in the mean time adjusts all his Engines to turn him out of his Estates.

After Charles had by his presence confirmed those People betwixt the Meuse and the Seine, and had withal made a Journey into Neustria, he returned with diligence into Aquitain, to put a stop to Pepin's progress, whose courage was much augmented upon the approaching of Lotharius. He took off somewhat of the sharpness of his Mettle by gaining a Battel: but in the mean while, the Neustrian People joyned with Lotaire.

Those Lords that accompany'd Charles observing these Artifices believed the best way was to breake thorow them all with a brave resolution, and advised he would march directly to him. Thus the two Armies were found to be within Six Leagues of each other, the City of Orleans lying between them. Then the Lords on either part endeavoured to bring them to an accord as was the usual custom of the French. Those of Charles's party, finding themselves by much the weaker, yielded to an agreement very disadvantageous, whereby was left to him only by provision Aquitain, Languedoc and Province with some Counties between the Loire and the Seine; and it was said, they should meet at the Parliament to be holden at Atigny, to compose all their differences: but they added this Clause, that in the interim Lotaire should attempt nothing upon Charles nor Louis, otherwise they should be quit of their Oathes and promises.

This Treaty finished, Charles marched towards Bretagne to quell the motions of some Lords of that Country. From thence he returns on his way to be at the Parliament of Atigny. Lotharius had in the mean while endeavoured to shut up the passages against him, broken down all the Bridges over the Seine, and ordered Forces on either Shoar, who coasted along incessantly. Which did him no good, because Charles having information that there were several Vessels at Roien Seized them with great diligence, and wasted over his Army with them. His enemies betook themselves to Flight upon the first appearance of his Standard.

At the same time Lotharius by the advice of Albert Earl of Metz, his chief incendiary, and Othbert Bishop of Metz, were dealing with the French Austrasians; and knowing that Louis of Germany was upon his march to joyn with Charles, caused some Troops to pass over the Rhine to meet him, and did entice away a part of his men, so that he was counsell'd, fearing he might lose the rest, to retreat into Bavaria: where it had been easy for Lotaire to have crush'd him, had he but pursued it.

Charles marching up along the River Seine, makes his Prayers in the Church of St. Denis, joynes some Troops which two or three of his Counts brought him near Montreuil on Yonne, beats two of the Counts that Lotaire had sent to oppose him in his March, goes on to Troyes, where he celebrated the Feast of Easter. From thence he went to Atigny, to let them know he would not neglect to meet at the conference appointed between him, and Lotaire. After his having remained there some days, he Marched towards Chaalons, and there finds his Mother the Empress Judith, and those Forces she brought him out of Aquitain.

He had intelligence at the same time that his Brother Louis having gained a Battel against Albert Count of Metz, made all possible hast to joyn with him. Wherefore he goes that way to meet him. Lotaire gave out a report that he fled, and pursues him. Mean time Louis arrives, and thus the two young Brothers being united, were found to be the strongest. Lotaire therefore gains some days time by his feigned negotiations, till Pepin who was upon the March, could joyn with him. When he had this re-inforcement, he talked of nothing but bringing them to obedience, and having a Monarchical Sovereignty. All the tenders they could proffer, did but confirm his resolution of having all. So that they were constrained to send him word they would give him Battel the next morning about the second hour of the day; which was the 25th of June.

(The two Armies being encamped against one another, near) the Burrough of Fontenay by Auxerre. The whole Power of France, all the bravest Officers, and most of the Grandees and Nobility were about the Four Kings, who were to be both the Witnesses and rewarders of their Actions. Since the Beginning of the French Monarchy, to the very day I write these Lines, there hath not been so much French Blood spilt in any Battel whatever. A Hundred Thousand men perished there; a horrible wound, and which weakned the Carolingian-House so greatly that it could never well recover it self again. The victory fell to the younger Brothers share. They used it with all humility, and would not give the Emperor chace, for fear of spilling more blood. They likewise caused his men to be buried, and took care to dress the wounded as their own, proclaiming a general pardon to all those that would accept thereof.)

The most part of those Officers that had been with these Princes, being gone away, they could not reap all the Fruits might have accrued upon so notable an advantage. Louis repassed the Rhine, and Charles took his way towards Aquitain to drive Pepin entirely from thence. But some dissention hapning in his Councils, so that he acted not vigorously enough; Pepin, who had been brought very low, and would certainly have submitted, re-assumed his courage.

On the other hand Lotaire having gathered up his scatter'd men, and raised new ones appeared soon after in Neustria, where he had a great many abettors. His Army and Charles's drew near each other about St. Denis, the River betwixt them. Charles's being the weakest saved themselves in the Forrests of Perche; Lotaire pursued them, but not able to compel them to a Battel, he sent back Pepin whom he had called thither with his Forces of Aquitain.

The two young Brothers at their parting had appointed to meet again at soonest. As soon as Charles found the way open and clear, he went to the banks of the Rhine to his Brother; and both of them being met the 22th of February in the City of Strasburgh made a new League, and Alliance of Friendship, promising by Solemn Oath never to forsake each other. This Treaty was framed and written in two Languages, viz. * Romance (the Original of the present French) and the * Turdesque. It mentioned that if either of the two Brothers contravened, their Subjects should be no longer obliged to serve them. Which was in truth to leave a gap open for them to change their Sovereign when they pleased.

This union having reassured their Subjects, brought back those whom Lotaire had invigled, and encreased their Forces, they fought for him to give him battel: but he left the Country in so much hast that he made no stop till he was gotten to Lyons, and by his flight abandoned all Austrasia to them, and part of the Kingdom of Burgundy.

When they were come back to Aix, the Bishops by them Assembled pronounced a Solemn Judgment, whereby they deprived Lotharius of all his Portion of Lands on this side the Mountains; and yet they would not admit the two Brothers, till they first were assured by them, that they would govern according to the Commandments of God. To which having answered that they desired so, the Bishops told them: And we by the Divine Authority do pray you to receive and govern them according to the will of God. They then divided betwixt them that portion of Austrasia which had been possessed by Lotaire.

Nevertheless this partition did not stand: for that Prince endeavouring an accommodation with them, the Friends on all hands brought it so to pass that the three Brothers had a parley together in an Island on the Soane, each accompanied and assisted with Forty Lords, in the presence of whom they agreed to divide the whole Succession of their Father (not including Bavaria, Lombardy, and Aquitain,) in three equal parts, whereof Lotaire should take his choice. That the same forty Deputies on the behalf of each of them, should meet together in November in the City of Metz to make that division, and that in the interim each of them should keep the same Portion he then enjoy'd, and remain therein.

The Assembly of the Six-score Lords was not held at Metz; because Lotaire being at Thionville it would not have been secure for those on the behalf of the two younger Brothers; It was removed to Coblenz; where for want of ample powers they could agree to nothing but a Truce till St. John Baptist's-day, and another meeting at Thionville before that time.

trude Daughter of Wodon *, Grand-child to Adelard who had governed Louis the Debonnaire, and had been a most horrible squanderer of the Treasures and Demefnes belonging to the Crown; which on the one hand had got him the hatred of those that loved the welfare of the State, and on the other the affection and esteem of Courtiers, and all such as were not able to maintain their expences but by the profusion of such Ministers.

843. The French Lords assembled at Thionville succeeded so well about the partition between the three Brothers, that they compleated it the 6th Day of March. To Charles fell the western Kingdom of France, which is near upon the same which we call at this very day France, that is from the Brittish Ocean to the Meuse: To Louis fell Germany unto the Rhine, with some Villages on this side which he would needs have included, because there were some Vine-yards; and to Lotharius with the Title of Emperor, the Kingdom of Italy, and Provence, and all that lay between the Kingdoms of his two other Brothers, which were the Lands between the Scheld, the Meuse, the Rhine, and the Soane. In the German Tongue this was called Loterreich, in Romance or Old-French Lohier-regne, and by contraction Lorraine, that is to say the Kingdom of Lotaire or Lotharius. The Country that bears this Title at present, is but a small part thereof.

As for Pepin, they allotted him no share: but having gained a great victory over those sent by his Uncle, who endeavoured to take away his Kingdom of Aquitain, he maintained himself for some years, even till his Vices, rather than the power of his Enemies, dethroned him.

This division of the Kingdom betwixt Brothers equally, divided the affections of the People of Germany, Gaul and Italy, who had begun to cleave, if I may say so, or joyn together in one Monarchick body, and made the Subjects become instant, unfaithful, Factionous, and take to themselves a liberty of chusing their Princes, believing they might do so, provided they were of Royal blood. But that which was worse, was that France, having lost the best of her Forces by that bloody Battel at Fontenay, was no longer able to keep those People under which had been subdued, especially the Gascons and the Bretons, neither to defend themselves against the incursions of the Normands.

As for the Gascons, Azenar who had Seized upon the County being dead in the year 836. his Brother Sance had also invaded it in despite of Pepin, and justified it by the assistance of the Basques, and the Navarros. The Dutchy was then held by a Lord named Totilus; Azenar far from obeying him, did tyre him with his continual incursions, and whilst he held him in play, gave opportunity to the Normands to ravage the whole Province.

One cannot without horror recount the Ruines, Murthers and Destructions by Fire, which those Barbarians practised over all France. Necessity forced them out of their houses to seek for a subsistence elsewhere: for every fifth year they sent out Colonies or swarms of young People, to go and seek out their Fortunes in other Countries. The desire of plunder and honour, made them ever fall upon the richest Provinces; the false Zeal of their Brutish and Impious Religion made them cruel and bloody, especially towards Church-men; the French making use of their assistance in their publick quarrels, had brought them into their Country; and such rascally people as were but too much at liberty, and in too great numbers during the Civil-War, served them for guides, and not only so, but sometimes became their commanders and encouragers, assisting them in their pillaging and robberies, with so great destruction, that no times nor History can parallel. For from one Sea to the other, there was not one Monastery standing that had not felt their fury and devilish rage, not one Town that had not been ransom'd, plundered or burnt two or three times. Which was demonstration sufficient that it was a terrible vengeance sent from God.

And to make this yet more plain, there were every one of those years most visible fore-warnings to repentance, by some extraordinary Signs shewed from Heaven. A little before the death of Louis the Debonnaire, appeared a Comet; and another again in An. 842. From the year 840. to 850. there were frequently Bat-tels in the Air to be seen: And the Earth-quaked often times with Terrible roar-ings.)

During the Government of Duke Totilus in Gascony, those Barbarians having failed in an attempt upon Burdeaux, ruined Basas, Ayre, Laitoure, Dags, Tarbe de Bigorre, Labour, Oleron and Lafcar; and beat that Duke Twice; But the Third time time he had the advantage against them, and drove them quite out of all Gascony.

He survived but a short while after his victory; that command was given to Seguin: and to strengthen him the better against Sance, and likewise against the Normans, the County of Burdeaux was joyned to his Dutchy, which before was Aquitania Secunda; and if I am not deceived, that of Saintes. Which hindred not the Normans upon a second descent An. 843. from defeating him in a bloody Battel between Saintes and Burdeaux, where his death Crowned their Victory.

Duke William his Successor could not stop this Torrent which overflowed Aquitania Secunda, and made them Masters sometimes of Saintes, another while of Angoulesme, then of Limoges or Perigueux. The confusion they brought into those Countries, and the revolt of Bernard Duke of Septimania, which hapned in the same years, gave so much confidence to the Gascons of the Dutchy, that they joyned with those of the County, and together made Count Sance Duke of Gascony. To whom some years after succeeded Arnold Son of Emenon or Immon Count of Perigord.

In the year 841. whilst the Kings were in the Field to destroy each other, Hobery or Oger, one of the most Famous Commanders of the Normands, who commanded a Fleet of 150 Ships, Burnt the City of Rouen the 14th of May, and the Abbey of Gemiege some days afterwards, and for Fifteen or Sixteen years together continued his Barbarities upon Neustria, and more particularly upon Bretagne and Aquitain.

They had also taken their course by Bretagne to make a descent. The revolt of that Province opening a gap for them. Louis the Debonnaire had given the Government to Neomene descended from the Ancient Kings of those Countries, and younger Brother of Rivalon Father of Salomon. Now Neomene having acquired some reputation for having made head against the Normans An. 836. began to think himself worthy of the Crown belonging to his Ancestors: however his design did not appear till after the Battel of Fontenay, when being incited thereto by Count Lambert, he openly declared himself Sovereign, and drove all the French out of Bretagne, unless those in Rennes and in Nantes, who held out.

This Lambert (enraged because King Charles had refused him the County of Nantes which he desired and demanded as a reward for having fought valiantly for him at the Battel of Fontenay) renounced his Service and Leagued himself with Neomene; with whose assistance having beaten and slain Reynold Count of Poitiers, to whom the King had given Nantes, he remained Master of the City. But being in a short time driven thence in a contest hapning between Neomene and himself, he mischievously went and fetched the Normans, and brought them up the River before Nantes, which they took by Escalado on Saint Johns Festival, cut the Throats of most of the Inhabitants who were gotten into Saint Peter's Church, and Massacred the Bishop at the High-Altar while he was saying Mass; carried away all that were left alive, and from thence went and Burnt the Monastery of the Islands, which was Noir Moustier. Thus Lambert became Count of a ruined City, and endeavoured to maintain himself there wavering betwixt the King and Neomene, unfaithful to both, and beloved by neither.

After the division made by the Kings, Bretagne being a pretended Member of West-France, which fell to the lot of Charles the Bald, that Prince having now no enemies at home, turned his Sword that way, thinking to bring Neomene to obedience. But he confidently comes towards him, and meeting him on his March in the Road from Chartres to Mans charged him so smartly, that he put his Army to the Rout, and forced him to fly to Chartres on Horse-back.

This advantage redoubled the Bretons Forces, who made inroads upon Maine, Anjou, and Poitou. It seems nevertheless there was some Truce, since upon King Charles's intreaty, Neomene drove Count Lambert out of Nantes who went and Nestled himself in the Lower Anjou, and there Built the Castle of Ondon.

At the same time that Charles was defeated by Neomene a Civil-War infesting Denmark, the Lords of those Countries who found themselves strong at Sea, amongst others Hasteng and Bier Iron-sides, fell upon West-France, and having forced the Guards that defended the Mouth of the Seine, went up that River with their Barks. They Sacked all on the right and left Shoar, and being unable to take Paris, they destroy'd all that lay without the Island, Plundered the Abbey of Saint Germain des Prez, and Ruined the City of Melun. When

When they were pretty well laden with spoil, they were soon tempted with Presents made them by Charles to withdraw themselves, but as they returned they ravaged Picardy, Flanders and Friseland, and took the City of Hamburg: however observing all Germany was rising up, to expel them from thence, they quitted it.

The Priests and all Religious Orders fled before them from place to place, seeking out places of safety, or at least hiding places to conceal and keep the Churches Treasure in, as also their Holy-Relicks; towards which their devotion did so much increase, when that furious Storm was over, that it occasioned sometimes bloody contests between the Citizens and Nobility, when the one would have them restored and the other would detain them.

843. Whilst Lotaire had denuded Italy of all its Forces to lead them into France, the Dukes Radelchise of Benevent, and Sigenulfe of Capua, quarrelling with each other, without regarding young Louis his Son called the one the Saracens of Spain to his assistance, the other those of Sardinia (for those Barbarians had invaded that Island) and gave them entrance into Italy, where having Fortified themselves in many places they exercised their fury for twenty years together. And An. 847. pillaged the Burrough of Saint Peter, and the Church of that Prince of the Apostles. Which obliged Pope Leo the IV. to enclose it with a wall, and quarter the Corfis- cians there whom the Saracens had driven from their Island.

846. The Nobility respected their Kings so little, that Count Gisbert dared to steal away the Daughter of the Emperor Lotharius, and convey'd her into the Dominions of Charles to marry her; which gave great cause of complaint to Lotaire, and much trouble to Louis of Germany to appease his resentment.

In Guyenne the great ones raised Forces for their private quarrels, and fought in despite of Pepin. In Italy in the year 844. the Clergy and Citizens of Rome had the confidence to elect Sergius II. Pope, without the Emperors permission, who nevertheless having sent Twenty Bishops, and with them some Soldiers forced the Pope to render his devoir, and to acknowledge him for his Sovereign.

It is a Fable, that this Pope first changed his Name, and that before his Election he was called Swines-shout, for it was Sergius IV. had that filthy Name, and he whom we here mention was called Sergius as was his Father. It is held by some that it was one Octavian introduced this mysterious change, who would needs be named John. He was the 12th of that name.

846. The French being entred into Bretagne, intangled themselves unadvisedly in Boggs and Fenny-grounds, where they received a second blow.

847. While Charles was preparing for a Third expedition against that Country, the terror of the Normans obliged him to agree to a peace with Neomene; which nevertheless did not hold long, for he began immediately again to make his inroads upon France. For which Charles taking revenge by Fire and Sword in Bretagne, Neomene did the like to all the adjacent Countries, and the Territory of Rennes, which did not then belong to his petty Kingdom.

847. And 848. Hitherto he had not taken the Title of King, or at least had not put on the Crown. The custom of those times were, that the People did not believe a Prince wore it Legally, if it were not put on by the hand of one Bishop, and the consent of all. Now those of Bretagne having for the most part been nominated by Louis the De-bonnaire, would not give their Ministry nor their approbation to this Usurper. He contrived therefore an accusation of Simony against them, by the means of an Abbot named Connoyon esteemed as a Saint by the People. The assembly sends them before the Pope to justify themselves, the Abbot follows them to Rome, and Ne-omene causes him to be accompanied with a stately Embassy with a Present of a Gold Crown for the Pope, and an order to desire of him the Restoration of the extinguished Royalty in Bretagne. The whole House of France opposed this so strongly, that he obtained nothing of the Holy-Father but some Relicks, and verbal Reprimands for the accusation against the Bishops. But at their return he fright-ed them so with the fear of Death as made them confess those crimes, and thereupon caused them to be deposed.

848. And 849. Presently after he put men of his own Faction in their rooms, made three more Bishopricks, that is of Dole, Treguier, and St. Brienc, and Ordained the Bishop of Dole for Metropolitan. The Popes had bestowed the Pall on those Prelats, in the sixth Century. All this tended towards his Crowning and Anointing, after the the Mode of the French Kings. Which was performed in the City of Dole, where he had assembled the Estates of his petty Kingdom. All his Bishops assisted except Athard of Nantes, who for that reason being turned out of his See, retired to the Arch-Bishop of Tours his true Metropolitan: who having called together the Bishops of his Province, and those adjoining, caused some Remonstrances to be made to Neomene, but to no purpose.

Two other Enemies, perhaps leagued together, young Pepin and the Normans, drew Charles's Army into Aquitain. In the Month of March he took some of those Pirats Ships in the Dordogne, and compelled Pepin to leave the Field to him: But when he was gone from that Province, the Normans surpris'd Burdeaux by the treachery of the Jewes that were in it, and took William Duke of the Gascous Prisoner, and such others as their covetousness prompted them to spare alive, after their fury had been glutted with blood. The French were so feeble and weak, as to let them make that place, their Store-house and Armory for several years.

The two Kings Lotaire and Charles had an interview in the Palace of Peronne, and by Oaths renewed again their affection and league for mutual Security. Charles Brother to Pepin of Aquitain, relying too much upon these seeming demonstrations, was so imprudent, when he returned from Lotaire's Court, of whose protection he made no doubt, as to pass by West-France. Count Vivian observing his steps, stop'd him, and carried him to Charles the Bald; who at the Assembly of Chartres caused him to be shaved and sent him to the Monastery of Corbie. About four years afterwards Louis the Germanick, his Uncle, made him Arch-Bishop of Ments.

King Pepin his Brother had many very ill qualities, he was a Drunkard, filthy-ly Debauched, and Violent, vexing and grieving his Subjects, and Authorizing the injustice and robberies committed by his Officers. A good part of the Grandeees of Aquitain having conceived a kind of scorn and hatred for him, invited and called in Charles the Bald whom they received with great applause at Limoges, and attended him to the Siege of Toulouse, which surrendered on composition. But as soon as he had left Aquitain, they reconciled themselves to Pepin.

The Voyage which Charles the Bald made into Bretagne, to put a reinforcement into Rennes, did not prevent Neomene from Besieging that Town, and taking Prisoners all the Chief Officers of that Garrison.

The same year the Traytor Lambert having turned his Coat, seized Count A-maulry, and divers other French Lords who were gotten into Nantes, without doubt to defend that place.

The following year Neomene attacking the French Territories by Anjou, and destroying their Churches with as much Barbarity almost as the Normans, was smitten, as it is believed, by the hand of God, whereof he died in few hours space. His Son Herispoux succeeded him.

There was a general Assembly held of all the Kingdoms of the French Monarchy on the banks of the Meuse, where the three Brothers met, and swore Amity and mutual Assistance. At their departure from thence, Charles goes into Bretagne to attaque Herispoux, whom he guessed to be as yet unfettled. Their Armies engaged on the Confines of Anjou. If we credit the Bretons, Charles's was but ill handled. However it were, he agreed to a Peace with the Breton, to take possession of Aquitain, which was a thing of more importance, and also to oppose the Normans.

The same year the Pyrate Hachery coming out of Burdeaux with his Fleet destroyed the Abbey of Fontenille to the very Foundations, then going up the Seine with his small Boats, he plundered all the Country for a great way on either side, and burnt divers Cities, amongst others that of Beaurais.

Pepin's ill conduct had so highly offended the Lords of his Kingdom, that in fine they seized on his Person, and delivered him up to Charles, who caused him to be shorn and confined to the Monastery of Saint Mard. Whence making his escape he roved a while, and took part with the Normans, which made him only the more odious; So that being retaken, he was close shut up in the Castle of Senlis.

The same year Lotaire associated his eldest Son Louis in the Empire. He had three living, this Louis, Lotaire, and Charles.

Lotaire, and Louis

Charles of West-

852. There would be no end, if we should set down all the exploits and ravages of
And the Normans. In An. 852 and 853. other multitudes went up the Seine again, 853. and this latter year some went up the Loire, plundered the City of Tours, and set fire to the Churches, particularly to that of the Grand Saint Martins.

852. Ebon had settled himself again in the Arch-Bishoprick of Reims, when Lotaire invaded the Territories of Charles the Bald: Afterwards that King expelled him, and in his stead caused Hincmar to be Elected, who after many contests, was this year confirmed in that Arch-Bishoprick by the Synod of Soissons.

852. Whether it were by necessity, or evil counsel, the Bald treated the Aquitains very rudely. He caused several of the principal Heads to fly, amongst others that of a Count named Gosbert, which begot so much aversion in them towards their new Sovereign, that under pretence that he took no care to defend them from the Normans they sent Deputies to Louis the Germanique to pray him to accept of the Kingdom, or send his Son to them.

853. Whatever union, or strictness of Amity there had been for ten years together between these two Brothers, the German King scruples not to break it, when it concerned the gaining of a Kingdom, and sent one of his Sons into Aquitain to observe the disposition of those People. He did not find it such as he desired, there being none that concerned themselves or espoused his Interest besides the Friends and Relations of Gosbert. But Charles having discovered his towards him, sought the Friendship of Lotaire, with whom he conferred in a Parliament holden at Valenciennes, a place so situated between both their Territories, that Lotaire possessed one half and Charles the other half of the City.

854. These two Brothers having brought themselves to a good understanding, called another Parliament at Liege, to which they invited Louis, to advise together in common touching the general Affairs of the French Monarchy, but he refused to be there.

Going from thence Charles passes into Aquitain, and was Crowned at Limoges.
It is not true that he reduced it to a simple Duchy: for his Son of the same name, held it for some time with the Title of a Kingdom; and we find that it continued so under the first Kings of the Capetian Race.

855. In this year it was, that after the Death of Pope Leo IV. hapned that strange adventure of Pope Joan, as is said. It was esteemed a very great truth for Five Hundred years together; but in these latter ages, the Learned, nay even some of those that are separated from the Church of Rome, have held it to be a ridiculous Fable.

855. The Motions of the Grace of God, which when he pleases can mollifie the most obdurate hearts, or perhaps the Melancholly and restless thoughts of the Emperor Lotaire, a Prince Fantastical and inconstant, gave him so much dissatisfaction and disgust of the Vanities and Pomp of the World, that he stript himself of his Sovereignty, and changed his Imperial Purple for a Frock, wherewith he cloathed himself in the Abbey of Prom, where he Died some Months after, having ruled the Empire Fifteen years, and the Kingdom of Lorraine Twelve, reckoning from the time the partition was made amongst the Brothers.

He had for Wife Hermengard Daughter of Count Hughes the Coillard, who brought him four Children, Louis, Lotaire and Charles, and one Daughter named Hermengard who was stolen away by Gisbert, Count of the Mansuarians.

Before his Abdication he shared his Lands between his three Sons, giving to Louis the eldest of them, Italy and the Empire, wherein he had associated him in the year 851. To Lotaire the Kingdom of Lorraine, and to Charles, Provence, and part of the Kingdom of Burgundy.

Upon this change all these Princes framed new leagues and new designs. The young Lotaire much courted by his two Uncles, joyned at last with Charles: But the Emperor Louis made league with the German King, who sought all manner of ways to ruin him.

Charles was much hated by the Grandees of his Kingdom, so much as out of mistrust of their affection, or contempt of their small courage, he bestowed his military employments upon people of Fortune, rather than on them. Neither was he over-much in the esteem of the people, because he defended them but ill from the incursions of the Normans and Bretons, and also connived at the pilferings of his Officers. So that there being a grand Conspiracy contrived to set him beside the Throne, they deputed some to Louis the Germanique, offering to acknowledg him for their Sovereign, if he would govern them with Justice, and employ his Forces in their defence.

Therefore whilst Charles was gone to make Head against the Bretons, he crosses Alsacia with an Army, and comes into Burgundy, where in the Palace of Pontigon he receives the Homage of a great many Neustrian Lords. After that he assigns a Parliament at Atigny to receive it from all the rest, and is introduced into the City of Sens by the Arch-Bishop, named Wenilon or Guenilon; ungrateful and treacherous to Charles his King, who from a Clerk of his Chappel had made him Arch-Bishop, and would needs be anointed and Crowned by his hands at Sainte Croix of Orleans.

Charles who was then on the banks of the Loire with his Army to make head against the Normans, having information that his Brother invaded his Kingdom, left those Barbarians there, and advanced to Brie to fight him: but when he perceived that all went on that side, that his Soldiers themselves began to forsake him, being afraid his own People might deliver him up, he abandons his Army, which quickly submitted to his Brothers commands.

This sudden revolution was as soon followed with one quite contrary. Those that had called in the German were the first that repented, and to repair one Treason by another, they conspired to make him fall into the hands of Charles; Which was very easy for them, since having been so credulous to follow their advice, he had sent away his own Forces. But he discover'd their intentions and evil design early enough to escape the snare; and upon the news he received of the in-cursion of the Venedes, took therefore the opportunity to return to Germany. As soon as his back was turned, Charles having gotten his Friends together regained the Kingdom with as much facility, as he had lost it.

859. The enterprize of the German gave some jealousy to young Lotaire, and induced him to league himself with his Uncle Charles for their common defence. In consequence of this union the Bishops of the Kingdom of Neustria and Lorraine being Assembled at Metz the 26th of May, charged Hincmar Arch-Bishop of Reims to go and summon the German to repair the wrongs he had done his Brother, and meet at the approaching general Parliament, where he that should be found guilty, should make satisfaction, and adhere no longer to those Traytors. He reply'd that he was ready to appear there, but having done nothing but by the Counsel of the Bishops, he desired to consult with them.

About mid-June therefore was held a Council at Savonnières, in the Suburbs of Toul, consisting of the Bishops of twelve Provinces, wherein they laboured for the reconciliation of the two Brothers and Lotaire their Nephew. It is not expressed upon what conditions.

The 16th of that Month Charles presents them a Libel of complaints against Wenilon de Sens. It mentioned amongst other things, That he was anointed King by consent of the Bishops; therefore, he could not be deprived of that consecration without their consent: And likewise added, that he would have appeared there to answer them, had he been called thereto. They allotted four Metropolitans to Judge Wenilon, who

who assigned him to give his appearance, before them within Thirty days. We do not find they continued this proceeding, for he died peaceably in his Arch-Bishoprick in the year 865.

It is a mistake if we believe this man to be the Subject of those ancient Fables of Ganelon, so renowned for his Treacheries in the old Romances: Such as understand the old French Tongue, know that Enganner signifies to deceive, and Ganelon a deceiver, a Traitor.

The Fathers of this Council, or perhaps of another held at the same place, wrote likewise to the Bishops of Bretagne to exhort them to acknowledge the Metropolitan of Tours, and sent them a Memorial to admonish King Salomon to obey Charles King of France his Sovereign; which he took little notice of.

The two Brothers Lewis and Charles, and their Nephew Lotaire being reconciled by the mediation of honest men, had an enter-view at an Island on the Rhine near Andernac, attended by an equal number of Lords who staid upon either hand of the River. They shook hands, and agreed to meet the following Autumn at a general Assembly which was to be held at Basle. But they did not come there, having adjourned the enter-view till the next Spring at the Assembly of Coblentz.

At this place the Bishops who were then Masters of the Government through the weakness of the Princes, and the little Credit of the Grandees, who shewed no courage but in fighting one another and devouring the People, contrived the agreement between these three Princes, and drew up the Articles or Form to be observed in this Peace, which the German first swore to, and the two others after him.

860. This year 860. the Winter was so hard that the Adriatique Sea was Frozen, and the Merchants of the Neighbouring Countries carried their Goods to Venice by Waggon. In several places there was Snow observed to fall of the colour of Blood; which will not seem wonderful to those that consider how often it hath Rained the same colour.

861. The Bretons continually infested the Territories belonging to Charles, wherefore he gave the Dutchy, that is to say, the Government between the Seine and the Loire to Robert Surnamed the Strong or the Valfant, to keep those Marches or Frontiers. Which I was willing to observe, because he was certainly The stock of that Glorious Race of the Capetines; the which (should we reckon their Original or Commencement but from this year) would have eight hundred and odd years of Antiquity, clearly made out from Male to Male, and of crowned Heads; an Honour which no Line on Earth besides can boast of.

This year the Bald made a Lord named Thierry Earl of Holland, from whom are descended those that have Hereditarily held that Earldom: but they have ever had a much limited Authority, and such a one as could undertake nothing against the Liberty of that Country.

Baldwin Earl of Flanders having the support of the German, took the confidence to come as far as Senlis and steal away Judith the Daughter of Charles his King, the young Widdow of Eardulfe King of England. He retired into the Country belonging to Lotaire, whence he conducted her to his own, and soundly beat those Soldiers under Charles's pay, who would needs pursue them. The Pope having excommunicated him at that Kings complaint, the young Count was so startled, that the following year he went to Rome and threw himself at his Feet: the Holy Father touched with his submission, and the Princesses tears interposed to obtain his Pardon. Charles was adviced to condescend; Nor indeed could the fault be any other ways repaired.

862. The passion of King Lotaire bred a greater scandal. He had married Thietberge Daughter of Hubert Duke d'ouvre le Mont-Jon, and allied to Charles the Bald: Now in the year 860. having some disgust against her, and love for Valdrade Niece to Thietgand, and Daughter of Gontier, this being Arch-Bishop of Colen, the other of Treves: these two Prelates Interested and Flatterers having Assembled their Suffragans at Aix la Chapelle, obliged them to dissolve the Marriage; and immediately Lotaire publicly marries Valdrade. The pretended Motives for this Sentence, were a supposed Incest of Thietberges with her own Brother; and the Bishop of Metz his assuring them, that Duke Hubert who could do all things in that Court, had forced the Prince to take Thietberge for Wife after the death of the King his Father, who in his Life time, said he, had made him Marry Valdrade.

At this time Nicholas I. was Pope, a Prelate of great capacity, and one that carry'd it high: He wrote concerning this to Charles, who before sought to quarrel with Lotaire; and indeed would have expell'd him, to break this Match, had not Louis the German King interpos'd and obliged them to meet at a general Assembly. Lotaire appearing there, promised to submit to the judgment of the Church; and to elude Charles his pursuit, appealed to the Pope, praying to let this cause be judged by a Council of French Bishops to be held at Metz, and whether his Holyness might send his Legats.

The Holy Father grants his request; the Council was assembled in June. The two Bishops Gontaire and Thietgand served the passion of the young Prince: his Presents corrupted the Popes Legats; in a word, the Council pronounced in favour of the dissolution. The two Arch-Bishops had the confidence to carry this Sentence to Rome to have the Popes approbation. But far from that, he calls a Council in the Lateran Palace, by whom they were deposed and both of them excommunicated; and it was declared that all the other Bishops who were assisting at this false judgment should incur the same punishment, unless they craved pardon by express Legats.

Thietgand and Gontaire replied very smartly to the decree he published, and framed another whereby they declared him excommunicate himself, and contravening even, said they, the Holy Canons favouring the excommunicated, and separating through pride from the society of the other Bishops. Which did not a little encourage the revolt of Photius Patriarch of Constantinople, and the obstinate resistance of Hincmar Arch-Bishop of Reims. Nevertheless soon after Thietgand submitted to the Sentence, but could not obtain his absolution during the life of Nicholas. But the Arch-Bishop of Colen regarded it not, still continuing in his obstinacy.

Charles the Bald's subjects, male-contented with his Government, had made several Leagues against him: he engages his Friends likewise to make one for his service, and to meet in all parts of the Country under his Standards, to be ready to March when ever he required it.

Valdrade had promised to go for absolution to Rome; she went twice into Italy. And twice repenting her having repented; returned back. The Pope having therefore Assembled his Church declared her excommunicate, and wrote very harsh Letters to young Lotaire, threatening to deprive him of his Kingdom.

There is no craft nor submissions which this Prince did not put in practice to elude that Sentence. But the Pope not valuing all those Arts, sent a Legat into France named Arsenius: who addressing himself to the German Louis called a Synod, and taking upon him a Supream Authority, declared to Lotaire that he must take his Wife again, or remain excommunicated with all his Adherents. The Kings his Uncles maintained this Sentence in such sort, that for the time he was forced to obey.

But so soon as the Legat was departed France, he began afresh to mis-use his Wife, to threaten to make process against her for Adultery, and prove that crime by combat. The accused retires to the protection of Charles, the Pope takes her business much to heart, and excommunicates Valdrade; and Duke Hubert Brother of this Queen rebelling against Lotaire plunders his Country, kills his people, and exercised all manner of cruelty, till he was slain himself, by Count Conrad, Father of that Rodolph who was the First King of Burgundy beyond the Jour, or Transjurain.

Salomon had fancied that the Kingdom of Bretagne, though Neomene had obtained it rather by conquest than succession, belonged to him, because he was the Son of Rivalon eldest Brother to that King. Thus having forgotten he was carefully and tenderly bred under his tuition, he contrives a conspiracy against Herispoux his Son, assaults him in the Fields, then kills him in the Church to which he fled for safety, and so puts the Crown all bloody upon his own head.

Neomene and he intituled themselves Kings of Bretagne, and a great part of Gaule, because in effect they possessed the Countries of Mayne and with that the lower Anjou, which they had wrested from the French. For this cause was Anjou divided in two Countries, the one containing what is beyond the River Maine and held by these Breton Kings, the other what lies on this side, and remained to the French.

At

At the same time the Normans entering into Neustria by the Loire, spread themselves all over Nantois, Poitou, Anjou, and Tourraine. Ragnulfe Duke of Aquitaine, and Duke Robert the strong, who was so called because he guarded those Marches against these Barbarians and the Bretons, having attacked them in a Post which they had fortified near the River, were by misfortune both slain in the combat: So that their Army wanting a Head, though they got the advantage, let those robbers get away from them.

Robert had two Sons very young, Eudes and Robert whom we shall find to have reigned hereafter.

The Saracens tormented Italy no less. Lotaire went thither with his Forces, not only to assist the Emperor Louis his Brother, but moreover by this means to deserve and gain the Favour of the Pope, which was Adrian successor to Nicholas; hoping in time to obtain the dissolution of his Marriage with Thietberge. The Holy Father received him very well, because he assured him he had punctually obey'd to all that was enjoyned him: but when both he and his came to receive the Holy Communion from his hands, he obliged them all to swear it was true that he had quitted Valdrade.

Now it hapned shortly after that the most part of these Lords died of sickness or otherwise, in such numbers and so suddenly as if they had been cut down by the Sword of an exterminating Angel; and Lotaire himself was Seized with a Fever at Luca, which he drag'd along to Piacenza where he gave up the Ghost the 6th of August. Which some interpreted a divine Vengeance, for the false and sacrilegious Oath he and his Courtiers had made. The Body of Jesus Christ in the Sacrament being a destroying Sword to the wicked and unworthy Communicant.

368. His youngest Brother Charles King of Provence, endeavoured to reap his succession, and was Crowned at Mets by the Bishop Adventius. But he survived not long after, and died without Issue. He was Interred in the Church of St. Peter's at Lyons.

gundy and Lorrain.

LOUIS II.
Emperour in Italy.

368. Charles who then held a Parliament at Poissy, informed of the death of Lotaire, went and Seized on the Kingdom of Lorraine, neither minding the Emperor Louis Brother of the two last Kings, to whom it should have belonged, nor the Mediation of the Pope who desired him by an express Legation, to do his Nephew Justice. The Bishops of that Kingdom being Assembled at Mets, gave him the Crown; And Hincmar the Arch-Bishop, chief promoter of that Decree, put it on his Head with the usual Ceremonies.

Lotaire had one Son and two Daughters by Valdrade. The two Daughters were Berte and Gisele; Berte was first wife to Count Thibault Father of Hugh Count and Marquess of Provence, and by her second Marriage to Adelbert Marquess of Tuscany, Father of Guy and Lambert. Gisele was Wedded to Godfrey the Dane, who Reigned in Frisland, the Son was named Hugh who when he came to Age contended for the Kingdom of Lorrain.

369. Hermenrude Wife to Charles the Bald, dying at St. Denis the 16th of October, he married for the second time Richende or Richilda his Mistress, Daughter of Earl Buvin or Boves, and the Sister to Thietberge Widdow of King Lotaire III.

370. It was with some justice, but without legal power, that the Pope should take any cognizance of the difference about Lotaire. He dispatched a second Embassy to Charles the Bald, to exhort him to surrender it to the Emperor Louis, otherwise he would Excommunicate him; And he wrote to the Bishops that they should forbear all Communion with that King, unless they would be cut off from the Church of Rome. Charles reply'd modestly enough to the Legats; but the French Bishops went a higher Note, and the Arch-Bishop Hincmar wrote very smart Letters to Adrian.

His Nephew, of the same name, Bishop of Laon, was of an other opinion, and and with much heat maintained all those Orders brought from the Pope. He had Excommunicated a Norman Lord, because he detained some Lands belonging to his Church whereof the King had given him the Benefice. His proceedings were blamed and condemned by the Bishops at the Synod of Verberie: he appealed to the Pope: for which cause his Uncle having cited him before the Council of Atigny, which consisted of the Bishops of twelve Provinces, he caused his Equipage to be Plundered by the way, and when he came to the Assembly forced him to renounce his Appeal. The Pope made grievous complaint of it, and would have brought the Process and the two Hincmars to Rome: but the Arch-Bishop reply'd with force, and hindred him.

This dispute went so far that the Bishop of Laon was deposed and clapt in Prison, whereafter two years Persecution his Eyes were put out.

The two Brothers Louis and Charles; after many persuasions used by the latter, and by the mediation of the Bishops and Lords, met in a place agreed upon on this side the Meuse, each with a certain number of People, and there divided the Kingdom of Lorrain in two, without having any regard to their Nephew the Emperor Louis.

Whose cause the Pope still supporting, sent a famous Legation to the two Brothers. Louis sent them back to Charles, and he taking time to delay, advanced as far as Lyons, as it were to confer with the Pope: but it was in effect for a quite contrary design. For very far from doing his Nephew justice, he likewise seized on the Kingdom of Burgundy, where he met with no opposition but from Berthe the Wife of Count Gerard, who sustained a Siege in Vienne and surrendered it upon composition. Charles the Bald gave this County in charge to Boson Brother to the Queen Richilda his Wife, whom he also made Duke of Aquitain and Grand-Master of the Porters*, and raised him in such sort, that he was shortly after one of those that dismembered the Monarchy.

During this Voyage he had left the Lieutenantcy of his Kingdom to the Arch-Bishop Hincmar, who by his Genius no less powerful then daring, had rendred himself very necessary. He had no small ado to hinder the designs and enterprises of Carloman eldest Son of his King. This Prince had some years before conspired against his Father who had made him a Deacon in despite of him; and having rebelled another time, he put him in Prison. The Prayers of the Popes Legates, who came the year before into France, had got him out again: but abusing this mercy, he fell again to his old Practices. Now being fallen the third time into his Fathers hands, he caused him to be condemned to Death, and then changed that Sentence to a deprivation of his sight, that he might have time to repent. Some time afterwards a couple of Monks craftily got him out of Prison, and convey'd him to his Uncle the German King, who gave him an Abbey for his maintenance. But Death did not leave him long in the enjoyment of it.

This cursed Custome of putting out Eyes, and other ways of dismembering, was the invention of the Greek Princes; and it hath been long practised in the West, so that Vassals in their Oaths of Fidelity, swore they would defend the persons of their Lords, and never consent they should be maimed in any part of their Bodies.

About these times the Gascons desiring to collect their Forces under a Duke of their own Nation, and of the Race of their ancient Dukes to secure themselves against the fury of the Normans, and the revenge of Charles the Bald, went into Spain to the Son of Loup Centulle, whom the King of the Asturias had made an Earl in old Castille, to desire and get one of his Sons. The youngest after the refusal of all his Brothers, accepted the Honour: his name was Sanche, his surname Mitarra, the *Saracens had bestowed it on him because he was their Ruin, and their Scourge. From him are proceeded the Hereditary Dukes of Gascony who lasted near 200 years. He had a Successor of the same name and surname as himself. This Son was Father of Garcia Sanchez the Crooked, who had three, Garcia Sanchez Duke of Gascony, William Count of Fezenzac, and Arnold Count of Astarack. This last not Born the natural way, but by an incision they made in his Mothers Flank, was surnamed Non-nat. Not Born.

The Princes of the Carlovinian Line, were for the most part, of weak Spirits, Fools, or Sottish. Louis Emperor of Italy, though Pious and Valiant, was so slighted by his Subjects, that they would part him from his Wife, because he had had no Male-Children. And even Adelgise Duke of Benevent made him Prisoner, and extorted from him very unjust things.

873. The Children of Louis the German gave their Father a great deal of trouble, and seemed to punish him for the disquiet he had given to his. The eldest named Charles, and afterwards surnamed the Gross, troubled without doubt with horror for the conspiracies he had made against him, had violent fits of Madness, believing he had seen the Devil and was possessed by him. He was cured of that Frenzy for some time, after many Devotions, and Vows over the Graves of Saints: but his Brain having been once so disturbed, he felt it all his life afterwards.

873. The Normans had seized on the City of Angers about four years since, and settled themselves there with their Families, from whence, when they had a mind to it they ran about the Loire, and all those other Rivers which fall into it, loading their Barks, with the Plunder and Pillage of all the Country. Charles assisted by Salomon King of the Bretons, besieged them in that City. The Siege was long: the Bretons by great labour bring it to an end; they turned the stream of the Maine, and by this means their Vessels lay all on dry ground, and gave them opportunity to approach to the foot of their Wall. The Pyrats could no way have escaped, if they would have forced them: however the Bald, so terrible had they made themselves, fearing the revenge such other Parties they had abroad in divers parts of the Kingdom might take, not only did them no hurt; but likewise gave them the liberty to depart with all their plunder. They only made a promise never to return any more into France: but at their departure from thence, they went and nestled themselves in an Island within the Loire, from whence they continued their old Trade.

Towards the Month of August, an unknown cause brought towards the Coast, or Borders of Germany, a prodigious quantity of Locusts, which were about the bigness of an inch, having six wings, and teeth as hard as a stone. In less than an hour they had eaten up all the Herbs and Greens growing in a Country of seven or eight Leagues in length, and two in breadth, to the very Branches and Rinds of young Trees. After they had done incredible mischief, a strong Wind hurried them into the British Sea, where they were drowned: But dead they did no less hurt than when living: the great heaps thrown by the Waves upon the Shoar, infecting the Country with the Plague.)

874. While King Salomon, who was become a good Man and devout to the doing of Miracles, was thinking to retire into a Monastery, and leave his Crown to his Son Guegnon: two of his Cousin Germans Pasqueten or Pasquitan Son of Neomene, and Urfand, assisted by Wygon Son of Duke Rodolph, and some French Inhabitants of Bretagne, whom he had treated ill, conspired against him, and besieged him in his Castle of Plelan; where surrendering himself and his Son, upon some false promises the French put out his eyes, and a few days after put him to death.

The two Cousins having shared the Sovereignty, soon quarrell'd each other, and came to blows near Rennes; Urfand with a Thousand men only, charged Pasquitan who had Twelve times as many, and got the advantage.

875. The other Lords of the Country, after the example of these two, set up likewise for Sovereigns, amongst others Alain Earl of Broerac, that is to say, the Territory of Vennes and that of Porboet, and Salomon Count of Rennes, Son of the Sister to a King of the same name; On the other hand the Normans wasted all the Country; so that Bretagne thus torn, lost the name of a Kingdom. And took that of a County, and then a Duchy. In those days, these two Titles were confounded.

Soon after Urfand fell sick to extremity; Pasquitan having notice of it gets his Forces together. Urfand whose courage could not fail, but with his Life, was carried in a Litter to the head of his men: his presence gave them the victory, but hastened his death a little. A great deal of honour which cost him but a Moments Breath.

875. His Rival did not long survive him, sickness deprived him of that which death had bestowed on him. His Succession remained in dispute between Alain his Brother, and Judicel Son of the Daughter to Herispoux. They found it better to share it by agreement than by the Sword, and at length it fell all to Alain by the Death of Judicel, who was slain in a * fight against the Normans.

Louis Emperor of Italy Dies without Male Children in the Month of August An. 875. the 20th of his Empire, who had been mightily disturbed by Factions of the Grands his State, and incursions of the Saracens. His Tomb is to be seen at Milan in St. Ambrose Church.

His Wife was named Engelberge, according to some the Daughter of Ethico who was Son of another Ethico Duke of Suevia or Germany, by whom he had but one Daughter only, named Hermengarde, who An. 876. was Ravished by Boson Brother to the Queen Richilde, and with the consent of Everard Berenger Son of the Duke of Friuli; who had her in keeping.

Louis the Germanick.

Charles the Bald.

It was now betwixt the Germanick and the Bald who should first Seize upon Italy. The Bald making great diligence got thither before Charles and Carloman two of the Germanicks Sons, who went two several ways, whilst their Brother Louis fell upon France to make a diversion. For the two first the Bald amused them with very fair words, and sent them back handsomely; and as for the third, the Prelats made such pathological remonstrances to him, that he took pity of the poor people, and returned without committing many acts of Hostility.

The Popes interest was to have an Emperor of a great name, one that could lend him powerful assistance, as Pepin and Charlemaine had done, but yet not abide in Italy, where he must have lain too heavy upon his shoulders: wherefore he would have no Italian Lord, because they were both weak and resided upon the place; and besides being to chuse out of the Carlovinian Line, he could not so well comply with the roughness of those that Governed in Germany. He therefore pitched upon Charles the Bald, and incited him by a sumptuous Embassy to come to Rome to receive the Imperial Diadem, as if it had been absolutely in his disposal.

He set it on his Head upon Christmas Day with great Solemnity. After which the new Emperor bestowed the Duchy of Spoleta upon Guy the Son of Lambert, and that of Friuli on Berenger the Son of Everard.

At his return he received also the Crown of Lombardy at Pavia, and a Confirmation of the Imperial one at an Assembly of Counts and Prelats in the said City, the Pope assisting in Person.

And the following year, there being yet several Lords in Italy who refused to acknowledge him, the Pope held another Council in Rome to Confirm him a second time adding Excommunications against the refractory.

The Western Empire could be but a vain or empty Title, and at most had nothing belonging to it but the Exarchate of Ravenna, and the Pentapolis; for his power was not absolute in the City of Rome, and the Kingdom of Lombardy belonged, nor held any wise of it.

Nevertheless the Bald esteeming himself wholly obliged to the Pope, and of his Sovereign being become his Subject; even so far condescending as to take it for an honour to bear the Title of his Counsellor of State: endeavoured in recompence with all his might to extend his Authority over the liberties of the Gallican Church. In a Council held at Pomigon he supported as much as he could the Popes Legats, who brought Letters of Primacy to Ansegise Arch-Bishop of Sens, saying the Pope had Commissioned him to assist at that Council, and to cause his Orders to be put in execution, and in effect he made him take his Seat immediately next the Legats. But the French Prelats encourag'd by Hincmar, who thought he better deserved that honour than Ansegise, could never be induced neither by Prayers nor threatnings to give consent to that Novelty. At the eight Session the Bald brought in the Empress his wife (so fond was he of her) with the Crown upon her Head, to preside there with him; of which the Bishops were so ashamed that they did not so much as rise up to receive her.

Though the Germanick were Seventy years old, and much discomposed in his Family by the discord amongst his Sons, he had nevertheless so great a resentment, for that Charles the Bald did him no justice in the matter of the Empire and Territories of Italy, that he gathered all his Forces to make a powerful irruption upon Neustria. Being come to Francfort, Death broke the thrid of his life and his undertakings the 28th of August, the Seventieth of his Age, and the 59, since his first Coronation

This Prince was well read in the Learning of those times. He was all his life long Active, Warlike and Liberal, one that cared not for money but to bestow it, and had a greater esteem for Steel than Gold; a great Zealot in Justice and Religion, an equitable distributor of commands and employments, in Fine approaching more than any Prince of his Line, to the noble virtues and qualities of Charlemagne: By Emme his sole wife, a Spaniard by Nation, much applauded by the Authors of those days for her Wisdom and Piety, he had three Sons, Carloman, Charles, and Louis.

876. Upon the News of his death, the Bald, of a defender which he was just before, became an aggressor, and resolved to strip those young Princes his Nephews before they could be aware. Louis nearest Neighbour to this danger sent Ambassadors to him, to put him in mind of the Treaty made with his Father, and offered him to prove by thirty witnesses, whereof ten should undergo the trial of cold water, ten more of hot water, and other ten that of burning Irons, that they had on their part never infring'd it in the least.

The Bald pretended to give ear to these justifications, and agreed to a Cessation, during which he made Oath he would not molest them. Yet he pursued his march by narrow and unfrequented ways through the Mountains, intending to surprize him near Andernack where he lay encamped, and to put out his Eyes. But the Bishop of Colen who was with him, having in vain used all his endeavours to dissuade him from this treachery, gave secret notice to Louis, who put himself into so good a posture as he defeated his great Army, and might have cut them all off would he but have pursued them.

877. The three Brothers confirmed by this victory in the Succession of their Father, divided it betwixt them. Carloman the eldest had the Kingdom of Bavaria to which belonged Pannonia, Carinthia, Bohemia and Moravia. Louis the second had East-France or Germany, and with that part of the Kingdom of Lorraine. Charles had the Country of the Grifons, Switzerland, Souabe, Alsace, and the other part of Lorraine bordering on them.

* Tra in old French signifies Tribute.
During all these dissensions the Normans had fair play. The Bald put no stop to them but with Presents of Gold and the like, which rather invited them soon after to come again, then perswaded them to stay away; So that while he lost himself with the imaginations of vain conquests, they imposed * Tribute upon West-France, and had it paid as themselves demanded, or after their own mode, the reason perhaps why they were called Truands.

The Saracens on the other hand tormented Italy no less: they had Fortified themselves at Tarente, and having made a League with the Duke of Naples, sacked all to the very gates of Rome. Pope John cries out and calls upon the Bald for help, and as a great favour sends him the confirmation of his Election to the Empire. He goes therefore into Italy with Richilda his wife whom he led about every where. The Pope comes to meet him as far as Versel, Crowned the Empress at Tortona, and from thence they went down to Pavia, to consult with the Lords of Italy about the means to drive out the Saracens.

While they were there they heard that Carloman King of Bavaria approached with a great Army to resume the Kingdom of Italy and the Empire. Upon the bruit of his march the Assembly dissolves, the Pope flies to Rome, and Charles makes hast into France: But at the same time Carloman Seized with a Pannique fear, turns back again to Germany.

Whilst the Bald was absent from his Kingdom, the French Lords formed a conspiracy against him, Dofon himself his Favourite and Brother in Law to his Wife, was of the Knot. They hated him mortally, and the occasion or pretence was, that he raised people of mean Birth, and seemed to despise the French Nation, in affecting to wear his Cloaths after the Greek Mode who were their mortal Enemies. It hapned therefore by the wicked contrivances of these Factionous persons combining, that upon his return, passing by Mount Cenis, he was poisoned by Sedecias his Physician, a Jew by Birth, and reputed a Magician. Accidents not uncommon to Great ones who make use of such-like People. His body was interred at Vercel, and seven years after brought thence to the Abbey of St. Denis. He died at the Age of 55 years, the second of his Empire, and the 38th of his Reign, accounting from the Decease of his Father.

At he loved Pride and vain Pomp more than Solidity, so Fortune in conformity to his humour, made him happy in appearance but unhappy in effect, she bestowed many great Lordships and but little good success upon him. The best of his qualities was that he acquired great learning, and gratified good Schollars with Honour and rewards, seeking and sending into Greece and Asia for them to enrich France by their knowledge; worthy of praise for so doing, had he but taken care to provide for the necessity and security of his Country, before he brought in those Ornaments.

His Father was blamed for raising people of a servile condition to Ecclesiastical dignities: And he going farther yet advanced very mean persons to Military Employments, and to such dignities as were due only to the greatest in his Kingdom: This turned the whole State, as it were upside-down, the greatest Families sunk to nothing, and the meanest were raised to the highest pitch, to whom the obscurity and ignorance of those times was very favourable in concealing and preventing all knowledge of the baseness or Poverty of their Original.

The City and Abbey of St. Denis are obliged to this King for the Faire at Landy.

He had no Children by Richilda his second wife; but by Hermentrude his first he had many: there was but one now alive, which was Louis whom they surnamed the Stammering, because in truth he was so.

The hatred they bare to the Father was transferred to the Son: he endeavoured to take it away by force of gratifications, bestowing Abbeys upon some, to others Lands and Employments were given: but by pleasing and pacifying a few, he created a world of discontents; and the Princes (so the great Lords were called) took offence, that he should grant of himself, what he could not well do without their consent, and in the general Assembly.

Whilst they were making divers Cabals, grounding all, as I believe, upon this pretence, that it did not appear to them that his Father had * ordained he should succeed him; his Mother in Law Richilda comes with all speed and brings him his Father Charles the Bald's Will, by which it was manifest he had given him his Kingdom, and did invest him in it by the Sword of St. Peter, and the Royal ornaments which he sent to him.

Louis being a little better Authorised by this means, the Lords agreed with him, but certainly not till it had cost him a great deal: And the Arch-Bishop Hincmar Crowned him in the City of Reims the 8th day of December.

IN the mean time Lambert Count of Spoleta and Albert Marquiss of Tuscany, partisans of King Carloman who pretended to the Empire, being entred into Rome kept Pope John VIII. a prisoner. But soon after, having made his escape out of their hands, he takes Shipping and Lands in Provence, whence he was conducted to Lyons. From that place, always defrayed in his expences by the Bishops of France, he came to Troyes, where he held a Council: the King came likewise thither, and by his hands was Crowned Emperor, the seventh of September.

In this Council the Pope Excommunicated Hugh Bastard Son to King Lotaire II. and Valdrade, who pretended to be Legitimate, and had collected together some herds of Robbers to regain the Kingdom of Lorraine. He likewise restored Hincmar Bishop of Laon, permitted him to say Mass, though he were blind, and bestowed one half of the revenue of the Bishoprick upon him.

879.

After the Popes departure, the Stammerer going towards Lorraine, conferred about Marsenne upon the Meuse, with Louis King of Germany. They made a Treaty by which they divided Lorraine betwixt them, as it had been betwixt their Fathers, and the Stammerer promised him part in Italy.

Neither the obedience nor affection of the Lords was firm towards him, they gave little heed to his Orders: and it hapned that having taken up Arms to suppress Bernard Marquiss of Gothia, whose Government he had given to Bernard Earl

Earl of Auvergne, he fell sick in his passage by Autun in Burgundy, not without suspicion he was poysoned, wherefore he sent for his Son Louis whom he put into the hands and keeping of Bernard Earl of Auvergne, Thierry his great Chamberlain, the Abbot Hugh, and some other Lords. This Hugh or Hugues was very powerful towards the latter part of the Reign of Charles the Bald, under Louis the Stammerer, and likewise under his Children.

The Stammerer being with much difficulty brought to Compeigne, gave up his Soul upon Holy-Friday the 19th of April: He was buried at the same place in the Abbey-Church of St. Cornille, his Age was 30 or 35 years, of which he had Reigned only one and seven Months. Before his death he sent the Crown and other Regal ornaments to his Son Louis, by the Bishop of Beauvais and an Earl, with order to have him appointed King as soon as possible.

He was in his youth married to Anfride, by whom he had two Sons, this Louis of whom we speak and Carloman: but, as she was of mean extraction, the King his Father without whose consent he married her, obliged him to put her away. For this reason it is that some Historians say that these two Princes are Bastards. After this divorce he took another named Adelaid, or Alice Daughter of some English Prince, and Sister to Wilfrid Abbot of Flavigny in the Dutchy of Burgundy. She was with child when he died, and brought a Posthumus Son into the World, Born the 17th of September following. He was named Charles the Simple.

The Western Empire remained vacant two whole years, and Italy in an extreme confusion, thorough the discords of the Lords, and the spoil and ravages of the Saracens, to whom the Pope was fain to pay Tribute.

We may in this Reign, place the Original of the Earls of Anjou, from a Lord named Ingelger, the Son of a Breton named Torquat or Tortulfe, on whom Charles the Bald had bestowed some Lands in Gastinois, and Perretta Daughter of Hugo Labbe in marriage. This Ingelger was the Father of Fulke le Roux, who being made Earl of Anjou by Charles the Simple, valiantly defended that Country against the Normans.

CARLOMAN,

King XXVII.

At the Age of Adolescence.

POPES,

JOHN VIII. 3 Years and half in this Reign.

MARTIN, Elected in January 883. S. one Year, and 20 days.

ADRIAN III. Elect. in January 884. S. One Year, 3. Months, whereof Six Months in this Reign.

LOUIS III. And Carloman, his Brother, Kings of West-France, Burgundy and Aquitain.

CARLOMAN King of Bavaria.

Louis the Young, King of Germany or East-France.

Charles the Fatt, of Germany, properly so called.

Lorraine to both.

TO the very end of this Race we shall find nothing but factions, the Kings being but their May-games, and even their Creatures. Thierry and the rest to whom the Stammerer had recommended his Son, sent to the other Lords to meet at the general Assembly at Meaux: And they reconciled the quarrels between Thierry and Boson. Gauzulin forgot not the injuries he had received by the preceding Government, and having made his Party with some Bishops and Lords, proposed that to heal the distempers of France, they ought to bring it all under one head, and for that purpose call in Louis of Germany (with whom he had contrived and held intelligence, as having formerly been taken Prisoner by him at the Battel of Andernac) promising to bring him in and make the French accept and own his Title to the prejudice of the Bastard Sons of Louis the Stammerer; For thus he called them.

The

Louis III. And Carloman, King XXVII.

The greatest Friends to these two Princes could no other way divert this Storm, but by yielding up to the German King that part of Lorraine which the Bald and the Stammerer had possessed. And ever since, that Kingdom, though disputed and divers times resumed by the Kings of West-France, yet remained at last with the Germans or Kings of East-France.

Louis would not have been satisfied with less than the whole Monarchy, had not his affairs pressed him to return home in haste; For being informed at Mets of the sickness of Carloman his eldest Brother who was Seized with the Palsie, he posted to Bavaria to prevent him from giving the Kingdom to Arnold his Bastard Son. Now Carloman died soon after, and was Interred at Oettingen in Bavaria in St. Maximilian's Monastery founded by him. He had no Legitimate Children, but two natural ones, Arnold to whom he could leave only the Duchy of Carinthia, King Louis having even in his life time received the Oaths of his Subjects; and Gisele, who An. 890. married Zuendipold King of Moravia, whom for that reason some have called Carloman's Son.

Louis III. and Carloman as before said.

Louis and Charles the Fatt as above said.

In the mean while Gauzulin and Conrard fearing to be oppressed by the other Neustrian Lords, applied themselves to Lewitgarde the wife of Lewis of Germany, a very ambitious Princess who solicited her Husband so earnestly, that she overpersuaded him to return once more into France with much greater strength then he at first carried.

880.

Upon the rumour of this second Irruption, the Lords caused not only Louis eldest Son of the Stammerer, but also Carloman his Brother to be both Crowned in the Abbey of Ferrieres in Gastinois.

880.

Some while after these two Brothers being at Amiens, divided their Fathers Kingdom betwixt them; Lewis had Neustria, and Carloman the Kingdoms of Aquitain and Burgundy.

At their first accession they meet with the displeasure of seeing two Kingdoms, belonging to their Father dismembred from the Succession, which were Lorraine, as we have observed, and Burgundy. As for this last it was lopp'd off by Boson. That Lord had been in such high favour with Charles the Bald, that he had given him Provence, if not in Sovereignty, at least to perpetuity, and his Niece Hermengarde to Wife. Having these advantages he was encouraged by that ambitious Princess to make himself King; So that having gained the Lords and Prelats of those Countries he was Crowned King of Burgundy in the Royal Castle of Mantale in Dauphine by the hands of the Arch-Bishop of Lyons.

This attempt went near the hearts of the two Brother Kings: but besides him they had two Enemies more to deal withal, their Cousin Louis and the Normans. They gained a Battel against the last nigh the River of Vienne the first day of November. After which leaving their victory imperfect, they turned head against Louis, who by the instigation of the Abbot Gauzulin was advanced even to their Frontiers. Having intelligence they were coming towards him, he durst not march forward, but demanded to parley with them at Gondouville where they saw each other.

In his retreat he defeated in Hainault a crew of eight or ten thousand Normans, but lost his Bastard Son in that Bustle. Those Pyrats had burnt Saint Omers, Teroienne, Arras, Tournay, Saint Riquier, Saint Valery, and all the Countries of Hainault, Flanders and Boulonois. Four Burghers of Tournay, who fled to Noyon, rebuilt the City, and let houses at easy Rents. Arras was deserted thirty years, the Inhabitants having forsaken it for Beauvais.

The four Kings to compose their contests, had assigned a general Assembly at * Gondoul a Town near Mets. Louis of Germany sent to excuse himself because he was fallen into a fit of sickness; but Charles his Brother came there and confer'd with Louis and Carloman touching their common interest and affairs. They found it necessary to enter into a league together for the destruction of their Enemies. Louis the Germanick, with Louis and Carloman against Hugh the Son of Valdrade, who sacked all the open Countries of Lorraine: And Charles the Fatt also with his two Brothers to pull down Boson's pride.

As for the first, the Forces of Louis the German and the two Brothers having encountered encountred the Army belonging to Hugh, commanded by Tybault his Brother in Law, they put it to the rout and made a great slaughter.

Then Charles the Fatt and his two Brothers marching joyntly against Boson, defeated him in Battel, and afterwards besieged Vienne, where that Rebel had left his wife, retreating himself to the Mountains. We shall not find this siege at an end till about two years hence.

Charles was come thither upon the request of his Cousins, and had left the affairs of Italy, whither had he made one Voyage already, and in some Months time had secured to himself all Lombardy, whereof he was Crowned King by the Arch-Bishop of Milan. And being impatient to return again, he took leave of them, and having repassed the Mountains, went directly to Rome; accompanied by the Patriarch of Aquileia.

At this time the Pope, who hesitated on whom he should bestow the Imperial Crown, could not deny a Prince so powerfully Armed, and therefore set it on his Head upon Christmas Day, in the year 881.

In the mean while a * Fleet of Normans entring by the Vaal or Waal, fortified themselves at leisure in the Palace of Nimeghen: So that Louis not being able to force them, only obliged them to quit the Kingdom. They went away indeed with all their men, but took all their Plunder with them likewise.

Another very strong Fleet going up the Somme, forced the rich Abbey of Corbie and the City of Amiens, then spread themselves at large over the neighbouring Countries. The mischief was very great: therefore Louis leaving his Brother Carloman at the siege of Vienne, hastned into Picardy, fell upon the Normans near Amiens, and laid nine thousand of them dead on the place. Nevertheless whether it were that he expected some other greater Body of them was marching towards him, or was Seized with a Pannique fear, he returned home, and the remainder of those Barbarians fell a plundering as before.

A third Body of them came to the place called Haslon nigh the Meuse, and having fortified themselves there, set the City of Liege on Fire, and likewise burned Tongres, which had otherwhile been ruined by the Vandals, then set fire to Coulen, Bonne, Nuis, the Palace of Aix la Chapelle, and Triers, and Mets; and having gained a victory over the Bishops of those two Cities where the Bishop of Mets was slain, made a horrible slaughter amongst the poor Peasants who were in Arms for them.

Whilst Louis the German was getting his Forces together to oppose them, he died at Frankfort the 20th of January in the strength of his Age, having Reigned but six years. His Corps was conveyed to St. Nazaire the Abbey-Church of Loreheine, where his Fathers lay.

He was the only Brother of three that married: his wife was called Lnidgarde, daughter of Ludolfe Duke of Saxony, and Sister to Otho Father of Henry L'Oiseleur, or Bird-catcher. He had but one Son, who in An. 880. playing in a Window, fell down and bruised himself so that he died.

Charles the Fatt Emperour,
King of Italy, Germany or East-France, Barvaria and Lorrain.

Louis and Carloman of East-France, Aquitain and part of Burgundy.

882. The Succession of the German Kingdom and likewise the necessity of affairs called Charles the Fatt into France, where the Normans posted at Haslon plaid the Devils, assisting and being reciprocally assisted by Hugh the Bastard of Valdrade: who invited and animated those Barbarians, and kindled factions amongst the Lords, to revenge himself at least, if he could not settle himself.

Charles therefore comes over the Mountains, confirmed the donation of Carinthia to Arnold his Bastard Nephew, and gave him the command of his Army, and afterwards he had held a Parliament at Wormes, Arnold having joyned him, he marched towards Haslon.

His Van-guard at first made the Normans retreat; And had it not been for the intelligence and correspondence between some of his Chief Officers (in favour without doubt of Hugh) and those Barbarians, he might have forced them upon this first disorder.

disorder. The Emperor afterwards blocked them up with his whole Army: But a most dreadful Tempest and furious Plague infesting his Army, were once more favourable to them: So that after ten days Siege, they were quit upon condition to leave the Kingdom, whence they carried infinite riches.

They had two Kings or Generals, Sigefroy and Godfrey. The first Embarked with above 40000 men. The other, whether for Interest or Devotion, received Holy Baptism, and had the Emperor for his God-Father, who gave him a natural Daughter of King Lotaires II. in Marriage, named Gisfe, and two thousand and fourscore Livers in Gold, with the Dutchy of Frisia.

About the same time Louis King of West-France, going to meet some Breton Princes, who were bringing him an Army to march against the Normans, fell sick at Tours, whence being brought back in a Litter, he died at Saint Denis in France, the of August, having Reigned somewhat more than three years. Paul Emilius says that spurting his Horse to run after a pretty Maiden that fled from him into a House, he broke his back riding in at the door which was too low, and thereof died.

Carolus Craßus,
or
Charles the Fatt,
Emperor & King of Germany.

Carloman King of West-France, Aquitaine and Burgundy.

His Brother Carloman immediately went from the Siege of Vienne, leaving the prosecution thereof to Earl Richard, to secure his Succession and head that Army, which was marching against the Normans. Upon his arrival at Autan he had information that those Robbers being afraid were fled out of the River Loire, and a few days after, he sees Richard come to him, who having taken Vienne, brought thither both the wife and daughter of Boson Prisoners.

From thence he marches against another Body of Normans, who having gotten in by the Mouth of the Somme, ran up as far as Laon and Reims: he charged them vigorously, and one part of them were defeated, the rest made their escape in their Barks by the River Aisne.

At this time the grand Hincmar Arch-Bishop of Reims worn out with age, and pierced with grief to see his Country thus Plundered and wasted, his self being forced to fly from his City, threatened by those Barbarians, as they were conveying him in his Litter, he died at Espernay, leaving the Gallican Church almost quite destitute of any Prelate, that understood her Rights or took care of her discipline.

After the example of the Emperor Charles the Fatt, Carloman his Cousin treated with the Normans to go out of his Countries, compounding with them for twelve thousand Marks of Silver to do so.

Shortly after being a-hunting in the Forrest of Iveline near Montfort a days journey from Paris, he was mortally wounded by a wild Boar, or as others say, by a Gentleman of his Train, who thought to dart the Boar. He lieth buried at Saint Denis. In all he Reigned five years, that is, three joyntly with his Brother, and two alone.

His Father had contracted him to Boson's daughter An. 878. But it is most likely he never did marry her: Nor do we find that he had any Children. For that Louis le Faincant, or Do-nothing, which some would bestow upon him, is a pure Chimera.

As soon as the Normans had the news that he was dead, they entred upon the Kingdom again, subtilly interpreting, according to their Genius, and their own interest, that the Treaty expired with his life. Hugh the Abbot fought them, and made so terrible a slaughter, that they left France in quiet for some time.

CHARLES III.

Surnamed

Craffus, or, The Fatt.

King XXVIII.

Aged about L. Years.

POPES.

ADRIAN III. Nine Months under this Reign.

STEPHEN IV. Elect. in May

885. S. five Tears, and some Months, whereof 2 Tears. 8 Months under this Reign.

Charles the Fatt
Emperor in Italy, and Germany.

Charles the Simple aged 7 years, a Minor under the Tutelage of Hugues
the Abbot, in France.

884. I need not be thought strange if the Western-French standing in need of a King in his Majority to command their Armies, did not confer the Crown upon Charles the Posthumus Son of Lewis the Stammerer, who was but seven years of Age, but gave their Oaths of Fidelity to Charles the Fatt, who was very potent, and was not as yet observed to be weak Spirited and inclining to be distracted.

884. However it cannot be said that they excluded the Pupil, since they entrusted the Abbot Hugh the Great with his Guardianship and Education; who held in Fief, the Earldom of Paris and the Dutchy of France, that is to say, all that lies within the Seine, the Loire and the Sea, excepting only the Bishopricks.

885. Valdrade's Bastard had not quitted his pretention to Lorraine: And Godfrey the Norman Duke of Frisia, his Brother in Law, were creating some quarrel that they might have an opportunity to restore him to the possession of that Kingdom. The Emperor Charles ridd himself both of the one and the other, but by unhand-some means, according to the contrivance of Henry Duke of Saxony. For this Henry and Gnillebert, or Gilbert, Arch-Bishop of Colen, having drawn Godfrey to a Conference at an Island in the Rhine, there massacred him, and all the Normans that attended: And at the same time Hugh, who came upon his promise of Faith and security to Joinville, was Seized and his Eyes put out, then confined to the Abbey of St. Gal.

155

The fury of the Normans which began to be allayed, burst out again upon this bloody Treachery, and made most horrible work under the conduct of Sigefroy. They entered the River Seine with 700 Barks, and so great a number of other Vessels that the stream was cover'd with them for above two Leagues in length: the City of Paris seated on an Island, and having Bridges on either branch of the River, put a stop to this formidable Fleet. The Barbarians who would needs have the passage thorough this River free, held it besieged three years.

886.

During all that time they tried their utmost endeavours to accomplish their ends. But the Bishop named Goslin, the Abbot Ebon his Nephew, the Earl Eudes, whom we shall hereafter find to be King, with a great many valiant Knights and the Parisians, whose courage was then greater than their City, defended it better then it was attacked.

886, 87, and 88.

The besiegers did from time to time make attempts, and assaulted the Towers of the two Gates, from whence being repulsed would make incursions upon the adjacent Provinces, still keeping the City block'd up with Forts which they had built very nigh the place.

Twice did the Emperor Charles send thither Henry Duke of Saxony upon the earnest intreaties of the French, who deputed Count Eudes to go and unpleore assistance from him. The first time he forced the Danish Camp, and put some relief into the City, which done he returned: but the second riding headlong imprudently into a ditch cover'd with straw and some small branches (a Stratagem often used in those times) he fell into the snare, and was instantly slain and stripp'd. His Army finding themselves a Body without a Head returned into Germany.

At last the Emperor came in person with numerous Forces, and encamped at Montmartre. Yet through some discontent which hapned between him and the French Lords, or some other cause, he chose rather to make use of Gold then Steel to drive out those Robbers, and came to composition with them: importing that for seven hundred pounds weight of Silver, they should go out of France in the Month of March, that in the mean while they might winter about Sens in the Dutchy of Burgundy, where those troublesome Guests staid six Months. And this concluded he returned much troubled with a grievous Head-ach, for which they were fain to make divers Incisions.

When they were assured of the State of his indisposition and affairs, they came and planted themselves again in the Fields of St. Germans, pretending however to keep their agreement; but indeed to surprize the City, as they thought to have done one day about dinner time (for it was the custom then for all the Inhabitants to dine at the same hour) if they had not been observed to come up slowly in their Boats, which they had made proof against their darts, and very well mann'd.

West-France was without any Head, and all the Lords of almost equal Authority, unless it were somewhat they shewed of more then ordinary respect to Hugh who was Tutor to Charles the Simple; but this eminent Lord died in the great disturbance and trouble of the Kingdom, An. 887.

Count Eudes, as I believe, succeeded him in the most part of his Governments, more for his virtue, then because he was his own Brother by the Mother. For the Genealogists assure us that their Mother was Adelais Daughter of Louis the Debonnaire, who had been first married to Count Conrard, by whom she had this Hugh the Abbot and another Conrard Father to Rodolph Duke of Burgundy, and in her second Marriage to Robert the Strong, she had Eudes and Robert.

Charles the Fatt had ever had a weak Brain, since he fancied he saw the Devil, which grew weaker after they made Incisions in his Head. He became suspicious of his Empress, which gave confidence to Berenger Marquis of Friuli to plunder the equipage belonging to Luithgard Bishop of Verfeil accused of Governing that Princess at his pleasure. Nevertheless Charles shewing some resentment the Marquis came and made him satisfaction at the Parliament of Uberlinghen. But yet that very same year, he put her away in the open Assembly, swearing that he had never touched her, though they had lived ten years together. She was named Richarde.

(His frenzie appearing more notorious in the general Assembly at Tribur, all his Subjects both of the Kingdoms of Germany and Bavaria, forsook him even by the Brothers advice of his own Sister Hildegard, to Elect and own in his stead Arnold his Bastard

Bastard Son: And when he thought to Arm himself against him, he was likewise forsaken by the Lorrainers, then by the Almans or Suabes, his ancient Subjects. In so much, that he had not a man left to serve him, nor a single penny to help himself. There was none took any pity, or gave him Food but Luitperd Bishop of Mentz, till Arnold (to whom he sent a natural Son of his to beg Bread) allowed him the revenue of two or three Villages for his Subsistence.

Thus was this Prince, who in those days had been the most potent of the whole world, having no apparent Vice, but on the contrary was very good, very just, and Devout to excess, reduced to this extremity because he had not strength of judgment, and wanted lawful Children, two things very necessary for a Sovereign.

This deplorable condition lasted perhaps a shorter time than he would yet have had it. He died a little while after, either with grief or strangled by his Enemies the 8th of January An. 888. His Corps was buried in the Monastery of Richennoie, situate on an Island in the Lake of Constance.

Of all the Carlovinian Race there was but two Princes left, Arnold and Charles, one a Bastard, the other but a Child. According to the humour of the French in those days, all should have been governed by Arnold: But there were so many of the Nobility equally Powerful and Ambitious, who thought themselves as worthy as a Bastard, being of the Carlovinian blood by their Mothers-side, that he could get no Authority amongst them neither in West-France, nor in Italy.

There were two others in Italy, that is Berenger Duke of Friuli, and Guy de Spoletta, Lands wherewith Charles the Bald had invested them. Each of these descended of the Blood Royal, though only by the Female side, who believed that for want of Males, capable to Govern, they ought to take their shares of the Succession of Charlemaine. They therefore agreed together, that Guy should have the Title of Emperor and Gallick France, and Berenger should enjoy Italy. Now the first having spent time in getting himself to be Crowned Emperor at Rome, stayed a little too long ere he came into France, so that finding their humours changed he went back into Italy, where he overthrew Berenger in two bloody Battles and forced him to take Sanctuary with Arnold.

Arnold likewise not making that diligence he ought, and besides the Nenstrians, or Westerns not agreeing well with the Eastern or Germans: was much amazed that the Lords of Nenstria, which henceforward we shall name simply France, sent word to him when he was coming, that in the Assembly at Compiègne they had Elected Eudes Earl of Paris and Duke of France.

And indeed, though some made a noise in favour of Charles the Simple, yet he was Crowned by Gautier Arch-Bishop of Sens.

On the other hand Rodolph the Son of Conrad, and Nephew of Hugh the Abbot, occupied the Lands between the Mount-Jon and the Alpes Penines, that is, Savoy and the Swisse-Country, and was Crowned King of Burgundy, Trans-jurane, or beyond the Jour, at St Maurice's in Valais.

As likewise Louis the Son of Boson, whose Father the Usurper of the Kingdom of Burgundy Cis-jurane, having been drove from thence by the Kings Louis and Carloman, Scized on the Country which lies between Lyons and the Sea, betwixt the Rhone and the Alpes, under the Title of King of Arles or Provence, and caused that Kingdom to be confirmed to him by a Council held purposely at Valence An. 890. He claimed and founded it upon this, that he was the Son of a Daughter of the Royal blood, and that Charles the Fatt, had Adopted him, in the Assembly of Überlingen. You may observe that all those Princes that thus dismembered the Monarchy, were sprung from the Daughters of the blood Royal, and believed themselves fitter and more capable to Succeed than Arnold or Charles the Simple, whom they looked upon as both of them Bastards,

Eudes,

E U D E S,

King XXIX.

Aged xxvi. Years.

Arnold Em- perour and King of Ger- many.	Eudes King of West- France & Aquitain .	Louis of the Kingdom of Arles .	Rodolph of Burgundy Trans- jurane .	Guy Emperour; and Berenger dispu- ting for Italy , betwixt them.

Thus the Succession of the Carlovinian House was divided into five Dominions (without counting the Lords who set up almost for Sovereigns) 1. Italy which was joyned with the Title of the Empire. 2. Germany, which then also comprehended the Kingdom of Bavaria. 3. France, which had the Kingdoms of Nenstria, Aquitain, and part of Burgundy. 4. Burgundy Cis-jurane, named ordinarily the Kingdom of Arles or Provence, under which were likewise the Lyonois and Dauphine. 5. and Burgundy Trans-jurane, or beyond the Jour, as the other on the contrary.

We need not doubt but these new Kings gave part of the Quarry to the Lords of their Party, and consented to every thing to get only their Oaths and Homage; nor can we imagine but these Lords did the like towards their Vassals, and these again to the lesser Nobility. From hence arose so many Lordships both small and great, of which the Bishops themselves such as were of good Families and had but courage enough, did not forget to take their shares.

Now Eudes to show himself worthy the choice they had made of him, went out against the Normans who ravaged Burgundy. He set upon them on St. John Baptists Day, nigh Mount-faucon, slew nineteen thousand, and pursued the remainder to the very Frontiers, shewing himself personally brave on all occasions.

Another party of them who were in Champagne, descended by the Murme as far as Paris, and there loading the Barks upon Waggon, carried and put them into the River again below the City, then falling down to the Sea and so running along the Coasts plundred the Country of Conjentine.

Alain and Judicael, who were contending for their shares in Bretagne, agreed together to fight the Normans their common Enemy. Judicael alone rashly presents them Battel, and so doing lost both his Life and honour: But Alain having gotten all his Forces together, fought them so fortunately that of fifteen thousand hardly did four hundred escape. The Bretons attribute this success to a vow he made to bestow the Tythe of the Spoil he should gain upon St. Peter's at Rome.

Such Devotion towards the Holy-Chair was very ordinary in those Ages. Divers Princes devoured their Estates, and became Tributaries to St. Peter. Which did not a little contribute to imprint that persuasion the Popes then had in their minds, that they had a right both to give and to take away Crowns.

After these losses the Normans having but few men left in France, two of their Chiefs*, Godfrey and Sigefroy went and shipped a new levy of a hundred thousand men.

* They called them Kings.

land men raised in Denmark, Sweden and Norway, that their reputation might not be wholly blasted. They entered the Meuse with fourscore and ten thousand, leaving the remainder to guard their Vessels. King Arnold's Lieutenants assaulting them indiscreetly, were defeated with the loss of an infinite number of the Nobility.

890. But Arnold himself, picqued at so bloody an affront, passes the Rhine with the whole Force of Germany, seeks them in their very Camp which was close by the Meuse, and forced them with so much fury that he left not so much as one of them alive. The dead Bodies made a Bridge quite cross the River, and the Flood was swoln with the Blood of those Barbarians.

If any wonder whence there could come such vast numbers, we must know, First, that all the rascally and pilfering French, and the like of other Countries joyned with them: That besides those Countries were then extremely populous: and all those Inhabitants greedy of Plunder lifted and embarked themselves to come and rob such rich and fertile Nations. In fine, there came so many, who were either destroyed, or else Inhabited in France, that those large Territories of the North are unpeopled to this very day. Thus in these last Ages, Spain which once swarmed with men, has made her self become a Desert, through the covetous humour in her Subjects, who all transport themselves into that new World where are the Mines of Gold and Silver they so long for.

891. All the Neustrian Lords did not own Eudes for their King. Aymar Earl of Poitiers, whom he would have dispossessed of his Estate to give it to his Brother Robert, Ranulfe II. Duke of Aquitain and some others in those parts, had taken up Arms against him.

892. Now whilst he was employed in Poitou in the War, a confederacy was contrived between * Herebert and Pepin Brothers sprung from Bernard King of Italy, the one Earl of Vermandois, the other of Senlis, and Baudouin, or Baldwin, Earl of Flanders, Fulk Arch-Bishop of Reims, and many others, who having been to fetch Charles the Simple out of England, whither his Mother had carried him, caused him to be Crowned at Rheims the 27th of January in the year 893. It was by the assistance of Fulk, that he immediately wrote Apologetick Letters to Arnold, Guy and Rodolph, exhorting them to help the Pupil against the Usurper. Which at first made some impression upon Arnold, in favour of Charles; but soon after, either in tereft or inconstancy, turned him on Eudes side.

Some have said that that Guy of Spoleta whom we have mentioned, had likewise been Crowned at Langres three years before. So that there were three Kings chosen and Crowned in West-France: But Guy had absolutely quitted it for Italy, and seemed to pretend no more to it.

Arnold King of Germany, Bavaria, and Lorraine.

Eudes and Charles Competitors for West-France.

Guy Emperour and King of Italy.

Rodolph in Burgundy, and LOUIS in Arles.

For two whole years the parties for Charles and Eudes made War with various success. Eudes being returned from Guyenne drove Charles out of Neustria, but shortly after he got in again by the assistance of the Lords of his party.

Eudes made him work enough, and had no less to do himself, being forced to guard himself as well from his own party, as from his Enemies. Count Gantier, Son of Adelme his paternal Uncle and Count of Laon, drew his Sword upon him in open Parliament; and had afterwards the confidence to take shelter in the City of Laon: but Eudes followed him so close, that not giving him time to to put himself into a posture of defence, he took the Town, and caused his Head to be cut off.

892. Arnold was sometimes on his side, sometimes for his Rival.

and 3. The well meaning French tyred with these discords, during which the Normans took their opportunity to return, contrived I know not what kind of Truce, between the two Kings. It seems Burgundy and Aquitain, Champagne and Picardy were to belong to Endes, all the rest was Charles's.

It troubled Arnold very much that contrary to the custom of France, such Princes who were of Charlemain's Blood but only by the Female side, should dismember the best Portions of his Succession. He goes down therefore into Italy, drives Guy de Spoleta out of all Lombardy, and forces him to retire to Spoleta. But he satisfied himself with that advantage only and went back into Germany. Now this Guy labouring to gather an Army about Spoleta, died of a bloody Flux, say some, though others make him to live a great while longer. However it were, Arnold gained nothing by his Death, for as he was at distance, the Lords conferred the Kingdom upon Lambert his Son, before Berenger his Competitor, who thought to restore his own Title, had time to take his measures. This Lambert was Crowned Emperor, and bare the Title as long as he lived.

In the mean time Arnold attacked Rodolph in Burgundy beyond the Jour or Transjourane, and put him to a great deal of trouble: however he could not force him quite out of those Mountains.

The year following he held a Council at the Palace of Tribur, which is betwixt Ottobin and Ments on the other side of the Rhine, and after that a Parliament at Wormes, where King Endes was present, and upon his return Plundered the Baggage belonging to the Ambassadors whom Charles the Simple was sending to Arnold.

In this Assembly Arnold, with the consent of the Lords, which he had very much ado to obtain, got Zuentibold his Bastard Son to be accepted for King of Lorraine. This young Prince embracing Charles's Party, besieged the City of Laon, then esteemed very important because of its advantageous situation upon a Hill: But when he found Endes returned out of Aquitain with his Army, he raised the Siege and turned his back to him.

The Normans began again their Incursions on that unhappy Kingdom with so much the more assurance and facility, as they found Endes backward and careless to suppress them, who indeed was only able to do it, but left them to go on to revenge the inconstancy of the French, who having made him King, would not obey him as he expected and required.

This year Rollo, or Rol one of the most considerable Leaders of those Pyrats after he found he could do nothing in England, where he had tried to Land, being also advertised by a Dream or divine Vision, steered his course towards France, and puts in at the Mouth of the Seine. Perhaps he might be called in by Charles, who turned every Stone to ruin his Rival.

As for the Empire of Italy, Arnold being invited by Pope Formosus, who would revenge himself for the outrages received from the Romans, forced the City of Rome, and having chastised them, was Crowned Emperor: But soon after as he was besieging the Widdow of Guy in the Castle of Fermo, one of his Valets de chambre, whom that subtil woman had corrupted, gave him a Drink which laid him asleep for three whole days, and brought him to be Paralytick for a while.

897. There hap'ned this year a horrible scandal in the Roman Church, Formosus Bishop of Porto, otherwhile degraded and condemned by Pope Nicholas, was elected Pope after Stephannus VI. This was the first example in the Church, and of most pernicious consequence, as we find it now every day, that without any necessity a Bishop is transferr'd to another See, and as one may say, does quit and forsake his first wife, to marry another. But after his death, Pope Stephen VII. his Successor, caused him to be taken out of his Grave, and having placed him in the Papal Chair dressed up in his Pontifical Ornaments, reproved and told him that thorough his ambition he had violated the orders of the Church, then condemned him as if he had been living, disrobed him of his Ornaments, cut off those three fingers with which he gave his Benediction, and caused him to be thrown into the River Tiber with a stone about his neck.

898. The enterprizes, surprisings and ren-counters, between Charles and Endes, ended by the death of the latter, which hapned the 3d. of January An. 898. about the end of the 36th of his Age, and the 8th. of his Reign. At his death he very earnestly earnestly desired and enjoyed his Brother Robert and the other Lords to own and acknowledge King Charles, whom he hoped they should find a Prince as much deserving for his Vertues, as his Birth to Rule over them. He left but one Son by his Queen Theodorade, named Arnold, who took the Title of King of Aquitain: But death soon snatcht the Crown from him before he was married, or, as I believe, of Age enough to be so.

The loss of the Kingdom of Lorraine did much displease the French; wherefore Charles to gain their esteem endeavoured to recover it. The rebellion of Duke Reinier who had been the Favourite of Zuendibold, and whom that Prince had driven out of his Country, did facilitate the means, he therefore passed the Meuse, with a great deal of company. Zuendibold betakes himself to flight, but soon after all his Lords coming to him, he pursues him in his turn; and there had been a Battel if the Lords on either Part had not procured a Truce between them.

Soon after an Assembly was held in the Abbey of Gorze nigh Mets, which confirmed a Peace between Charles, Arnold and Zuendibold.

Towards the end of the year Arnold died, having Reigned twelve years since the Death of his Father Charles the Fat; And held the Empire only two years and a half.

He had divers Children by three several women; amongst others Zuentibold, and Arnold the Bad, by two Concubines, and Louis by a lawful Wife. This last was but eight years old when his Father died.

The German Princes immediately Crowned Louis, and committed his person to the care and Guardian-ship of Orto Duke of Saxony who was married to his Sister, and Arch-Bishop Haton, as they did the conduct of his Army to Lutpold or Leopold, Duke of the Eastern Frontiers of Bavaria. From whom some make the House of Bavaria to be derived.

The Dominions of Louis were soon enlarged by the death of Zuentibold who behaving himself with much irregularity and little justice, and making his chief exercise the divertisement with women, and taking counsel only of the lowest and meanest People, gave the Lords of Lorraine just cause to forsake him to submit themselves to Louis. Those that had the Government of this young Prince brought him purposely to Thionville where they put the Crown upon his Head: and Zuentibold endeavouring to revenge it, was slain in a Battel fought between them, the 3d. day of August in this year 900. He Reigned five years.

In the War which Arnold Earl of Flanders made against Hebert Earl of Vernandois, Endes had favoured Hebert, and King Charles took part with Arnold to whom he was in some sort obliged for what he enjoy'd. Now Endes being dead, Hebert who was subtil and insinuating, found means to make friends with Charles, and got into so much credit with him, that this simple and un-knowing King, took the City of Arras from Baldwin, and gave it to Count Altmar, that he might restore Peronne to Hebert.

Baldwin or Baudouin coming to the King, to beseech him to let him have his Town again was denied with rough language. Now Fulk Arch-Bishop of Reims, great both by birth and merit, was then chief Counsellor to Charles, and holding the Abbey of Saint Vaast, had excommunicated Baldwin, for invading the Lands thereof: Wherefore Winomach Lord of the Island, Vassal to the Count, imputing the affront his Lord had received to the Counsel of this Arch-Bishop, way-laid him in a Wood and murdered him; for which being pursued and excommunicated by all the Bishops, made his escape into England, where he was eaten up with Lice.

It seems this was an Epidemical distemper in those days; For we find divers persons in History that died thereof, amongst others Arnold the Emperor the preceding year, and King Rodolph of whom we shall hereafter make mention.

900. The Hungarians began to make themselves known about the latter end of the Reign of Charles the Fatt. They then seated themselves in Pannonia, having chased out the Huns; and from thence became a Scurge to all the Provinces beyond the Rhine and the Danube, as the Normans were to all on this side. They were Originally a People of Scythia, Brutish and Barbarous beyond all imagination. Their Mothers trained them to inhumanity from their Birth, gashing and mangling their Faces that they might have nothing of humane; and by swallowing down blood mixed with their own tears before they sucked their first Milk, they might grow Blood-thirsty, and pitty-less to all mankind. They caroused in blood, and fed upon raw flesh, cut the hearts of those they took Prisoners in quarters, and swallowed the goblets reeking warm, had no faith, nor truth, nor honour, no wit but to defraud and contrive mischief, always a turbulent and furious courage either against an Enemy or against one another. The women were yet worse than the men. They had scarcely any other weapons besides Arrows, but were so dextrous in the use of them, that every one they shot did some execution, and every wound almost was Mortal. They were all Horsemen, very serviceable in flat and open Countries, who would notably harrafs an Army within their Bow-shot, but useless in Mountainous or Woody places, or for Sieges; Nor indeed would they ever adventure to come to handy-blows, but ever made a running Fight.

* You must mistake this Zuentibold, for the Son of Arnold.

King Arnold had brought them in to fall upon the back of Zuentibold * a Slavonian Prince, who would have usurped Moravia and make himself King. He being dead, they were not afraid to fall upon the Countries belonging to Louis his Son; And this year they gained a great victory against his Forces near the City of Augsburgh, and afterwards Plundered Bavaria, Swaben, Franconia and Saxony.

901. The year following having good information of the Civil War betwixt Berenger and Louis the Son of Boson they marched into Italy. The Italians An. 899. tired with the Government of Berenger, and above all with Adebert Marquis of Tuscany Father of another Berenger who was likewise King of Italy, had called in Louis: But Berenger I. had made himself so strong with the assistance of Adebert Marquis of Tuscany, that he hemm'd him in and forced him to a promise he would renounce the Kingdom, upon condition he would give him free liberty to march home again without farther lett or molestation.

902. The oaths of ambitious Princes are as frail and short liv'd as the vows and promises of Lovers: the same Adelbert who had supported Berenger's cause, turning Coat, and soliciting Louis to return thither again, that un-advised Prince confides in Faithless men. But he had time to repent at leisure. For they delivered him up to Berenger, who deprived him both of his Empire and his sight. That done he forced the Pope (it was John IX.) to Crown him Emperor, but so soon as he was gone from Rome, the Pope sent for Lambert, who was then private in some corner of Italy, and Crowned him. Which was confirmed by a grand Council held at Ravenna.

Empp. Leo VI. and Lambert. 902.

Berenger Governed 22 years, we might say happily enough, had it not been for the incursions of the Bulgarians. In the Month of August this same year, they again entered Italy with a numerous Army, and having ranfack'd the Territory of Aquilea, Verona, Coma and Bergamo, came at last towards Pavia, Berenger mean while had got his Forces together: When they saw his numbers three times more than they expected, they endeavoured to make a retreat; and when he followed and pursued them so close that they could not get off without fighting, they profer'd him all their Plunder and their own Baggage. The Italians would hear of nothing less than to have them all upon discretion. Necessity converted their fear into fury and despair; the Hungarians now attaque their pursuers, and cut their Army all in pieces. And Lombardy did afterwards become their prey: Nor did they attempt to drive them thence but with their money: a Bait so sweet that it allured them to return again often.

In the year 903. a Star appeared near the Pole-Artick, which darted from the North-North-East, towards the South-West, a long Train resembling a Lance, which passing between the Signs of the Lyon and the Twinns, crossed the Zodiac. It was seen for three and twenty days.

For seven or eight years together there was nothing so remarkable as the cruel incursions of the Normans. An. 903. Heric and Haric two of their Captains burnt the Castle of Tours, and Saint Martin's Church.

An. 905. Rodolph and Gerlon two other Commanders of the same Nation took the City of Rouen upon composition, and there settled their Habitation, fortifying the Castles that were near them.

From thence for five years space they made Incursions into all the neighbouring Provinces, conquered Constantine, and inhabited it, sacked all Picardy, Artois, Champagne, and the Country of Meffin, often frightened Paris, covered the Seine, the Marne and the Loire with the Ashes of those Cities they consumed by Fire near those Streams, and beat the French every where; excepting at Chartres from whence they were repulged by the protection of the Holy Virgin, and the courage of Bishop Gosselme, and at Tonnerre, where one of their Parties was defeated by Richard Duke of Burgundy.

The foregoing year Lambert was killed by treachery, as he was taking his pleasure in hunting, by Hugo Earl of Milan. The Western Empire remained vacant till the year 915. When Berenger was again Crowned by Pope John X.

We may here place the Birth of the Kingdom of Arragon, because about this time Sancho Abacca I. having extended his Kingdom of Navarre, or Territory of Pampeluna, towards Huesca, and conquered all the rest of the Province of Arragon, besides the Earldom of the same name which held already of him, took the Title of King of Pampeluna and Arragon.

In An. 911. hapned the Death of two Kings, Rodolph of Burgundy beyond the Jour, and Louis King of Germany. The first left Rodolph II. his Son for Successor. The second being only 19 or 20 years of age, had only two Daughters Placidia or Plesance, and Matilda, who for Husbands had Conrad Duke of Franconia, and Henry the Bird-Catcher Duke of Saxony and Son of Duke Otho. The Lords of Lewis's Kingdom intending to bestow the Crown upon this Otho, he excused himself upon the Score of his great Age, and generously advised them to Elect Conrad Duke of Franconia, though he had been his Enemy.

Rollo the great Captain did by little and little make himself familiar and friendly with Franco Arch-Bishop of Rouen. Upon his intreaties he had twice or thrice granted a Truce. The design of that vertuous Prelat was to convert him, Rollo's was to attain the Sovereignty, and of the head of those Pirats become a Legal Prince. The French Lords had much ado to suffer such a Stranger to be settled thus in the best Country of the Kingdom: But the People so long and often tormented by their plundrings and continued disturbance, cried out to them to put a period to their miseries. Besides Robert Earl of Paris, who aspired to the Monarchy, desired he might remain in that Station, to have his assistance in time of need. For these reasons, Charles made a Truce with him, during which he propounded to him, to give him in propriety, and with the Title of a Dutchy, that part of Neustria between the Sea, the River of Seine and the Epte which falls into the Seine; with his Daughter Gisèle in marriage, if he would be converted and embrace Christianity.

912. Upon these conditions Rollo was Catechised, and received holy Baptism upon Easter-Eve An. 912. Earl Robert was his God-Father and named him. After this he went and did homage to the King for the Lands he gave him, and then wedded the Princess his Daughter, but she lived only a short time with him, and brought him no Children.

Thus this Province which the Romans called Lugdunensis Secunda, was dismembered from the propriety of the Kings of France; But not from their Sovereignty: and according to the name of it's new Inhabitants took that of Nor-mandy.

As this was granted to them, because they knew not how to drive them out, so for the same reason they were released of the Homage, and dependance of Bretagne, because they were indeed Masters of it, and pillag'd it when ever they pleased: And withal by this means it was reduced to the Sovereignty of the Crown, by subjecting it under a Duke that held it of the King.

913. The year following Rollo failed not to demand Homage of the Bretons with his Sword in hand. Duke *Alain Rebre or the Great had been dead six years and left his Children very young. Those that govern'd them, rather then let them degenerate from their Sovereignty, carried them out of the Country with some of the greatest Nobility. And since that we find no mention of them in History*. Count Porhouet, named Mathued, who had married a Daughter of Alain's the Grand, went into England with his Wife. Berenger Earl of Remes and Alain de Dol having defended themselves the best they could, were at last constrained to bow the Knee before the Normans and shake hands with them.

There were besides in divers other parts of France, especially in Bretagne, Anjou and the Country of Maine, and the Islands in the River Loire numbers of these people; but in time, following the example of Rollo, they took Habitations, and Naturalized themselves French, but not without first doing a vast deal of mischief; and for a long while after, the settlement of these drew in fresh swarms from Denmark and Sweden, who were no less ravenous and cruel, though not so formidable as the first.

913. and 14. All the Grandeens of Germany were not satisfied with the Election of Conrad. Arnold Duke of Bavaria Proud for having vanquished the Hungarians in his Dutchy, rose up against him with design to make himself King: and not being able to compass it, pretended to stickle that Charles might have it.

915. That King had it ever in his thoughts to Sieze again upon the Kingdom of Lorraine. Now meeting this fit juncture, and the assistance of Reiner Count of Ardenne, who was very potent in those Countries, he enters into Lorraine and makes himself Master of part of that Kingdom, whereof he made him Governor with the Quality of a Duke.

916. Duke Rollo had repudiated Pope Daughter of the Earl of Bayeux to marry the Daughter of Charles the Bald; that Princess being dead, he takes his former wife again, by whom he had two Children William and Gerlose or Gerloc.

916. Henry Duke of Saxony rebels against Conrad, gains a Battel over Everard his Lieutenant, and gives chase to Conrad himself; whilst on the other side, the Hungarians over-run even to Alsace, burning the City of Bale, and can have no stop put to them but by Sums of Money, which Conrad is forced to give them.

917. An. 917. Died Rollo first Duke of Normandy, for ever renowned for that severe justice and exact policy he established within his Dominions; Where the very mention of his name is able to this day to stop the Progress of Villians, and bring those that are such before the judgment Seat. Some put off his death to the year 924. his Son William, afterwards surnamed Long-Sword, Succeeded him; And undertook his Tuition.

918. The following year hapned the Death of Baldwin the Bald Earl of Flanders. His Eldest Son, Arnold the Fatt Inherited his Earldom; Adolph the Second Son, the Cities of Terouenne, Boulogne and Saint Omers, but some few years after he died without Children.

Fulk le Roux Earl of Anjou, Son of Ingelger, quickly followed Baldwin, Fulk the Good his Son Succeeded him.

Conrad

Conrad King of Germany went off likewise the same year by a Wound he received in the Bavarian War. Dying he commanded with a more then Royal generosity, Everard his Brother, to carry the Regal Ornaments to Henry Duke of Saxony, though he had always made war against him. Thus he returned the kindness that Otho his Father had shewed in giving him the Crown, and laid down all thoughts of revenge to promote the happiness and safety of his Country which stood in need of a Prince able to defend it against the Incurfions of the Hungarians. This Henry was called the Bird-Catcher, because he was found catching of Birds, when they brought him the news of his Election.

Charles the Simple in France.	Henry the Bird Catcher in Germany.	Rodolph II. in Burgundy Transjurane.	LOUIS in Provence.	Berenger in Italy.
-------------------------------------	--	--	--------------------------	--------------------------

Before Henry was well settled, Charles falls into Lorraine, conquer'd it all as far as Wormes, and compels him to become his Subject for the remainder of that Kingdom.

But the French Lords, who apprehended that if Charles grew too potent and too peaceable, he might take away their Estates which they intended to make Hereditary, stirred up new troubles. Amongst others in Lorraine Gisalbert and Otho Son of Duke Regnier, the first of these had wedded a Daughter of King Henry's, and in France Robert Brother of King Endes who held Intelligence with the Son of Regnier.

These Male-contents being joyned with divers others, during the time the two Kings Henry and Charles were thrusting each other out of Lorraine, did in the end make their Cabal so strong that all Charles's Subjects abandoned him, as had done otherwhile those of Charles the Fatt. The pretence for this general revolt was, that he had a Favorite by name Aganon, who disposed of every thing, wasted the Royal Treasure, and treated the Grandeens of the Kingdom insolently.

However Herve Arch-Bishop of Rheims getting him into his house, found a means to make up the Breach between him and his Subjects, so that they restored his Crown to him, but not his Authority.

921.

For a new broil being started up, because Charles refused the Abbey of Chester to Hugh called the Blanc Son of Robert who pretended to it, for that his Aunt and Mother in Law had enjoy'd it, to bestow it upon Aganon his Favourite: the troubles not only began again, but which was worse, Robert at the Instigation of Gisalbert, having gained a great Party amongst the French Lords, got to be Elected and Crowned King at Rheims by the Arch-Bishop Herve the 20th of June in the year 922.

922.

Charles the Simple. in France.	Robert his rival.	Henry the Bird-Catcher, in Germany.	Rodolph II. in Burgundy Transjurane.	LOUIS in Provence.	Berenger Emperor in Italy.
--------------------------------------	----------------------	---	--	--------------------------	----------------------------------

Upon this news Charles raises his Siege from before the Castle of Capremont, where he held Gisalbert one of his greatest Enemies cooped up. This Gisalbert had once before been stripp'd of all his Estate by this King, and being restored again by Henry his Father in Law, had revolted this second time. Then Charles, who had had the advantage over Henry, changed condition, and became a suppliant to him. Both he and his rival strove to get him first; and by that means confirmed him in the possession of the Kingdom of Lorraine.

However these two competitors had each of them still some share. Charles having raised considerable Forces in that part which he held, came resolutely to find out Robert encamped with his men near Soissons, on this side of the River Aisne, and having passed over unawares, charged him furiously whilst his men were feeding and refreshing themselves. Robert fighting at the head of his Army, was slain with the stroke of a Lance, which honourable deed some Authors bestow upon Charles. Nevertheless Hugh his Son, Earl Hebert of Vermandois and the others Chief Officers of his Party, not only made head against Charles, but gained so upon him, that they had utterly defeated him, had they but followed their pursuit.

This combat hapned the 15th of June, so that Robert Reigned not one whole year. He had married Beatrix daughter of Hebert II. Earl of Vermandois, by whom he had a Son Hugh, whom they surnamed the *Blanc, the Grand, and the Abbot, and one Daughter Emma wedded to Rodolph Duke of Burgundy, Son of Duke Richard who died the year preceding.

The string or knot of Robert's Party was not broken thorough the loss of their Head, but held the firmer united because their danger appeared the greater; Therefore the Lords by the persuasions of Hugh his Son, who found himself not potent enough to be a King, but to make one, Elected Rodolph Duke of Burgundy his Brother in Law, a Noble-man of a brave presence, and a much better judgment, and Crowned him at Saint Medard in Soissons the 13th Day of July.

The French Historians place this Rodolph and Endes before mentioned in the rank of their Kings, and yet they do not put in Robert Brother of Endes, for which there can be no reason assigned but the shortness of his Reign.

Rodolph,

RODOLPH,

King XXXI.

Charles — Rodolph Henry the Rodolph II. LOUIS Berenger, the Simple his rival. Bird-catcher, in Burgundy in Emperor.
in West-France. in Germany. Trans-jurane. Provence.

After the Election of Rodolph, all the world forsook Charles: the Norman assistance which should have come to him, not being able to pass, because his enemies lay betwixt them, rendred him more odious. Having therefore no other refuge, he wrote in a doleful manner to Henry King of Germany, and gave him up Lorraine, upon condition he would help him against these Rebels. The reward was great, and the Act of restoring a King very glorious, Henry did therefore promise he would undertake it with all the power of Germany.

Robert's Party was greatly astonished at this News, they did not know how to ward so dangerous a blow, Hebert Earl of Vermandois draws them out of this difficulty. King Charles believed he had quite taken him off from their interest: But this Traytor, whose Sister Robert had married, having decoyed his King into the Castle of Peronne, whither he was so simple as to let them lead him, detained him Prisoner, and confined him to Chasteau-Thierry, where he was strongly guarded.

Queen Ogina having heard of this detention of her Husband fled to England her own Country, and carried with her the only Son she had by him, named Louis, to wait a better opportunity out of the reach of those who could no way secure their Royalty but by his Death. Saulse Arch-Bishop of Rheims, having had some contest with the Kindred of Hetto his Predecessor, for having taken some Fiefs from them which they held of the Church, was joyned with Hebert's Party to gain their protection, and had made him a promise never to assent to any Election whatsoever but whom he pleased.

During the Reign of Rodolph, of Lewes Transmarine and Lotaire III. there was almost a continual War betwixt the French and the Germans, for the Kingdom of Lorraine; We shall mention only the great events. It is certain that Rodolph reduced a great part thereof to his obedience.

They were fain this year 924. to make a Collection for the Normans, as Charles the Bald had done several times, partly by voluntary contribution, the rest by way of a Tax.

The Duke of Aquitain, William I. of that name the Son of Ebles, did not submit himself so much as he ought to Rodolph, he was obliged to turn his Sword that way. William knowing his resolution, advanced to the River of Loire, which made the bounds of his Dutchy: where after some negotiations he passed the same, and alighting came to Rodolph, who embraced and kissed him sitting on Horse-back, and the next day granted him a Truce for eight: Which being expired the Duke did him Hommage, and in requital had the City of Bourges and Berry restored which Rodolph had taken from him.

The Italians grown weary of Berenger, bestowed the Sovereignty upon Rodolph II. King of Burgundy Trans-jurane. Berenger taking no other counsel but from revenge, was so unhappy as to make a league with the Hungarians, and drew them into Italy. Those Barbarians having sacked Mantona, Brescia and Bergamo, reduced the celebrated and rich City of Pavia Capital of the Kingdom of Lombardy to a heap a heap of ashes. Two hundred of the Citizens escaping the Fire and Captivity redeemed the Walls thereof from the hands of those destroyers for eight Bushels of Silver, which they had raked together out of the Ashes and Rubbish of it's ruins.

924. This money being received the Bulgarians passed the Mountains, and penetrated even into Languedoc. The same Rodolph, and Hugh Count of Vienne followed them and pressed so close upon them, that those Barbarians partly cut off by the Sword, and the rest perishing by the Flux or Dysentery, and want of Food, enriched greatly those Countries with their Spoil which they came to plunder.

925. The year following Berenger struggling to regain the Kingdom of Italy, was slain by his own People at Verona. After his death the Title of Emperor in the West was not conferr'd upon any, at least by the Pope or Italians, till Otho I. An. 962.

By his death the Kingdom remained entirely Rodolph's: but the inconstancy of the Italians, who were ever hunting out one Lord and Master by another, made them resign themselves to Hugh Count of Arles the Son of Brethe, to ridd themselves of Rodolph. Who being informed that they had Treacherously killed Burchar Duke of Svevia, his father in Law, withdrew himself into his own Kingdom of Burgundy, not daring to attempt any thing amongst such wickedly disposed people.

Rodolph King of France. Henry of Germany. Hugh of Italy. Rodolph II. of Burgundy.

926. Every year almost the Normans made Incursions: Besides those that were in Neustria, there were others in Burgundy, and towards Artois; and at all times they were forced to be making head against them, or be in pursuit of them; but they had such sure friends amongst the Grandeas, who would not suffer the Kingdoms grievances to be scann'd, that they ever got away scot-free.

This year Rodolph King of France, having surrounded them in a Wood in the Country of Artois, they made a Furious Salley unawares, in which he was wounded, and had been taken without the timely assistance Count Hebert gave him. Those that held the Islands in the Loire, having been a long time besieged by Hugh and Hebert, defended themselves so stoutly that they gave them the City of Nants for their habitation.

927. Notwithstanding the strickt alliance which seemed to be between King Rodolph and Hebert, the City of Laon, became an occasion of discord between them. Hebert would have it for Otho his Son, and the King desired to keep it to himself. Hebert not able to get it by friendship, had thoughts of gaining it by force. He therefore draws Charles the Simple out of Prison, and carries him to parley with the Normans, who suffer'd his confinement with great impatience, because he had bestow'd upon them the richest Province of France. This menace having effected nothing, for as much as Emma the Wife of Rodolph was obstinately bent to preserve Laon, and had put her self in there, he conducts him to Reims as if designing to reestablish him.

927. Then was the Queen forced to let go her hold, and surrender up the place to Hebert: who being by this means appeased, returned Charles to the Castle of Peronne, and made a new Oath to Rodolph.

928. In the year 928. Hugh King of Italy came into France (we do not find for what reason) King Rodolph went towards Lyonnois to receive him and conferr'd with him.

* A Trench or Moat.
A crew of Normans gotten into Boulenois made a double Foss or Water-graft round about Guifces. Afterwards Arnold Earl of Flanders gave it in Fief to Sigebert Commander of that Fleet: who some time after stole away his daughter Eltrude; but finding he came to besiege him, was in so much dread of his wrath that he hanged himself, and left that Woman great with child of a Son named Adolph, who was since Earl of Guifnes.

929. Sometimes Rodolph, otherwhile Hebert gave hopes of setting the unfortunate Charles the Simple at Liberty, and paid him all the respects due to a Sovereign. Yet only death took him out of their custody, putting a period to his Captivity and unhappiness in the City of Peronne, the 7th Day of October in the Year 929. He was Interred at St. Fourcy's in the same City. His Reign if we reckon from his Coronation Coronation day to that of his imprisonment was 37 years, his life 50. He left but one Son named Louis by his Queen * Ogina, Daughter of Edward King of Ogiva. England.

Rodolph King of France. Henry of Germany. Hugh of Italy. Rodolph II. of Burgundy.

930. Whilst King Rodolph was gone into Aquitain, he had news that the Normans of the Islands in the Loire had adventured to run as far as Limosin: He went and set upon them in the place called Dextricios, we cannot well tell where that was, and so hemm'd them in that not one of them returned. This seasonable victory gained him great esteem amongst the Aquitains, and induced them to acknowledge him with a little more submission.

930. The Regal Authority was in an extreme low Ebbe and feeble condition, the Lords made War upon one another for their under Vassals, and such places as they usurped from each other, and often times attacked their Kings when they refused them certain Lands or Abby's.

Hebert could not agree with Rodolph, because he was his Sovereign, he held a correspondence with all his Enemies, and sought all means to weaken him. The pretence for this quarrel was that Hugh Brother in Law to the King had allured some of his Vassals from him, amongst others Herluin Earl of Monstrueil.

931. There was a rude War betwixt them for five years together, divers places taken, and much Country laid wast. Hebert made use of the assistance of the Lorrainers against him, and had given his Oath to Henry King of Germany. But Rodolph being helped by Hugh the Great, took the City of Rheims which Hebert enjoy'd, because he had caused them to Elect his Son Arch-Bishop, though a Minor destituted Benon Bishop of Chaalons, who had followed Hebert, and besieged him in Laon himself, which he gained upon composition.

Hebert's Insolence being a little abated, Rodolph made a journey into Aquitain and Languedoc, where he received homage of Raymond and Ermengard Gothican Princes (for so was named that part of Languedoc, nearest to the Pyrenean Hills) and of Loup Azeuar Duke of Gascogny, whom, if we credit Flodoard, was mounted upon a Horse one hundred years old, and yet vigorous and lusty.

932. William Duke of Normandy did likewise pay him homage, and in retribution he gave him those Lands the Bretons held on the Sea-side; I believe those were the Bessin and the Constentin.

In Italy King Hugh from the year 929. had obtained the Seignory of the City of Rome, by wedding the lustful Merofia Widdow of Guy Marquits of Tuscany, who then Governed the City and the Holy Chair: but he was soon driven thence by Alberic the Son of that Woman, to whom he had given a Box on the Ear, and retired into Lombardy. Lambert who Succeeded in the Marquisat of Tuscany to Guy his Brother, was likewise Brother by the Mothers-side to King Hugh, for he was Son to Berte his Mother, who in her widdow-hood married the second time to Adelbert Father of Guy and Lambert. Hugh notwithstanding put him to death, and bestowed Tuscany upon Boson his Brother both by Father and mother, who proved as little faithful to him as Lambert.

931. The People were soon distasted with his Government, and recalled King Rodolph. These two Princes being ready to embroil all Italy, their friends contrived an agreement between them, which was such that Rodolph should renounce the Kingdom of Italy, and also should assist Hugh with a certain number of men to preserve it, on condition Hugh should give him la Bresse, Viennois, and all that he held in Provence, with the Title of King of Arles; which by this means was united to the Kingdom of Burgundy Trans-jurane.

The name of the Kingdom of Arles, was not given it because those Kings that enjoy'd it, did ever reside there, nor were ever Crowned there, but because that was so renowned a City as to deserve the Title, having been in the Roman Emperors days, the Capital of seven Provinces of the Gauls, and her Metropolitans Vicars of the Holy Chair.

933. Notwithstanding this agreement, the Italians persisting in their resolution to set aside Hugh, invited Arnold Duke of Bavaria to come and take the Crown. He made way as far as Verona and was well received; but Hugh got good footing there there, and chased him back again into Bavaria. After which to maintain his ground the better, he associated his Son Lotaire to the Crown.

The Acts we find of Louis the Blind King of Provence, makes it appear he was yet alive An. 933. So that there is no colour to mention his death till An.

934. He was then 55 years of Age, and had but one Son named Charles Constantine, who not being at that time out of his Child-hood, the Provençals who then stood in need of a King able to Govern, Elected Hugh Son of Count * Thibault and Be-the, who was Marquis of Provence.

An. 829.

In the mean time the two most potent Lords in France, Hugh le Blanc and Herbert de Vermandois, not being able to agree together made a rough War upon each other, the King favouring Hugh, whose Sister he had married. Henry King of Germany having interposed to make up this Breach, Saint Quintins was restored to Hebert, and his wife Peronne, by a Cessation which ended in a final Peace.

933. 34.

Anno 935. The three Kings of Germany, France, and Burgundy had an interview near the Meuse, to give joyned orders for repressing the cruel incursions of the Bulgarians, who infested the Dominions of all these Princes. This very year having ravaged Lombardy, they were gotten into Burgundy: but when they understood the King of France was marching that way, they returned speedily into Italy.

In this march the same King besieged and took Dijon, which Boson his own Brother had got in his possession. Which I mention only to shew the universal disorders of those Reigns, even amongst the nearest Kindred.

In the year 936 died Ebles Earl of Auvergne and Poitou, and Duke of Aquitain, the Son of Ranulfe and Successor to William, leaving his Estates to William surnamed Teste d'estoupe, or Flaxen-head, his Son.

As likewise Rodolph the King of France left this World the 14th of his Reign and the 15th of January in the City of Auxerre, where he fell sick in the former Autumn of a Phthisis. His Monument is at St. Columbes of Sens. He was a Prince most Liberal, Valiant, Religious, Just, and worthy of better times. His wife died a Twelvemonth before him, and his Brother Boson about a quarter of a year: both Child-less. But they had another Brother called Hugh le Noir, i. e. the Black, who bare the Title of Duke of Burgundy and the surname of Capet.

The same year Henry the Bird-Catcher also ended his days, and in his place the Germans set up Orto his eldest Son, afterwards surnamed the Great.

Church of the 9th Century, or Age.

Never Prince employ'd so much care, and so much Time in regulating all that concerned the advantage and administration of the Church, the Discipline of the Clergy, and Christian manners, as Louis the Debonnaire. In all the Assemblies, hardly any other thing was ever treated of: He and the Grandees of his Kingdom were present in the Councils to approve and subscribe what was ordained; which afterwards he confirmed by his Letters Patents.

At the Council of Aix-la-Chapelle in the year 816. were digested in writing the Form and Method of the Institution of the Ecclesiasticks in CXLV. Articles, and those of Religious Orders in XXVIII. both taken out of the Ancient Councils, and Holy Fathers. After this Council, and in the same place, he made XXIX. Capitulary's, as was the Custom upon the like occasions.

The year following 817. he assembled the Abbots and their Monks in the same place, who made XC. Chapters or Rules for Monastick Discipline: After which Bennet Abbot of Aniane, laboured in the reformation of the Order of St. Bennet, which was much unsettled and shattered.

The Laity were much given to abuse and often murder the Clergy: And for this reason he called a Council at Thionville An. 821. where the Bishops ordained long and tedious penances for such as should commit those crimes. The next year he convoked another at Arigny, and there in imitation of the Example of the Great Theodosius, he would needs voluntarily undergo publick Penance for the Death of Bernard, and those violences he had committed against some other of his Kindred. He also made several Capitulary's for the Government of Church and State.

To the same end, and to find out some way to appease the wrath of God, which appeared visibly in the frequent incursions of the Normans, he gave order An. 828. for the Assembling of four Councils the year following, in four several parts of the Kingdom, at Mentis, Paris, Lyons and Thoulonze, and framed Articles of what they were to consult about. He confirmed the Decrees of all those four in one at Wormes, which was held the same year in presence of some Legats sent by Pope

Gregory

Gregory IV. We have the Acts of that held at Paris, which is the VI. of that name. They are very judicious, and divided into three Books.

He called another Assembly An. 832. in the Abbey of St. Denis, to re-establish the Monastick Orders, and Authorized this Reformation by a Declaration.

We must not amongst these Holy Assemblies place that of Compiègne, where this good Prince was degraded and condemned to wear the Habit of a Penitent. That of St. Denis in the year 834. reconciled him to the Church, and restored him to the Communion. The Council of Thionville did the same thing, and besides that, degraded Ebbon Arch-Bishop of Reims, who had been the Principal Author of that attempt.

To shew his thankfulness to God as well by his works, as his Prayers and Devotion, he caused one to be held at Aix An. 836. where some excellent Decrees were made, which the Fathers sent to Pepin of Aquitain, thereby to admonish him of his Duty towards God, and restrain him from treating the Churches so ill for the future, as he had done. These Decrees were Commented as one may say, and Corroborated with Reasons and Arguments extracted from the Fathers, which was frequently practised by the Councils of those Ages.

It would be too tedious to mention all those that were held during the Reign of Charles the Bald, with all those Capitulary's which were framed for the same purpose of Reformation. We have the Council of Lauriac in Anjou An. 843. that of Thionville and another at Vernon in An. 844. those of Beauvais and Meaux An. 845. that of Paris the year following, to compleat the Regulations which could not be finished in that of Meaux; One at Soissons in 853. and another at Verberie, to digest all that had been Ordained at Soissons; One at Tonziack * in the Bishoprick of Toul, An. 860. composed of the Bishops of fourteen Provinces. One at Soissons, An. 866. One at Troyes the year after, as it were for a supplement to that of Soissons, all these being for the Reformation of Discipline, and Manners. Most of the others were for particular affairs, and yet did often make Canons. That of Mentis in the year 848. where Rabanus Maurus the Arch-Bishop presided, sent back Godefride the Monk * to Hincmar of Reims his Metropolitan; who at the Council of Crecy on the Oise, the same year, caused him to be condemned. This Monk was accused for preaching errors concerning the Doctrines of Predestination, Free-will, and the Redemption by the Blood of Jesus Christ; These questions were debated again An. 853. in the third Council of Valence, which met to prosecute the Bishop of that City for certain Crimes.

The Council of Paris of the year 847. was called for the business of Ebbon of Reims, that of Tours met An. 849. about the enterprise of Neomene, who had given the Bishops of Bretagne a Metropolitan, and had thereby substracted them from the Arch-Bishoprick of Tours. In that of Crecy An. 858. the Bishops depured two of their Assembly to go and make remonstrances to Louis the Germanick, upon his invading the Kingdom of his Brother Charles. There was one at Savonieres, the Suburbs of Toul, An. 859. to make up that Breach. Lotaire the Young convened two at Aix-la-Chapelle, in the year 860. about the business of the Marriage of Thierberge and Lotaire II. and there was likewise a third at Mentis for the same Subject.

In that of Senlis An. 863. Hincmar caused Rouland Bishop of Soissons to be degraded, upon the accusation of a Priest whom Rouland had deposed, for being surprised with a Woman, and Mutilated in those Parts or Members, which are unuseful to a good Ecclesiastick. Rouland appealed to Rome; Pope Nicholas sent word to Hincmar and the Bishops that they should order the Party accused to come to him that he might review his Process; and upon the second Summons he interdicted their saying Mass, till they did obey. But Hincmar who had great Credit in the Gallican Church, stood it out, and caused Guards to be set upon Rouland lest he should slip out of the Kingdom. Nevertheless two years after he went to Rome, and was restored to his Bishoprick by Pope Nicholas.

The same Holy Father ordered Herard Arch-Bishop of Tours to call a Council at Soissons An. 866. (which was the III) to restore Wlfade * and his Companions to their places of Clerks in the Church of Reims, in case Hincmar who had displaced them, refused to do so: That of Troyes in 867. laboured in the same business. There was a Council Verberie in 869. One at Arigny An. 870. and another at Douzy in 871. concerning the affair of the unfortunate Hincmar of Laon. In that of Arigny, was likewise debated the division of the Kingdom of Lotaire I.

and the Rebellion of Carloman Son to the Bald, who was condemned to be kept Prisoner at Senlis. Which was confirmed in another held at Senlis An. 873.

* Perhaps it is truly upon the River of Vesle, Diocess of Reims.

* Thought to be Pont-yon, two Leagues above Vitry.

* The Palace of the Burgundian Kings, about four Leagues from Vienne.

The Council of Donzy * II. An. 874. was against incestuous marriages, and such as invaded any thing belonging to the Church. That of Pontigon * in 876 confirmed the Regulations framed in that of Pavia. Pope John VIII. having escaped out of the Captivity of Lambert Count of Spoleta, and Albert Marquis of Tuscany, while he was in France, called that of Troyes in 878. where he caused the Excommunication he had at Rome thrown upon those persecutors to be approved, as also the Condemnation of Formosus Bishop of Porto, and his Adherents. The Bishops of Burgundy in that of Maintaille * gave the Kingdom to Boson An. 879. There was one at Fimes in Champagne in 881. amongst whose Acts we find an exhortation and advice to King Louis Son of Louis the Stammerer to Govern well. King Arnold had one held at Mets An. 888. That of Valence in Daulphine An. 890. gave the Kingdom of Burgundy Cis-jurane or Arles to Louis the Son of Boson. In the same Kingdom there was one at Vienne two years after, of which some Canons are remaining. The same year that of Reims, where Foulk Successor to Hincmar presided, which ordered comminatory Letters to Baudouin, or Baldwin, Earl of Flanders, who invaded the Propriety belonging to the Churches.

The question about the Worshipping of Images, and that touching Predestination, had like to have divided the Gallican Church. For the first, it is certain there were no Bishops in all France that would have broken them, or rejected the Intercession of Saints, unless Claude de Turin, who was so pelted on all hands, that he could not stand his ground. But many, and those of the most Learned, amongst others Jonas of Orleans and Agobard of Lyons, could not consent or yield, that Images should be adored. In so much that the Emperors Theophilus, and Michael having sent Ambassadors into France An. 825. to consult with the Debonnaire about the means to take away that Schism which divided the Greek Church from the Roman, the Bishops who were Assembled at Paris to confer about it, examined the Sayings of the Fathers with their reasons and opinions on that Subject, whence they did infer that the Worshipping of Images was not to be permitted.

They also wrote Letters conformable thereto, to be sent unto the Pope on this occasion, as well in their own as in the Emperors name, and others likewise for his Holyness to send to the Eastern Emperors. But we do not find that these resolutions had any effect; the Gallican Church hath allowed and received the Worshipping of Images, and hold those of a contrary opinion to be Heretiques.

For the question of Predestination, that made more noise yet. It was Godeschale the Monk a Native of Germany, but who had taken his Frock in the Abbey of Orbais in the Diocess of Soissons, who gave occasion for these Disputes. On his return from a Pilgrimage to Rome passing by Ments, he made out some propositions upon this Subject, which seemed to be hard and Scandalous; he was accused to be damned, as the Elect to be glorified, and therefore as he was the Author of good Actions, so he was likewise the Author of Sin. Those on the other side for him maintained that he held no other then the Doctrine of St. Augustine, St. Gregory, St. Fulgentius, and in fine the whole Church, which is, that God predestinates or Inclining them to Sin.

However it were, Rabanus Maurus Arch-Bishop of Ments, adjudged him guilty of the Error whereof he was accused: but because in condemning him he seemed to contradict that Proposition in General, that God Predestinates to Death, not knowing it was the opinion of St. Fulgentius and authorized by many of the Fathers, Godeschale reproached him that his was contrary to their Sentiments.

There is some likely-hood this Monk did not express himself with all that respect and submission he ought to so great a Prelat; and indeed being cited before the Council of Ments, he presented a Petition containing an accusation against him; The Arch-Bishop call'd him Make-hate and Insolent, and sent him back to Hincmar his Arch-Bishop to give judgment against him.

Hincmar, who of himself had but little mercy, and was besides something evilly disposed against the Monk, because of his too confident proceedings, used great severity towards him. For in the Council of Crecy, he caused him to be condemned for his Incurable obstinacy, and for his having been the cause of trouble, to be deposed from the Order of Priesthood, whipped till he should throw his Writings into a Fire which was kindled near him, then shut up in close imprisonment, where he died at ten or twelve years end.

Writings

He persisted however in his opinions to the last; and Hincmar treating him like one excommunicated deny'd him the Sacraments, even at the time of his dissolution, and Christian Burial after his death.

Now as in the Council of Crecy, that Arch-Bishop had composed four Chapters, wherein he seemed to refute that Proposition of St. Fulgentius, and examine and oppose some others of St. Augustin's; the greatest men of those Times withstood the enterprise. Amongst others St. Prudence Bishop of Troyes, Servais Loup a Priest of Ments, Loup Abbot of Ferrieres, Ratramne a Monk of Corbie; Nay even the Church of Lyons, to whose judgment Hincmar referr'd himself together with all those of the Kingdom of Arles, and his Pastor St. Remy, who for his Doctrine, and Ecclesiastical capacity was to be compared with the ancient Fathers.

Divers Councils were held, and many things written on either side, especially by John Scot for Hincmar, and by Florus for the Church of Lyons: By which, (say the Learned) it appears they were all for St. Augustine, but did not well understand themselves, or explain their own meaning clearly, so that the Errors they charged each other withal lay only in the different Interpretations and Sense of either Party. And indeed the Councils before whom these Controversies were brought wisely suppressed them, declaring that they were to be considered in a more ample manner and sober discussion. Which certainly they would never have done if there had appeared any positive or notorious errors in either Party.

All the mischief of this Storm fell upon two Priests, Godeschale and John Scotus, who suffer'd because they had reflected on the Bishops. The first was handled as is above-mentioned; the other having been mightily baffled and despised, was compelled in the end to forsake the Court and Kingdom: And even after his death was condemned as the Precursor of Berenger, and the Sacramentarians; Rabanus, and Amalarinus Deacon of Treves were likewise censured or blamed in their life time for holding that villainous or filthy opinion of the Stercoranists, which is not to be explained without trespassing on that respect, which is due to the most Sacred of all Mysteries.

The Authority especially was excessively encreased ever since Pepin made use of their interest to obtain the Crown, and Charlemain, after the Pattern of the Visi-Goth Kings, would have affairs both Civil and Ecclesiastical debated in the same Assemblies; where those Bishops being the Principals, often times carried things so as best pleased and served themselves. But the Rebellion of Louis the Debonnaire's Children against their Father, and afterwards the Civil Dissentions ensuing, raised their power to a higher pitch yet, and put them into such a Capacity that they seemed to pretend a Right of Electing Kings, like the Pope, who disposed of the Empire, as if it had been a Benefice depending on him.

It is fit we observe that at the Coronations of Kings, they forgot not their own Interests, nor failed to make them promise solemnly to maintain the Rights of the Church: But we do not find them always so careful and zealous for the good of the People and the Prerogative of the Nobility.

Of those that appeared with most Splendor, some were such as were noted for Intrigues and Factions; and of them were a great number, Ebbon of Reims, Agobard of Lyons, and Bernard de Vienne active in the degrading of Louis the Debonnaire. Ebroin of Poitiers for disposing Aquitain to surrender themselves into the hands of that Emperor, who would bestow it upon Charles his beloved Son. Thietzand de Colen and Gontier de Ments touching the marriage of Valdrade. And Hincmar of Reims for his resisting the Pope, and intermeddling with all affairs both of Church and State, wherein he acted with as much heat as judgment during the Reign of Charles the Bald.

The others were illustrious for their Learning; as the same Agobard, Theodulfe, and Jonas his Successor, Rabanus Maurus of St. Bennets Order and Arch-Bishop of Mentz, Hincmar of Reims who had been Abbot of St. Denis, and the other Hincmar his Nephew, Remy of Lyons, Adon of Vienne, Hilduin Abbot of St. Denis, Loup Abbot of Ferrieres in Gastinois, Henry Monk of St. Germain d'Auxerre, Valafride Strabon Abbot of Richenone, Florus Master of the Church of Lyons, that is a Divine, and John Scot, or Scotus, surnamed Erigena. This last was a great Philosopher, and for the Beauty and Delicacy of his wit, highly cherished by Charles the Bald, even to the lying in his Chamber: But in Theology he passed for one of a raving Brain, whose sentiments were not right and sound.

As

As for Hincmar de Reims, we have his works whereof every one may judge. The other Hincmar his nephew very zealous for the Popes authority collected their Decretal Letters, and was the first that durst put down the names of some Ancient Popes, who till that time had none, but which Isidore Mercator had already gathered together. Other Canonists followed his error, till at length the more judicious found they were but fictitious. Adon de Vienne composed a Martyrology which is yet in being: Hilduin wrote the life of St. Denis the Areopagite by command of Louis the Debonnaire, from the Memoires of Methodius, Patriarch of Constantinople; who to flatter the French endeavour'd to have two things believed, which the Criticks pretend to condemn of false-hood; The one, that this Saint Denis had been Bishop of Paris; the other, that those Writings which go under his name, were his own.

We have the Epistles of Loup de Ferrieres which give a great light in the affairs of those times; And the Monk Henry wrote the Life of Saint Germain de Auxerre in more Elegant Verse than the roughness of that Age could promise.

I shall observe en passant that Latin Poetry began to rouse its self under Charles the Bald, and amongst other Poets that flatter'd him, there was one that made a Piece containing three hundred Hexameters in praise of the Bald, where every word began with the Letter C.

Some for their good lives deserved to be placed in the Catalogue of Saints; as Anscher taken out of the Order of St. Benedict by Louis the Debonnaire, to be the first Arch-Bishop of Hamburg Established by that Emperor, and to Preach to the Danes and Swedes; the same Rabanus whom we have mentioned: Two Andres, one of Sens, the other of Mans; Ayos * de Bourges, Prudence de Troyes, Hildeman de Beauvais, Foulquin and Hunfroy de Teroüanne, Amant de Rodez, and Bernard de Vienne. This last had Adon above-named for Successor both in his Sanctity and his See: But he had very few in that good Christian Maxim, so often in his Mouth, and ever in his Soul: That the Riches and Goods of the Church, are the Patrimony of the Poor; and that a Clergy-man hath no right to them but for his necessities. Nor did he keep any more Domestique Servants but one Priest and one Lay-man; Proclaiming to all Prelats by this noble example; That he who is great in himself, hath no need of other Equipage, or Train of Servants to make him appear so.

Saints.

Of all the French Lords Hugh le Blanc Earl of Paris and Orleans Duke of France, and Brother in Law to the late King, had the greatest Authority in the Kingdom: He durst not however take the Crown, because Hebert Earl of Vermandois and Giselbert Duke of Lorraine, two very potent Enemies would have broke his Measures. He found it therefore more safe to make a King of the Blood of Charlemaine, who should be wholly obliged to him for his Crown.

To this purpose he dispatched a Famous Deputation of Prelats and Lords, whereof William Arch-Bishop of Sens was the Chief, into England, to beseech Ogina the Widdow of Charles the Simple, to bring back her Son Louis, whom the French desired to own for their King. She granted their request, but not without great opposition of King Aldestan her Brother: He apprehended his Nephew might be destroy'd by some treachery as his Father had been; and therefore would would not be satisfied with only their Oaths, but took Hostages besides. Hugh and the other Lords came to receive their King at his Landing at Bullogne, tender'd their Hommage on the Strand, and thence conducted him to Laon where he was Anointed by Arnold Arch-Bishop of Reims the 20th day of June.

936. Immediately after his Coronation, Hugh who still retained the Administration of the Kingdom, carried him into the Dutchy of Burgundy for his own ends, for there were some pretences, but how grounded we do not well know; And Hugh le Noir appropriated it to himself as Heir of the Deceased Rodolph his Brother, who had it from Richard his Father, on whom Boson had bestowed it when he was made King of Burgundy. Le Noir, or (the Black) had therefore Seized on the City of Langres after the Decease of King Rodolph, but the new King and Hugh thrust him out again without striking one blow, and engaged him to yeild up one half of the Dutchy to Hugh le Blanc or the White.

An. 937. King Rodolph died, having Reigned 25 years in Burgundy Transjurane, and only five in the Kingdom of Arles. He left three Children, Conrade who Succeeded him, but whom Otho Seized upon and detained fourteen years: Burchard Bishop of Lausanne; and Adeleis a most illustrious Princess, who by her first marriage was Wife to Lotaire King of Italy, and at her second to the Emperor Otho I.

937. The second year of his Reign Lewis Transmarine took the Government in hand, and sent for the Queen his Mother to come to Laon to have the Benefit of her Counsel. To settle his Authority the better, he first began with some petty Rebels by little and little, then falls upon Hebert himself whom he thought the more easily to overcome because he was grown odious for his Treachery against Charles the Simple. And indeed he gained some places very quickly: But Hugh fearing they would set upon him likewise joyned with Hebert, who was besides his Uncle by the Mother; And because he judged there would be little security in a person that had broke his Faith, he armed himself likewise with the Alliance of King Otho by Wedding his Daughter, named Havida*.

* Havide, Havide, Hadnige, Avoy.

938. The King on his side fortified himself in a more strict Union with Arnold Earl of Flanders a Mortal Enemy to Hugh, Artold Arch-Bishop of Reims, Hugh le Noir Brother of the Defunct King Rodolph, and some others: but this year Giselbert Duke of Lorraine, being come to the assistance of Hugh the Great his Brother in Law, Arnold and the Noir negotiated a Truce till the first day of January of the following year, between the King and that Duke.

As soon as that was expired the War began afresh. Whilst the King was in Burgundy, to divide it with the Noir, Hugh le Blanc, Hebert & William Duke of Normandy, over-ran and Burnt the Territory's of Arnold. The Bishops censures had not power enough to stop them: but the Kings Return gave them more cause of dread, and made them renew the Truce to the Month of June.

Henry the younger Brother of Otho fancied to himself that the Kingdom of Germany belonged to him, he being Born when his Father was a King, whereas Otho came into the World before he was so. Giselbert very powerful in Lorraine, and who had married Gerberge Sister to these two Princes, instead of behaving himself as a Mediator between them, takes part with the Younger.

These two Brothers in Law thus Leagued, sent to King Louis to put themselves under his obedience; After which Otho having beaten and forced them at a passage over the Rhine, the despair they were under made Giselbert and some other Lorrain Lords, come even to Laon to do him Hommage.

Louis wanted but very little of having the whole Kingdom of Lorraine surrender to him; he got into Alsace and was well received every where: But when he came to treat those as conquered people, who had voluntarily submitted to him, it soon alienated their affections.

939. Mean time Hugh the Great, Hebert, William Duke of Normandy, and even Arnold

Arnold of Flanders not thinking it expedient for themselves that King Lewis should make himself so potent, re-allied themselves with Otho; who having quitted the Siege of Capremont, which was Giselbert's impregnable Fortrefs, and joyned with them, easily drove Louis out of Alsacia, then laid Siege before Brisac, a place very considerable in those days, and where they shewed notable Fears of Arms.

Whilst Otho was at this Siege, a party of his, especially the Clergy abandoned him. But Giselbert and Everard were defeated by his men at their passage over the Rhine near Andernac, where the last remained dead on the spot, and the other that had been the Fire-brand, of all these Wars, was drowned. This unhoped for advantage, having ruined Henry's Party, he grew wise, and timely yielded himself up to the discretion of his Brother; who sent him away Prisoner for some time. In the interim Brisac surrendred and all Lorrain was his, the Government whereof he bestowed upon Henry himself, and soon after upon Count Otho.

The year following King Louis thinking to strengthen himself on that hand, or perhaps gain Vassals and Friends amongst the Lorrainers, married that Kings Sister Gerberge, the Widow of Giselbert by whom she had two Children Regnier & Lambert.

Count Hebert of Vermandois had by craft and force got his Son, but ten years of Age, to be nominated Arch-Bishop of Reims: which being contrary to the Rules of the Church, the Clergy placed one Artold in that Episcopal See, who by consequence was an Enemy to Hebert, and a great friend to the King. The contest about this Arch-Bishoprick begot a War, which lasted 18 or 20 years, and greatly molested all Champagne.

This year after, some other inconsiderable actions, Hebert with Earl Hugh, and William Duke of Normandy besieged Reims; The Inhabitants being terrified, forsook Artold and opened their Gates to them. Artold thorough the like fear suffers himself to be persuaded to renounce the Arch-Bishoprick and accept of an Abbey; whereof repenting again, the King embraces his defence, and the quarrel revived again.

From thence the Confederates went and planted the Siege before Laon: but upon the noise of the Kings March, who was returning from Burgundy, they retired towards Otho, and having led him as it were in Triumph to the Palace of Atigny, they put themselves into his protection.

King Louis having refreshed Laon, retires into Burgundy. His strength lay that way, because of Hugh le Noir who together with William Count of Poitiers accompanied him. King Otho having a potent Army, pursued him thither, and struck Hugh le Noir with so much terror, that he made Oath never to employ his Forces more against Hugh le Blanc, nor against Hebert, who were his new Vassals.

The next year Louis notwithstanding besieges Laon, wherein was Count Hebert; but it was to his own great damage; for being surprised in his Legements by his base Subjects, he beheld above one half of his men slain with his own Eyes, and could not save himself but by a shameful flight.

After which forsaken of all his Neustrian Subjects, he took shelter under Charles Constantine Earl of Vienne, his Cousin German, being the Son of Louis the Blind King of Italy and Arles, and a Sister of Queen Orina's. Thence he had recourse to the Pope, the Lords of Aquitain, and to William Duke of Normandy. The Pope sent a Legat to exhort the Lords of Neustria to be faithful to him: those of Aquitain came and tendered him Hommage at Vienne, and profer'd their assistance; And William quitting the Associates treated him magnificently in his City of Rouen, and served him with his Forces, as did likewise the Bretons.

With these Forces he sought all opportunities to fight his Enemies: but they were retreated on this side the Oise, and having broken down all the Bridges would not come to any Engagement. Therefore a Truce was made between them; and by the mediation of King Otho a Peace was concluded, by which Hugh and Hebert submitted to their King.

There was a mortal hatred betwixt William Duke of Normandy, and Arnold Earl of Flanders, because this Last would constrain Herluin Earl of Monstrenil to become his Vassal, and had taken his Castle, whilst William on the contrary had espoused Herluin's quarrel and powerfully assisted him. Arnold not being able to have his will of Herluin, betook himself to base and treacherous means to compass it; For having upon pretence of reconciliation, procured an enter-view with William in an Island on the Somme right against Pequigny, he caused him unhappily to be assassinated the 18th of December An. 942.

That

That good and vertuous Prince had just designed, before he was murdered to take upon him the Habit of St. Bennet in the Monastery of Jumièges, which he had begun to rebuild. He left but one Son named Richard, Born of Sporra his wife who was Daughter of Hebert Count of Senlis; he Succeeded him in his Dukedom.

943. A great part of the Normans were yet Idolaters, and there came every day new flocks of them from the North, who encouraged them in their Superstitions. After the Death of William they rebelled against his Son, and would force him to renounce his Baptism. Hugh the Grand allied to his Father assisted him against those impious revolvers, beat them in several rencounters, and help'd him to destroy their Leaders: their names were Setric and Rodard.

The King knowing that while the Normans were divided, their little Duke Richard might easily be stript, and that it would be a Noble act to recover so great and good a Country, went to Rouen about Autumn, and seized upon Richard's person, under pretence of breeding him in his own Court. The Burg-her's at first took the Alarm, and stood in his defence, so that he was fain to shew him to the people and confirm the Duchy to him: but their first heat being spent, he so managed the business that persuading them he would have a great care of his Education, they suffer'd him to be carry'd away to Laon.

943. When he had gotten him absolutely in his power, Arnold Earl of Flanders whose interest it was to exterminate all the Normans, by his Presents and Counsel, easily inclined him to the resolution of incapacitating him for ever, and resuming the Dukedom. Before they came to the Execution of this, Richard's wife Governor, by name Osmond, craftily drew him out of the Danger; He stole him out of Court, trussed up in a Faggot of Herbs, and conveyed him into Senlis. That City one of the strongest in those days, was then held by Count Bernard Uncle to Richard by his Mother; who kept that Pupil and would not surrender him either to the King, nor to the Normans, till he could see a little more clearly what was like to be the event of that War then threatened.

943. During these stirrs Hebert of Vermandois died at Peronne, (tormented with the gnawing remorse of his treacheries, crying perpetually in his Agonies, We were twelve of us that betrayed King Charles!) He had three Sons, Hebert and Robert who shared his Lands, and Hughes or Hugh pretended Arch-Bishop of Reims.

944. King Lewis, who had that fault that he could not dissemble, adventures rashly too early to ruin them. His precipitate revenge drew great troubles upon him; the other Grantees apprehending the like usage, joyned all to defend them. Even Hugh agreed with the Normans, and King Otho made one, and openly declared against Louis: who for that reason reconciled himself to Hugh.

At first this Duke had embraced the cause of little Richard: but the King promising he should share the Duchy of Normandy with him, and likewise have the Territory's belonging to the Bishopricks of Evreux, Lyseux and Bayeux, he not only abandoned the Pupil, but also joyned with the King to ruin him. They entred the Country therefore at the same time, the King by the way of Rouen, and Hugh towards Evreux. Bernard Count of Senlis, who had saved his Nephew, did likewise preserve his Country by his wonderful Sagacity. He advised the Normans to pretend a submission to the King, to avoid the desolations of a War; and afterwards easily persuaded him to reserve all that rich Province to himself, and take away from Hugh those places which he had conquer'd; so that by this Method he caused a new rupture between those Princes.

944. He afterwards omitted not to make those advantages he had designed: for he engaged the discontented Hugh to undertake once more the protection of Richard, and to promise him his Daughter * Emine, who was not however married till Sixteen years after. And more-over this little Prince being still dispossessed, he so craftily contrived his affairs that he restored him. And thus it was. There was a Chieftaine or Norman King named Aigrold, who being come some years before from Denmark, had taken his Habitation in Constenin: This Prince having consulted with Bernard, revolts against Lewis, and sends to summon him to set the little Richard at Liberty. Upon this news Bernard counterfeiting great zeal, assures the King that all Normandy was united for his service, and by these plausible pretences obliges the King to go thither in person to suppress that Pirat. His Army and Aigrold's being near each other, Aigrold seems to be afraid, and demands a Conference; the King agrees to it, and to that end goes to the Village of Cresten-ville in the mid-way between Caen and Lisieux. The train was so well laid that the the Norman finding himself the stronger, cuts off all that came with him, Seizes upon his person, and sends him Prisoner to Rouen.

In this rencounter Herluin Earl of Monstreuil, the principal subject of the quarrel between the deceased William and Arnold, was slain by Aigrold in revenge for that although he had always been protected by William, nevertheless he had ingrat-fully sided with Arnold to oppress Normandy and it's little Duke. 944.

In vain did Queen Gerberge implore the assistance of King Otho her Brother for the deliverance of her Husband. He refused to apply any other means but only his mediation. By virtue of a plenarie power Signed by the Bishops at his desire and by all the French Lords, he decreed with them at a Conference held at St. Clair sur Epte, That Louis should restore Richard to his Duchy and receive homage, and from that time he should be set at Liberty, and give his second Son and two Bishops for security. But Louis getting out of the hands of the Normans, remained still under the power of Hugh; who upon I know not what pretences detained him at least a year under the guard of Thibault Earl of Blois his Cousin German, and would not let him go till he had gotten the City of Laon of him. 945.

In the mean time King Otho who had conquer'd the County of Burgundy, whether he feared an absolute re-union between the King and his Subjects, or whether the Tears of his Daughter Gerberge and compassion to behold a King so ill treated by his means moved his heart, he roughly refused Hugh who sought his amity, and profer'd Louis his assistance to revenge himself. 946.

Lewis accepted it, and soon after he was out of his imprisonment, went to Otho at Cambresis, where Arnold Earl of Flanders had joyned Forces with him: So that they had together above thirty Legions: And which is remarkable, all these combatants, except the Abbot of Corbie in Saxony, had all Straw-hats, without doubt to defend their heads from blows, or from the cold. 946.

One would imagine such a prodigious Army must overwhelm Hugh and all his Allies: but after they had tried Laon, driven away Arch-Bishop Hugh from Reims, and restored Artold to his See, having shewed themselves before the Gates of Senlis and the Suburbs of Paris, they ran themselves on ground and Shipwrackt against Rouen. The death of Otho's Nephew and a great number of Saxons who were slain there, the autumnal Rains, the approaching Winter, Arnold's desertion who withdrew in the night time with his Forces, apprehending to be delivered up to the Normans, constrained Otho to raise his Siege and retire. 946.

Afterwards Hugh besieged Reims, and King Lewis Monstreuil, held by Rotgar Son of Count Herluin: but both without success. 947.

In August the two Kings Louis, and Otho conferred together on the Kar, or the Cher, concerning their affairs. This River which coming from the Country of Luxembourg falls into the Meuse between Sedan and Mousson, hath ever since made the bounds or separation of the Kingdoms of France and Lorraine as it did heretofore of Neustria and Austrasia.

Anno 947. Italy suffer'd a New change. Auscace and Berenger, one Brother, and the other Son of Adelbert Marquis of Ivrea, having ingratfully conspired against King Hugh, that Prince put Auscace to Death, and Berenger escaped to Herman Duke of Swabia. Now this man having good information that Hugh had rendered himself very odious to the Italians, having founded their affections, repass'd the Alpes. He was received in Verona and in Milan, and seemed welcom to most part of the Nobility. Nevertheless the People moved with pity towards Lothaire the Son of Hugh, a handsome young Prince not above 14 or 15 years old, would have the Title of King to be preserved for him: And Berenger consented for that time the more willingly, because all the Authority was in him. The agreement made, Hugh returned into Provence with his Treasure, where he died the same year. 947.

The dispute for the Arch-Bishoprick of Reims between Hugh of Vermandois and Artold was a mighty business. It was first treated of at Donzy by some Prelats, who who having not power to determine it; referr'd it to a Synodical Assembly of Gallican and German Bishops, which was held at Verdun in the middle of November. Robert Arch-Bishop of Triers presided there. Hugh appeared not, but having sent thither certain Surreptitious Letters from the Pope, which they little valued, the enjoyment of the Arch-Bishoprick was awarded to Artold, and Hugh was excluded for his contumacy, till he should appear before the General Council in the Month of August following, and had purged himself of the crimes imputed to him.

948. Hugh makes complaint to the Pope, who sent a Legat to Otho to injoin him to call a general Council of the Gallicans and Germans to determine this difference, as also to decide the quarrel between King Lewis and Hugh le Blanc. He convoked them at his Royal Palace of Ingelheim; he and King Lewis assisting there and sitting on the same Bench. The Council heard the Kings complaint, and then Artold's Petition. The King declared all the mischiefs Hugh had done him, even to the detaining him a Prisoner a whole year, and offered, if any one could reproach him that the troubles and calamities of the Kingdom were by any fault of his, to justify himself in such manner as the Council should advise, even by personal proof in the Field of Battel. Upon these complaints they wrote Letters to Hugh le Blanc and his adherents, to admonish them to return to their duty, under pain of an Anathema; and doing justice upon the Petition of Artold, they confirmed the Arch-Bishoprick to him, and excommunicated Hugh his competitor, till he duly repented.

With this, Otho assisted Lewis with good Forces, the Lorrain Bishops his Vassals took Moulson and razed it, excommunicated Thibault, who maintained the City of Laon for Hugh, and caused Hugh himself by virtue of the Legats letters to be cited to appear before the Council of Triers, to give satisfaction for the damage he had done the King and the Church. Who not appearing was excommunicated.

949. The War was not abated by this; and divers Castles were taken by the two rivals for the Arch-Bishoprick of Reims as well as by the Kings Forces, and those that belonged to Hugh.

This year hapned the death of Fulk the Good Earl of Anjou, a mighty Religious Prince and a lover of Learning; who being one day informed that the King scoffed at his going so often to Sing in the Quire, wrote only these words to him; Know, Sir, that a Prince without Learning, is a Crowned Ass.

949. The Hungarians being fallen An. 949. upon Lombardy, Berenger compounded with them for eight Bushels of Silver, and upon pretence of railing that money committed violent extortions. About that time Lotaire either out of grief to find himself despised, or by some poyson fell into a Phrensie and died without Children towards the end of the same year. Berenger immediately caused himself to be proclaimed King and was Crowned together with his eldest Son Adelbert.

950. Otho very glad of the disturbances in France, gave slight assistance to Louis, who in the necessity of his affairs, relied much upon him and often went to him, or sent his wife Gerberge. He also made cessations from time to time: In one of which he and Hugh meeting by consent at the Marne, the River between them, they patched up I know not what Peace, upon which Hugh was to surrender up to him a great Tower which he held in the City of Laon.

Peace being made on this side, Lewis takes his progress towards Aquitain to secure himself of the Fidelity of the Lords of that Country. For during these revolutions the Subjects faith was grown so wavering, that often in less then a years time, they swore obedience and fealty to three or four several Kings. Which was indeed, because they would have had none, had it been in their power.

* Ogina. 951. This year 951. Ogina * Mother to King Lewis, Aged above 45 years, went from Loon, where her Son kept her as a Prisoner, and married Hebert of Vermandois Count de Troyes, Son of that Traytor Hebert who made her Husband die in Prison. She thus satisfied her revenge to the prejudice of her honour, or perhaps made that only a cover for her incontinence.

Adeleide the Widow of Lotaire was Beautiful and Charming, she had the City of Pavia in Dowre, and besides great riches and possessions, much credit, and many Friends as well in that Country, as on this side the Mountains, being the Daughter of Rodolph II. and Sister to Conrad Kings of Burgundy. For these reasons Berenger sought to gain her for his Son; but she courageously rejected the proposition. Upon her obstinate refusal he besieges her in Pavia, took her, and sent her Prisoner to the strong Castle of Garda, whence the Lake hath borrowed its name. She notwithstanding made her escape by the help of a Priest, reduced after she was got out, to live upon such Alps as the Priest begg'd for her; Then retired to the Marquis Athon her Kinsman, who undertook to protect her in his Fortrefs of Canossa.

Presently Berenger besieges it with all his Forces. The second year of the siege and the end of their provisions drew near, when that Queen sent to implore the aid of King Otho, and to offer him with her self the Kingdom of Italy. The Love of Honour, more then Love to that Lady, drew this Prince thither: He delivered her, Married her, because he could not otherwise enjoy her, and carried her into Germany, leaving his Army with Conrad Duke of Lorrain to finish that War.

This Conrad prosecuted the War so briskly against Berenger and his Son, that both of them laying down their Arms came to a Conference with him, and thorough his persuasions went both of them into Germany to King Otho; who having treated them magnificently, and taken their Oaths and made them do homage restored to them all that Kingdom, excepting only Veronnois and Friuli, which he bestow'd upon his Brother Henry Duke of Bavaria.

The contest about the Arch-Bishoprick of Reims and some other particular Lordships, had brought King Lewis and Hugh le Blanc again to Daggers-drawing: But Hugh in fine, whatever motive prompted him, desired to confer with Queen Gerberge his wives Sister, who came to meet him; And afterwards treating with the King personally in Soissons, he made Peace about the end of March in this year 953.

This re-union perhaps pleased King Otho but little, but he found himself not in a condition to disturb it. He was too much troubled with the Civil-War made against him by his own Son Luiolf, incited by Conrad Duke of Lorrain, who made him jealous of a Son as yet in the Cradle, which his Father had by Adeleide his second wife. Otho thrust Conrad out of his Dutchy, and at length brought his Son to his duty, not without much hazard fighting and labour.

But Conrad obstinately rebellious turned every stone to be revenged. He made a League with Berenger King of Italy, as ingrateful as perfidious against Otho, and drew the Hungarians in twice; first into Lorrain An. 954. whence they over-run even to Champagne and Burgundy, and having done a world of mischief were beaten back into Italy; the second into Bavaria, where a most dreadful multitude got in together. Yet Otho fought them, and cut them all off, after Conrad had been killed in the scuffle. This was in Anno 955.

During these troubles, in the year 954. King Lewis died by a strange accident. As he was going from Loon to Reims, spurring to ride after a Wolfe which he met in his way, his Horse stumbled, and threw him so rudely on the ground that he was bruised all over. These bruises turned into a kind of Leprosy, which caused his death the 15th of October in the City of Reims, whither he would be carried, and where he lies buried in the Church of St. Remy. His Reign was 18 years, three Months, and his Age 38, or 39, years.

Of

Of five Sons which he had by Gerberge, there were but two remaining, Lotaire and Charles, whereof Lotaire the eldest was about 14 or 15 years old, and Charles but 15 or 16 Months.

The small Age of this last, the poverty of the Kings who had scarce any other Towns in propriety but Reims and Laon, and perhaps the interest of Hugh le Blanc, were the reasons why he did not share the Kingdom with his elder, as had been ever almost the Custom in the first and second Race, or Line. Since this time it was never equally divided amongst the Brothers: the eldest alone hath had the Title of King, and the cadets, or younger have only had some Lands in appennage and under an entire Subjection. And even of these the Kingly power being increased hath taken the Reversion for want of Heirs-males; which hath not a little contributed to restore the Grandeur of the Monarchy.

THE greatest part of the power being in the hands of Hugh, he might have taken the Crown, had he not feared the Forces of King Otho, maternal Uncle to the Sons of the deceased King, and the jealousy of the other French Lords. For these reasons, Queen Gerberge his wives Sister, being come to him to take his Counsel, he chose rather to preserve his Authority by protecting a Widdow and a Minor, then by oppressing them. Having therefore carried Lotaire to Reims, he caused him to be Crowned the 12th of November by the Arch-Bishop Artold.

Upon this occasion the young King gave the Dukedoms of Burgundy and Aquitain to Hugh le Blanc and to Hugh Capet his eldest Son: who being satisfied and the Duke of Normandy likewise for their sakes, it was not difficult to calm the other Lords who were less considerable.

These Dukes in my opinion, were of two sorts in those times; the one held the Cities and Lands, and were become Hereditary; the other were general commands over a whole Kingdom, as well for the Militia as to do Justice, which the Kings could bestow, or take away. So there was a Duke for Lorrain which was Bruno Arch-Bishop of Colen, King Otho's Brother, One for France, one for Aquitain, and one for Burgundy; and Hugh was such in all those three Kingdoms, by consequence he was as the Kings Lieutenant General, and in that quality might be set aside, if his great alliance and the Cities in his possession had not rendered him indestructible.

France was quiet enough three years together, only Hugh An. 955, led the King into Poitou to make William Earl of that Country and Duke of Aquitain become obedient, and laid Siege to Poitiers. Scarcity of provisions and the terror of a Thunder-clap which tore his Tent in two, forced him to raise it; and yet the Count presuming to pursue the French upon their retreat, they turned head and put him to the rout with great slaughter of his Nobility.

Le Blanc.

The following year Hugh, who without a Scepter, had Reigned more then 20 years, being the Son of a King, Father of a King, Uncle to a King, and Brother in Law to three Kings, died in his City of Paris full of years, glory, and riches. He was surnamed the White * from his skin, the Great from his power, or perhaps his bulk; and the Abbot, because he held the Abbeys of St. Denis, St. Germain des Prez, and St. Martin's of Tours. At his death he intreated Richard Duke of Normandy his Son in Law, to be the Protector of his Children and Vassals.

* Harvada and Hadvada.

He had three wives, Rotilda Sister of Lewis the Stammerer, Ethild Daughter of Edward King of England, whose two Sisters were married to Charles the Simple and Orbo, and *Avida, or Avoye Sister of the same Orbo and Queen Gerberge. There came no Children by the first two, but by the third he had Hughes, or Hugh, surnamed Capet, who was Earl of Paris and Orleans, then also Duke of France; Orbo who was Duke of Burgundy after the Death of Gilbert his Father in Law; Eudes or Odon who succeeded him; and Henry who likewise enjoyed it after them.

956. 57. and 58.

These four Sons not being yet in a capacity to make any noise, the eldest not above 16 years of Age, Gerberge governed peaceably enough, excepting some petty quarrels about the Castles belonging to the Arch-Bishoprick of Reims and some private contests.

The worst of it was, that it seemed most of the affairs were managed according to the pleasure and will of King Orbo and Bruno his Brother Arch-Bishop of Colen, and Duke or Governor of Lorraine, so that they became as it were the Moderators and Arbitrators of France.

The Queen being at difference with the Children of Hugh and the Widdow Avoye her Sister, for some Castles which King Lotaire had taken from them in Burgundy, Bruno came into France and brought them to an agreement in a Parliament held at Compiègne. After which the Queen and her Son Lotaire went to keep Easter at Colen with Bruno who entertained them splendidly, and sent them back furnished with very brave Presents.

A while after being called to their assistance against Robert Earl of Troyes, and Count of Chaalons by his wife, who had surprized Dijon, he returned into France with his Lorrainers and regained that place. At the same time he sent some Saxon Forces to Troyes to restore the Bishop whom that Robert had thrust out thence: But Renard Earl of Sens and Rimbauld Arch-Bishop of the same City, friends to Robert gave them Battel and defeated them.

* Curle-beard, or Twist or Twine-beard.

The same year died Alain surnamed Barbe-torte * Duke of Bretagne and Son of Earl Matueda, who left two Bastards, Hoel and Guerec, and one Legitimate Child named Drogon then in his Cradle, whom he declared Heir. Thibauld Earl of Chartres Grand-Father by the Mother to this Child had the Tutition, and the Mother the care of his person. Now marrying again with Fulk Earl of Anjou, this wicked woman unhappily killed him, by causing scalding water to be thrown down upon the Infants head.

The Succession begot a bloody debate in Bretagne which lasted 34 years. The two Bastards of Alain disputed it with one Conan, who was descended by a Daughter from King Salomon: he made them both perish, Hoel by the hands of a Souldier who assassinated him, and Guerec, by a poisoned Lancet wherewith a Chyrurgeon let him Blood. But himself perished at length in a Battel he lost An. 992, against Fulk Earl of Anjou a Capital Enemy of the Bretons. Geofrey the eldest of the four Sons he left succeeded him.

The Children of the Defunct Hugh the White, thorough the persuation of Arch-Bishop Bruno, tendred homage for their Lands to King Lotaire, who in retribution declared the Eldest, Duke of France, as his Father had been, and bestowed Poitou upon him; you must understand if he could conquer it, for it was possessed by another very potent Earl. This is a conjecture that the Kings had not yet given entirely away their power, of bestowing Duchies and Earldoms, and that if they were Hereditary, it was only by Usurpation, not as yet by Concession.

All the new Principalities and Seignories or Lordships which were started up in the Kingdom did not trouble the King so much as that of the Normans, who being strangers and the Issue of those Fathers that had plagued and plundered France 80 years together, should yet enjoy so rich a Province. Wherefore Bruno who governed the affairs of the Kingdom, being excited by the persuasions of Arnold Earl of Flanders, Baldwin his Son, Thibauld Earl of Chartres, and Geofrey Earl of Anjou; combined to ruine Duke Richard. For this purpose he sent for him to come to the Royal Parliament, or General Assembly of Estates at Amiens, putting him in hopes, if he came thither, they would give him the Administration of the Kingdom: But it was with design to seize and send him Prisoner into Germany. Richard who was on his journey, being informed of this Combination by two unknown Cavaliers, returned whence he came and stood more upon his Guard.

He avoided likewise another Snare the King had laid for him near the River of Epte, to which place sending for him to come and do him homage, he meant to lay hold on him. The Duke had already passed the Epte, when the Scouts he had sent forth to discover what the King was doing, brought him word that all his Enemies were about the King, and were making ready to set upon him. By this he understood the meaning of the French, and withdrew in time.

Since Berenger and Adelbert had been restored to the Kingdom of Italy by Orbo, they never ceased to conspire against him, and withal cruelly vexing their Subjects, so that he had sent his Son Luitolf to chastise them. This young Prince had almost hunted them quite out of the Kingdom, when he was surprized by Death An. 958. not without suspicion of poyson, and thus left his Conquest imperfect.

Now the complaints of the Lords and Prelats, and the earnest entreaty of the Pope pressing King Orbo, he resolved to go himself, after he had Crowned his Son Orbo II. at Aix la Chapelle, though he were but seven years of Age.

Upon his Arrival in Italy, Berenger, his Son, and his Wife abandoned the Cities and Country, and retired each of them into a strong Fort. Orbo was there received with universal applause, recovered Pavia, was Crowned King of Lombardy at Milan by the Arch-Bishop, and thence marched to Rome, where he received the Imperial Crown upon Christmase-day by the hands of John XII. who had been put into the Holy Chair by the Credit and Money of his Father Alberic before the Age of 18 years.

This Alberic was the Son of Marosiz, who had chased King Hugh from Rome; after which he had changed the Government there, and made himself Consul that he might command in Chief with a Prefect and some Tribuns.

Now the young Pope who had earnestly desired Orbo to come, quickly changed his mind, and recalled Berenger to Rome as soon as Orbo was gone from thence to reduce the rest of those places which that Tyrant still held. Orbo being informed of this odd fantastical news did not give over his Conquests, then when he thought it seasonable to return to Rome he led his Army thither.

The young Pope being fled with Berenger and the Treasure of the Church, he caused his Procefs to be made, not for his Intrusion, but for Murther, Sacrilege, Adultery, Incest, Simony, and other enormous crimes. For this end he Asssembled a Council, John was cited before them in due form, and not appearing they deposed him, and in his place put Leo, who was the VIII. of that name.

This Pope to avoid the trouble the Cabals caused in Elections, gave the Emperor Orbo the power thenceforward to Elect the Popes and Bishops, and to give him Investiture. The Ecclesiastical History does likewise observe that this John XII. was called Ostavian before his Election, and that he was the first Pope that changed his name.

Whilst Orbo was passing the Christmase Holy-days at Rome with the new Pope, having quartered his Army out of the City: the Faction and money of John the deposed Pope, made the Romans rise to Attaque him Treacherously, he had notice of it time enough to prevent surprize, put himself in the head of his Army and came boldly to them. They were afraid and coming to a composition with him gave several Hostages.

He delivered them up again some few days after upon the entreaties of Leo; but no sooner was he gone to besiege Camerin, but they revolted, drove out Leo, and received John in their City: where he exercised most revengeful cruelty upon Leo's Friends. He had continued it to the end, had he not been killed in the very act of enjoying a Woman. After his death the Romans persisting in their Rebellion Elected the Arch-Deacon Bennet. Immediately Otho returns again, reduces Rome to a Famine, compels Bennet to ask pardon in the Synod of Bishops, and causing him to be degraded of his Priest-hood, sent him Prisoner into Germany, where about a year after he died at Hamburg.

Some months thence believing Italy might remain in Peace, because he had taken Berenger and confined him to Bamberg in Germany, he returned home and marched his Army with him. After his departure some Lombard Counts revolted having Adelbert and Guy the Sons of Berenger at their head: But Duke Burchard whom he sent back overthrew them in a great Battel, which was fought on the Banks of the Po. Guy the most mischievous of them all was left dead upon the place, and Adelbert escaped with much ado.

This last having gathered some Forces together, hazards another Battel An. 968 which loosing he died with grief. And thus with him ended the second Kingdom of Italy, or if you will it passed over the German Princes who let it moulder away and come to nothing.

After Pope Leo VIII. was dead, and that John XIII. had been set in the Chair with the consent of Otho, on whom Leo had bestowed the power of Confirming the Election of Popes: the Prefect, Consuls, Tribuns and other Magistrates of the City of Rome, displeased that Otho had greatly limited their power, which before led all Italy as they pleased, they put this Pope in Prison, then turned him out of Rome, calling to their aid Rofroy Count of Campania.

The Pope retires to Pandolfus Prince of Capoua who restored him, and John his Brother slew Rofroy. In recompence the Pope erects an Arch-Bishoprick at Capoua, and bestowed it on the murderer of his Enemy.

But Otho desiring to remedy things once for all by suppressing these Rebellions, returns to Italy, where he settled his Authority by severe punishments, by rewarding of friends, by creating new Counts, by good and wholesome Laws, and in fine by the conquest of Calabria and Puglia, which he wrested from the Grecian Empire, who had kept them hitherto.

And to compleat all he Crowned his Son Otho at Milan by the hands of the Pope, and joyned him in the Empire. This young Prince three years after, that is to say in An. 971. Married Teophania or Tisaine Daughter of the Emperor Nicephorus who was then dead.

Thus Otho but little inferior to Charlemaine, raised the Western Empire, the Title thereof ever since that time remaining as it were annexed to Germany, with pretences much more great and extensive then their Forces. We shall henceforth speak no more of the affairs of Italy, and little of Germany, unless where things do jointly relate to the French.

During these Transactions, in Italy, divers quarrels were troublesome to France, the two greatest were that about the Arch-Bishoprick of Reims, and the hatred of the Counts Thibault de Chartres and Arnold of Flanders against the Normans. The first might have been ended by restoring Hugh of Vermandois to his Dignity in Reims, Arnold the Arch-Bishop being dead An. 962. if the Queen could have suffer'd it: But far from giving her assent, she so brought it about, that the Council of Soissons refer'd it to the Pope who declared him Excommunicated.

The Brethren of this Hugh furiously Animated against Guibuin Bishop of Chalons, who in that Assembly had proved the chief obstacle against his restoration, Burnt the City.

The Earl of Chartres was supported by the King against the Normans, because he was joyned both by alliance and affection to the Interest of the Sons of Hugh the Great. He lost a Battel in Normandy, for which he received satisfaction by the conquest of Evreux which the King put into his hands, having obtained it by intelligence. Richard followed him close at the heels, and getting into the Country almost as soon as himself made terrible havoc. The Earl of Chartres had his revenge the very same year, carrying Fire and Sword to the very Gates of Rouen: but was rudely repulsed, and lost his Son in the Retreat.

Arnold surnamed the Old, the Fair and the Great, Earl of Flanders died in the year year 965. The Son of Baldwin his Son, named Arnold the Young Succeeded him under the Guardianship of Matilda of Saxony his Mother. This was that Arnold who being come to Age, began to Fortify the Port of Petresfa or Scalus, which then belonged to the Abbey of St. Berthin. It is now named Calais Neighbour to Portus Iccius; in these days, as it is believed, called Blanc Nez, and very Famous in the Romans times, who from thence passed over into Great Britain. He thought to make good use of it against the Normand Pyrats, and because he could not always be on those Coasts, he gave the County of Guines to Adolph Son of Siffroy, who had married the Daughter of Herniculle Earl of Boulogne.

King Lotaire having heard of the Death of Arnold the Old, went immediately into the Country to receive Hommage of the Lords, and took Arras and Doway. As on the other side William Earl of Pontieu, took from that Minor Boulogne and Terouenne, and two of his Sons were Earls, each of one, of those Cities.

The same year Arch-Bishop Bruno being come into France to determine some difference between his Sister Gerberge and King Lotaire with the Children and Widdow of Hugh, was Siezed with a Feaver at Compienne, which he carried to Reims with him and there Died.

Some Authors give him the Title of Arch-Duke of Lorraine, because he commanded all the Dukes and Earls of that Kingdom. And this is the first time that I find that Title in any Authors.

There was before this time a Marquiss and Duke of the higher or Mosellanick Lorrain; which was Gerard, from whom it is held the Lorrain Princes of our days are descended. Some Genealogists derive it from Erchinoald Mayre of the Palace, and from the same stock they make the Austrian Habsburgh-House to spring, with that of Zeringhen, from whence is issued the Princes of Baden.

The King marry's Emme or Emina Daughter of that Lotaire King of Italy Poysoned by Berenger II. and the Queen Adeleida whom the Emperor Otho made his Second Wife; which strengthened the good correspondence between the two Monarchs of France and Germany.

There hapned nothing very observable during these two years, unless it were that in An. 967. King Lotaire gave his Sister Marilda in marriage to Conrad King of Burgundy, and for her Dowre bestowed the City and County of Lyons.

The Earl Thibault supported by the King, went and encamped before Rouen, from whence he could not be forced but by the help of the Infidel Normans, which the King of Denmark of Kin to Richard sent thither, who having made him retreat, ran to the very Gates of Paris.

The ignorance of those times was extream; which is the reason that for want of History, we scarcely find any thing, and must sometimes slip over whole years without mention of any occurrences.

In the year 973. Died the Emperor Otho, very justly surnamed the Great, founder of the German Empire, Subduer of the Hungarians and Sclavonians, and who found out the Method to Quell the Italians Pride, and Chain up their perfidious mutability.

50 years. In

This begot a Bloody and most obstinate War. The two Brothers defeated and slew in a Battel, fought at a Village of Peronne near Binns, the Counts Garnier and Renold: But Otho II. immediately substituted Renauld and Godfrey two Lorrain Lords, whom he invested with the Earldoms of Hainault and Valenciennes. Now after various events the two Brothers assisted by Charles Brother to King Lotaire and Hugh Capet, whose Daughters they afterwards Married, got possession again of those Counties: But it was at soonest not till An. 983.

977.

The Emperor was highly displeased that these two Sons of a Rebel should possess such large and great Feofs in his Kingdom of Lorraine in despite of him; however he dissembled it, having other affairs which would not allow him time to break with King Lotaire.

977.

Which is more whether out of design to oblige him, or rather to put a Barr in his way, he Created Charles his Brother Duke of Lorraine, a young Prince about the Age of 23 or 24 years.

The French had not forgot the remembrance of their Ancient right to Lorraine; And the King, as Son of Gerberge, who of her own held very many great possessions in Capite, expected that Otho his Cousin German would restore some part to him, especially seeing he had given such sweet Morfels to the Bishops of Liege and Colen.

But not doing so, Lotaire undertakes to compel him. He gets unexpectedly into the Country with an Army, takes the Oaths of the Lorrainers in the City of Mets, and from thence marches directly to Aix-la-Chapelle. Otho was diverting himself there very securely with his Family, it wanted not above half an hours time to have surpris'd him: He could do no other, but only just get on Horseback and fly for his safety, leaving his Dinner at the Table, and all his precious Household Furniture in the Palace, which Lotaire plunder'd, and then scowred thorough all the whole Country.

In revenge of this Exploit, the very same year Otho made a great irruption in France with Three-score Thousand men, sack'd all Champagne, and that which is called the Isle of France even to Paris, sending word to Hugh Capet, who being Count of that City had put himself in there, that he would have an Alleluia sung upon Montmartre by so many Clerks it should be heard at Notre-Dame.

* History does
his name.

Those Rodomontado's were not justified by the effects. His *Nephew going in a Bravado to plant his Lance in one of the Gates of Paris, was slain by Gefrey Grise-gonnelle Earl of Anjou; Winter which came on obliged him to retire, and Lotaire and Hugh Capet having drawn their Forces together, cut off all his Reare-Guard at his passage over the River of Aisne, which was overflown, and pursued him fighting to the Ardenes.

The Almain Monks of those days, as it is the Genius of men to pretend Miracles in great danger, write that St. Udalric Bishop of Ausburgh, who accompanied that Emperor in this War, went over the River Aisne dry-foot, leading the way before him and his whole Army who followed, the over-following Stream miraculously growing hard and firm under them, the River becoming a Bridge to it's self.

In this retreat the Earl of Anjou did let the Germans know, that the quarrel being between the two Kings, it would be better according to common right, for them to decide it singly hand to hand, then to spill the Blood of so many innocent people: But the Germans reply'd, that although they did not doubt the courage of their King, nevertheless they would not consent that he should expose his person singly; Confessing tacitely thereby that they did not think him so brave as the King of France.

Otho thus roughly handled, fought an accommodation with the French: Lotaire and he conferring together in the City of Reims, concluded a Peace upon condition, that Lotaire should yield him Lorraine to be held in Feif of the Crown of France, say our Authors; for which the French Lords shewed a great deal of discontent.

978.

Thus the Sovereignty of that Kingdom remained in Lotaire, the Dutchy of the Lower Lorraine, which two years before had been bestowed upon Charles his Brother by Otho, reverted to his disposal: but as he must give some part to Charles, he agreed he should enjoy that also. Which was consented to at an enter-view between that King and Otho upon the River of Kar, the German Prince having desired desired that conference before he undertook this expedition into Italy against the Saracens.

Charles imagining his Brother had yielded him that Dutchy but by compulsion, was so ill advised, that he might have some body to support him in it, as to render Hommage for it to Otho, instead of holding the Sovereignty himself as he might have done.

978.

Two years after, Otho, to oblige him the more, gave him likewise the Country all about Mets, Toul, Verdon, and Nancy and other Lands between the Meuse and the Rhine.

Now this submission tendred by Charles to a Stranger, founded very ill amongst the French, and the Augmentation of his power certainly shock'd the designs of Hugh Capet, who was preparing his way to the Throne. For we must consider that Charles was the only obstacle, Lotaire having but one Son, weak both in Age and understanding, and of very small hopes.

Besides the long abode of that Prince in those Countries without coming into France, the too great affection he shewed for the Germans, who at that time were the Capital Enemies of France, as likewise some ren-counters with the King his Brother; one amongst the rest about the City of Cambray, which he defended against that King who would have plundered the Churches as he had done those of Arras: gave his Enemies occasion to decry him amongst the French.

Upon the News of his Death Lotaire believed that Germany was going to be all in confusion and combustion by reason of the contests about the Guardianship of young Otho, who was then but seven years old: wherefore he entred Lorraine An. 983. to regain it, and took Verdun with Godfrey Earl thereof: but when he understood Otho was Crowned by the consent of all the Grandeas, he engaged no farther, but returned home to France.

Two years after he rendred up the City of Verdun, gave Godfrey his liberty, and caused his Son Louis to be Crowned to Reign with him. He had already married him to a Princess of Aquitain, named Blanche; And yet was at most not above 18 or 19. years of Age.

985.

It is not well known of which Aquitain she was; for in that Age, and the next following, the French comprehended Languedoc and Provence likewise under that name.

This couple were ill-matched, the Woman courageous and gallant, the Husband wanting vigour of mind, and perhaps of Body; in so much that she despised him, and carrying him into her own Country under colour that she could procure the conquest of it by the assistance and interest of her Kindred and Allies she planted him there, and the King his Father was forced to go and fetch him thence again.

This was a great misfortune in the Royal Family, and a greater yet that Lotaire Died the 12th Day of March in the following year of some desperate morfel, given him by his own wife.

987.

He was a Warlike Prince, active, careful of his affairs, and worthy in fine to have commanded better Subjects. He survived little more then the 45th year of his Age, and the 33th of his Reign.

LOUIS the OTHO III. CONRAD.
Do-Nothing in France.

986.

IT was divulged that at his Death he left the Guardianship of his Son to Hugh Capet, who in effect was his Cousin German. How-ever it were, Emina not relying too much upon him, as it seems had resolved to carry him in the Month of June to his Grand-mother Adeleida, Widdow of Otho I. and Tutorefs of Otho III. A Heroick Princess who was called the Mother of Kings.

But they did not give her the time : for the 22th of the same month, the Poor Prince ended his Life in the same manner as his Father, and by the crime of Blanche of Aquitain his wife. He lieth at St. Corneille of Compiene. An Author of those times sayes that he gave his Kingdom to Hugh Capet ; another, that he bequeathed it to his wife, upon condition he should marry her.

He Reigned in all about three years, Eighteen or Twenty Months with his Father, and sixteen Months alone.

(With his Reign ended that of the Carlian or Carlovingnian Line, after it had lasted 236 years, and had a Succesſion of Eleven Kings* taking only those of West-France; for if we reckon all the others, we shall find above thirty, without speaking of all those Princes who dismembred this Kingdom, as being illued of this August blood descended by Women.)

There were sprung up three Branches of this Race, one in Italy by Lotaire I. Emperor, another in Germany by Lewis his Brother, named the Germanick, and a third in West-France by Charles the Bald. All three ended their Reigns with

* Or Caroline.
* There were two of these that were not so, to wit, Eng-des and Rodolph.

with a Louis, that of Italy by Louis II. great Grand-Son of Lotaire, that of Germany by Louis Son of Arnold, and that of France by this Lewis the Faineant.

The Princes of this Race at their Coronation, received the Sacred Unction. They were almost ever on Horse-back and in the Field, and had their wives with them. Charles Martel and Pepin, when they were at rest and peace, held their residence at Paris and thereabout, Charlemain at Aix-la-Chapelle, the Debonnaire in the same place, or at Thionville, Charles the Bald at Soissons and at Compiene, Endes at Paris, Charles the Simple at Reims, Lewis Transmarine at Laon.

If we consider the causes of the ruine of this Race or Line, we shall meet with five or six principal ones. 1. The division of the main Body of the Estate into divers Kingdoms, which was necessarily followed by Discords and Civil-Warres between the Brothers. 2. The irregular Love the Debonnaire had for his too dear Son Charles the Bald. 3. The imbecillity of most part of these Princes, there not having been amongst all of them above five or six who were furnished with Sence and Courage together. 4. The ravages and inroads of the Normans who ransacked France for Four-score years together, and favoured the attempts of the great Lords. 5. The multitude of Bastard Children which Charlemaine had, who plaid the Sovereigns in those Countries allotted them for their subsistance. 6. And if we will believe the Clergy, the Curse of God, which fell upon those Princes, because they gave the Churches goods to their Lay-officers and their Soldiers of Fortune.

7. One may add that this Tree bearing no more good Fruit, God would pluck it up to plant another in its place, infinitely more fair and more fertile, whose duration shall be extended to the end of time, and it's renown and glory to the ends of all the Earth.

THE THIRD RACE OF LINE Of the KINGS of
FRANCE,
 Called the Capetine Race, or of the Capets.

First Part.

Hugh Capet, King XXXV.

POPES,

JOHN XV. S. Eight years and an half during this Reign.

996. S. Two years eight months, whereof some months under this Reign.

GREGORY V. Elected in June

HUGH CAPET, Aged Forty four or Forty five years.

* Hugues.

There was none of the Carolovian Race remaining but Charles Duke of Lorrain. This Prince was abient, of little Merit, and very ill in the minds of the French. Hugh Capet on the contrary was in the heart of the Kingdom, Powerful and Esteemed; He held the Dutchy of Burgundy by Henry his Brother, that of Normandy by Duke Richard his Nephew, and that of France, with the Counties of Paris and Orleance in his own hands. Besides he had a Party made; so that having Assembled the Lords in the City of Noyon, he prevailed to be Elected and Proclaimed King about the end of the month of May. From thence he went to Reims to receive the unction and the Crown from the hands of the Archbishop Adalberon, who invested him the Third of July; Not one of all those that were present at Noyon, and at that Ceremony claiming for Charles, but on the contrary all giving their Oaths in Writing as well as by Word of Mouth to his Enemy.

One might say, that this poor Prince had destituted, or deprived himself, by rendering himself a Stranger, and that this Estate could not suffer or admit a Head that was Vassal to another King. Hugh might also make use of the Testament which King

Lewis made in his favour : but his best Right and Title was the general consent of the French People.

After his being first Crowned, he never put the Crown more upon his Head during his whole life time, because it having been predicted to him by Divine Revelation, That his Race should hold the Kingdom for seven Generations, he thought to prolong that Honour one Degree more, by not wearing himself the Regal Ornaments, that so he might not be reckoned one of the seven. He did not know the number seven in Sacred Language, signifies an extent to all Ages.

You must observe, that from about the time of Charles the Simple, under the name of the Kingdom of France were comprehended that of Neustria, that of Aquitain, and that of Burgundy, at least that part of it which lies on this side the Saon ; and therefore when those Kings would be Crowned, they were fain to call together the Lords of all these three. For this reason perhaps it was, that the first Capetine Kings having joyned them all under one Title, took likewise upon them the Quality of Emperors ; unless we should say, they did so not to seem inferior to the German Kings : but either by some Treaty, or upon some other Condition to us unknown, they quitted it, and contented themselves with that of King.

The same year Geoffrey called Grise-Gonelle, Earl of Anjou, ended his days. His Son Fulk surnamed Nerra was his Successor.

988.

Hugh Capet six months after his Coronation, desiring to have an Assistant, obtained in an Assembly of French Lords, which was held at Orleans, that his Son named Robert, should be Associated in the Throne with him. He was Crowned in the same City the first day of January in the year 988.

HUGH CADET, and ROBERT his Son Aged about Sixteen years.

It is to be presumed, that Prince Charles did not omit to present himself to have or demand the Crown : but being come too late, he was rejected by the French, so that he betook himself to Arms, to resume his pretended Right.

Amongst all the Lords of the Kingdom, there were only Arnold Earl of Flanders, and Hebert Earl of Champagne, his Wives Father, that assisted him : but the first died this year, having been ill handled by Capet, and Hebert durst not proceed to act any farther for his Son-in-Law, but under-hand.

Mean time the young King Robert Married Lugarde the Widow of the Earl of Flanders, though she were already very aged, and he not yet above Seventeen years old.

* Adalberon.

Duke Charles had a Bastard Brother named Arnold, who was a Clerk in the Church of Loan : by his means he seized upon that City and upon the Archbishop Ancelin-Auberon *. This Ancelin was a very subtil Man, but without Faith, who to regain his liberty, pretended to be come wholly his Friend, and wrought so upon his Mind, that he made him the first of his Council.

988.

The new King knowing that Charles was in Laon, came presently to besiege him, resolved to take it by Famine. In the length of the Siege, his Men not standing carefully upon their Guard, Charles made a stout Sally, put them to the rout, burnt their Lodgments, and forced them to retire ; Then made himself Master of Reims and Soissons.

989.

But suffering this heat of good success to grow cool, few People declared for him, and even the Archbishop of Reims whom he importuned to Crown him, told him that he could not do it of his own head, and that it was a publick Business, that is to say, it required the Consent of the Lords of the Kingdom.

* Adalger.

It was greatly Hugh's interest to gain Arnold Bastard Brother of Duke Charles to his Party ; To this end he gives him the Archbishoprick of Reims, which was vacant by the death of Adalberon, having first taken an Oath from him in Writing : but six months after his being in that Town, Charles his Brother was introduced there, and made himself Master by means of a Priest named * Adalger, and in Confederacy, as was thought, with the Archbishop ; who notwithstanding, ever denied it, and remained Prisoner in the hands of Charles, either really or at least pretended.

990.

At the same time William III. Earl of Poitou and Duke of Aquitain refused to acknowledge the two Kings Capet and Robert, though he were Uncle to Robert by the the Mother, openly accusing the French of Perfidiousness, and their having abandoned the Line and Blood of Charlemaine. Both the Kings marched that way to bring him to Obedience, and besieged Poitiers. He repulsed them smartly, pursues them to the Loire ; and there happens a bloody Engagement, but the conclusion was to the Advantage of the French.

The year ensuing this Duke made War upon the Count of Anjou, for Mirebalais and Loudunois, and did so roughly handle him, that in the end he was constrained to acknowledge him and hold them in Fier of him.

Charles living in too great security at Laon, and with too much confidence in Ancelin, King Hugh gained that Traitor ; who like another Judas, upon Holy-Thurs day-night opened the Gates, and delivered the poor Prince and his Wife up to him. He sent them away Prisoners to Senlis, and from thence to Orleans, where they were shut up in a Tower.

991.

The Archbishop Arnold his Brother was taken with him. The Bishops of France Assembled in Council at Reims, made his Process as one that was guilty of Perjury, and who had broken his Faith to King Hugh, and therefore degraded him of his Prelature ; after which the King sent him Prisoner to Orleans to keep his Brother company.

992.

Gerbert a Benedictine Monk, who had been Tutor to the Emperor Otho III. and to King Robert, was chosen in his place. He was so Learned for those times, particularly in the Mathematicks, that it gave him the Reputation of a Magician amongst the ignorant.

Anno 993. William III. Duke of Aquitain made Peace with the King, and owned to hold his Lands of him. But another William Duke of Gascongne kept himself still independent. He it was who having gained a memorable Battle against a Fleet of Normans landed in Gascongne towards the end of this Century, and believing he obtained that Advantage by the intercession of St. Sever, who was said to have appeared that day on a white Horse with glittering Arms fighting against the Barbarians, put his Dukedom under the protection of that glorious Martyr, and Erected a Church and Abby over his Tomb ; round about which Edifice is built that City called St. Sever, Cape of Gascongne.

Many believe, but without any certain proofs, that Hugh Capet confirmed the Inheritance of all the great Estates, Dutchies and Earldoms to those Lords that had usurped them ; and it is probable that they themselves had first given such as depended upon them, to their own Vassals, thereby to engage them to maintain and justify them in their Usurpations.

It is certain he annexed to the Crown, which had scarce any thing left in Propriety, the Earldom of Paris, the Dukedom of France, containing all that is between the Loire and Seine, and the Earldom of Orleans.

Amongst a very great number of Lords who enjoy'd of the Regal Rights, the Eight most considerable were the Dukes of Burgundy, Normandy, Aquitain, and Gascongne, (Bretagne then held of Normandy) the Earls of Flanders, of Champagne and Thoulouze ; This last was likewise Duke of Septimania and Marquis of Gothia ; the Earl of Barcelonna in the Marches of Spain, and the Earl of Anjou on the Frontiers of Bretagne, this held of the Duchy of France. All these Lords had a great many more besides who took upon them to be Sovereigns.

I do not speak of the Estates that were set up in the Kingdom of Lorraine : amongst others the two Duchy's that bare that name, to wit the higher or Mosellanick, which retains it to this day, and the lower which is Brabant ; Nor of those that were framed out of the Ruines of the Kingdom of Arles, and that of Transjurane, as the Earldom of Burgundy, those of Viennois, Provence, and Savoy, Dauphine, the Dukedoms of Zerigben and Alman, and divers others, because those Countries were not of France, but held of the Emperors of Germany, who were Titularies of those two Kingdoms.

The Grandees of the Kingdom thought that Capet ought to suffer all from them, because they had set the Crown upon his Head : His Patience and Courage, which he exercised diversly according as occasion required, kept them from running to extremity, and maintained him in his Throne.

One Adelbert Count de la Marche and Perigord was one of the most unruly, and concerned himself in all their Quarrels. Fulk Nerra had some Pretensions to the City of Tours ; he besieged it in his behalf. The King sent and commanded him to desist ; Adelbert would do nothing ; and asking him, Who was it that made you a Count ? He insolently replied, Those same that made you a King, continued the Siege, and took the Town.

993. This year was memorable for the death of Conrad King of Burgundy, William III. Duke of Aquitain, and Hebert Count of Meaux and Troyes. Conrad left his Estate to his Son Roldolph called the Faineant or Do-nothing, William left his likewise to his Son of his own name, but surnamed Fierabras; and the third dying without Children, to Eudes his Brother, Earl of Chartres and Tours: who was the first that intitled himself Earl of Champagne.

William IV. of that name, Earl of Toulouse and of Arles, turned Monk, and his Son William V. succeeded him.

After the death of the Count of Poitou, his Son being yet but young, found his Country in Combustion, by the Rebellion of many of his Vassals, especially Adelbert who besieged Poitiers, and made divers other Enterprizes: but in the end he met with that fate which attends the Factious, being slain at the Siege of a small Castle. Boson his Fathers Brother succeeded in his Dominions.

994, & 95. The Pope could not suffer their having Deposed the Archbishop Arnold without his Authority, which the Bishops of France believed to be in their own power. He therefore took this Business mightily to heart, and dispatched the Abbot Leon to France, with an order to the Prelates to Assemble in Council about that Affair, and to Sequin Archbishop of Sens, to Represent his Person amongst them.

994. Hugh complained, opposed it, and held good some time against this Enterprize; But a new born Royalty could not but comply and yield at last to those Orders, for fear of being quickly tumbled down again. The Council which was held at Reims deposed Gerbert, and restored Arnold to his See after three years imprisonment. Gerbert withdrew himself to his Disciple King Otho, who bestowed upon him the Archbishoprick of Ravenna, from whence some years after he was raised to the Holy Chair.

994. In the year 994. the unhappy Charles died in Prison at Orleanse. It is not said what became of his Wife, but he left two Sons, Otho and Lewis; and two Daughters, Gerberge and Hermengarde. All these Children went to the Emperor Otho III. The eldest enjoyed the Dutchy of the lower Lorraine some years, and died without Heirs. The other is not mentioned. Hereafter we shall take notice to whom his Daughters were Married.

994, and the following. King Hugh as well as Pepin, and all such Princes as set up by a new Title amongst People that are not perfectly Barbarians, was truly Religious, Devout, and a lover of the Church and Church-men, gave up all the Abbies he held, and surrendered the Right of Election to the Clergy and Monks.

By his Example those Lords that possessed Church-Lands, as their own Patrimony: not only restored them, but for Restitution of their unjust Enjoyment and Detention, founded divers Monasteries which they peopled with reformed Monks: who certainly were much less good and more interested, than the former had been.

996. He ended his Life Anno 996. the 29th of August, or according to others the 22th of November, aged about Fifty five years, having Reigned nine years and some months. He was buried at St. Denis. If he Married Blanche, the Widow of Lewis last Carlovinian King, he had no Children by her: but by his first Wife Adeleide, Daughter, according to some, of William II. Duke of Aquitain, he had a Son named Robert, and three Daughters, Haduige or Avoze Wife of Renier IV. Earl of Monts and of Haynault, Adelain Wife to Renand I. Earl of Nevers, and Gisle who Wedded Hugh I. Earl of Pontieu, to whom she brought the City of Abbeville in Marriage.

996. The same year 996. Richard surnamed Sans Peur, or without Fear, Duke of Normandy, ended his days in his Palace of Fescamp, aged Sixty four years, of which he had Reigned nine, and was Interred before the Portal of the Church there: His Son Richard II. succeeded him.

* Mal des Ardens. About these times, that Sacred Fire which they named the Burning * Sickness, and had otherwhile made great destruction, broke out and kindled again, cruelly tormenting France, especially for two Ages. It seized again on a sudden, and burnt the Intrails, or some other part of the Body, which fell off piece-meal. Happy were those that escaped with the loss of a Leg or an Arm. This caused many great Donatives to be given to those Saints whose help they believed they had received in the midst of their dreadful Torments: as likewise the frequent founding of Hospitals for such as were infected with this Distemper.

The Calamity, which Anno 994. destroyed in Aquitain, Angoumois, Perigord, and Limousin, above 40000 Persons in a few days time, wrought at least this good, that the Grandees who had troubled this Province by their private Feuds, fearing the Wrath of God, made a Solemn Oath amongst themselves, to do Justice to their Subjects, Subjects, and for this end formed a Holy League, which drew other Provinces by their Example to do the like.)

(It was likewise in this Age that Pilgrimages to the Holy Land grew very frequent; I mean amongst the Seculars, for the Monks and Clergy-men travelled to those Holy Places from the time of King Clovis.)

If the Tenth have deserved the name of the Iron Age, which is commonly bestowed upon it, it must have been for the continual and very Bloody Wars, between the Western Princes, and for the terrible Devastations of the Normans, the Hungarians, and the Saracens, but if they called it so for the ignorance and irregularity of their Manners, it was rather in respect to the Church of Rome, where in truth there were horrible Disorders and Crimes, then those of France and Germany.)

It is certain that the Bishops and Abbots notwithstanding the Prohibitions of Princes and Councils bore Arms and went to the Wars; a Custom which passed into a Law and Obligation, and lasted a long time in the third Race; That several were plunged into Vanity, Luxury, and Dissolution, and lived rather like Princes of this World, then Apostles of Jesus Christ; That those Wars which scourged them, made them yet but more worthy of Chastisement, for the Disorders and Licentiousness they fell into; That their Manners run to ruine with their Buildings; and that as there hardly remained any Monastery or Church entire, so there was scarce any Discipline left, not even amongst the very Monks; That, in fine, many Churches were without a Pastor; for example, there was but one Bishop in all the Country of Gascogne, who enjoyed the Revenue of six or seven Bishopricks.

But after all these Ruines, they began, before the middle of this Century, to gather up the broken pieces or fragments, and reform the behaviour of the Clergy, as well as rebuild their Churches. William Duke of Aquitain and Auvergne, having founded the Monastery of Clugny in the year 910. and St. Mayeule having raised, as it were a Nursery of Religious good Men, they took some Plants from thence to stock and furnish those Abbys which the Princes re-edified. This Abbot and Odillon his Successor furnished at least twenty or thirty, who remained still in submission to their common Mother, and formed the Congregation of Clugny. As much did William Abbot of St. Benigne at Dijon; as likewise Abbon de Fleury, to some others about Aquitain; Subordinations which may procure much good, and perhaps much greater evils. St. Gerard of the Blood of the Dukes of Lorraine, having embraced a Monastick Life, reformed Eighteen or twenty. Adalberon Bishop of Metz, Brother to Frederic first Earl of Bar, made a Regulation in those of his Bishoprick, amongst others in that of Gorze, and at St. Arnold, from whence he expelled the Canons who were grown disorderly, to place Monks in their stead.

Abbon de Fleury going to settle his Reformation in the Monasteries of Squires upon the Garonne, which therefore was called the Rule, and in the Language of that Country, La Reoule, and near to which was built a City of that name: was knock'd down by a Sedition which the Gasccon Monks of that place, and the Women had raised against him.

Amongst the Bishops there were divers that were noted for their famous Intriguing and Disorders. In the Wars between the Kings, Henry the Bird-catcher, and Charles the Simple, Hilduin falsifying his Faith, which he owed to Charles, who had given him the Bishoprick of Liege, went and acknowledged Henry, and forced away the Treasures of the Church, which he distributed to that Prince and his Courtiers, to maintain him: but the face of Affairs being changed, Charles would not suffer him to hold that Bishoprick, but bestowed it upon the Abbot Richer, which was confirmed by the Pope. King Henry recompensed Hilduin with the Bishoprick of Milan. Herve de Reims, otherwise a very learned Prelate, was likewise unfaithful to Charles the Simple, whose Chancellor he was, and Crowned Robert Brother to Eudes: but he died within three days after, as if he had been smitten by the avenging hand of God. Sculfe, Hugh, and Arnold his Successors, did all cause many troubles for more than Twenty five years. The Traytor Adalberon de Laon delivered up Prince Charles, who had made him his prime Minister; and Arnold de Reims was contented to owe the Obligation of that Archbishoprick to his Brothers mortal Enemy, and then broke his Faith with him.

It will be difficult to cull out any so excelling in Christian Vertues, as to merit the Titles of Saints; unless we place in this Rank Erembert of Toulouse, Gaubert of Cahors, and Turpin of Limoges. I do not speak of those of Germany; amongst them this Age produced a sufficient number, whose Apostolical Labours and Endeavours converted the Danes, Sclavonians, Hungarians, and other Infidel Nations. But amongst the Monks, we find in Burgundy five Abbots, Bennon, Odon, Mayeule, Odillon and Church of the Tenth Age.

Saints.

and William, the four first of Clugny, the last of St. Benigne, and in Lorrain Gerard, who are respected by the Church.

Books were become mighty scarce, the Wars had almost destroy'd them all by burning, tearing, and other such like barbarities; and as there were none but Monks who Transcribed the Copies, and that Monasteries were much deserted, the numbers of Learned Men were very small. However Herve of Reims about the beginning of this Age, Ruthier de Liege about the middle, and Arnold d' Orleans towards the latter end, made it appear they were not ignorant in the knowledge of Holy Scripture, and the Canons and Usages of the Church. Aymoin a Monk of Fleury, Brocard Abbot of St. Remy of Reims, and Dudon Dean of St. Quentin, wrote of History; and Gerbert passed for a Prodigy of Science. He had been bred young in the Monastery of Orillac, and going into Spain, he was by the Recommendation of Borel Count of Barcelonnette instructed in the Mathematicks, either by Bishop Hutton, or by some Arabian Doctors. He was afterwards Rector or School-master in the City of Reims, (and perhaps he was the first that taught it in France) where for Scholars he had Prince Robert Son of Hugh Capet, Leoterick Archbishop of Sens, and Fulbert Bishop of Chartres; After which he had also the honour to teach Otho III. We know how he was raised to the See of the Church of Reims by Hugh Capet, then to that of Ravenna by Otho, and at length to that of Rome by the name of Silvester II.

As for the Councils of the Gallican Church, the first that I find in this Century, is that of Troisy, Anno 909. Troisy is in the Diocese of Soissons; * and pretty near that City; Herve Archbishop of Reims was President. "Therefore fifteen Chapters, which are as to many warm Exhortations and excellent Sermons, against all the Abuses and enormous Crimes, that had * over-whelmed France, where the weak were become a prey to the stronger, where the Laws were made a snare and burthen by the violence of particular powers; for which reason God had, to the plague of War, added that of Barrenness and Famine, caused by a most horrible Drought."

Anno 921. King Charles the Simple Convoked one or Sixteen Bishops for the business of Hilduin whom he had thrust out of the Bishoprick of Liege. I neither find the Place nor the Acts.

There were three more at Troisy, one in 921. where Erlebaud Earl of Castrice, who had been Excommunicated by the Archbishop Herve for invading what belonged to the Church of Reims, was absolved after his death upon the intreaty of King Charles, by the same Archbishop. Another, Anno 924. wherein Isaac Earl of Cambrai having given satisfaction for some wrongs to Stephen his Bishop, was absolved and reconciled to him. The third, Anno 927. of six Bishops called by Count Hebert of Vermandois, Munze King Rodolph, where Herluin Earl of Montrenil was admitted to Penance for having Married a second Wife, his first being yet alive.

In the year 923. there was one in the Diocese of Reims, the place is not named, which ordained those that had born Arms in the Wars betwixt King Charles and King Robert, to do Penance for three whole Lents, three several years consecutively, and also fifteen days before the Feast of St. John, and fifteen days after it, fasting all the Mondays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays during that space of time, and besides all the Saturdays throughout the whole year with Bread and Water only, unless they bought it off. The first time of this Penance in Lent, they were to stay out of the Church, and at the last to be reconciled upon Holy-Thursdays.

The Council of Duisburgh, Anno 928. Excommunicated the Faction Party of Mets who had put out the Eyes of their Bishop Bennon; after which King Henry the Bird-catcher severely Revenged that villanous act of theirs, and made it fall upon their own heads.

That at the Abby of Cherlieu in 926. and that of Fimes in 935. endeavoured to repair the Desolations of the Holy Places ruined by Robbers and other such wicked People.

The Debate for the Archbishoprick of Reims between *Artold, and Hugh the Son of Hebert Earl of Vermandois, was an occasion of calling divers Councils. Hugh having been advanced to that See too young and against the Canons, was deposed, and Artold placed in his stead. But Anno 940. Artold had renounced, and made Solemn Oath not to intermeddle any more in the government of that Church. Thereupon a Council called at Soissons in the year 941. by Hugh and Hebert, destituted him, and re-established Hugh. On the contrary that of Verdun, Anno 947. restored him. That of Mousson in 948. confirmed him: and that of Ingelheim the same year where the Kings, Lewis Transmarine and Otho I. were present, Excommunicated the Bishop Hugh of Vermandois, and resolved to Treat Count * Hugh in the same manner, who who being a Rebel to his Prince had held him Prisoner a year, if he did not come and give satisfaction.

The same year that of Treves, where Marin the Popes Legat presided, confirmed the Sentence against the two Hughes, and thundred against the Bishops irregularly Ordained by Hugh of Vermandois.

Artold being dead, Anno 961. some Bishops Assembled together near Meaux, the year following, to contrive some Method to bring Hugh in again to that See: but considering that a small number could not undo, what had been done by a greater, and that they had notice from the Pope to clear their doubts, that he had Excommunicated him in a Council held at Rome Anno 949. they broke up without proceeding any farther.

That of Reims in 975. wherein presided Stephen Deacon to Bennet V. Pope, and Adalberon of Reims, Excommunicated Thibault who had usurped the See of Amiens.

In 983. that of Mount St. Mary in the Diocese of Reims, where Adalberon presided, confirmed the Decree made by that Bishop, to put Monks into the Monastery of Mousson, in the stead of those Canons that were there. In the foregoing Age, in many places the Canons were more desired; The Humour was changed in this.

Gerbert soliciting with heat to have Arnold de Reims his Process made, a Council was called in that same City Anno 992. where his Credit and the vehement Eloquence of Arnold d' Orleans carrying it against the Remonstrances of Abbon Abbot of Fleury, and the Sentiment of Seguin de Sens who was President, Arnold was deposed and Gerbert instaled in his See. The Pope believing it intrenched upon his Authority if he suffer'd them to undertake this without his Order, sent a Legat into France the year ensuing, who first called together some Bishops at Mousson, then a greater number at Reims, where Seguin representing the Person of the Pope, it was said that Gerbert should be deposed and Arnold restored: but this last being a Prisoner at Orleans, Gerbert disputed it, and stood his ground yet for some time; and appealed to the Pope, who grew more stubborn and stiff in favour of Arnold, and forced the King by the threatnings of a terrible Excommunication to release him and suffer him to enjoy his Bishoprick.

POPE S,

GREGORY V. About two years under this Reign.	1003. S. Five years ten Months.

ROBERT, King XXXVI. Aged Twenty four or Twenty five years.

THis King compleat both in Body and Mind, of a handsome Stature, a sweet and grave Air, a composed and sage Humour, having been nurtur'd to Piety and good Learning by Gerebert, became very knowing for that Age, much more Religious and Zealous in the Service of God, and as Just, Charitable, and Debonnaire towards his People, as any Prince that ever wore a Crown. And indeed God favour'd his Reign with the choicest Blessing he is wont to bestow upon those Kings who are according to his own Heart, I mean with a long and happy Peace, which he enjoy'd near Thirty years, after some slight and petty Wars.)

This year 996. died Richard I. Duke of Normandy, who was past his Seventieth year; He left his Dukedom to his Son Richard II. surnamed the Good.

William Earl of Poitou and Duke of Aquitain, having War with Boson II. Earl of Perigord and de la Marche, Robert was obliged to assist him as his Kindred and Vassal. They both laid Siege to the Castle of Belac: but their Army wanting Provisions, because they were too numerous, could not subsist till the taking of the Place. The Chronicles of those times who are all very succinct, do not give an account of the end of that War, no more then of many other things.

Eudes Earl of Brie and Champagne prompted with great desire to have a passage over the Seine as he had already over the Marne, thereby to go commodiously from Brie to his County of Chartres, cast his Eyes upon Melun, and with Money gained the Vicount or Castellaine belonging to Earl Bouchard, who deliver'd it up to him.

Bouchard had been the favourite of Hugh Capet, who had given him that Earldom, and he was yet at this time Count Palatine for King Robert. Wherefore this King took in hand his defence, sent Richard II. Duke of Normandy his Cousin and good Friend, and with him besieged the place. The Battery with their * Engines having made a Breach, the Garrison surrendred upon Composition: the Castellaine and his Wife were both Hanged on the top of a Hill near the place.

They did not punish Gentlemen with Death for Rebellion or Felony, unless they committed Treason; but in that case they hanged them in some eminent Place, that Crime degrading them of all Nobility.

Poland

Robert, King XXXVI.

Poland was honoured with the Title of a Kingdom by the Emperor Otho III. who going to Gnesne to Visit the Sepulchre of St. Adalbert Martyr, gave the Regal Ornaments to Duke Boleslaus.

The following year Hungary had the same Advantage and Honour, but would receive it from the hands of the Pope, to whom Prince Stephen the Son of Geisa, who first embraced Christianity, sent to demand the Royal Crown.

Towards the end of January in the year 1002. the Emperor Otho, aged but Twenty nine years died in the City of Rome, or in Paterna, not leaving any Children. It was believed to be of Poyson; the cursed practise thereof being much in use, as I have observed in this Age, thorough all the West. Henry II. of that name, called the Cripple, Duke of Bavaria and Earl of Bamberg, succeeded him by an Election of the German Princes, but did not bear the Title of Emperor, at least not in Italy, till he had been Crowned by the Pope, which was Twelve years afterwards.

The degrees of Parentage wherein Marriage was prohibited, having been extended to the Seventh, besides the obstructions from Spiritual Alliance or Gossipship, caused much Broil especially amongst Princes and Grandees, who commonly are of Kin to one another, even within that degree. For so soon as a Husband or a Wife were disgusted with each other, or that any one had a mind to trouble them, they needed but to Article and make Oath they were of Kin within the degrees forbidden, and produce Witnesses upon it, (to the number of nine, as I believe) which were not wanting, or difficult to get; and thereupon the Diocesan Bishop, or an Assembly of Bishops, if there were any greater difficulty, pronounced Judgment.

Now Queen Luigard the first Wife of Robert being dead, he was advised, by Maxims of Policy, to Wed Bertha Sister to Rodolph the * Lazy King of Burgundy, Widow of Eudes I. Earl of Chartres, and Mother of Eudes II. as yet but young. She being of Kin in the fourth Degree, and besides he having held a Child with her at the Font; he thought he might prevent the inconveniency of nullity of Marriage by the Authority of the Gallican Church: he called therefore his Bishops together, who having heard his Reasons, were of opinion upon consideration of the publick good, that he might take her for his Wife notwithstanding the Canonical Obstructions; which was a kind of Dispensation.

Abbon who was Abbot of Fleury, a vehement Man, not having been able to dissuade him from this match, bestir'd himself with much heat to have it dissolved. The Pope, to whom Robert had made no Application, Excommunicated the Bishops that had authorized it, and the two Parties that were Contracted, if they did not separate forthwith.

The King not giving Obedience to a Sentence which appeared to him contrary to the good of his Kingdom, the Pope by an unheard-of Proceeding put the whole Nation under an Interdiction. To which the People so humbly submitted, that all the Kings Domestick Servants, excepting only two or three, forsook him, and they threw whatsoever was left at his Table to the Dogs, no body thinking it lawful to eat of that Meat he had but touched.

These Severities, and not a Monstrous Birth by his Wife, whom the Miraclemongers say was delivered of an Infant with the Neck and Feet resembling a Goose, constrained him to part from her, but that was not till two or three years after; and we find that they made a Journey to Rome, either to defend their Cause before the Pope, or to crave his Pardon. However it were the Marriage remained Null.

I cannot forget one memorable Example of the Sovereign Power, and the extremity Rigour of the Pope, it was Silvester II. Guy Vicount of Limoges was cited to Rome by the Bishop of Angoulesme, because he had detained him Prisoner in a Castle. The two Parties appeared. The Cause pleaded upon the very Easter-day, the Pope pronounced that Guy for Reparation of his Crime, should be tied to the Necks of two Wild-horses, and his Body thus torn and bruised, thrown on the Dung-hill, which was to be put in Execution three days after. In the mean time Guy was delivered up into the hands of the Bishop; but the Prelat being moved with pity pardoned him, and stealing away in the night, generously brought him thence into France again with him.

About this time Henry Duke of Burgundy Brother of Hugh Capet, died without Children. Now by the induction of Giselle his Wife, Widow of Adelbert, as above, King of Italy and Son of Berenger II. he left his Dukedom by Will and Testament, to Otho-William surnamed the Stranger, illie of that Woman by her first Husband, who finding himself already Earl of Burgundy beyond Soane, named Franche-Comte, and besides assisted by Landry Earl of Nevers his Son-in-Law, and Brinon Bishop of Langres, whose Sister he had Married, took possession of all Burgundy by virtue of that Grant.

But King Robert, to whom this Dukedom belonged lawfully, as Heir to his Uncle, led a powerful Army thither, with the aid of Richard II. Duke of Normandy, suppressed the Usurpers Faction, took Auxerre by Composition, and Avalon by Battery; the Walls, as 'tis said, falling down miraculously before him; and at length forced out Otho-William and confined him beyond the Saone, where he became the Stock of the Earls of * Burgundy.

From these issued the Dukes of Brabant, and the Earls of Namur.

Baldwin Earl of Flanders already an Enemy to the Emperor, undertook the Quarrel of these Daughters. The Emperor came to the Relief of Godfrey whom he had invested with this Fief; and the King of France embraced Baldwin's Party who was his Vassal. The Emperor in vain besieged Valenciennes and then Gannet: Finally this War being made at the Charge and Expence of the Flemming, he agreed with the Emperor and restored Valenciennes.

Afterwards the Emperor desiring to make use of his Valour in the great Troubles brought upon him by the Rebellion of the German Princes, gave him that City again, and withall the Island of Walcharen being part of Zeland: whence proceeded a long and bloody Contest between the Flemmings and the Hollanders, these pretending that Zeland appertained to them, by virtue of a certain Grant which they alledged had been made to them by the Emperor Letaire Son of Lewis the Debonnaire.

I think we ought to place in the year 1007. the Marriage of Robert with Constance surnamed Blanch Daughter of William V. Earl of Arles, Provence, and Toulouse; a Beautiful Princess, but Haughty, Capricious, and Insupportable.

We must observe that the Authors of those times frequently called Provence, Aquitain, whether out of ignorance, or because of its City of Aix, Aquæ Sextiæ.

The Saracens at the instigation of the Jews in France demolish the Temple of Jerusalem and the Holy Sepulchre; which re-ignites the Devotion of the Western Christians, and their hatred against the Jews, whom they banish or knock on the Head every where.

1009, 10,
&c.

The good King Robert addicted himself intirely to works of Piety, Charity, Mercy and Justice, re-edified old Churches, or built new ones, and fed great numbers of poor People in all the Cities throughout his Kingdom. He kept above Two hundred in his House whom he led every where; having no aversion to see them even under his Table, to touch their Ulcers, and make the Sign of the Cross over them, whereby they were oftentimes made whole.

He delighted to Sing in the Quire, and Compose Words and Notes for the Songs and Responses, in honour of God or his Saints. The Church hath preserved some of them which they make use of to this day.

This year 1012. was seen towards the farther Southern parts, a Star of an extraordinary magnitude, which seemed to dart its bright Rays into the beholders Eyes. It appeared for three months together, sometimes contracting its self, other while seeming much greater, as if it took new Fire, then again as it were quite extinguished. Anno 1003. a Comet had likewise been observed which kept near the Sun, and appeared but seldom, which was about the break of day. Eight years before, viz. Anno 995. another had been observed upon St. Laurences-day; And in 981. also another yet about Autumn. Which I take notice of to shew that these Phenomena are not so rare as to make so much noise about them.

The King having bestowed the Archbishoprick of Bourges upon Gessin his Natural Son Abbot of Fleury, the Clergy of that Church made great opposition, saying, That the Holy Canons admitted no Bastards to the Prelacy: Which occasioned many Tumults, that were not allayed till five years afterwards.

1015.

The Earl of Sens, Raynard II. of that name, called the Bad*, using much violence against Leuterie his Archbishop and all the Clergy within his Territory, the King besieged his City and took it, deprived him of his Earldom, and rejoyned it to his Demcaiss.

ROBERT, and HUGH his Son.

The Duke of Aquitain at his return from his third, or fourth Pilgrimage to Rome (those that made most were the most esteemed) found his Country enriched with a new Treasure. The Abbot of St. John's de Angery having lighted on the Skull of a Man in a Wall, the Report was spread that it was the Head of St. John Baptist. The People of France, Lorrain, and Germany, who in those days ran with much Zeal after all sorts of Relicks, flocked thither from all parts: King Robert, the Queen, the Duke of Normandy, and a great number of other Lords, brought their Offerings thither. The Kings was a Scollop-shell of Gold which weighed Thirty pounds; an admirable Present in such times when Gold and Silver were fifty times more scarce then in our Age.

The Danes or Normans beyond Seas, having not quite forgotten their custom of Piracy, did yet sometimes make Descents in England and on the Coasts of France. They had Conquer'd a great part of England, and at last made some Kings there. This year they landed in Poitou, being perhaps informed of the great Crowds of Pilgrims that came to see the Head of St. John; and indeed they carried away a great many good Prisoners. All the Country Armed to drive them thence; The Duke of Aquitain going to attack them, twenty or thirty of his most considerable Gentlemen fell into Holes cover'd over with Branches and green Turfs which the Normans had digged about the Avenues to their Camp. This accident disheartned the rest from going on; however the Normans fearing a ruder onset, dislodg'd in the night, and got into their Vessels: but they were forced to give them what Ransom they pleased to demand for the Prisoners they had gotten.

Gefroy * Duke or Earl of Bretagne (for in those times the Dukes took indifferently the Titles of Earls) dying, his eldest Son Alain III. of that name succeeded him in his Dukedom, and Eudes his second had the Earldom of Pontieure in Partage. Alain espoused the Princess * Avoise Sister of Duke Richard; and by that means Normandy and Bretagne hitherto great Enemies, were united in Alliance and Amity.

There was a War begun from the year 1017. between Richard Duke of Normandy and Eudes or Odon Earl of Champagne and Chartres, because Eudes would not give up the City of Dreux granted him in Dowry with Matilda the Sister of Richard, who was lately dead: so that Richard had built the Castle of Tilleret, from whence he made incursions on the Country of Dreux. Eudes put himself in a posture to surprize the Garison, having with him the Counts Valeran de Meulan, and Hugh du Mans: but he was soundly beaten and put to the rout.

1020, 21,

The War growing hotter he raised so many Enemies against the Norman Duke, that that Prince fearing to be overwhelmed, sent to Lagman or Lacime King of Sweden to assist him, and also Olaf King of Norway, who being landed in Bretagne, and having forced and sacked the City of Dole, marched towards the Chartrain Country. All France upon remembrance of their former Desolations, fell into an extream apprehension and dread, and the King bestir'd himself with so much activity to quench this Flame, that he brought the two Princes to an Agreement, and satisfied the Northern Kings, who returned again, after the Norwegian had received Baptism at Rouen, having the name of Robert given him at the Sacred Font.

1022.

The Emperor Henry and King Robert desiring cordially to take away all cause of difference between them, agreed upon an Interview at the River Menfe. Whilst the Courtiers on either side were making several Scruples about the Place, the Manner, and such like trivial Circumstances and Punctillios, and the two Princes on the contrary had it in their thoughts to outvie each other in Civility; Henry passes the River early in the morning and pleasantly surprizes Robert, who the next day repays his Visit in the same manner. Both Treated one the other Magnificently, and offered each very rich Presents to the other: but Robert took only a Book being the 1024.

This last being dead at Bamberg, the German Princes elected Conrad Duke of Wormes, who could not go to Rome to receive the Imperial Crown, till the year 1027. At last the Italian Princes and Prelats hating the Teutonick Nation, who Treated them Peremptorily, ruling as it were with a Rod in hand, refused to obey, and sent into France to profer King Robert the Kingdom of Italy for his Son Hugh.

Upon his refusal they Addressed themselves to William Duke of Aquitain, very well known in Rome by his frequent Pilgrimages. He hearkned to the Proposal, understood their Methods, sent some thither to sound them thoroughly, and after went himself. When he was amongst them, he found nothing of all they had promised, every one demanding of him instead of giving to him; they propounded no Conditions but such as were very ridiculous; so that finding they had a design upon his Purse, and feared his Power, he laughed at them and left them.

The imperious and proud Humour of Queen Constance gave the King perpetual trouble and displeasures, who used all means to soften her. One day being offended and angry with a favourite of his named Hugh de Beauvais, who upheld the Husbands Spirit against her undertakings, she makes her complaint to Fulk Earl of Anjou her Cousin, intreating to Revenge her. The Count sent twelve of his own Country Gentlemen, who taking their opportunity when this Favourite was Hunting with the King, seized on him, and cruelly cut off his Head in the Kings presence, without any regard to his Intreaties.

The King was forced to put up this Affront for fear of a greater mischief, and withall to endure this Step-mother should Treat his Son King Hugh with the greatest indignity, even to the reducing him to much indigence of all things fit for him.

I find in the Life of this most Wise King an act of Clemency more then Royal. There having been discovery made of a grand Conspiracy against his Life and State, and the Authors taken, when the Lords were assembled together to Sentence them to Death, he caused those Wretches to be splendidly entertained, and the next day admitted to the Sacred Communion: then would needs have them be set free, saying, They could not put those to Death whom Jesus Christ had newly received at his * Table.

This year William IV. Duke of Aquitain and Earl of Poitiers died, and his eldest Son William V. surnamed the Gros took the Government of his Country. The Widow Dutcheß second Wife of William IV. having Children, to gain assistance against those of the first Bed, Married Geoffrey Martel a most valiant Prince, the Son of Fulk Earl of Anjou.

Richard III. Duke of Normandy (others affirm it was Robert) received the old banished Man and restored him to his Earldom: but he could not totally suppress the Partialities in those Countries, where some still sided with the Son, as others stood up for the Father.

The 17th of September the young King Hugh died in the Flower of his Age, be-moaned of all Europe for his rare and lovely Qualities, which had acquired him so great Reputation, that he could hardly have made it good if he had longer survived.

King Robert had three more Sons remaining, Henry, Robert, and Eudes. Some say that Eudes was the eldest of them all. However it were, the King after the Death of Hugh would have Henry Crowned: but Queen Constance by a depraved appetite had undertaken to put Robert in the Throne.

The Fathers Authority and Reason carried it for Henry amongst the French Lords: and yet this Womans Obstinacy could not acquiesce, but caused many Tumults, her Husband not being able to prevent her even in his Life time, from contriving a great Conspiracy to dethrone the eldest, and place the younger in his stead.

Richard III. Duke of Normandy having Reigned but two years, died of Poyson by 1029.

tained by Fratricide.

In the year 1029. and 30. there began a great War between Eudes Earl of 1029, & 30.
Champagne, Chartres and Tours, and Fulk Earl of Anjou, because Fulk fortified the Castle of Montrichard which Eudes said did belong to the Country of Touraine. After some Rencontres they came to a pitched Battle, each being at the head of his Army: the loss was great on either side, but the Angevin obtained the Victory.

Though King Robert commonly permitted the liberty of Elections, yet the Bishop 1030, 31, of Langres being dead, he by his absolute Authority substituted another, as having and the fol-need of one wholly at his Devotion in that place, to help him in the bridling and lowing.
containing of Burgundy. The Canons having Poysoned this, he put in a second there; which excited so great trouble amongst the Clergy of that Diocess, that he was forced to send his Son to install the last promoted, and to secure him from their Attempts.

Whilst Henry was in that Country, hapned a great Eclipse of the Sun, and 1033.
Robert his Father was seized with a Distemper, whereof he died the 20th of July in the year 1033. having lived Sixty one years, of which he Reigned Forty five and an half, that was Nine and an half with his Father, and Thirty six since his death.

He had four Children living; three Sons, Henry who had the Crown, Eudes who contended with him for it, and Robert who was Duke of Burgundy: and one Daughter named Adeleida, who Married Baldwin Earl of Flanders.

It was no fault of his Government that France was not compleatly happy: he gave his Subjects what depended upon him, Justice and Peace; but had the unhappiness to see a Famine three times, and after that a Plague make great destruction in his Dominions, the first in Anno 1007, the second, Anno 1010, and the third from the year 1030, to 1033. (The first was general over all Europe, and the last so severe in France, that many People were seen to dig up dead Carcasses for Food, to go a hunting after little Children, and lie in wait at the corners of Woods like Beasts of Prey, to devour Passengers. Nay there was a Man so possessed with the covetous desire of gain, more cruel then the Famine it self, that he exposed Human Flesh to sale in the City of Tournus: but that detestable Prodigy was by them expiated in the Flames.)

THe first and most capital Enemy against this King was his own Mother: who continuing to the prejudice of his Fathers Declaration, and the right of Nature, to endeavour to set the Crown upon the Head of Robert her beloved Son, raised a good Party of the Grandees against him, particularly Baldwin Earl of Flanders, and Eudes Earl of Champagne, bellowing the City of Sens upon this last to engage him to her Party.

But Henry whose Resolution was above his Age, went himself, being the Twelfth, to Robert Duke of Normandy to implore his Assistance. The Duke by Motives of Fidelity, or hatred against the Champenois, aided him with all his Forces: With which having in a short time defeated the Queen's in several Rencontres, and taken the Rebels Hold, he unlinked the whole Party, and reduced her in despite of all her Projects to live quietly with him.

The War ended, he gave Robert the Cities of Chaumont and Pontoise, and the French Vexin.

It was then likewise he yielded the Dukedom of Burgundy to his Brother Robert. From whom issued the First Race of the Dukes of Burgundy of the Blood Royal.

1033, and the following.

The Earl of Champagne did not hold himself vanquish'd by the defeat of the Party: to make him lay down his Sword the King was forced to beat his Army twice, and the third time put him to a rout, and made him fly away half naked, and hide himself, before he could compel him to shake hands.

About the year 1032. or 33. Geoffrey surnamed Martel, made a cruel War upon William V. called the Gros, Duke of Guyenne and Earl of Poitou, whose Mother-in-Law, or his own Fathers second Wife he had Married; She was named Agnes Daughter of the Earl of Burgundy. The Subject of the Quarrel was the Earldom of Saintonge and the Country of Aunis, which he disputed for. The Authors do not tell us plainly by what Title he claimed; but that he vanquish'd the Duke in a great Battle near Montrenil-Bellay, took him Prisoner, and did not release him till three years end, after he had yielded up Saintonge, and paid a lusty Ransom.

Rodolph or Rouel King of Burgundy beyond the Jura and of Arles dying in the year 1033. instituted his Heir Conrad the Emperor who had Married Gisle his youngest Sister, and had by her a Son named Henry, and made no account of Eudes Earl of Champagne the Husband of Berthe his eldest Sister, because while he was living he

he would have forced him to acknowledge him for King, and had bred Factions and Stirrs in his Country.

By this Institution the Kingdom of Burgundy and Arles passing over to German Princes, was by them as it were united and joyned to the Germanic Kingdom and the Empire, who being at too great a distance have insensibly let it slip through their Fingers, and after they had lost the Possession, have likewise lost the very Title to it.

In these days lived Humbert, Surnamed White-hands, Earl of Maurienne and Savoy, Stem of the Royal House of Savoy, which at this day holds a great Rank amongst Christian Sovereigns, the Off-spring of this Humbert, having by Marriages, Successions, Conquests, and other means, assembled and joyned all the several pieces whereof that State is composed. Some Historians make this Prince to be descended from Bolon King of Provence, others from Hugh King of Italy, and some from the ancient Counts of Maxon; but Tradition, and which appears most probable, makes him the Son of one Berald of Saxony who descended from Vitekind, by the same Branch as the three Otho's Emperors, or by some other.

The Earl of Champagne not able to endure that Conrad should allow him no part of a Patrimony, of which the best share ought to be his, took his time when that Prince was employ'd in Hungary, and with his own Forces and those of his Friends, made himself Master of a great part of the Kingdom.

But Conrad at his return having led his Army into those Countries, drove Eudes Garrisons forth of all the Places he had taken, put in his own, and received Homage of all the Lords. In fine, he handled him so roughly, that all help failing, and perhaps an apprehension getting into his thoughts, that the King of France who hated him, might agree with the Emperor to strip him, he went and surrendered upon Mercy, and humbled himself before him.

Robert Duke of Normandy by force of Arms constrains the Bretons to do him Homage.

He dies the year after at Nicea in Bithynia, upon his return from a Pilgrimage to Jerusalem. At his departure he had instituted an only Son of his, but a Bastard named William to be his Heir, begotten on a Citizens Daughter of Falaise, leaving him at Paris, in the guard and protection of King Henry who had very great Obligations to him, and giving the Regency of the Country to Alain Duke of Bretagne.

William had two Paternal Uncles, Mauger Archbishop of Rouen, who was Married and had Children, and William Earl of Argues, to whom the Nobility of the Country would much rather have obey'd then to a Bastard. This was the occasion of great Troubles, and would have ruined Normandy, had the French King's Forces been but as great as his desire to regain it.

About this time the name of the Normands began to grow famous and potent in Italy, especially in Puglia and Calabria. In the year 1003, forty Adventurers of that Nation, upon the quitting the Holy Land, having acted some things there almost incredible against the Saracens, in favour of Gaimar Duke of Salerno, who was hugely tormented by them, being returned into Normandy laden with Honour and Presents, had excited other brave Men of their Country to go seek their Fortunes beyond the Mountains. The first that try'd, was a Gentleman named Drengot-Osmond, who being forced to quit the Country for killing one William Repostel in the presence of his Prince having vapoured that he had abused his Daughter, went with four more Brothers and some others of his Kindred, to offer his Service to Mello Duke of Bari, and Pandolphus Prince of Capua, who were Revolted against the Greeks. They received them with open Arms, and gave them a City and some Lands to maintain themselves. Then after these were settled, not without many hazards, Combats and Adventures, six of the Sons of Tancrede d'Anteville, a Gentleman of the Bishoprick of Constance, who had twelve all of them brave and courageous, arrived there and carried their fame to a higher pitch then the former.

Normandy was all in Fire and Blood by the particular Feuds of some Lords upheld by the Uncles of the young Duke Alain III. Duke of Bretagne, his Guardian being come to appease them, could not avoid a Mortal Poyson given him by the Factious Antagonists. Conan II. his Son but then in his Cradle succeeded him.

About these times William the Gros Duke of Aquitaine was delivered out of Prison and died the same year. Otho or Eudes his second Brother succeeded him. Two years after he inherited the Dukedom of Gascongne, taking possession thereof in the Church of St. Severin at Burdeaux according to the Custom. He had this Lordship in Right of his Mother Brice who was the Daughter of Duke Sance. Thus the House of Gascongne resolved, or dissolved into that of Poitiers or Aquitaine.

The Pretensions of Eudes Earl of Champagne to the Kingdom of Burgundy not being wholly stifled, he fell with an Army into the Kingdom of Lorraine which belonged to the Emperor, and took the City of Commercy: but as he would have attacked Bar, Gatolun Duke of Lorraine came and opposed him so roughly, that he defeated his Army and laid him dead upon the place. His two Sons Thibault and Stephen shared his Lands. Thibault had the Earldoms of Chartres and Tours, and Stephen those of Troyes or Champagne, and Meaux in Brie.

Geoffrey Martel, following the Passion of Agnes his Wife, excited the Subjects of Eudes Duke of Aquitain to rebel against him, thereby to advance his Brothers of the same Venter, Peter-William and Guy the Son of that Agnes: which succeeded as he wished; for Eudes who had no Child being slain in the year 1039, at the Siege of a little paltry Town, Peter-William succeeded him, and Guy-Geoffrey had the Earldom of Gascogne.

Emperor Michael, and Henry III. or according to others II. Son of Conrad, in June 1039.

1039, and the following.

The Normans under the Conduct of William surnamed Fierabras, the eldest of Tancred's Sons, were employ'd by the Grecian Emperor's Lieutenant, to drive the Saracens out of Sicily, upon condition they should have part of the Conquests. Whereof finding themselves frustrate by the Greeks, they fell upon Puglia or Apulia, which they began to take footing in. Duke Fierabras their General hapning to die, they chose his Brother Dragon in his stead, and he being likewise treacherously kill'd by the Lords of that Country, they Substituted Onfroy the third of those Brothers.

The Grecian Emperor's Lieutenant brought his Army from Sicily to stop their Enterprize, and fought them near the Streams of Ausidus, and not far from Cannes, where otherwhile Hannibal made so horrible a Slaughter amongst the Romans. The Greek was not more fortunate then the Carthaginian, he lost the Battle and so great a number of his Men, that the Grecians could never raise themselves again in that Country; and the power of the Normans increased so much, that it suppressed theirs in a few years.

* Or Fulk, 1039.

Foulk * Earl of Anjou died in the City of Mets in his return from the Holy Land: Geoffrey surnamed Martel his Son succeeded him. This Foulk being in Jerusalem touched with a deep Repentance for his Sins, caused himself to be drawn all naked on a Hurdle with a Rope about his Neck, and Whipt till the Blood run, crying out, Have Mercy Lord, on the Treacherous and Perjur'd Foulk.

1040, and 41.

The Sons of Eudes Earl of Champagne refused to do Hommage for their Lands to King Henry, because he had not assisted their Father against the Emperor Conrad. The pretence of their Felony was, that they said the Crown belonged to his Brother Eudes; In effect they encouraged him to set up for King. Which hath made some suspect that he was the eldest.

Henry did not give this Conspiracy time to make any progress, he besieged his Brother in a Castle whither he was retired, and having taken it, sent him under a strong Guard to Orleans. I do not find what became of him.

This done, he marched against Stephen Earl of Brie and Champagne, whom he put to a rout; and thence turns against Galeran Earl of Meulan their Allie whom he deprived of his Earldom.

On the other hand he animated Geoffrey called Martel against Thibault, whereupon he besieges the City of Tours, and whatever Agreement could be afterwards made between the King and Thibault, Martel would not give over his Enterprize.

He had kept it block'd up almost a year; Thibault knowing it was like to perish for want of Victuals, resolves to relieve it. Geoffrey going to meet him with the Chappe or Mantle of St. Martin, which he caused to be carried in manner of a Standard, gained the Victory, made Thibault a Prisoner, and afterwards reduced the Town, which since belonged to the Earls of Anjou.

In those times Princes caused the Relicks of some Saint Worship'd in their Countries to be carry'd for their Ensigns, or some which they had procured from other places, and likewise often took the Banners used in Churches which served as their Standards.

During the Troubles and Factions the Minority of William the Bastard occasioned in Normandy, the King took his opportunity to make them deliver up the Castle of Tilleres, upon pretence that the Rebels might seize upon it: and in truth he caused it to be razed, but soon after he rebuilt it, and placed a Garrison there, then stepping farther into Normandy, he ransacked the County of Hiesmes, and there burnt the little City of Argentan, which perhaps is the place the Romans called Ara Genue.

1040.

Soon after William took the Government; and because he was yet a Minor, chose himself a Guardian, it was Rodolph de Gace his Constable. But the Lords obey'd unwillingly because of the defect of his Birth: they had for Chief Guy of Burgundy, who being the Son of Reynold Earl of the Franche Comptee, and Alix Sister of the deceased Robert, pretended that in his Conscience the Dutchy belonged to him.

The

The Faction was so strong that they had like to ruine William; but being somewhat re-assured, he had recourse to King Henry, who having now another design then to destroy him, went and joyned Forces with him: both gave the Rebels Battle in a place called the Valley of the Downs, some Leagues on this side the City of Cuen. The King was struck down with a Lance by a Gentleman of Constantine, but recover'd himself again without any hurt. The Rebels were wholly cut off, Guy of Burgundy besieged and forced in Brionne, was devested of the Lands he held in Normandy, and retired to the Franche Comte.

The Earl of Anjou, who had been once in greatest favour with the King, there being I know not what coldness grown betwixt them, let fall some words, which so highly offended the King, that he undertook to chastise him; he sent therefore to the Norman Duke to accompany him in this Expedition, and entred upon the Earls Lands; but they were immediately reconciled.

The quarrel was still to be decided between the Norman and the Angevin, it lasted as long as the life of the latter, and Fortune was favourable sometimes to the one, sometimes to the other.

The Norman Duke having attained to years fit for Marriage, espoused Matilda, Daughter of Baldwin, called the Pious, Earl of Flanders, and Alix, or Adeleida, Daughter of King Robert. Being of kin to him, they were fain to obtain a Dispensation from the Pope, who allowed it, upon condition to build four Hospitals in four several Cities, each to maintain an hundred poor People.

The Church not being used to these Dispensations, Mauger Arch-Bishop of Rouen, Uncle to the Duke, not out of any zeal for Canonical Discipline, but because he would embroil them, that his Brother the Earl of Arques might make himself Duke, Excommunicated them both, The Duke having Convened the Bishops of the Province at Lisieux, the Popes Legat presiding, deposed him, and banished him to the Island of Grenezay.

The Earl of Arques having his Party Formed, rises up in Arms, the Duke gives him a repulse, and besieges him in the Castle of Arques; the King who changed sides, either according to his Interest or Humour, highly undertakes his Defence, and goes in Person to put Provisions and Relief into Arques. Notwithstanding this Refreshment, the Duke is bent to keep the place blocked up; so that the Earl wanting Provisions, is obliged to Capitulate, provided he may enjoy his Life without loss of Members, and some Lands for his subsistence.

The broken remnants of the party fled to the King, who being a little jealous of the prosperity of William, and pushed forwards by the Earls of Anjou and Poitou, enemies to the Duke, promised to turn him out of his Dutchy. He had but the design, the event was contrary: being advanced towards Rouen, the Normans cut his Vanguard in pieces, between Escoy and Mortemer; he was compell'd to face about, and after this checque to deliver up the Castle of Tilleres to him.

This Duke not wont to pardon any that took up Arms against him, especially his Relations by the Fathers side; most of those who had engaged for the King, or the Count d'Arques, went into Puglia, where they made a better fortune then they were like to have found, had they remained in Normandy.

The victorious Duke carries the War into Anjou, and in his passage seizes on the County of Maine, which Earl Hebert had given him by Will, in recompence for that he had defended him against the Angevin.

The valiant Geoffrey Martel, Earl of Anjou in the year 1047, about Eight and forty years old, quitted the World, and retired to the Abby of St. Nicholas of Angers, where he lived till An. 1061. Before his Retreat, he left his Estates to Geoffrey called the Bearded, and to Foulke surnamed the Rechin, who were the Children of his Sister Adeleida, and Alberic, Earl of Gastines in Poitou. Geoffrey bare the Title of Earl of Anjou, and dying, left it to Foulk.

The Emperour Henry III. called the Black, and Henry King of France had an interview this year in the Countrey of Mefin, where they renewed the ancient Alliance between the two Crowns.

Pope Leo IX. a Lorainer by Birth, and who had been Bishop of Toul, being come into Gall, to reconcile Godfrey Duke of Lorraine with the Emperour, and put a period to that bloody quarrel, which was betwixt that Godfrey supported by the Earl of Flanders, and the Houses of Alsace and Luxemburgh, held a Council at Reims, and negotiated so effectually, that he made an end of that War.

At his going from Germany he carried some Forces into Italy, to oppose the Normans, who being grown potent did sometimes undertake upon the Countries belonging to the Holy Chair. These brave Adventurers conducted by Onfroy, did first shew their valour to him by cutting his Army to pieces, and taking him prisoner; then their Piety and Respect, by Treating him with great submission, and restoring him to his Liberty.

In recompence, he granted and gave them Title to all the Lands they had conquer'd, and likewise all such Lands as they should hereafter gain from the Greeks and Saracens; and Onfroy shared part of his Conquests with Robert surnamed Guiscard, which is to say the Craffy, and Roger and the rest of his Brothers.

1054.

Thibald Earl of Chartres taking it to heart that the King should thrust him out of the Earldom of Tours, and not being able to get satisfaction, went and waited on the Emperour at Meurs, who made him his Knight, and promised him his protection.

1055.

Emp. Theodora, Daughter of Constantine, then Michael VI. and Henry IV. Son of Henry II.

1057, and 58.

To prevent the seeds of Jealousie and Discord, which this Voyage might have sown between the Emperour and the King, they thought fit to set all right by a mutual Interview, at the same place where they formerly met. The King complain'd that the Governour had contraven'd to the Articles of Alliance, but he found no satisfaction; and having conceived some apprehension of an ill design upon his Person, retired by night.

The brave Robert Guiscard with his Normans having compleated the Conquest of Calabria, called himself Earl for two years, and after feared not to take upon him the Title of Duke.

Normandy having still in its bosom some sparks of Division, the King who thought to make advantage by it, attempted to bring it to his bow by a second Expedition, which was no more fortunate then the first, his Army having been set upon, and defeated on the Common of Varaville, between Caen and Lisieux, he accepted of a Peace with the Duke.

1059.

Emp. Isaacius Comenus, and Henry IV.

1059.

Anno 1059. was seen an unheard of Prodigy, a vast multitude of Snakes and other Serpents, being assembled together in a Plain near the City of Tournay, divided into two Bodies, who fought obstinately, till one of them being overcome and fled, left the Field all covered with their Dead, and retreated into the hollow of a great Tree, whither the Conquerours pursued them to compleat their Victory: but the Countrey people running thither with Clubs, Fire and Fagots, destroyed both the one and the other.

Not long after King Henry finding himself broken with Labour, though he were not above 54 years of age, assembled the Grandees of the Kingdom, and having told them the Services he had done for the Nation, and how well he had acquitted himself of the Command of the Armies; he prayed them all in general, and every one in particular, to own Philip his eldest Son for his Successor, and to give him their Oaths; which having all promised, he caused him to be Anointed, and Crowned at Reims the 22 of May, being the Feast of Pentecost, by the Arch-Bishop Gervais, whom afterwards this young King Honoured with the Office of Chancellor.

About the end of the same year he was taken with a little Fever, of which he dyed at Vitry near Paris, having Reigned Twenty eight years and four Months after the death of his Father.

To avoid the danger of contracting a Marriage within the Degrees prohibited, he sent to seek a Wife as far as Russia or Moscovia: She was Ann, the Daughter of George, some call him Juriscled, King of those Countreys, by whom he had three Sons, Philip, Robert, and Hugh: the Eldest was then but Seven years old; Robert dyed in Infancy, and Hugh when come to age had the Earldom of Vermandois, and was the Stock of the Second House of that Name. For they made him Marry Adeleida Daughter of Hebert, last Earl of the First Branch of Vermandois, She enjoying her Fathers Lordships, though She had a Brother alive named Eudes, his Vassals judging him incapable to succeed, from the imbecillity of his understanding; a defect very ordinary in the Carlovinian Race.

Emp. Constantine, Ducas, chosen by Michael, who turned Monk. And Henry IV.

Henry left all his Three Sons under the Guardianship of Baldwin Earl of Flanders, who had Married his Sister, and likewise entrusted him with the Regency of the Kingdom.

Queen

Queen Ann his Widdow retired to Senlis, where she was building a Church in Honour of the Martyr St. Vincent. Her Solitude was not so Austere, but she could listen to the Addresses of Rodolph Earl of Grespy, who was of that neighborhood. She made no difficulty to Marry him; and this Second Flame had like to have kindled a Civil War, not for the difference in their Qualities, for the Grandees went almost equal with their Kings; but because Rodolph was of Kin to the First Husband; for which reason the Bishops Excommunicated that Lord: but nothing could make him let go his hold of her, save death, which untied him from his Princess, Ann. 1066. Being a Widow, and destitute of support, she returned to end her days in her own Country.

Vacancy Five Months.

Urban II. Elect in March 1088. S. Eleven years and Four Months.

1060, 61, and 62.

ALL quietly gave Obedience to the Regency of Baldwin, the Gascons only refused to submit themselves, apprehending, said they, lest by that Title, he should destroy his Pupil to invade the Crown, upon pretension that he was Married to the Daughter of King Henry.

He wisely dissembled this injury; but two years after marched an Army towards the Pyreneans, giving out, it was to make War upon the Saracens in Spain; and when he had passed the Garonne, he stopp'd in the Rebels Countrey, and brought them to their Duty without striking a blow.

In the mean while the Duke of Aquitain having re-conquered Saintonge, led his victorious into Spain, where he forced the City of Barbastro, at that time very rich and renowned.

The Zeal of Religion did often lead the Princes and Lords of Aquitain and Langue-doc into Spain, to succour the Christians against the Saracens, and their assistance raised, and very much supported the petty Spanish Kings.

1064. Edward, King of England, whose Christian Virtues have placed him in the number of Saints, dying without Children, left his Kingdom by Will and Testament to William the Bastard Duke of Normandy, in consideration of the good Reception and Treatment he found in the House of Robert his Father, when he was driven out of his own Countrey; as likewise because he was neer of Kin. But the English not affecting the Government of a Stranger, gave the Crown to Harold, Son of Godwin, one of the great Lords of the Kingdom.

The Bastard on his side sought from all parts the assistance of his Friends and Allies, to get himself into possession of his Right; infomuch as having got by his large promises, a powerful Army of Normans, French, Flemmings and others together, he he landed in England, gave Battle to Harold the 14th of October, who was slain in the Fight with his chief Commanders, and left England to the discretion of the Conquerour. A Revolution thought to be prefaged by a terrible Comet, which for Fifteen days blazed with three great Rays, over-spreading almost all the Southern parts of the Heavens.

Before William past the Sea, hapned the death of Conan Duke of Bretagne; it was said he caused him to be poyson'd, because he claimed the Dutchy of Normandy, as belonging to him by his Mother, Daughter of Duke Robert. Hoel who was Married to his Sister, succeeded him.

The English ill-Treated by Williams Lieutenants and Officers, Revolted the following years, and called in the Danes to their aid, but that only increased their misery and yolk, for he took from them almost all their Lands, and even their antient Laws, introducing and imposing those of his own Countrey, as he did that Language in all Courts of Justice, and instruments of Law, withal putting such Lords as follow'd him, in possession of English Mens Estates, the greatest part of them being punished or slain.

This ended the Reign of the English in that Island, which hath notwithstanding retained their Name; but in effect hath ever since been sway'd, and is still by the Norman Blood, their Kings, and the greatest of the Countrey being descended, and holding their Rights of this William the Bastard, to whom was given the Surname of Conquerour.

Baldwin, Regent of the Kingdom of France, and Earl of Flanders, ended his days An. 1067. He had Two Sons, Baldwin, called of Monts who was Earl of Flanders, and Robert, who was Surnamed the Frison, as being Lord of that Countrey of Friesland.

It is observed that in the year 1069. Arnold Lord of Selne began to build the City of Ardres, upon the ruins of his Castle of Selne.

A War did soon break out between Baldwins two Sons, the Eldest thinking to develt the Younger, was by him beaten and slain in the field of Battle, leaving two Sons, Arnold and Baldwin very young. The Guardianship of these begot a bloody contest between Robert their Uncle, and Richilda their Mother. This Princess, supported by Gefroy Crook-Back, Duke of the lower Lorrain, defeated Roberts Army, and thrust him out of a part of his Countreys. This happy success made her so haughty towards her Subjects, that the Flemmings Flammengant forsook her, and she had none left but the Walloons and the Hennuyars. The King would have made himself Judge and Arbitrator between both parties; but Richilda coming to Paris with great Presents, gained his Counsel, and engaged him openly to take her quarrel.

The King inflamed with the heat of Youth, would needs go in person to make his first Essay in War and Arms. It proved not very successful, for he was beaten and pursued, Richilda taken and carried to St. Omers. But as he was retreating towards Montreuil, Eustace, Earl of Boulogne, who had a great Body of Reserves, took Robert, and carried him to St. Omers: He that Commanded the place, surrendered it to deliver Richilda, for which the King was enraged, that he sacked and burnt the City.

The same year Richilda, though still assisted by the French, lost another Battle; in which Eustace Earl of Boulogne being made prisoner, his Brother, Chancellor of France, and Bishop of Paris, to obtain his freedom, obliged the King to intermeddle no more in that dispute.

Nay, which was more, he made him Marry Bertha, the Daughter of Florent I. Earl of Holland, and Gertrude of Saxony, who had taken Robert for her second Husband.

By this means he was engaged to maintain the Cause for his Father-in-law, who by his assistance defeated Richilda's Army the Fourth time, and so remained Master of Flanders.

Roger, Brother of Robert Guischart, Duke of the Normans in Puglia, was by his Brother sent into Sicilia, which was possessed by the Saracens; he conquered the City of Panormus * and Messina, which opened him a way to become Master of the whole Island.

After the death of Baldwin the Regent, King Philip being arrived to the age of Adolescence, ran into many disorders and vexations with his Subjects. Whereupon Pope Gregory VII. who sought but the occasion to constitute himself the Judge and Reformer of Princes, wrote to William Duke of Aquitain, that together with the Lords, he should make him some Remonstrances, and Declare, that if he did not amend, he would Excommunicate both him and all the Subjects that obey'd him, and would place the Excommunication upon St. Peters Altar, to re-aggravate it every day.

1080. The Lords of Touraine and of Maine extremely pressing Foulk Rechin by force of Arms, to set Gefroy his Brother at liberty; this barbarous Man, rather then release him, chose sooner to give the County of Gastinois to King Philp, that he might maintain him in his injustice.
- Emp. Alexis Comm. R. 37 years 7 Months, and Henry IV. 1080. Some time after his own Son named Gefroy likewise, and surnamed Martel, moved with the miseries of his Uncle, forced his Father to set him free: but whether it were the Melancholy he had contracted, or some Drink they had given him, he could never relish the sweetness of his liberty.
- * Apulia Puglia. 1085. The famous Robert Guischard, Prince of the Normans in * Puglia, after he had gained two Naval Victories, one over the Venetians, and the other over the Greeks, died this year 1085. He had two Sons, Boemond and Roger; the eldest being then upon the coasts of Dalmatia with a Navy, his younger Brother seized on the Dutchie of Ponille * and Calabria; for which the Brothers were contending, till the time of the first Croisade, or Holy War, when the French Lords passing that way to the Holy Land, brought them to an agreement. Their Uncle Roger held Sicily, with the Title only of Earl.
- * Apulia, or Puglia. 1085. Upon complaints about the vexations, and ill Treatment Duke Robert shewed to his Norman Subjects; his Father the Conquerour comes over out of England to chastise him; but his paternal tenderness did easily admit of a reconciliation.
1085. The death of Guy-Gefroy-William, his Son William VIII. aged but 25 years succeeded him.
1086. King Philip, a very voluptuous Prince, being disgusted with Berthe his Wife, made use of the pretence of Parentage which was between them, and having proved it according to the course then in use, caused his Marriage to be dissolved by authority of the Church, though he had a Son by her named Lewis, about Five years old, and a Daughter named Constance. He banished his Divorced Wife to Monstreuil upon the Sea-side, where she lived a long time poorly enough.
1087. This Divorce according to Rule, and a judicial Sentence being made, he demanded the Daughter of Roger Earl of Sicilia, named Emma, who was conducted as far as the coasts of Provence: however he did not Marry her, the reason is not given.
1083. William the Conquerour become crazy, was under a strict regiment of Dyet at Rouen, to pull down his over-grown fatness, which did much incommode him. The King rallied at him, and asked when he would be up again after his Lying in: the Duke sent him word, that at his Uprising he would go and visit him with 10000 Lances instead of Candles: and indeed, as soon as he could, he got on Horseback, he destroy'd all the French Vexin, and forced and burnt Mantes. But he over-heated himself so much in the assaulting of that place, that it set his own Blood and Body on fire, and brought a fit of Sickness, so that he returned to Rouen, where he dyed in a few days.

By

By his Will he gave the Kingdom of England to William called Rufus, who was but his Second Son; Normandy to Robert who was eldest; and some Rents and Moneys to Henry the youngest of the three.

An. 1089. hapned the death of Robert called the Frisson, Earl of Flanders. His Son of the same name succeeded in his Earldom. Some time after he was Surnamed of Jerusalem, because he was present at the Siege of that City, An. 1099.

Foulk le Rechin extremely incontinent and changeable towards Women; but yet fuller of desire then ability, after he had turned away two, under colour of Proximity, had in An. 1089. Married Bertrade, the Daughter of Simon de Montfort. The appetite of this Woman, Young, Beautiful, and Gay, did not suite with the age of her Husband; she forsook him at three years end to cast her self into the Arms of King Philip, who was a lover of Ladies, and had not passed his 35th year. There hapned to be a Bishop (it was Endes of Bayeux) who undertoo to Marry them together, upon condition he might have the Revenue of some Churches, which the King bestowed upon him.

Bertrade was of Parentage to the King in the Fifth or Sixth Degree, and le Rechin her Husband in the Third or Fourth; these were therefore two obstacles: besides, if Philip were free, as he pretended he was, Bertrade was not, because her former Marriage had not been dissolved: wherefore upon the hot pursuit of Ives, Bishop of Chartres, who shewed himself a zealous Defender of the Discipline of the Canons; he was threatned with Excommunication at the Council of Autun, though the Pope suspended the effect or execution till the following year, that he thundred it himself in the Council of Clermont.

The famous quarrel between the Pope and the Emperours, which has caused so much mischief to Christendom, was grown very hot: it began betwixt Gregory VII. and Henry VI. The First very imperious and undertaking, the latter wicked, cruel, and irregular to the highest degree. The Pope pretended to take away from the Emperour, the investiture of Benefices, as an unjust and sacrilegious thing; but his true motive was a desire of the Empire of Italy, and to subject all Princes to his Pontifical Power, which seemed very feasible and easie, because all Europe being divided into a Hundred, and a Hundred several Dominions; the Princes were but weak, and the greatest number of them, either out of Devotion, or to avoid the Sovereignty of the more potent, submitted, and even devoted themselves to the Holy Chair, and paid him Tribute; so that had there been but three or four successive Popes, crafty enough to have cloaked this design, with at least an appearance of Sanctity, and would have taken fit opportunities of relieving the people against their Oppressors; they had made themselves sole Monarchs, as well in Temporals as in Spiritualls.

There was not that little Lord that did not Brave King Philip, rocked asleep within the Arms of his Bertrade. Miles, Lord of Montlebery, and Guy Troussel his Son, made him sweat for anguish, with their Castle of Montlebery, and four or five others which they held in those parts; with which they domineer'd over all the Country, and interrupted the Trade betwixt Paris and Orleans; though Guy Lord of Rochefort, Brother of Miles, was greatly in favour with Philip.

This year Urban II. being come into France, the refuge of persecuted Popes, that he might be owned the true Head of the Church (for the Emperour had dethroned him, and caused another to be elected) Assembled a Council at Clermont in Anvergne, in the Octave of St. Martins: wherein he made a great many Canons for the reformation of the Clergy, and especially to root out Simony, and prohibit the Marriage of Priests; and afterwards he Excommunicated King Philip, and Bertrade his Concubine.

In the same Council, upon the application and instances made by the Emperour Alexis, to have some assistance against the Turks; and upon the Remonstrances of Peter the Hermit, a Gentleman of Picardy, neer Amiens, who having made a voyage into the Holy Land, had been witness of the cruelties those Infidels did exercise upon the Christians: the Pope by a warm discourse animated all the Prelats then present, to incline the Faithful to take up Arms for the defence of Christendom, and go into the East. His Exhortations were so moving, that they made impression on all their minds; and this Zeal in a short time was spread all over Europe; an infinite number of all qualities, of all ages, and of all Sexes, Lifted and Enroll'd themselves in this Sacred Militia. The Signal was a Red Cross sowed upon the left Shoulder, and the word Dieu le Vent.

The Turks after divers irruptions, being called and taken into Pay by Machmet, King of Perfia, who was a Saracen, and had War with the Caliph of Babilon, a Mahometan, turned their Swords against himself, and made themselves Masters of part of his Country.

they in An. 1048. then of Mesopotamia, Syria, Judea, and almost all Asia; and had formed five or six Kingdoms, one in Persia, one in Bithynia, one in Cilicia, one in Damas, whereon Jerusalem depended, and one in Antioch. Now subduing the Persian, they had taken up their Religion, which was the Mahometan; This Reason joyned with their natural Barbarity, inclined them to treat those Christians that inhabited Judea with all manner of cruelties; and besides, they threatened to invade the rest of Asia, and destroy the whole Eastern Empire.

These Croisades and beyond-sea Voyages, the heat whereof lasted for above two hundred years, was the ruine of the Great Lords, and multitudes of the common people. But the Popes and Kings found great advantages towards the making themselves absolute. Those, because they had the Command of these Expeditions, whereof they were the Heads; took into their protection, the Persons and Estates of such as adventured; made the use of Indulgences and Dispensations more common and current then formerly; their Legats collected, and managed the Alms and charitable Contributions that were given for the carrying on these Wars; and it was even made a fair pretence to raise the Tithes upon the Clergy.

The Kings found their reckoning likewise, because all the brave active, and hottest Spirits going into these foreign Provinces, left them a clearer stage, and more easie Government, with less opposition to attain their chiefest ends. The Lords and Grandees sold them their Estates, or Engaged and Mortgaged them to raise Moneys; or at their death they fell to Minors, or Women, from whose hands they were easie to be wrested; And in fine, France which swarmed with prodigious numbers of Men, being evacuated by these great and frequent Pblebotomies, became more gentle and submissive, and their Wills less dependant on the Laws and antient Orders of the Kingdom.

In the first Expedition there adventured above 300000 Men, which were divided in several bodies. Some took their way by Germany, and Hungary; others by Sclavonia: Others again by Italy, to embark in Puglia*; these conducted home the Pope, and restored him to the Chair in despite of his Enemies. They all got into Greece, and thence passing the straight of the Hellespont, or arme St. George, arrived in Bithynia. But those who were led by Peter the Hermit, and Gautier* de Saint Sauveur being ill conducted, were almost all cut in pieces by Solymen Sultan of the Turks in Bithynia.

Amongst the Chief Commanders of these Forces, were Hugh the Great, Brother to King Philip, Robert Duke of Normandy, the Earls Raimond of Toulouse, Stephen de Chartres, Baldwin of Hainault, Hugh de St. Poll, Rotrou du Perche, William de Forez, Rambol of Orange, Baldwin of Mets, Fulke of Guisnes, Stephen d'Amale, another Stephen of Franche Comte, William of Angoulesme, Herpin de Bourges, who sold his Earldom to the King, Boemond Duke of Apulia, Tancred his Nephew, Son of Robert Guisefhard, and above two hundred other Lords of note.

* Or Godfrey.

(All these being passed into Bithynia, elected for their Chief, Godfrey* Duke of Bouillon and the lower Lorrain, Son of Eustace Earl of Boulogne. An Election so glorious for him, that all the Scepters of the Universe together, are not comparable to it.

1096.

For several nights together it was seen to rain down Stars by intervals, but thick and very small, as if some sparks had fallen from the shatter'd Orb.)

and 98.

The City of Nicea in Bithynia, was the first exploit of these Christian Adventurers; The defeat of Solymen's Army, followed with the surrender of the places in Lycania, Lycia, Cilicia and Pamphilia, the Second; and the taking of Antioch, which held them seven Months, and cost them a great deal of Blood and Trouble, the Third.

After they were got in, they went to meet Corban, or Corbaget, General of the Army to the Sultan of Persia or Babylon, fought him, and slew an hundred thousand of his Men, which weakened the power of the Turks so much, that the Sultan of Egypt, who was a Saracen, took from them Judea, and the Holy City of Jerusalem.

He kept it but a little while, the Christian Army besieged it the 9th of June, and carried it by main force the 15th of July. All the chief Commanders agreed to give it, with all its dependencies, and the Title of a Kingdom, to Godfrey of Bouillon, their Prime General; who notwithstanding, was so humble, that he would never suffer them to put the Crown upon his Head, nor give him the Title of King in a City where the King of Kings had been Treated like a Slave.

The Sultan of Egypt with reason apprehending, lest the Christians, after so many advantages should deprive him of his Countrey likewise, without which it is very difficult to preserve the Holy Land. Seeing them therefore much weakened, so that they had scarce 5000 Horse, and 15000 Foot left, he got together an hundred thousand Horse, and four times as many Foot, giving the Conduct of them to a Lieutenant, to cut them off. Godfrey the greatest Soldier of his age charged them so resolutely, that he put them into disorder, and slew above an hundred thousand. So great a Victory gave him all Palestine, one or two places only excepted.

This year therefore commenced the Kingdom of Jerusalem, under which were the County of Edessa, the capital City of Media, the Principality of Antioch in Celsyria, and the County of Tripoly, which was not conquer'd till many years afterwards, upon the Maritime coasts of the Phenician Syria. At that time was Caliph in Babilon, Albugebase Achamet the Son of Muquetady, the Eight and twentieth of the House of Guebase.

The Fame of this Conquest published in the West by those Princes that returned, excited such others as had not been there, to go and signalize their Names. They made therefore a Second Croisade, composed of above 300000 Men, French, Germans, and Italians. William V III. Duke of Aquitain, carried an hundred thousand, two thirds of them being his own Subjects: Hugh le Grand the Kings Brother, and the Earl of Burgundy who had been in the first Expedition, went also in this: and divers Prelats, and many illustrious Ladies would go this Voyage. Godfrey being dead the preceding year, his Brother Baldwin succeeded him in the Kingdom of Jerusalem.

This Army took their way by Hungary and Thrace, and by the straight crossed over into Asia. In their passage Duke William saw the Grecian Emperour, and in too lofty Language, deny'd to pay him Hommage for those Lands he should conquer from the Infidels. The perfidious Emperour being offended in his mind, ordered them such Guides, who having haras'd, and enfeebled them, by the difficulties of the bad ways, and want of Food, made them pass over a River, where the Enemy waiting for them with advantage, kill'd above Fifty thousand in one day, the rest made their escape as they could in Cilicia. Hugh the Kings Brother went to Tarfes, where he died of his wounds.

These Voyages to the Levant renewed, and extreemly increased the hatred the Greeks had conceived against the Latins, or Western People; insomuch that those Traitors did them more mischief a great deal, then the Infidels themselves. Hereafter we shall mention no more of these Wars then what relates to our History.

But we must not forget to tell that they gave beginning to the use of Coats of Arms*. In all times every Nation bore some Figure or Symbol in their Banners or Ensigns. The Roman Legions were distinguished by the different painting of their Shields or Bucklers, and the different Lines traced or drawn upon them. Particular Men did likewise adorn their Shields with devices which made known their birth, or their brave acts, or their Wit and Humour; (Now in these Expeditions to the Holy Land, those that had such Symbols before, made them more proper for them; and those that had none, contrived, and made choice of such as might render them conspicuous and remarkable in Battle (their Armour for the Head, binding them from being known by their Faces) as well as to distinguish them from others; And likewise that those Coats of Arms might serve them as it were for Surnames; for in those days there were yet but few or none.)

Some therefore to shew they were going in these Croisades, took Crosses in their Shields, of which there was infinite variety and several sorts; others to make known they had been in the Levant, and passed the Seas, took Besants, Lions, Leopards, or Escollop Shells. Others framed their Arms of the Linings of their Mantles or Cloaks, according as they were Checkie, Varie, Diapred, Gyroned, Lozanged, Undulated, Paled. Some there were that chose rather to charge their Field with some piece of their Arms, as the Spurs, Lance, Maillets and Sword. Several chose such things as had resemblance to the Surnames people had given them, or to the Lands they held, as what they produced, how situated, or some particularities of their Castles, or such Office they bore. Some there were that chose such things as preserved the memory of their brave Feats of Arms, or some singular Adventure which had hapned to them, or theirs: and others in fine would have such as betokened their inclination, not to mention those that would needs have their Coats out of a meer fantastical Humour, and without any design.

These

These glorious Marks and Badges belonged otherwhile only to the Nobility, and was not the least illustrious part of the Succession of their Noble Families. Now at this time everyone hath them, the meanest villains are the most curious herein; they have not only brought the Rebus's of the little Citizens, Merchants, Cyphers, Shop-keepers, Signs, and Artists tools and implements into their Coats, under the shadow of Crowns, Helmets, and Supporters; but likewise by a confidence not to be endured, they have made choice of the most illustrious things, and given occasion to observe, that there are no better Coats, then the Arms of a Villain or Plebeian.

From the first Croisade, William Rufus King of England, taking the opportunity of his Brother Roberts absence, had seized on the Duchy of Normandy. Sworn with this increase of Power, he promised himself to invade France, because he saw the Excommunicated King, languishing in the Arms of his Concubine, who besides, had but one lawful Son of 15 or 16 years of age, and was destitute both of Money and Friends. Nevertheless this young Prince surpassing his age, did by his Courage and Virtue defend himself so well three years together, that Rufus (was forced to leave him in Peace, and retired again into England.)

In that Countrey letting himself loose to all sorts of infamous pleasures, tyranny, and execrable wickedness, both towards God and Man, he perished in a tragical manner, being as he was Hunting shot with an Arrow, either designedly aimed at him, or by chance, which pierced his very Heart. Henry his younger Brother got into the Throne during the absence of Duke Robert, who was still in the Holy-Land.

Notwithstanding the Popes Excommunications, the King had renewed society with Bertrade, by the consent even of Foulk her Husband, being so infinitely enchanted with that Woman, that he was often seen at her Feet, there to receive all her Commands, as if he had been a Slave.

Some of the Belgick Bishops honour'd the Kings Adultery with the name of Marriage, and on their great Feasts, according to ancient custom, placed the Crown upon her Head, to shew or signify they did not hold her to be Excommunicated; but the Popes Legats denied to communicate with him, and conven'd a Council at Poitiers in July, where he was Excommunicated once more. William Duke of Aquitain, who feared the like Treatment, having committed the like fault, for he entertained a Concubine, and had forsaken his lawful Wife, affronted and abused the Prelats greatly; and perhaps his Sorrow and Repentance for it afterwards prompted him to go to the Holy Land, as we have observed.

The King constant in his Affections, solicited the Popes Favour so earnestly, that he sent some Legats to re-view the Cause.

They assembled a Council at Baugency. The King and Bertrade promised to abstain from each other till the Popes Dispensation, and thus the Council broke up without giving any Judgment. The King continued with the recommendation of the Bishops, to endeavour the obtaining a Dispensation in the Court of Rome; in the end he had it, he was Absolved in the City of Paris, and his Marriage confirmed; so efficacious is constancy, even in things not commendable. The opposition of the Bishops served only to authorize the use of Dispensations from Rome, which since have been very common in all matters and occasions.

Young Lewis, whom they named the Prince of the Kingdom, and was designed King by his Father, (it is not specified in what year) took the Government of Affairs.

PHILIP LEWIS, Surnamed the Grofs, designed King, aged 19 or 20 years.

In those times the Rights * of the French were such, that they could not legally arrest the Lords, nor punish them with death, unless it were for Treason; but only deprive them of their Lands; I mean those they held of the King. (they called them Honours.) This was it that gave them Licence to arme, to oppress the weaker, to rob and plunder, and above all, usurp the Goods of the Church.

Lewis had to do first with Bouchard Lord of Montmorency, against whom he embraced the Cause of the Monks of St. Denis, whose Lands that Lord had pillaged, and having appeared according to an assignation in the Kings Court of Justice, refused to obey the Sentence or Judgment given against him therein. He forced him by destroying and burning all his Villages, and his Castle it self, to submit to Reason.

In like manner he chastised Droco or Dreux de Monchy, and Liannet de Meun, who tyrannized, this over the Churches of Orleans, the other over those of Beaumont.

Also

Also he humbled Matthew, Count of Beaumont upon Oise, Son-in-law to Hugh Earl of Clermont in Beauvoisis, who having half of the Lands of Luzarches in Dowry, had seized upon all, and had despoiled the good Man his Father-in-law.

He durst, or would not intermeddle with the quarrel between the two Norman Brothers, Robert and Henry. The First upon his return from the Holy Land demanded the Kingdom of England of his younger Brother, who had usurped it after the death of William Rufus. The business after three years Negotiation and War, was determined in this manner; Robert An. 1107. having lost a Battle at Tinchebray in Normandy, was made prisoner by his cruel Brother, who deprived him of Sight, by placing a burning Baſon of Brass before his Eyes, whereof he dyed in Prison. Thus the whole Succession of William the Conqueror, remained in Henry the youngest of his three Sons.

In the year 1103. Lewis passed into England to King Henry, I cannot tell upon what design. Bertrade his Mother-in-law, who could willingly have sent him out of the World, solicited Henry to make him away; and this Artifice failing, she caused poison to be given him at his return into France, which put him in great hazard of his Life.

The King to rid himself of the trouble brought upon him by the Family of Montlebery, agreed upon a Marriage with Guy Tronssel, betwixt Philip his Son, and Bertrade, to whom he gave the Earldom of Mantes, on condition that Guy should deliver him the Castle of Montlebery, which he did.

At the same time, or a little after, Guy Lord of Rochefort, Uncle of Tronssel, entirely possessing the Kings Favour, contracted his Daughter Luciana, but ten years old, to Prince Lewis.

Ebles Baron de Roncey a famous Captain, who often raised Soldiers, with which he went into Spain, not so much to fight the Saracens, as to find opportunity to plunder and pillage the Churches, vexed all those of Champagne, upon complaint of the Clergy Lewis hastens to Reims; his Celerity astonished the Plunderer so much, that he laid down his Arms, and promised to forbear those Robberies.

The protection he gave to Thomas Lord of Marle, against Enguerrand de Boves his Father, was not so just. Thomas by means of his Castle of Montagu in Laonnois, committed a thousand Cruelties and Robberies, insomuch that his Father was forced to besiege him. Lewis upon the request of Thomas re-vivified the Castle, at which Enguerrand and the Lords were so enraged, that they declared they owned him no longer for their Sovereign, since he protected the wicked. They were almost ready even to give him battle; but being brought to a Conference, they kissed his Hand, and swore Service to him.

The unhappy Emperour Henry IV. against whom the Popes had stirred up first his eldest Son Conrad, then he being dead, Henry his Second Son, being taken prisoner by this unnatural Child, wrote very pathetic Letters to King Philip and Prince Louis, which begot a great deal of compassion towards him, but no help. Being got out of prison, he died in the City of Liege the Second of August, and Henry V. his Son succeeded him in his quarrel with the Pope, as well as in his Estates.

Pope Paschal II. not willing to go to this Henry, because, said he, the Germans are yet enough humbled, came into France, passed to Clugny, la Charite, Tours, Paris, and went to St. Denis, where the King and his Son paid him their Respects, by bowing down to the very ground. At Chaalons he Treated with the Ambassadors of Henry V. and held a Council at Troyes.

In this Council, whether by the zeal of the Prelats, or the suggestion of Prince Lewis, the Pope pronounced the Dissolution of his Marriage, not yet consummated with Luciana.

Guy de Rochefort discontent for the Divorce of his Daughter, retires from Court. Anseau and Stephen de Garland the Brothers exasperate Prince Lewis's Spirit against him, which they sway. Rochefort commits some hostilities at his Castle of Gournay upon Marne. Lewis besieges the place; a League is formed between Rochefort and Thibault Earl of Blois and Chartres; Lewis goes to meet the Army of these discontented Gentlemen, defeats them, and returning to the Siege takes Gournay.

King Philip quite wasted with excess of pleasures, dies at Melun the 26th of July, aged 56 years, whereof he had Reigned 48 and two Months. From thence he was carried to St. Bennets Abby on the Loire, where he had chosen his Burying place. He was a Prince of a good shape and stature, but his softness and amorous Commerce had rendered his Body unactive and heavy, and stupified his Conscience and Courage.

(By Bertrade were born two Sons, Philip and Florus * or Fleury, and one Daughter named Cecely. The two Sons were Married, but had no Male-issue. The First was Earl of Mantes, Meun upon Tenre, and Montlebery: the Daughters first Husband was Tancred Prince of Antioch, the Second was Ponce * de Toulouza Count of Tripoly.

Church of the Eleventh age.

The Tenth, the Offerings, the Presentations, and the very Churches as we have related, had been infeoffed to the Laity by a strange abuse, whereof the Footsteps are yet to be seen in Gascogne. The Lords took the investiture of the Prince, and held them of him in Fief; so that they could not alienate them without his consent, and when they sold them, it was upon condition of preference for the Curate, or for the Bishop, if he would.

Now to bring them back by little and little to the Ordinaries, it had been ordained by the Councils, especially by that of Mess under King Arnulf, that the Laicks should not put them off of their hands, nor give them to the Monasteries, without the permission of the Diocefan Bishops or the Pope, which was since confirmed by the Council of Rome in the year 1078, and by that of Melfe, An. 1090.

When it hapned then that the Seculars would discharge their Consciences, and restore those Possessions to the Church, which their Fathers had usurped during the Wars; the Ordinaries believed they ought not to suffer the Monks should draw these to themselves, and joyned together to make them revert to the benefit of the Hierarchicall Order.

This was the subject of an obstinate and bloody quarrel between the Bishops and the Monks; the First held divers Assemblies to preserve their Rights. There was one amongst the rest in the Abby of St. Denis, about the end of the Tenth Century, where Seguin de Sens, venerable both for his Age and Virtue presided. The Monks perceiving the Council was going to pronounce against them, raised a furious Sedition to scatter them. Abbon de Fleury was accused to have been the Boute-feu *. How ever it were, Seguin was wounded with an Axe betwixt the two Shoulders; and Arnold d'Orleans, a particular enemy to Abbon, had lost his Life there, had he not fled away betimes.

Learned Men.

As the conduct of the Prince is the Rule to all his Kingdom, the Piety of Robert served not a little to contain the Ecclesiasticks in their Duty, and incline them to the exercise of their Religion, and the study of good Literature. We ought certainly to reckon him the first amongst the Learned Men of this age, not so much for his quality and rank, as for his capacity, which was not little for those times; and to him we may add Gaufrin his bastard Brother, Arch-Bishop of Bourges, who amongst other Works, composed a Discourse about the causes of the shewre of Blood that had fallen An. 1017. in Aquitain for three days together, and had this of wonderful in it, That it could not be wiped or rubbed off from any Flesh, Cloaths or Stones, but out of Wood the spots might be easily taken away, and leave no stain behind. Amongst other persons of erudition, those that most excell'd, were * Foulk and Yves, Bishops of Chartres, Leoderick of Sens, Gervais de Reims, Chancelour of France, Beranger Arch-Deacon of Angers, Hildebert du Mans his Disciple and Admirer, and Gefroy de Vendosme (these two passed very far in the other age) Lanfranc Abbot of St. Stephens at Caen, Durand Bishop of Liege, and the Monks, Sigebert of Gembours, Glaber of Clugny, and Helgaud de Fleury, who all three labour'd in History.

* Or Fulk.

Saints.

We must take notice besides those most eminent Servants of God, Odillon, whom we have already mentioned, and Hugh, both Abbots of Clugny, who being favoured by Heaven, were in great credit with the Princes of this world; of Thierry Bishop of Orleans, Burchard de Vienne, Bruno de Toul, all three in the beginning of this Century: and in the latter part of it, Austinde d'Auch, Hugh de Grenoble, Arnold de Soissons, and Maurille de Rouen. Add to these Prelats Brune who was Institutor of that most austere Order of the Chartreux; and Robert Abbot of Moleme, who was Institutor or Founder of the Cisteaux. For Robert d'Arbrefer he is not yet in the Catalogue of Saints.

Heretics.

France was not exempted from Heresies; In the year 1000, there started up a Phanatique Peasant, named Leutard, in the Burrough of Kerrou, within the Bishoprick of Chabalons, who broke down the Images, Preached that they ought not to pay Tithes, and maintained, that the Prophets had not always spoke those things that were good; he was followed by an innumerable multitude of the Populace, who believed ved him to be inspired of God: his Bishop (it was Guibin *) having easily convinced him, and afterwards disabused those ignorant people; the unhappy wretch, in despair to see himself forsaken, cast himself into a Well, his Head foremost.

Some years afterwards came from Italy I know not what Woman, infected with the dotage of the Manicheans, which she inspired into a couple of the most Noble, and most Learned Clergy-men of Orleans, and those into several other people of several conditions. King Robert who made his Residence in that City, being informed hereof, assembled a Council, An. 1017, to convince them; but not able to disinfatuate them, they kindled a fire in a neighbouring Field to burn them, if they persisted in those Follies. These obstinate Zealots far from dreading those Flames, ran to them, Thirteen were burnt; Ten whereof were Canons of St. Croix.

The same severity was practised towards all of that Sect that could be discovered in any place, especially at Toulouze An. 1022. But the remainders or Seeds of those ashes, or (as some say) the frequent Commerce the French, who travelled to the Levant, had with the Bulgarians, who were Manicheans, soon after raised up this Phrensie again in Languedoc and Gascogne.

The error of the Sacramentaries was more subtil, and therefore did not make so great a progress. Job. Scot. Erigene, and other half Learned, and too subtil Wits, disputing about the incomprehensible Mystery of the Holy Sacrament, according to the notions and terms of humane Philosophy, had raised doubts and difficulties in the minds of Men, touching the real presence of the Body of JESUS CHRIST in the Holy Eucharist. We may believe that even in the Tenth age, some scruples had been made by people contending herein, since there were miracles wrought to prove it.

But the First that durst openly say contrary to the belief of all former ages, that the Holy Sacrament was but the Figure of the Body of our Lord, was Berenger, Arch-Deacon of Angers, Treasurer and * Super-intendant of St. Martin de Tours. As he was one of the most Learned Men of his time, and had such charms in his Discourse and Entertainment, that he was followed by vast numbers of Disciples, for which reason his adversaries said he was a Magician: he drew to his party Bruno Bishop of Angers, and very many others, who spread his Doctrine thorough France, Italy and Germany. Durandus Bishop of Liege, and Adelman his Rector, afterwards Bishop of Bresse, stopt the current of it by their Writings; and King Henry by his Authority: so that he kept close and quiet for some years. At the end whereof moving the question afresh, Pope Leo IX. condemned it in the Council of Rome, and in that of Vercel, both in An. 1050. In the last they ordered Scots Book to be burned, which was the Well from whence he had drawn his error. Five years afterwards Hildebrand Legat from Pope Vicior II. being sent into France to reform the Clergy, convened a Council at Tours, where he compell'd him to abjure his Error, and subscribe his Retraction.

* Or Schöbmaster.

For all this he desisted not from his former ways, they were fain to cite him before the Council which was held at Rome, An. 1059. where he was ordered to burn Scots his Book with his own hand, and Sign to a Confession of Faith composed by Cardinal Humbert: but as soon as he was at liberty he renews the Dispute, which lasted till the year 1079. when Gregory VII. having summon'd him before another Council in Rome, managed this turbulent Spirit so well, that he owned and confessed both from his Heart and Tongue, the substantial Conversion of the Bread and Wine into the Body and Blood of JESUS CHRIST.

Being returned into France, he took up the Habit of St. Bennet for his penance, and retired into the Priory of St. Cosmo, which is in an Island of the Loire, about two Leagues from Tours, whither he drew several Cannons of St. Martins, who were enchanted with the sweetness of his Conversation. He passed the rest of his days there with great austerity, and died very Religiously, An. 1091. aged above Fourscore years.

What care soever was used to reform the disorders, and take away the Weeds and Darnel out of the Church, yet they could never pluck up the most spreading and fruitful root of Simony. I shall give you a little taste of it. In a Council which the Legat Hildebrand held at Lions, An. 1055. there were 45 Bishops, and 23 other Prelats, who without any other accusation but their own Consciences, publicly avowed this crime, and renounced their Benefices: An example very common as to the fault, but singular for the repentance.

I do not know any times wherein so many Churches and Abbeys were built, as in these days. King Robert himself founded above 20. There was not one Lord but valued valued himself in so doing. The most wicked affected the Title of Founders; whilst they ruined the Churches on the one hand, they built on the other, and made their Sacrilegious Offerings to God of those things they had ravished from the poor, and needy.

The fancy that reigned in Mens minds at the beginning of this Century is most remarkable, which was to pull down old Churches to build new, nay, even the fairest and noblest, to erect others after their own mode.

This change of material Walls, seemed to be a sign of that change was made in those times in the whole Face, and if we may say so, the Body of the Gallican Church. From the Eighth Century the Popes had found out means to diminish the Authority of Metropolitans, obliging them by a Decree in Council, held at Mentz by St. Boniface, necessarily to receive the Pall at Rome, and subject themselves Canonically to obey the Roman Church in all points. A Profession since changed into an Oath of Fidelity, under Gregory VII. They had likewise attributed to themselves, exclusively to all others, the Right of Separating, or Dissolving the Spiritual Marriage which a Bishop contracteth with his Church, and to give him the liberty of Marrying with another, they had enlarged their Patriarchal Jurisdiction over all the West, by necessitating the Bishops to have confirmation from them, for which they paid certain rates, which in time were converted into what they call Annates; in admitting the appellations of Priests, and in taking cognizance of things that belong only to Bishops.

Nay, much more, they had as it were annihilated the Provincial Councils, in taking away their Sovereignty by a cassation of their Judgments; insomuch as those Assemblies were in the end laid aside as useless, yielding no other satisfaction to such as resorted thither, but the displeasure of having their Sentences oftentimes reversed at Rome, without any proofs, or any reasons brought before them. Gregory II. made it a Rule of common Right, That none should be so bold as to condemn any that appealed to the Holy See.

But they never made a greater breach in the liberties of the Gallican Church, then when they introduced the Belief, that no Councils could be called without their Authority; and after they had made divers attempts to set up perpetual Vicars in Gall, found out the way to have their Legats admitted and received. To this purpose they first made use of a Canon of the Council of Sardique, which gave them power to send Legats into the Provinces, to review any Process of the Deposition of Bishops, where complaint was made. After they had accustomed the French Prelats to suffer the Legats in such Cases, they gained by little and little another Point, during the weakness of their Princes, which was to send a Legat whether there were any such Process, or Appeal, or not; and finally when they had received the Yoak, Alexandre II. settled it for a maxime, that the Pope ought to have the whole Government of all the Churches.

Of these Legats, some of them had the whole Kingdom under their jurisdiction, others a part only. They came with Authority to Depose Bishops, or the Metropolitan himself, when they pleased; to Assemble Councils in their District, to preside with the Metropolitan, and precede him, to make Canons, to send to the Pope the decision of such things to which the Bishops would not consent; as likewise all Acts of the Council, which he disposed of at his Will; and it is to be observed that their Suffrage counterpoised those of all the Bishops; and often, by their sole Authority, they judged of the Elections of Bishops, of Benefices, of the Excommunications of Laics, and other such like: so that those Assemblies formerly so Holy and Sovereign for the Discipline, having now no more power, were to speak properly, rather Councils to assert the Will of the Pope, then lawful and free Councils.

Now after Alexandre II. had ordained, that the Bishops of those Provinces, whether the Legation extended, should be at the charges for their subsistence, and defray their expences; and that Gregory VII. had added to the Oath the Bishops take when they receive the Pall, that they would Treat them Honourably at their going, and upon their return, and would furnish them with all necessities; the profit of those employments was not less great then the Honour and Dignity. So that the desire of gain made them court these employments with great earnestness; and the Popes bestowed them as rewards upon their creatures. There was nothing but going and coming of Legats, and as soon as one had cramm'd his Purse, immediately another came in his place. Insomuch as the Bishops and Clergy extremely tired, and and impoverished by these perpetual exhaustings, did not look upon these Legations any longer as a remedy, but as a disease. In effect, it became so importunate and vexatious, that at length they were forced to consider of some moderation, and not to receive any more Legats, but upon very important occasions.

We should never have done if we quoted all the Councils that were assembled in this Century. We find a great number in the Epistles of Tves de Chartres, Gregory VII. and Gefroy de Vendosme. I will likewise set down some, An. 1003. The Bishops of France approved the Marriage of King Robert with Berthe; and the year after, being constrained by the Anathemas from Rome, they revoked their Sentence, and Excommunicated the King.

Glaber relates that many were celebrated in Italy, and in Gall, about certain usages of no great importance; as to consider, whether they should Fast on the days between the Ascension and Pentecost; permit the Benedictines to Sing the Te Deum on the Lent Sundays; and celebrate the Feast of the Annunciation the 25th of March, or else the 18th of December, as the Spaniards did, according to the Decree of their Tenth Council of Toledo. The decisions were, That those Fasts should be all abolished, excepting upon Whitsuntide Eve; the Benedictines maintained in their Singing the Te Deum in Lent; and the Festival of the Annunciation be observed in March.

King Robert convened several Councils, particularly one about the year 1017. at Orleans, to extirpate the Heresy of the Manicheans, which sprung up apace in that City; another in the same place An. 1029. for the Dedication of St. Agnes Church, which he had built there. The same year was held one at Limoges, Gauzelin de Bourges presiding, about the contest started, Whether they must give St. Martial, the Bishop of Limoges, the Title of Apostle, as the Limosins would have it, or only that of Confessor, as some others maintained. These frivolous questions did all of them attribute the Foundations of their Churches to the Apostles or Disciples of Jesus Christ, and to that end invented Fables, and perverted all History.

This Council had not power enough to determine this question, it was again debated with great contention in that of Bourges, An. 1033 in the second of Limoges, and that of Beauvais, which were held in the year 1034. and withal, they consulted the Holy Chair herein, where it was decided, that St. Martial ought to be revered as an Apostle.

In this second Council of Limoges, complaint being made concerning Absolutions granted to such as being Excommunicated, addressed themselves to the Pope; it was said, That none could receive Penance or Absolution from the Pope, if he were not sent thither by his Bishop.

The same Glaber writes, that the same year 1034. there were divers Councils in the Provinces of France, particularly in Guyenne, for the reformation of Manners, which all people most earnestly desired, thereby to appease the wrath of God, who had sorely afflicted France with Famine. Amongst divers Decrees, there was one which Ordained upon pain of Excommunication, abstinence from Wine upon Fridays, and Flesh upon Saturdays, unless Sickness, or some great Festival hapned upon those days. Gerard the Bishop of Cambray rejected this Decree as a Novelty, contrary to the Orders and Rules of the Church, and which had no Foundation, but I know not what Revelation.

These Assemblies labour'd likewise to secure what belonged to the Church from the Rapine and Thefts of some Lords, and restore the Discipline, for which some Canons were made in the Second of Limoges. That of Beauvais was held Fifteen days after that of Bourges. Pope Leo IX. being come into France, Convened one at Reims, towards Autumn, An. 1049. Victor II. One at Toulouze, An. 1056. To extirpate abuses, and especially Simony, which is more difficult to be taken from the Church, then their Riches which is the cause of it.

King Henry desiring to have his Son Philip Crowned, Assembled the Prelats and Lords of the Kingdom at Paris, An. 1059. or 60. Amat, Bishop of Oleron, Legat from Rome in Aquitania Tertia, and Narbonensis held divers; Two in Gascogne, One wherein he Excommunicated such as detained any Goods belonging to the Church; another wherein he Dissolved the Marriage of Centulle, Viscount of Bearn; and another also at the Burrough of Deols in Berry, with Hugh, Legat and Arch-Bishop of Lyon, about the affairs of that Abby. The same having the the Popes Legation in the lesser Bretagne, Convened one An. 1079. in that Province, to take some course against the abuses of false penances, that is to say, their imposing of slight penances for great crimes.

About the end of the year 1080. there were three, One at Lyons, where Hugh, de Die, the Popes Legat caused the Sentence to be confirmed, whereby Manasser, Arch-Bishop of Reims had been deposed; One at Avignon, where he consecrated another Hugh, Bishop of Grenoble, and the Third at Meaux, in which Ursion de Soissons was deposed, and Arnold a Monk of St. Medard intalled in his place.

The year following the same Hugh, and Richard, Abbot of Marseille, Cardinals, called one at Poitiers; Amat d' Oleron Legat in Aquitain came likewise thither. They provisionally ordained a Divorce of William Earl of Poitiers from his Wife, because of their consanguinity.

That of Toulouze in An. 1090. was Convened by the Legats of Urban II. Some Rules were there made concerning Causes Ecclesiastical, and the Bishop of that City purged himself of certain things imposed upon him.

The most famous of all was the Council of Clermont, An. 1095. where the same Pope with great zeal Preached up the First Croisade; and to obtain the assistance of the Holy Virgin towards those that should undertake the Expedition, ordained the Clergy to recite the Office, or Heures * of our Lady, which the Chartreux and Hermits instituted by Peter Damianus, had already received amongst them. There was one more at Tours the year following, to prepare them to that expedition of the Holy Land.

The last year of this Century they had one likewise at Poitiers, whereat John and Benedict, Cardinal Legats presided; King Philip was here struck with an Anathema, for having retaken Bertrade; and the Kingdom of France put under an interdiction. The precedent year, there had been one held at Autun, and the following, there was also one at Baugency for the same business.

The prohibition of Marriages, even to the seventh Degree, extremely embarrass'd the Eleventh and Twelfth Century; and as that rigour was excessive, the Princes broke thorough without much scruple, and afterwards became obstinate against Excommunications, with so much the more Reason and Pretence, as having the opinions of many great Lawyers, who reckoned these Degrees after another manner than the Church-men; so that it served for little else but a specious colour for such as were dissatisfied with their Wives, to procure their Divorce.

The custom practised in the Church of Jerusalem, where because of the too great confluence, the Laity communicated only under the species of Bread, introduced it self by little and little, into the Western Church; and there is some appearance that the Canon of the Council of Clermont was favourable to it, ordaining, That those that communicated should take the two species separately (this was to avoid that abuse of the Greeks, who soaked or dipped the Bread in the Wine) Unless in case of necessity, or by PRECAUTION, That is to say, if there were danger of spilling the Chalice, as when the multitude and throng of Communicants was * too great.

There was like a change in the Government of some Churches; the Sees of Gascogne, which had been vacant above two ages, were filled; the Bishopricks of Arras and Cambray, both which had been Governed by one Pastor since Saint Vaast, began each to have their own, after the death of Gerard II. who held them both; and Manasser was the first Bishop of Cambray, An. 1095.

The same thing was attempted for Noyon and Tournay, which had been joyned since St. Medard: but King Philip opposing, they remained so united till the year 1146. When Simon the Son of Hugh the Great being Bishop thereof, they were divided. Anselme a Monk of Soissons, and Abbot of St. Vincent de Laon, was the first that held the See of Tournay.

An. 1179 Gregory VII. by his Bulls gave, or as others say, confirmed to the Arch-Bishop of Lyons the Primacy of the four Lyonnoises only, being perhaps perswaded, as some others, that Lyons was in antient times the capital City and first Church of the Galls. The Arch-Bishop of Tours was the first who submitted, but those of Sens and Rouen opposed it with all their might: and although this establishment had been maintained in the Council of Clermont, and since by judgment contradictory, which was given in the Court of Rome, Anno 1099. they had much ado to submit themselves; and it was, as I believe, during this Contest that he of Rouen began, out of emulation, to take up the Title of Primate of Normandy.

* Prayers for certain Hours.

* They permitted then in that case to communicate under one species.

The Abbot Odillon being excited by divers Revelations to ease the Souls that were in Torments after Death, ordained the Monks of his Congregation of Clugny to make a Commemoration every year the day after All-Saints, in their Prayers and Divine Service; which the Universal Church received soon after.

About the end of his Age three famous Religious Orders had their Birth; That of the Chartreux Anno 1086. by Bruno Canon of Reims, and St. Hugh Bishop of Grenoble, who were the first that retired into the horrid Solitude of the Chartreuse in Dauphine, which gave name to this Order. That of St. Anthony at Vienne, in the same Country, by a Gentleman named Gaston, who devoted his Person and Estate to the assistance of those that were seized with the Dilemper called St. Anthony's Fire, and came to implore the intercession of that Saint at Vienne, where they had his Corps, brought thither from Constantinople by Jocelin Count d' Albon, in the time of King Lotaire Son of Louis Transmarine. This Gaston got together some Companions, who at first were of the Laity, but soon after they became Friars under the Rules of St. Augustin, and planted their Congregation in several Provinces.

In the year 1098. Robert Abbot of Molesme instituted the Order of the Cisterciens, being as it were a younger Sprig of that of St. Bennet, and became so potent that for more then Twenty years it governed almost all Europe both in Spirituals and Temporals.

We must not omit how Robert, Native of the Village d' Arbrefel in the Diocess of Rennes, founded the Order of Fontevault, whose Monasteries are double, of Men and Women, living according to the Rule and wearing the Habit of St. Bennet. This Robert was at first Archdeacon of Rennes, then had a particular Mission from Pope Urban II. to Preach to the People. Finding he was every where followed by an infinite multitude of either Sex, he built Cells for them in the Woods of Fontevault three Leagues from Saumur on the Confines of Poitou; and then shutting up the Women apart (this was perhaps after the good Advice of Gefroy de Vendosme) he made a large Monastery, which produced many others; in each of them the Abbess Commands, and she of Fontevault is the General of the whole Order.

About the year 1048. began a famous Dispute between the Benedictine Monks of St. Denis in France, and those of St. Himmeran of Ratisbonne, these having given out a report that they had the Body of St. Denis the Areopagite, and that it was bestow'd upon them by King Arnold. They held a famous Assembly at St. Denis upon it, where the Contenders of either side, having fasted and pray'd, the Shrine of this Saint was opened; and there his Corps was found intire, excepting one Arm which Pope Stephanus III. had carried to Rome. Those of Ratisbonne would not yield for all this; but always maintained their Supposition.

The great Zeal People then had for Reliques, prompted such as hold nothing so Sacred as Money, to go for some to Jerusalem and the East, to steal Reliques wherever they could come at them, and oftentimes likewise to suppose and bring Counterfeit ones to make Merchandize: and the great Lords gave dear Prices for them, not only out of Devotion, but also to enrich their Towns and Castles, by the affluence of those People that came to behold them.

Lewis the Gros, King XXXIX.

POPES,

PASCAL II. Nine years six Months during this Reign.

GELASIUS II. Elected in January 1118. S. One year.

CALISTUS II. Elected in Feb. 1119. S. Ten years, ten Months.

HONORIUS II. Elected in Decem. 1124. S. Five years, one Month and an half.

INNOCENT II. Elected in Feb. 1130. S. Thirteen years seven Months, whereof Seven years seven Months during this Reign.

THis Prince no less Massive of Body than his Father, but brave, active, vigilant, exposing himself boldly to all Labours and all Dangers, had undertaken to suppress the Pilferings and Licentiousness of the Lords. They had made several Leagues against him; and at that time there was one, whereof Guy Earl of Rochefort was the chief Promoter; and, this perhaps, had hindered him from being Crowned in his Fathers life time.

The fear of this League obliged him to hasten his Coronation, so that five days after the Death of Philip he was Anointed and Crowned at Orleans by Gislebert Archbishop of Sens, assisted by all his Suffragants. He would not have it performed at Reims, because Rodolph who was chosen Archbishop by the Clergy, and confirmed by the Pope, had not his approbation, for which reason he disturbed him in the enjoyment, and Rodolph thereupon had put the City under an Interdiction.

The War raised by Guy de Rochefort and his Friends, lasted still. The new King besieged Chevreuse and other little Castles which the other party defended well. Mean time Guy died, and Hugh surnamed de Crescy, his second Son, succeeded to the Animosity of his Father.

* See before Fol.

Hugh Lord Puiset in Beauce, mighty famous for his Robberies, was of the League. Eudes Earl of Corbeil, Grandson to Earl Bouchard*, having refused to joyn with the Male-contents, Crescy, though his Brother by the Mother, made him Prisoner, and shut him up in the Castle of la Ferte-Baudouin. The King set him free soon after, taking the place, partly by Intelligence.

At the same time the King had War with Henry King of England and Duke of Normandy. The Subject was, that that Prince did not keep the Promise he made upon his doing Hommage for Normandy, to pull down the Castle of Gisors, built on this side the Epte, a River which served as a Boundary between the Territories of the French and the Normans.

The Difference put to Discussion between the Deputies of the one and other side, and the Parties not able to agree the Fact; King Lewis offer'd to prove it by Combat Body to Body. Some idle Jefters said, the two Kings had best fight upon the Bridge which shook and was ready to fall. Henry having refused this Challenge, they they came to a Battle, the English lost it, and their broken Remains fled to Meulan.

Robert Earl of Flanders pursuing them too rashly, was wounded to Death. His Son Baldwin surnamed * a la Hache succeeded him.

* Of the Hatchet.

Under the favour of this War, the Male-contents drew Philip the Kings Brother to their Party: The power and greatness of Amaury de Montfort his Uncle by the Mother, the credit of his Mother Queen Bertrade and of Foulk Earl of Anjou, afterwards King of Jerusalem, his Brother heightened his courage. He had two strong Holds, Mantes and Montlebery; the King besieged Mantes, and forced it to surrender.

For that of Montlebery, the better to keep it, they would have given it to Hugh de Crescy with a Daughter of Amaury's in Marriage: but the King prevented it, and restored it to Milon Vicount de Troyes who had some right to it.

He after this attack'd le Puiset in favour of Thibault Earl of Chartres, who was mightily molested by Hugh, Lord of that Castle, and took the place together with the Lord, whom he kept under a good strong Guard in Cujil-Landon.

This War begot another. Thibault would build a Fort on the limits of the Country of Puiset: the King obstructing him, he maintain'd he had promised him leave to do it: and therefore did him wrong, which he offer'd to prove by Combat, proposing his Chamberlain for Champion, in his own stead, he being yet too young. The King on his part appointed his Grand Seneschal Anseau de Garlande: but the Champions could find no Court or Judge in the Kingdom, who would secure them the field of Battle. Perhaps the King might underhand obstruct it.

The Earl therefore declares War against the King with the Assistance of Henry King of England, his Mothers Brother, and the Duke of Bretagne; for according to the Customs of those times the Lords thought they might do it, when they apprehended there was a denial of Justice. With him joyned the Lords, Hugh de Crescy, Guy de Rochefort returned from the Holy Land, Lancelin de Dammartin, Payen de Mont-Jeay, Rodolph de Beaugency, Milon Vicount de Troyes, and Eudes Earl of Corbeil.

To tell it in gros, the King received a great deal of trouble, and made them suffer so much too, that he brought most of them to their Duty one after another. Eudes being dead during these Transactions, he Treated with Hugh de Puiset who was to inherit that Earldom, and making him resign his Right provided he would give him his liberty, put himself in possession of that place, of great importance at that juncture.

Some time after Hugh having re-fortified le Puiset, and committing a thousand Insolencies upon the Neighbouring Countries, he besieged him in that place: but the Champenois having the rest that were in League together for him, failed not to come to relieve it. Two great Battles were fought, one to the Kings disadvantage, the other to his advantage; after that they talked of an Accommodation, and Hugh obtained his Pardon.

Milon Vicount de Troyes whom the King had re-settled in Montlebery, had withdrawn himself from the rest of the Leagued Party, Crescy not being able to draw him in again surprized him by Treachery; and after he had led him about to divers Castles bound and fetter'd, not knowing where to secure him so, but the King would deliver him, nor how to let him go but he would take his Revenge, he caused him to be Strangled in the night, and thrown out of a Window at the Castle of Gomet. He would have had it believ'd that he had broken his Neck, endeavouring to make his escape; but the Crime was discover'd; and the King with great diligence besieged the Castle of Gomet. The wretched Murderer being condemned to justify himself by Duel in the Court of Amaury de Montfort, had not the courage to expose himself to that hazard; and therefore finding himself Convicted, he came and cast himself at the Kings Feet, gave up his Lands to him, and put on the Habit of a Monk as his Penance.

Hugh du Puiset being Revolted the third time, the King again besieged that Castle, razed it, and then turned that Rebel out of all his Estate. This unfortunate Man having in a Sally killed Anseau de Garlande Grand Seneschal and Favourite to the King, and not daring to remain any longer in the Country, went a while after to the Holy Land, which in those times was the Refuge of Banish'd and Condemned People, as it was likewise of true Penitents.

Thomas de Marle Lord of Coucy had been Excommunicated and Degraded of his Nobility Anno 1114. by the Popes Legat in the Council of Beauvais, for the Sacrilege and Robberies he committed upon the Churches, and the People belonging to the Bishopricks of Reims, Laon and Amiens. That Sentence had inflamed his 1119.

Rage to do yet worse, even to the setting Fire to the City of Laon, and the Noble Church of Notre-Dame, (I believe it was that of Lieffe) to Maltacre the Bishop Galderic, and cut off that Finger whereon he wore the Episcopal Ring. The King who flew about every where with incredible Celerity, ran that way before this Robber had seized the Tower of Laon, forced and razed his Castles of Crecy and Nogent, and brought him to Reason.

1116, & 17. He quelled likewise another puny Tyrannet named Adam, that ravaged all the Neighbourhood of Amiens. He had gotten possession of the City Tower which was very strong, and gave a great deal of trouble: but the King having begirt it for two years, gained it and razed it.

About Ten or Eleven years afterwards Thomus draws the King again upon him, by the like Deportment, so that he went and besieged his Castle of Coucy. It hapned that making their approaches, Rodolph Count de Vermandois met him, wounded him, and took him Prisoner. He was carried to Laon where he died miserably of his Wounds.

* Firebrand. 1117. Henry King of England was the *Boute-feu, and Support of all these Revolts: King Lewis in Retaliation had stirred up against him his Nephew William Son of the Deceased Duke Robert, whom he admitted to do Hommage for the Dukedom of Normandy, and gave him the Castle and City of Gisors, the first occasion of the Quarrel. This Nephew being thus supported, put his Uncle to so much trouble that he was fain to make a Peace with Lewis, promising to leave all the Rebels to his Mercy.

1118. * Archambaud Lord of Bourbon being dead, Hemon his Brother surnamed Vaire-Vache, under pretence of claiming his Share detained the whole Possession to the prejudice of the Son, and Treated his Subjects, especially the Clergy very Tyrannically. The King assigns him to plead his Right before the Parliament. Upon his refusal to appear, he went in Person to compel him, and besieged his Castle of Germigny. Hemon dreading his Wroth, came and craved his Pardon: he received him to Mercy, and took both him and his Nephew along with him, to bring them to an agreement of all their Disputes.

The Quarrel between the Emperor and Pope concerning the right of Investitures, being burst out anew with more heat then ever. Pascal II. being Pope, the Emperor Henry V. had seized both upon him and all his Cardinals, and constrained him to allow him the privilege of nominating two Bishopricks. Afterwards that Pope being at liberty annull'd that Treaty in the Council of Latran, and Excommunicated the Emperor.

Emperor Foh. Comnenius, Son of Alexis in Aug. Reigned Twenty four years nine Months; and Henry V. still. 1118. In this year 1118. Galasius was elected in the room of Pascal, or Paschalis, but he sought not the approbation of the Emperor, who being displeased at that neglect or contempt, caused one Maurice Burdin to be chosen, a Limosin by Birth, and Archbishop of Braga in Portugal, to whom they gave the name of Gregory.

1119. Galasius being then driven from Rome took his way into France, to hold a Council there, as he did in the City of Vienne: but he died the same year in the Abby of Clugny.

1119. The Cardinals that had followed him elected Gny Archbishop of Vienne, who took the name of Calixtus II. He was the Brother of Stephen Earl of Burgundy, and Uncle of Adele or Alix Queen of France, who was the Daughter of his Sister and of Humbert Earl of Morienne: and this consideration did fortifie the Holy See with great Alliances against the Emperor.

1119. The whole Kingdom of France having taken his part, he came from Vienne to Toulouze, where he held a Council. Thence he went to Reims where he called another, in which divers Canons were made to take away Simony, the Investiture of Benefices from Laicks, Concubines from Priests, and the selling of Sacraments. The King was present, the Emperor Henry would not be there, and having refused to part with the right of Investitures, was Excommunicated.

There was almost the same contest and difference betwixt the Popes and the Kings of France; These pretending the Election and Provisions of the Popes were not sufficient without their consent. So that it had begot great troubles in the Churches of Bourges, Reims, Beauvais and others. But the Popes durst not shock these Kings so rudely. It was good Policy not to make so many Enemies at once, to keep France in reserve as a Refuge against the Emperors; and bring down the Germans first, because they troubled them most.

The Peace between the two Kings Lewis and Henry, was of no long duration. The Friends of the late Duke Robert and William his Son declared for Lewis, and the Earls Earls of Anjou and of Flanders served him zealously: as Thibald Earl of Champagne served Henry who was his Uncle.

Baldwin Earl of Flanders being wounded upon an assault of the little Castle of Bures in Caux, did so inflame his Wound with his Debauches, that he died of it at Amale. Charles surnamed the Good, Son of his Sister and Canut King of Denmark, succeeded him in the Earldom of Flanders, and maintain'd himself there courageously, notwithstanding that Clemence of Burgundy Mother of Baldwin, who was again Married to Godfrey Earl of Louvain, endeavoured to make it fall into the hands of a Bastard of Flanders named William of Tpres who had Married her Niece.

After a world of Ravages, Firings, Sieges, Surprizes, and Plunderings of Places; after two great Battles fought betwixt the two Kings, one in the Plain of Beneville near Noyon on Andelle, where the French had the worst, the other near Breuil where the success was doubtful: Pope Calixtus, as the common Father, being come expressly to Gisors, brought them to agree, by persuading them to restore what places they had taken to each other. Thus the Dutchy remained to Henry; who gave it to his eldest Son William, surnamed *Adelin, in wrong of William his Nephew.

This Peace did not put an end to his grief and troubles; For a few weeks after he lost his three Sons, and with them above Three hundred Gentlemen, the flower of his Nobility and his best Captains. It was a strange misfortune. They being Embarked at Harfleur to go into England, their Seamen who were drunk, split the Ship as they were getting out of Harbor. And at the same time his Nephew's Friends and Partisans stirred up new Disturbances in Normandy, and re-engaged the King of France to uphold them. Which renewed the Desolations of that Province.

In Anno 1119. died Alain surnamed Fergeant Duke of Bretagne Son of Hoel, who departed this Life Anno 1084. His Son Conan surnamed the Gris or Ermengard succeeded him.

This Alain, if we believe the Historian of Bretagne, prescribed certain Forms and Rules for the doing Justice in his Country, where before it was administered very confusedly. For he established a Seneschal at Renes, to whom he would have all Persons to resort, unless those of the County of Nantes who had one likewise; and began to hold an Assembly or Parliament, which judged of Appeals from the Seneschals of Rennes and Nantes, for in Matters Criminal there lay no Appeal. There were no certain and fixed Officers, no more then any certain times for sitting. They afterwards made a President in the absence of the Chancellor and a Master of Requests.

The death of Hugh III. of that name Duke of Burgundy, to whom succeeded Odon his eldest Son, who Married Mary the Daughter of Thibault Earl of Champagne.

The War grew hotter in Normandy betwixt the French and King Henry, and was carried on with various success. But Henry found nothing more troublesome then his Domestick Officers and Servants, who had framed a Conspiracy against his Life. He could confide in no body, he trembled at the approach of all that came near him, he died a thousand times a day for fear they would Murther him, and in the night shifted Beds five or six times, and changed his Guards, not thinking he was safe in any place, believing there were none but Enemies about him.

The Emperor reconciled himself with the Pope, and laid down the Investitures: But his Wrath still boiling in him, would needs discharge it self upon France.

He had Married Matilda, Daughter of the English King, for that reason, as likewise for the Resentment he conceived because Lewis had protected Pope Calixtus, he raised a very great Army to destroy and lay that City of Reims flat with the ground, where Calixtus had held the Council against him. Lewis on his side resolved to draw all the Forces of his whole Kingdom together, even to the very Priests and Friars, so that in a short time he had 200000 Men out of the Isle of France, Champagne and Picardy only. The Emperor having information of these prodigious Levies, found it safer for him not to come into the Country of Messin, but retire.

At his return Triumphant Lewis brings back the Martyrs Holy Standard, (called the Oriflamme) and deposits it again in St. Denis, whence he had taken it, rendred Solemn Thanks to those Glorious Saints, carried their Shrines upon his Shoulders, which had been taken down and exposed on the high Altar during all the time of the War, and made or confirmed several Grants to that Abby, especially the Fair of Lendit out of the City, for they had one already within.

Upon this occasion we may observe the difference there was between the Forces of France and the Kings. For when he made a War for himself, he could have only the People of those Countries properly in his own possession, and they served but unwillingly; but when it was the Kingdoms Cause or Concern, all the Forces of France were in action, every Lord came in Person, and brought all his Subjects along with him.

1125. The Emperor Henry being dead, the Princes of Germany brought in Lotaire * Duke of Saxony; who likewise retaining the Kingdom of Burgundy as united to the Empire, Renold Duke of Burgundy refused to acknowledge him. For which he would have deprived him of his Earldom, and have bestowed it upon Bertold Duke of Zeringhen; and this begot a bloody War between these two Houses, who fought till the time of Frederick I. who Married Beatrix the Daughter of Renold.

1126. This year 1126. the King received the Complaints made by the Bishop of Clermont concerning the Usurpations and Tyrannies of Robert Earl d' Auvergne, and going thither in Person forced the Earl, notwithstanding the Rocks and Castles of his High-Lands or Mountains, to submit to Reason.

Five or six years after, the repeated Violences of the same Earl engaged him to make a second Expedition and besiege Montferrand. The Duke of Aquitain came to relieve his Vassal; but having from the height of a Mountain taken a view of the great Strength and Forces the King had with him, he sent to offer him all Obedience, and brought the Earl as far as Orleans to demand Pardon, and submit to all that should be enjoined him.

1126. Death of William VIII. Duke of Aquitain Aged Fifty six years. He left his Possessions to William IX. his Son, who was the last Duke of those Countries. The Father had Married Emma only Daughter of William Earl of Arles and Toulouse, and Brother of Raimond de Saint Gilles. By her he pretended to the Earldom of Toulouse: but Raimond de Saint Gilles said his Brother had sold it to him, before he went to the Holy Land. It caused a War between William Duke of Aquitain, and Alphonso Son of Raimond, and afterwards again between Queen * Elionor and the same Alphonso.

1127. Whilst Charles, most justly surnamed the Good, prudently governing Flanders, relieving the Poor, protecting the Clergy, and doing Justice to all; a Family in Bruges abounding in Riches and in numbers of Men, but of Servile Race, taking offence for that he had commanded them to open their Granaries in the time of Famine, and withall being instigated by the Bastard William of Ypres, plotted the Death of this Prince; So that one Morning before day-light whilst he was at Prayers in St. Donats Church at Bruges, these Villains Murder'd him at the foot of the Altar.

The horror of the Fact, and intreaties of the Nobility of the Country, made the King take Horse immediately to revenge this Parricide. He besieged the wretched Authors in the Church, and having taken them, punished the two principal very severely. For one, after they had put out his Eyes and cut off his Nose, was bound to a Wheel planted very high, where they pierced him with an infinite number of Arrows and Darts thorough every part of his Body. The other was hanged on a Gallows with a Dog tied on his Head whom they beat continually that he might tear his Head in pieces. All the rest who fled into the Steeple were cast down from the top to the bottom, and dashed against the Ground.

This done he adjudged the Earldom of Normandy Son to Duke Robert as being the nearest, or next Heir, without any regard to Baldwin Earl of Hainault, and to William of Ypre, who pretended a Right. The last obstinately struggling to carry it by force, the King handled him so roughly, that he took from him the City of Ypre, and all the Lands he held in Flanders.

1128. As little gained Stephen Brother to the Earl of Champagne, who was Earl of Boulogne, by his Wife, though the King of England his Uncle supported him in this design, not so much to advance him, as out of hatred to the King of France, and a fear of the growing greatness of his Nephew William. The King finding that with the Assistance of the Earl of Hainault and Godfrey of Namurs Forces, he had besieged Ypres, led his Army into that Country again, gave them Chace and secured the Country to William.

However the Covetousness of this Prince vexing his new Subjects with Imposts he wanted not, and selling of Offices; the principal Cities revolted, and invited in Thierry Earl of Alsatia whom they owned for their Prince; and in truth he was of the Blood of their Counts by the Female side. The King therefore made a third March towards those Quarters, and advanced as far as Artois, to serve William: but not not finding things disposed so as he expected, he came his ways back again.

William did not lose Courage for all this; He gave Battle near Alost to Thierry, and put him to the rout: but pursuing his Victory, he received a Wound in his Arm, which being ill-dress'd caused his Death; and after that all the Disturbances raised in Normandy by his Partisans wholly ceased.

In this Kings Reign there were four Brothers, private Gentlemen of the Family of the Garlands, Anseau William, Stephen, and Giselbert, who had the greatest share in the favour of the King, in his Council, and Offices. Anseau had that of Grand Seneschal or Dapifer, which he held in Fief of the Earl of Anjou, who was the Lord Suzerain: (for in those times Offices and Dignities were granted in Fief, and even the Contributions or Offerings, and other Revenues proceeding from the Charity and Devotion of the Faithful.) Stephen who was Archdeacon of Paris was provided with that of Chancellor, and Giselbert with that of Butler. Now Anseau being slain at the Siege of Puisset, Anno 1118. the King bestowed his Office upon William; and he being dead about the year 1120. Stephen desired it rather for himself, then for his younger Brother Giselbert.

This was a Monster, that never any Reason, nor any Example could justify, a Soldiering-Priest, making profession to spill Human Blood. And indeed all good People had him in horror, but his Ambition, and the flattery of Courtiers, who lay the fairest Colours upon the foulest Facts, stopp'd his Ears, that he might not hear the just Reproaches of his Brethren, nor the checks of his Conscience. His Pride ascended to that height to shock Queen Alix, who had Spirit enough not to endure it, and it was perhaps for that reason that he would surrender his Office to Amaury de Montfort who was Married to his Niece the Daughter and Heiress of Anseau.

The King not thinking that convenient, he dared to take up Arms against him, and made a League with the King of England, Thibault Earl of Champagne, and other of his Masters Enemies, plainly demonstrating thereby, that in his former Services his aim was not the good of the Kingdom, but his own Grandeur. The King vigorously assaulted the Castle of Livry which they had fortified; they shot at him, and he was wounded in the Thigh with an Arrow. The smart of his Wound redoubling his Anger, he forced the Castle and razed it; In fine, he continued to make so hot a War upon them, that Stephen was constrained to renounce the Office of Seneschal. But the Party being strong, he thought fit to leave him that of Chancellor.

Great toil and labour, more then number of years, making Lewis old, he found it fitting the better to secure the Kingdom to his Family, to have his eldest Son Philip Crowned. Which was performed in the City of Reims the 14th of April, being Easter-day, in presence of Henry King of England his Vassal.

LEWIS the Gros, and PHILIP his Son.

Henry likewise having no Children by his second Wife, caused his Daughter Matilda Widow of the Emperor Henry to be acknowledged and accepted of as Heiress to his Crown and Dominions, and Re-Married her to Geoffrey surnamed Plantagenet Son and future Successor to Fulk Earl of Anjou. The Party was good, and besides he made it his choice thereby to divide this House of Anjou, which had given him so much trouble, from the King of France's Party, and joyn it to his Interest.

King Lewis who had defended the Churches and protected the Clergy, changed his Language towards the end of his Reign, because they carried themselves too haughtily towards him, and would not suffer he should meddle with the nomination of Benefices, nor lay his hand upon their Revenues. He turned some out of their Sees, and seized their Lands. Stephen Bishop of Paris, and Henry Archbishop of Sens adventur'd to Excommunicate him: but the Pope Honorius annulled their Censures.

Pope Innocent II. Successor to Honorius, was no sooner elected, but makes himself General of an Army, to compel Roger Duke of Puglia, to resign that Country to him, which he pretended (I know not wherefore) to belong to the Holy See. In the beginning he overcomes Roger and blocks him up in the Castle of Galesazzo; but his Son William hastning thither, disingages his Father, cuts the Popes Army in pieces, and takes him Prisoner. Now although he set him immediately at liberty again, nevertheless the report of his Captivity being carried to Rome, caused them to elect another Pope, who took the name of Anacletus.

Innocent not daring therefore return to Rome, held a Council at Pisa, where he Excommunicated Anacletus. From thence he came into France, where he called another at Clermont in Auvergne. His Cause had some difficulties; the King assembled the Prelats of his Kingdom at Estampes to know which Party they must take. St. Bernard Abbot de Clervaux strongly maintained Innocents, after his example every one embraced it. Nevertheless Girard Bishop of Angoulême's advice, to whom Anacletus had restored the Legation of Aquitain that had been taken from him; had so much influence upon William Duke of Aquitain, that he declared himself for this Anti-Pope, and persisted a year and an half in that Schism, vexing those Church-men extremely who would needs side with Innocent.

1131. One day being the Fifth of October, as the young King Philip was riding thorough some Street of the Suburbs of Paris, a Hog thrusts himself betwixt his Hories Legs, who slownd and curveted in such a manner as threw him on the Ground, and then ran over his Body; wherewith being much bruised, he died the same night.

To Comfort the King for this loss and the great and sensible grief it was to him, and in some measure repair it, he was Counsell'd to let his other Son named as himself Lewis be Crowned. He carried him to Reims, where the Twenty fifth of the same Month he was Anointed and Crowned by Pope Innocent, who then held a Council there against the Anti-Pope Peter Laon.

It seems it was at this Coronation that they reduced the Pairs or Peers, who were hereafter to be assistant at those Ceremonies to the number of Twelve, Six Ecclesiasticks, and Six of the Laity, who were chosen from amongst all the Lords and Prelats of that Quality. They did not however take away from the other Pairs their Prerogative of not being judged by any but their Pairs in matters Feodal, as well Civil as Criminal.

Of these Twelve Pairies are remaining only the six Ecclesiasticks, five of the Lay ones having been re-united to the Crown by Confiscation, Marriage, or otherwise, and the sixth, which is that of Flanders, torn from them by the Emperor Charles V.

LEWIS the Gros the Father.

LEWIS the Young his Son called the Pious or Debonnair, Aged about 20 years.

1132. Thierry of Alsatia remaining Master and Possessor of the Earldom of Flanders, was admitted to render Hommage to the King who received him, because it would not have been in his power to drive him out, and besides he was his Kinsman.

Geoffrey Plantagenet was come to be Earl of Anjou, Fulk his Father being returned to the Holy Land to take possession of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, to which he was called by King Baldwin his Father-in-Law. He pressed King Henry his Wives Father very earnestly to give him Places and Money for advancement of Succession; which begot such a divorce between them, that Geoffrey besieged and burnt Beaumont, and Henry had carried his Daughter back into England, had she not been in Child-bed.

When she was up again, she fell into Dispute with her Father, and parted very much discontented from him; which gave him so much jealousy and anguish, that being taken ill of a slow Fever and a Loosness, he died the First day of December, having Reigned Thirty five years.

1136, &c. His Succession no more then his Life was without great Troubles. That Stephen Earl of Boulogne of whom we have spoken, his Sister Adela's Son, being in England, seized on that Kingdom, and maintain'd himself in it as long as he lived; Not content with that, he likewise disputed for Normandy, and almost totally dispossessed Matilda and Geoffrey her Husband. The unhappy Province dividing it self in favour of both Parties was ravaged by both, and the King of France favouring sometimes the one, sometimes the other, kept it still in a Flame.

* St. Fago, or St. Jacques.

William IX. Duke of Guyenne touched with Compunction, resolved to go in Pilgrimage to St. James's in Galicia. Before he went he made his Will and Testament, wherein he ordained that his eldest Daughter named Alianor should Marry the young King Lewis, and should bring him all his Lordships in Dowry; For his only Son was dead: but he had yet another Daughter called Alix-Pernelle. In his Journey he fell sick and died having confirmed his Will.

His Corps was conveyed to St. James's in Galicia and interred in the Church; and yet the Legend-makers do not stick to say, That he feigned only that he was dead, and stealing away so privately that his own Secretary knew not of it, he went and turned Hermit in a Grotto or Cave near Florence, where he macerated his Body by terrible Pennance, and that it was he who instituted the Order of the Guillemins*.

* Or Willermians.

Of

Of the same Fabrick is the Tale they make of the Emperor Henry V. saying, That to do the greater Pennance for his Faults, he caused it to be reported that he was dead, and retired to Angers, where he ended his days serving the Hospital, but before he died, discovered himself to his Confessor, and was known by Matilda his Wife, who was again Married to Geoffrey Earl of Anjou.

King Lewis was likewise fallen Sick of a Diarrhea, which took him upon his return from his last Warlike Expedition, in which he had razed the Castle of St. Brieux on the Loire, the Lord thereof using to rob the Merchants.

William's last Will and Testament being brought to him, he accepted of the Match, bestowed a gallant Equipage upon his Son, and ordered a Train of many Lords and above Five hundred Gentlemen, with whom he went to Bourdeaux, where Elienor Resided, and there Espoused her in presence of the Lords of Gasconny, Saintonge, and Poitou, then brought her to Poitiers towards the middle of July.

In that City he heard of the Death of the King his Father, which hapned at Paris the First day of August, the Thirtieth of his Reign, and the Fifty eighth of his Age. His Body was carried to the Church of St. Denis.

Before this Prince Violence reigned, Majesty and Justice were trampled under foot; the People, Merchants, Clergy, Widows and Orphans were exposed to Rapine and Plunder; The Lords and Gentlemen had all of them Castles from whence they sallied out to Rob upon the High-ways, upon Rivers, and the defenceless Countries. As soon as he could ride on Horseback he buckled on his Armour, running wherever the Oppressed cried out to him for help, and fighting Personally as a private Soldier, so that having brought many of these Tyrants to Reason, he began to settle things again in order and security.

He had by his Wife Alix Daughter of Humbert Earl of Savoy Seven Children yet living, Six Sons and one Daughter. The Sons were Lewis who Reigned, Henry who was a Monk at Clervaux then Bishop of Beauvais, Hugh of whom we know nothing but his Name, Robert who for his share had the Earldom of Dreux, from whom sprung the Branch of the Earls of that name, Peter who Married Isabella Daughter and Heiress of Renaud Lord of Courtenay, whence came the Branch of Courtenay, whereof there are yet some younger Brothers or Cadets. Philip who was Archdeacon of Paris, and being elected Bishop, had so much modesty that he yielded it to Peter Lombard called the Master of Sentences; whose Book hath served as a foundation of School-Divinity. The Daughter was called Constance, she was Married first to Eustace Earl of Boulogne by whom she had no Children, her second Marriage was with Raymond V. Earl of Toulouse.

As for Scholastick Learning, it is fit we observe that towards the end of the Reign of Lewis the Gros, a Philosopher named John Rousselin, and after him the famous Peter Abelard his Disciple both Bretons, introduced in the Schools certain Notions and certain Expressions, with a Sophistical manner of Arguing, drawn from Philosophy and applied to Theology, which hath intangled it with Questions subtil and dangerous, and which savour more of the Metaphisicks then of the Holy Scripture. The great Wits of those times, having nothing better to apply themselves to, there being none that taught the true Sciences, nor good Literature, fell all into these Ergotries.

LEWIS called the Young, during his Fathers Lifetime, and the Pious, King XL. Aged Nineteen or Twenty years.

1137. After Lewis the Young had taken possession of Guyenne, he brought his new Spouse to Paris, where he laboured with his Council to establish the publick Safety, and that Justice, which some petty Tyrants began to disturb afresh, Ransoming the Common People and Merchants.

The Cities to defend themselves from these Oppressions had framed Communities, that is to say, created Popular Magistrates, with power to Assemble the Citizens and Arm them. For this end they must have the Kings Letters Patents, which he granted willingly, with many fair Priviledges thereby to oppose them against the overgrown power of the Lords. Some Citizens of Orleans making use of this power, to the prejudice of the Regal Authority, and running into Mutinies, he repress'd them as he past that way, and brought them to their Duty again.

1138. As he was Sovereign Lord of Normandy, he was obliged to concern himself in the Dispute between Gefroy Plantagenet Husband to Matilda, and Stephen Earl of Blois and Boulogne, who disputed it between them. At first he took part with Gefroy, invested him in the Dutchy and received Hommage from him, and in Recompence Gefroy gave him the Normand Vexin: but when Stephen who was come over from England, had got some advantage upon Gefroy, Lewis changing his Party, puts his Son Eustace into possession, aged not above Fourteen or Fifteen years, and gave his Sister Constance in Marriage to him.

The Schism in the Roman Church was extinguished by the Death of Anacletus, and after by the Cession of Victor, whom the Cardinals of Anacletus had elected Pope.

The Emperor Lotaire II. deceased in a thatched Cabbin, the Tbird of December Anno 1138. After four Months Interregnum, Conra dill. of that name was elected.

1139. Roger having made himself Master of the Dutchy of Puglia by the Death of Duke Reynold Feudatary to the Holy See had taken Pope Innocent Prisoner who made War upon him without Mercy ever since he got into the Papacy: Now having him in his own hands he obliged him partly by force, partly by his good Usage and Respect to confirm the Title of King of Sicily to him, which Anacletus the Anti-Pope had already bestowed upon him. Thus began the Kingdom of Sicily, which besides the Island likewise comprehended Puglia and Calabria, that is to say, what we now call the Kingdom of Naples.

Thierry of Alfania goes into the Holy Land with great numbers of the Nobility, to the relief of Fulk King of Jerusalem his Wives Father, and leaves the Administration of his Earldom of Flanders in the hands of Sibylla his Wife.

Stephen returned into England is vanquish'd and taken by Robert Earl of Gloucester Bastard Brother to Matilda. William of Ipres a brave Soldier, who had taken Sanctuary in that Country, found a way to make this Robert Prisoner, the sole Counsellor and Support of Matilda: so that to get him again the releases Stephen: but during the time he was under Restraint, Gefroy recover'd a great part of Normandy.

This year Alfonso I. Duke of Portugal having obtained a most famous Victory over five petty Moorish Kings or Generals, was saluted and proclaimed King by his Army. Five years after, he renders his Estates Tributary to the Holy Chair, to pay down four Ounces of Gold annually, Anno 1078. he puts it wholly under the protection of the Pope, and increases the Tribute unto two Marks of Gold; upon which Condition Alexander II. confirmed the Title of King to him.

This Alfonso was the Son of one Henry, who going into Spain about the year 1039. to seek his Fortunes, Married Trefa Daughter of Alfonso VI. King of Castile, and hid for Dowry the Earldom of Portugal, formerly gained by him from the Moors. The most exact Genealogists assure us that this King Henry was of the French Blood, being Son, say they, of another Henry, who was Son of Robert Duke of Burgundy, Son of King Robert.

We do not find during these years any Stirs or Troubles in the King of Frances Territories; unless it were some Contentions amongst the Divines. Peter Abelard, disputing with too much subtilty concerning the Trinity and other Misteries of Faith, had given occasion to accuse him of Novelty and Error, for which he was condemned by the Popes Legat. Afterwards the Archbishop of Sens gave him leave to explain and make good his Propositions against St. Bernard. But being come for that purpose to the Council of Sens, he would or durst not dispute there, but appeal'd to the Pope.
Being on his way towards Rome to pursue his Appeal, he stopt at the Abby of Clugny, and there led a holy Life in the Habit of St. Bennet, which he had long before taken upon him.

"These Prosecutions were carried on by the Zeal of St. Bernard Abbot of Clervaux, a Burgundian Gentleman, who had raised himself to so high an Esteem for several years before amongst the Clergy, the Nobility and Common People, that there hapned no Cause in Matters Ecclesiastical, no considerable Contest, no important Enterprize, wherein his Judgment was not required, together with his Counsel and Mediation. To shew us, that the Wife and Virtuous have a more natural Empire, then that which proceeds from Power, or the Institution of Man.

The Clergy of Bourges had elected for their Archbishop one Peter de la Chastre a Person of singular Learning and Piety: The King whether he did not like him, or desired that Benefice for another, refused to give his consent. Peter would therefore have desisted: but Pope Innocent enjoyned him to perform his Duty; which the King obstructing, it bred a great deal of trouble, and grew to that height, that the Pope Excommunicated the King, and put the King under an Interdiction.

Thibault Earl of Champagne, a Lord of great Authority, as well for his Power as his Vertues, having intermeddled somewhat too much about this business, offended the King; whose anger was yet more inflamed upon another occasion, which was this.

Rodolph de Vermandois, who was in effect the first Prince of the Blood (but in those days that Title was not known, those Princes being considered only according to the dignity of their Lands) caused his Marriage with Gerbete Cousin German to Thibault to be dissolved, upon pretence of Parentage, that he might have Alix-Fernille the Sister of Queen * Alienor for his Wife. The Pope at the instigation of * Thibault Excommunicated Rodolph, and interdicted the Bishops that had pronounced the Divorce.

Lewis lays all upon Thibault and enters his Lands in Hostile manner; Thibault has recourse to the Pope, who to deliver him from that War which oppress'd him, takes off the Excommunication; but as soon as that was over he thunders it a second time, and then the King more exasperated then before, turns his Army into Champagne;
They take Vitry by force, putting all to the Sword and setting Fire on the Church, wherein three hundred poor innocent People were burnt who were got in to secure themselves.

At the recital of this Cruelty the Kings Bowels yearned, and his Conscience was mightily troubled. He mourned and dispairst; St. Bernard had much ado to persuade him that he might obtain Mercy from God upon his Repentance. In this Condition it was easie to persuade him to restore the Archbishop of Bourges to his See, and procure a Peace for the Earl.

(Fulk King of Jerusalem being dead) Anno 1142. the Government being in the hands of Melisenda his Widow, his youngest Son Baldwin, (and the Christians of that Country worse then the Turks; their Affairs ran all into confusion: so that) Sanguin Sultan of Assyria tore the Principality of Edessa from them, one of the four Members of the Kingdom of Jerusalem.

The King had before Vow'd a Voyage to the Holy-Land, these sad Tidings moved both him and the other French Princes to carry them Relief. St. Bernard the Oracle of those times being consulted with herein, refers the business to the Pope, who sent him orders to Preach the Croisade over all Christendom.

(Beginning with France, he Conven'd a National Council at Chartres, by whom he was chosen for Generalissimo of that Expedition: but he refused the Sword and was content to be the Trumpet only. He proclaim'd it every where with so much fervour, so great assurance of good success, and as they believed, with so many Miracles, that the Cities and Villages became Deserts, every one lifting themselves for this Service.)

1147.

The Emperor Conrad and the King were the first that took the Badge of the Cross with an infinite number of Nobility. Each of these Princes had a Legat from the Pope in his Army. Conrad led threecore thousand Horse, he went away first and arrived at Constantinople about the end of March in the year 1147.

1147.

The King staid some while in France after him, to receive Pope Eugenius who by the Revolted Romans was forced to quit that Country. He set forwards a fortnight after Whitsontide in the same year, and having marched thorough Hungary and Thrace passed the Bosphorus; so that the following Lent in Anno 1148. he got into Syria whilst on the other hand his Naval Force was put to Sea to meet him there.

By Advice of his Parliament held at Estampes, he left the Regency of the Kingdom to Rodolph Earl of Vermandois, and Suger Abbot of St. Denis who was in great Credit at Court, even from the time of Lewis the Fat. (Before his departure he went according to the usual Custom into St. Denis Church to receive his Staff and Scrip, the Badges of Pilgrimage, and the Standard de L'Oriflamme on the Altar of the Holy Martyrs.)

"It is fit we should tell you the Kings of France of the Second Race display'd at the head of their Armies St. Martins Cope or Mantle: But Capet and his Line, after their great Devotion to St. Denis made use of the Banner belonging to his Church, which they called Oriflamme.) It had wont to be carried or born by the Count de Vexin-Francois who was Hommager to the Church of St. Denis: After the Kings had possession of this County they appointed some Person of great Merit and illustrious Birth to carry it.

There is not that wicked or mean Artifice and Treachery but the perfidious Manuel Emperor of Greece put in practise to destroy both the Emperors and the Kings Armies. Against the first he had his will, by Poysoning their Meal, he was to furnish them withall with Lime and Plaster, and appointing such Guides, as having led them a long way about, which made them waste all their Provisions, at last delivered them half dead, and languishing into the hands of the Turks, who cut them all in pieces, so that there was not a tenth part of them escaped.

The King being likewise gotten into Asia, found the Emperor Conrad at Nicea where he comforted him in the best manner he could. Then he marched along by the Sea-side and ran the same hazard as the other had done, however he saved himself, more by good fortune then prudence. He won a Battle at his passage over the Meander: but reaped little benefit: for after that, not standing upon his Guard, he received a notable check in a narrow Pass through the Mountains. At last he arriv'd at Antioch, whereof Raimond Uncle to the Queen his Wife then held the Principality.

This Raimond did all he could to oblige him to employ his Forces for the enlarging the limits of his Principality. The King refusing it because he would continue his march towards Jerusalem, he resolv'd to be reveng'd, and to this purpose persuades the Queen, to demand to be Divorc'd from him, as being of Consanguinity within the third or fourth Degree. This Princess being Fickle and Amorous, and having but a mean Esteem for her Husband, was easily over-sway'd by her Uncle: The King

King could find no other remedy to avoid this scandal, then by taking her away in the night time out of Antioch, and sending her before him to Jerusalem.

Now the Emperor Conrad after he had been at Constantinople to refresh himself was come to Jerusalem to pay his Devotions. (The King and he holding a Council together with the Lords in that Holy City, resolv'd to besiege Damascus. This Enterprize had no better success then all the rest, by reason of the horrid treachery of the Christians of those Countries. So these two Princes detesting their wickedness, which outvied the Malice and abominable Vices of the very Infidels, thought of nothing but their return again.)

The Emperor having made Alliance with the Greeks against Roger King of Sicily, was by them brought back into Italy. Soon after the King being Embarqu'd in his Fleet met the Navy belonging to those Traitors, who lay in wait for him. Whilst they were engaged, or as some Authors tell us, were carrying him away Prisoner, by good fortune arrives the Fleet of Roger King of Sicily their capital Enemy, commanded by his Lieutenant, who made them quit their Prize, having burnt, taken, and sunk a great many of their vessels.

Alfonso Earl of Toulouse Third Son of Raimond de Saint Gilles, had also made that Voyage about the same time as the King, but went all the way by Sea, and landed at the Port of Ptolemais. He got not far into the Country before he died, having been basely Poyson'd, though it could not be known who had committed the Execrable Deed. His Son Raimond was his Succellor.

"During the time of this Expedition, St. Bernard was wholly employ'd in Languedoc in opposing one Henry a certain Monk that had cast off his Frock, a Disciple of Peter de Bruys, who Preached with much applause, but with little integrity of Life as it was said of him, almost the same Opinions as the Zuinglians and the Calvinists Preached in these latter Ages.

"A certain Wealthy Citizen of Lyons named Valdo, did likewise about Ten or twelve years after this Preach the same things in Lyonnois and the neighbouring Provinces. They called such as were Followers of Henry and Peter de Bruys, Henricians, and Petro-Bruysians, and those Valdo, Poor of Lyons or Vandois. There were some Remnants of these last in the Valleys of Dauphine and Savoy, when Luther began to appear.

In the year 1148. hapned the death of Conan the Gros Duke of Bretagne; Endon Earl of Ponticure, who was Married to Berthe his Daughter, seized on the Duchy, to the prejudice of Hoel, whom the Duke Conan had disowned for his Son. From hence broke forth a War between these two Princes; which two or three years afterwards was complicated with another much longer, which lasted Thirteen or fourteen years at times between the same Endon and Conan III. surnamed the Little his own Son, who would needs enjoy the Dukedom, because it came by his Mothers side. This bad Son having recourse to Henry King of England for assistance, used his Father roughly, and also compell'd the Nantois who took Hoels part, to forsake him: we do not know what became of him at last.

The ill success of the Foreign Expedition, which had made so many Widows and Orphans, ruin'd so many good Families, and unpeopled so many Countries, bred grievous Murmurings and Reproaches against the Reputation of St. Bernard, who seemed to promise them a quite contrary Event. So that when the Pope would, two years after, have had him Preach up another Croisade, and obliged him to go personally to the Holy-Land, to draw the greater numbers after him: the Monks of Cîteaux broke all those Measures, fearing a second misfortune, which might have proved greater then the first.

The King at his return to France finding the War continued still between King Stephen and Matilda, joyned his Army with Eustace Son of Stephen to besiege the Castle d' Arques. Gefroy the Husband of Matilda and his Son Henry to whom the year before he had resigned the Duchy, marched to the Relief. The two Armies being within sight, the Lords on either side undertook an Accommodation, and manag'd it so that the King (who without doubt found himself to be the weaker) agreed to receive Prince Henry upon Hommage; who by this means was the Twelfth Duke of Normandy.

Towards the end of the year Gefroy ended his days at the Castle du Loir, leaving three Sons, Henry, Gefroy, and William. He ordained that forthwith Henry should quietly quietly enjoy the Mothers Estates, to wit England and Normandy; That Gefroy should have the Paternal, that is Anjou, Touraine, and Maine, with the Castles of Loudun, Chinon, and Mirebeau; and William the Earldom of Mortain.

1151. Not long after died Eustace Earl of Boulogne: his Death was a means to restore Englands Peace, for as much as Stephen his Father seeing himself Childless, was overpersuaded (it was not though till two years after) to consent that when he died the Kingdom should return to Henry.

This Prince, as English Authors tell us, would have resumed the County of Tou-louze in right of his Wife: but Earl Raimond gained so much upon him by Marrying his Sister Constance the Widow of Earl Eustace newly dead, that he confirmed to him the possession thereof.

1152. The following year 1152. hapned the death of Thibault Count Palatine of Champagne, surnamed the Liberal, the Father of the Council, and Guardian of the Poor and Orphans; a Man of great Justice, who notwithstanding was almost in continual War with the Kings. He had four Sons, and five Daughters. The Sons were Henry Earl of Troyes or Champagne, Thibault Earl of Blais and Chartres, Stephen Earl of Sancerre, Henry Archbishop of Sens, afterwards of Reims.

"This year also died the Emperor Conrad, to whom for want of Male Issue by Election succeeded Frederick I. surnamed Barbarossa Duke of Alman or Schwabe his Sister Son.

"If I do not mistake, it was under this Frederick that the French began to give the Germans the name of Allemands, or Almans, because this Prince being Duke of the Almans, had ever both in his Train, and in all Offices more of those People then of any other Country. The Italians even in those days called then * Tudeschi, as they do still.

* Teutonici.

Death ravishd from the King his two ablest Councillors, which were Siger Abbot of St. Denis the Fifteenth of January, and Rodolph Earl of Vermandois, the last Prince of the second Royal Branch of that name. He having no Children, and his Sister being Married to Philip Son of Thierry Earl of Flanders, the King who cherished this Philip, lett him the possession of Vermandois; the Subject of a Quarrel in the Reign following.

1152. Whether it were jealousy or scruple of Conscience, the King eagerly pursued the Separation from his Wife, and obtain'd it by Sentence of the Prelats of his Kingdom whom he had called together at Baugency.

Immediately proceeding with integrity, he withdrew his Garrisons from Aquitain to leave her that Country in freedom, and gave her liberty to go whether she pleased, keeping the two little Daughters he had by her with him. This Woman burning with Love and Ambition, Married some Months after Henry Duke of Normandy and Presumptive King of England, a Prince both young, hot, and Red-Haired, very able to satisfy her Desires.

As soon as * Alienor was Divorced, Lewis sent to demand Constance-Elizabeth Daughter of Alonso King of Castile, by Hugh Archbishop of Sens, who performed the Ceremony of that Marriage at Orleans, and there Crowned the new Queen; the Archbishop of Reims protesting in vain that this Right belonged to him only.

Lewis not able to endure his Vassal should go equal with him, nor Henry who had so many great Lordships, suffer a Sovereign above him, it was impossible they should continue good Friends. This last being assigned to appear in Parliament, refused to come. Lewis to punish him besieged and took the City of Vernon, but Henry submitting out of some apprehension he yet had of King Stephen, the Lords reconciled him with Lewis, who restored the place to him.

King Stephen the Usurper of the English Crown being dead, Henry gets into possession of that Kingdom, according to the former agreement betwixt them.

It was not permitted the Kings of France, says Yves de Chartres, to Wed any Bastards. Now there went a report that Constance was such: wherefore King Lewis two years after his Marriage would satisfy himself herein, and under the pretence of going on Pilgrimage to St. Jago in Galicia, took her Fathers Court in his way, the most magnificent Prince of those times, who received and entertained him most Royally at Burgos, and took away that suspicion he had conceived.

Divers do in this year 1154. reckon the Death of Roger I. King of Scilly, one of the most Warlike and Potent Princes of this Age. He raised the reputation and fame of the Normans to its highest pitch, in so much as after him, it did ever decline.

He

Emperor Manuel and Frederick Barbarossa in Feb. Reigned Thirty six years.

He had a Son named William, and a Daughter called Constance, the Son Reigned, but with so much Injustice, Avarice, and Tyranny, that he deserved the surname of Wicked or Bad. He prided himself most in filling his Coopers, and draining his Subjects to the very last Penny. Constance being an old Maid Married the Emperor Henry VI. in the year 1186.

Gefroy Earl of Gien on the Loire knowing himself too weak to oppose William Earl of Nevers, who made a rude War upon him, allied himself with Stephen de Champagne Count of Sancerre, and gave his Daughter to him, and for Dowry his Earldom, to the Exclusion of his Son Herve. The Son thus disinherited by his Father without any fault committed, implored the Kings Justice, who goes in Person and besieges Gien, takes it upon Composition and settles him there.

When Henry was possess'd of England, Gefroy his Brother demands Anjou, Touraine, and Maine, according to their Fathers Will: but far from giving these, he takes Loudun, Chinon, and Mirebeau from him; so that he had been left without any thing, had it not been his good Fortune to be chosen by the Nantois for their Earl, who having forsaken Hoel, stood in need of a Prince to defend them against the Assaults of Conan.

The Enmities between King Lewis and Henry being ready to break forth, the Lords found out a way to prevent it yet a while, by the Alliance of Henry's eldest Son of the same name, with Margaret Daughter of Lewis by his second Wife, though both of them were Children and had scarce left off their Bibs. The Girl was put into the Father-in-Law's hands, and Lewis promis'd to bestow in Dowry with her Gisors and other places in the Normand Vexin; which in the interim were trusted to the keeping of the Grand Master of the Knights-Templars, to be deliver'd up to Henry when the Marriage should be Consummate.

"The Emperor Frederick composd the Difference between Bertold of Zerigheim and Renault about the Earldom of Burgundy, in such a manner that he dismembred or cut off from it the little Country of Nufland which is beyond Mount-Jou, and the Cities of Geneva, Lausanna, and Sion to give them to Bertold, leaving the remainder to Renault, whose Daughter and Heiress named Beatrice he Married. After which keeping open Court with great Pomp at Besancon, he received Hommage of all the Lords and Prelats belonging to the Earldom of Burgundy and the Kingdom of Arles; who notwithstanding regarded not his Sovereignty, but only to obtain a better Title to their usurpations.

Those that were common Friends to both endeavour'd to procure an Interview between him and the King of France, and agreed upon the time and place: but the King stung with Jealousie at the Grandeur of that young Prince, or having some suspicion he would design upon his Person, would go attended with a great number of Soldiers; which caused Frederick to withdraw very much dissatisfied.

Gefroy Earl of Nantes being dead without Children, Conan Earl of Renes or of Little Bretagne, seized on the City of Nantes. King Henry Brother of Gefroy pretending it belonged to him by Succession, undertakes to recover it by force of Arms. Conan being hardly press'd, buys his Peace by giving him his Daughter, and Heiress, (named Constance) for his Third Son, by name Gefroy, the same as his Uncle deceased.

After the Death of Pope Adrian, the greater number of the Cardinals elected the Cardinal Rowland a Siennois, who was named Alexander III. But the Roman People and two Cardinals only gave their Votes for Cardinal Octavian a Roman, who took the name of Victor. The Right of either side was dubious: for on the one hand the Decrees of some Popes had refer'd the Election to the Cardinals only, and on the other the Roman People pretended they had the better Title, and had most commonly maintain'd themselves in possession of it, alledging the Popes could not deprive them of a Right born with the Church its self, and practis'd in the times of the Apostles.

King Lewis relying upon the Judgment of the Gallican Church, whom he Asssembled for this purpose at Estampes, adhered to Alexander. All the West followed his Example, excepting the Emperor Frederick, who with his Almans, and what Partisans he had in Italy, fiercely rejected him, because he was Install'd without his Approbation.

King Henry besides the Kingdom of England, held the Dutchy of Normandy, (which had then a part of Bretagne holding of it) the Country of Maine, Anjou, Tou-

For this end, having made Alliance with Raimond Prince of Arragon and Earl of Barcelona, he raised a great Army of Aquitains and * Routiers, amongst whom was Malcolme King of Scotland; enter'd upon Languedoc, took Moissac, Cahors, and some other places.

* Old Soldiers experience'd.
1160, & 61. The jealousy Lewis had of his growing Greatness, moving him at least as much as the Prayers and Intreaties of Earl Raimond his Brother-in-Law, caused him to march that way, and cast himself into Toulouze, but he had so few with him, that it was in the power of Henry to have forced that City, had not the scruple of falling upon his Sovereign deterr'd him from it. After which they were reconcil'd: but Henry would not let fall his claim and hold of the Earldom of Toulouze, till he bestow'd his Daughter Jane Widow of William II. King of Sicily, on Earl Raimond.

"In these days the curfed Crew of Routiers and Cottereaux began to make themselves known by their Cruelties and Robberies; we cannot tell certainly why they were so called; but they were a kind of Soldiers and Adventurers coming from divers parts, as from Arragon, Navarre, Biscay, and Brabant, who wandred over all Countries, and would be hired by any one that offer'd to take them, provided they might be allow'd all manner of Licence. The Cottereaux were most of them Foot-Soldiers, the Routiers served on Horseback.

In the mean while Pope Alexander fearing the Emperor, after he had pull'd down the Pride of the Milannois, might come to Rome, did not judge himself a fit match, and so retired into France, where he remained above three years.

1161. This year he held a Council at Clermont, in which he did not forbear to thunder against Victor, Frederick, and all their Adherents.

1161. The most Potent and most Factious Family in all France was the House of Champagne: Lewis to divide them from the English and gain them to himself, takes Alix for his third Wife who was youngest Sister to the four Brothers Champenois; for Constance his second Wife was dead, Anno 1159. and for the two Daughters of his first Bed he gave one to Henry the eldest of the four Brothers Earl of Troyes, and the other to Thibault the second Earl of Blain.

1162. Pope Alexander came to Torey on the River Loire, where the two Kings Lewis and Henry received him with extream submission: Both of them alighted, and each taking one of the Reins of his Horses Bridle, conducted him to the House prepared for him.

1162. A second time the Emperor came into the County of Burgundy bringing his Victor with him, and a second time some endeavoured to procure a Conference betwixt him and the King, to determine that Difference which made the Schism, by the Judgment of a Council. They agreed upon the place of Interview to be at Avignon, as being the Frontier of either Prince, whither the King by Oath obliged himself to bring Alexander. But that Pope refusing to go there, saying he could be judged by none, it broke off the Conference, and put the King in very great danger. For the Almans having reproached him that he kept not his word, plotted to way-lay him, and had taken him Prisoner, had not the King of England caused his Army to advance to disengage him. Thence follow'd a cruel War between the Emperor and Alexander, which horribly tormented Italy, and out of which the Emperor could not withdraw himself but by the means of a shameful submission, craving Pardon of the Pope, and suffering him to set his Foot upon his Throat. Which hapned in Anno 1177. in the City of Venice.

1163. Anno 1163. Alexander assisted at the Council of Tours Asssembled by his order; and there he thunders once more against Victor and Frederick. He caused some Decrees likewise to be made against the Hereticks who had spread themselves over all the Province of Languedoc.

"There were especially of two sorts. The one Ignorant, and withall addicted to Lewdness and Villanies, their Errors gross and filthy, and these were a kind of Manicheans. The others more Learned, less irregular, and very far from such filthiness, held almost the same Doctrines as the Calvinists, and were properly Henricians and Vandois. The People who could not distinguish them, gave them alike names, that is to say, called them Cathares, Patarins, Boulgres or Bulgares, Ada-

Death of Edo III. Duke of Burgundy, to whom succeeded Hugh III. his Son.

There being Peace between the two Kings, Lewis employs himself in doing Justice and suppressing Disorders. The Inhabitants of Vezelay having made a Corporation, would have shaken off the Abbot who was their Lord, protected by the Earl of Nevers: He compell'd them and their Earl to ask Pardon and break their Corporation. The same year he went in Person to fight the Earl of Clermont, the Earl du Puy, and the Vicount de Polignac, Lords of Auvergne, who denied to forbear plundering of Churches, overthrew them and brought them Prisoners to Paris; where having detained them a long while, he releas'd them upon giving their Oaths and Hostages.

In like manner he punished the Earl of Chaulons with the loss of his County, because he had pillag'd the Abby of Clugny and kill'd above five hundred, some Monks, some Servants. However the Daughter of this Man re-entred upon her Patrimony.

Thomas Becket Chancellor of England, elected Archbishop of Canterbury Anno 1163. soon lost the good favour of King Henry, for divers causes; and particularly for stickling too fiercely in maintaining the Privileges of the Clergy: Being banished the Kingdom he retired himself in France in the Abby of Pontigny of the Diocess of Sens, whence he gave much trouble to his King, and suffer'd not a little himself during six years.

"Death of Victor the Anti-Pope, in whose stead the Cardinals of his Party elected Guy de Creme who named himself Paschal, and was confirmed by Frederick. But Alexander III. recalled by the Romans, left France the year following and returned to Rome to put an end to that Schism.

In the year 1165. Lewis had a Son born, whom he believed Heaven had sent him in return of his Prayers. For this reason he was surnamed * Dieu-Donne, i. e. Gift of God, or God-Gift, and after for his brave Acts the Conqueror, which Paul Emilius has rendered by Interpretation Augustus, and is followed in the same by all the Modern Historians.

The Life of Conan the Little, Duke of Bretagne which had been ever full of trouble, ended Anno 1166. to make room for Gefroy of Normandy his Son-in-Law. This Prince being yet but Fifteen years of Age, remained together with his Darchy under the Guardianship of the King his Father for some time, after which being at liberty, he begins a War against him, because he would make him do Hommage for his Dukedom; a Duty he required by virtue of a Treaty made by Charles the Simple with Rollo Duke of Normandy.

Thierry of Alfatia Earl of Flanders dies at Gravelin, Philip his Son governs after him.

The Feud was renewed between the two Kings upon several occasions; one was the Earl d'Anvergne, whom Lewis as Sovereign Lord took into his protection and safeguard against Henry to whom the Earl was a Vassal holding of him in Aquitain; the other, the support he gave to Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury. The War thereupon breaks forth, and lasted for two years; however it was carried on but slowly, and so, as the Respect either of them had for Pope Alexander's Mediation, brought them to an Agreement for some time.

These two Princes having Confer'd together at Saint Germain en Laye, concluded the Peace betwixt them; and there the King of England's Sons rendred Hommage to Lewis for those Lands their Father assured to them by advance of Inheritance; Henry of the Dutchy of Normandy, the County of Anjou, and the Office of Grand Seneschal, joyned thereto from the time of Grifgonnelle, as also the Earldoms du Maine and de Touraine; and the second named Richard, of the Dukedom of Aquitain; as for the third (which was * Gefroy) he had Bretagne by his Wife, and ow'd Hommage to none but the Duke of Normandy.

The Kings Intercession obtained of Henry, that Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury might return into England: but he continuing to act with the same heat, four Gentlemen of Henry's Court out of Complaisance as mean as detestable, having plotted and contrived to deliver their King of him, entred the Church at Canterbury where that Holy Prelat was reading Service, (it was on the Christmas Holy-days) and Murther'd him at the foot of the Altar.

1171. Though the King disown'd this Murther, and shewed an extream grief: nevertheless having given cause to commit it, if perhaps he did not command it, the Pope made a mighty business of it, from which he could not get clear without submitting to great Pennance and such Reparations and Satisfaction as was ordained by his Legats. The Holy Archbishop revered as a Martyr, was Canonized the following year, and the frequent Miracles wrought on his Tomb, attested his Holiness.

1173. Every year almost there was some Rupture, then a Peace or Truce, between the two Kings, either concerning their own proper Interests, or that of their Friends and Vassals. Lewis had this advantage, that being the Sovereign Lord, he had a right of hearing the Complaints of Henry's Vassals, and of making himself his Judge.

1173. He had stirred up many in Aquitaine and Normandy: but this year he Armed his own Children against him. The eldest with Margaret his Wife, being gone to Visit him, and having staid some time in that Court, had a fancy put into his Head that since he was Crowned he ought to Reign, and to demand of his Father the enjoyment either of the Kingdom of England, or the Dukedom of Normandy.

With this disposition, and fretted for that his Father had taken some young People from about him who gave him such like ill Counsels, he stole away one Night from him, and came and cast himself into the Arms of the King.

Immediately all the young Nobility follows him, Queen Alienor favours him, his two Brothers, Richard Duke of Aquitaine and Gefroy of Britagne joyns with him; and those whole Provinces follow their Motions. The King of France takes them into his protection, William King of Scotland declares for them and attacks England, whither at the same time went some French Forces under the Command of Robert Earl of Leicester.

1174. It seemed therefore as if the unhappy Father must needs be overwhelm'd on a suddain: but he overthrew all the Enemies. Lewis having taken Verneuil au Perche, durst not hold it, and retreated before him. The Earl of Leicester is defeated in England, and all those that followed him either slain or taken, then all the Kingdom reduced in less then Thirty days by old Henry, who went thither presently after this defeat.

1175. The following year whilst he was doing Pennance at St. Thomas Becket's Tomb, William King of Scotland his most capital Enemy loses a Battle against his Lieutenants, and was taken Prisoner. The Fleet of young Henry is dispersed and disabled by Tempest; King Lewis who had carried Philip Earl of Flanders with him, is rudely repulsed from Rouen; so that finding Henry who was come over-Seas again to Relieve this City, made ready to give him Battle, he hearkens to a Truce for some Months.

1175. Whilst that lasted old Henry going into Poitou, and subduing Richard the worst of his three Rebellious Sons who held that Country, all the others returned to their Obedience; and he enters upon a Treaty of Peace with Lewis; who gave him * Alice his Daughter for his Son Richard, and put her into his hands to compleat the Marriage when she should be Age for it.

1177. The two Kings now grown old were weary of so many Wars and Disturbances; Either of them had cause to fear, the one the activity of his three most valiant Sons, the other the weakness of his only Heir as yet too young; so that they confirmed the Peace by new Oaths, promised mutual friendship against all others, and took up a resolution to go jointly into Languedoc to extirpate those Hereticks, already mentioned by us. But they thought it more convenient first to send the Popes Legat thither with three or four other Prelats to endeavour to reclaim them by Exhortations and Anathema's which converted and brought back a great many, and kept the rest within bounds for sometime.

These Hereticks were all called Albigenis, because they propagated most in those Countries, under the protection of Roger Earl of Alby who much favoured them.

1178. During the Calm of this Peace, Lewis who was extream feeble with Age, using the same provident foresight as his Predecessors, resolved to have his Son Philip Crowned: but it hapning that this young Prince fell ill upon an affright for having lost his way in a Wood as he was Hunting, this Ceremony was fain to be put off, which was not performed till the year following.

In the mean time Peoples Devotion increasing towards the Reliques of St. Thomas of Canterbury, from the example of King Henry, who of his Persecutor was become his Adorer: King Lewis passes into England, prayed on his Tomb, and left very rich Tokens of his Piety there behind.

1179. In fine Prince Philip was Anointed and Crowned at Reims on All Saints day by William Archbishop of that City and Cardinal, Brother to the Queen his Mother; The Duke

Duke of Normandy and Philip Earl of Flanders, both Pairs or Peers, assisting at that Ceremony, and holding the Crown upon his Head.

Soon after Philip Earl of Flanders faithful and affectionate to King Lewis, procured the Marriage of his Niece Isabella-Alix Daughter of his Sister and of William Earl of Hainault, with the new King who was his God-son; and treating her as his own Daughter because he had no Children, he gives her in favour of this Marriage the County of Artois, and the County all along the River of Lys.

Hardly was the joy of this Festival over, when King Lewis died of the Palsy in the City of Paris the 18th or 20th of September, Aged, as many tell us, near Seventy years, but according to my Computation not above Sixty three or Sixty four, whereof he had Reigned Forty three. His Corps lies in St. Denis.

He was not very happy in his grand Designs, and too effeminate or mild in Affairs that required vigour; but as Pious, Charitable, Good, Just, Liberal, and Valiant as any Prince in his Time. He can be taxed but for two faults, the one against Prudence for Divorcing his Wife; the other against the Laws of Nature, having supported the Rebellion of Henry's Children against their Father.

He had three Wives, Alienor or Eleanor of Aquitaine, Constance of Spain, and Alix or Alice of Champagne. By the first he had two Daughters Mary and Alix, who Married the two Brothers, Henry Earl of Champagne and * Thibault Earl of Chartres and Blois. By the second came Margaret Married first with Henry the young King of England, and then with Bela III. King of Hungary. By the third he had two Daughters, Alix who was betrothed to Richard of England, afterwards Married to William Earl of Pontieu, Agnes Married to Comnenus the Son of Emanuel of Constantinople; and a Son named Philip who Reigned.

PHILIP II. Surnamed the Conqueror, or Augustus, King XLI. Aged Fifteen years.

Emperor Alex. II. Son of Manuel in Octob. Reigned Two years, and Frederic I. 1180.

Even in the Life-time of Lewis the Young, Affairs began to be governed in the name of Philip, and by the Administration and Care, as I believe, of Philip Earl of Flanders, who was his Guardian, his Governor, and his God-father.

The Methods of Piety and Justice his Father and Grand-father had taken to strengthen their Authority, had much advanced them in their Design; He was therefore Councell'd to pursue them. Wherefore immediately undertaking the Protection of the Church, he with a high hand went and reduced Ebles Lord of Charenton in Berry, Imbert Lord of Beaujeu in Lyonnais, and Guy Earl of Chaalons upon Soane, who oppress'd the Ecclesiasticks.

At the same time he began to let the Grandees of the Kingdom know how he could order and reduce them, for he dissolv'd a powerful League which they had formed against him, perhaps out of the jealousy they had conceiv'd of the greatness of the Earl of Flanders, and forced the Earl of Sancerre, who was the first that declar'd himself, to fly to his Mercy.

After the Death of his Father, desiring to Sanctifie his new Reign, he publish'd an Edict against such as utter those horrible Blasphemies compos'd or made up of the Name and Body or Members of the Son of God, condemning them to pay a certain Pecuniary Mult, if they were People of Quality, and to be thrown into the Water if they were meaner People.

Prompted with the same Zeal, he caus'd strict search to be made after all those that were accus'd of Heresie, and sent them to the Fire; expell'd all the Jews within his Territories and Confiscated their Estates, suffering them to carry away only the Price of their Household-Goods.

His

Philip II. Surnamed Augustus, King XLI.

His Piety appear'd no less in the expulsion of Comedians, Juglers, and Jesters or Buffoons, whom he turn'd out of his Court; as People that serve only to flatter Vice, encourage Sloath, and fill idle Heads with vain Chimera's which perverts them, and puts their Hearts into those irregular Motions and Passions as Wisdom and true Religion commands us so much to suppress and mortifie. Princes were wont to bestow great Presents on those People, and reward them with their richest Clothes; But he, being perswaded, says Rigord his Historian, *That to give to * Players was to Sacrifice to the Devil;* chose rather according to the Example of that Holy Emperor Henry I. to make a Vow he would henceforth employ his Money towards the maintenance of the Poor.

Anno 1183. he encompassed the Park du bois de Vincennes with a Wall, and stock'd it with Deer which the King of England sent over to him.

The same year Henry, the young King of England, died in the Castle of Martel in Quercy; Perhaps by the just Punishment of Heaven, for having been so often, as he was at this time, in Rebellion against his Father.

"Every private or particular Lord having usurped a Right of making War upon one another after either had sent his defiance, there followed Murthers and continual Spoils and Plunderings; For which the Bishops and some of the wisest Lords of the Kingdom had endeavour'd to find a Remedy, from the year 1044. having ordained the Truce or Peace of God, for those Disputes and Contests betwixt particular Men during certain times in the year, and certain days of the week, with most severe Punishments against the Intringers, even to the killing them in the very Churches, which served as a Sanctuary to all other the most enormous Criminals. William the Conqueror had Establish'd this Law in England and in Normandy, Anno 1080. Raimond Berenger Earl of Barcelona in his Country Anno 1060. the Council of Clermont had confirm'd it Anno 1096. and that of Rome Anno 1102.

"Now as these Truces were but ill observ'd, and Languedoc and a part of Guyenne, principally upon occasion of that War betwixt the King of Arragon and Raimond Earl of Toulouse, were most miserably tormented with Factions, Murthers, and Robberies: a certain Carpenter named Durand, who seem'd a plain simple Fellow, found the Remedy against these Calamities, and a Means to enrich himself. He asserted that God had appeared to him in the City du Puy in Auvergne, commanding him to proclaim Peace, and for proof of his Mission had given him a certain Image of the Virgin which he shew'd. So that upon his Veracity, the Grandees, the Prelats and the Gentry being Assembled at Puy on the day of the Feast of the Assumption, agreed amongst themselves by Oath upon the Holy Evangelists, to lay down all Animosities, and the remembrance of former Injuries, and made a Holy League to reconcile Mens Spirits, and entertain Love and Peace, which they nam'd the Peace of God. Those who were of it, wore the Stamp of this Image of our Lady in Pewter upon their Breasts, and Capuches, or Hoods of white Linnen on their Heads which this Carpenter fold to them. Which had such power over their Minds, and had made such Impression, that a Man with those Badges was not only in security, but likewise in Veneration amongst his most mortal Enemies.

Whether the three Princes of Champagne, Brothers to the Queen Mother, had gotten the upper hand at Court, and put the King out of conceit with the Earl of Flanders, or for some other cause; the King summon'd him to surrender up Vermandois, which Louis the VII. had given him only, as was pretended, for a certain time. The Earl being very Potent would maintain the possession, call'd the Somme with a great Army and came as far as Senlis. But upon tidings of the Kings march, he turns back the way he came and went and besieged Corbie; from whence he decamp'd again immediately for the same cause. The King not being able to overtake him, besieges Boves, the two Armies drew near to engage. Some Mediators put a stop to their impetuous haste, and made up the Peace; The Earl yielded all Vermandois, excepting Peronne and Saint Quentin, which they let him enjoy during Life.

To this Agreement the King call'd all the Bishops, Abbots, Earls and Barons, that served in his Army, with their Under-Vassals. And such was then the Fights of the French.

The Patriarch of Jerusalem, and the Prior of the Hospital of St. John's, deputed on the behalf of the Christians from the Holy-Land, brought the Keys of the Holy City to King Philip, imploring his assistance, and representing to him the extrem danger it was reduced unto. Whereupon having held a great Assembly of Prelats and Lords at Paris, he enjoynd them to Preach the Cross or Croisade, and to publish it every where: and in the mean time sent at his own Expence a considerable Relief of Horse and Foot into that Country.

The Complaints of the Clergy of Burgundy whom Duke Odo had plundered, and the Lord de Vergy, whose Cattle that Prince besieged, engaged the King to march that way, and besiege Chapillon on the Seine, the strongest Bulwark belonging to that Rebel. Who finding his Fort taken by Assault, came humbly to submit to his Commands, promised to pay 30000 Livres for Reparation to the Clergy, and gave up four Castles; which however were soon after put into his possession again; without doubt because they had some need of him.

In Berry there were several Bands of Robbers that wasted the Country: they were named Cottereaux, and were believed to be tainted with the Heresie that spread in Languedoc, because they aimed chiefly to do mischief to the Churchmen: the Berriers getting together with the help of some Men sent them by the King, cut them in pieces, killing seven thousand upon the place.

The vast Multitudes of people that flocked to Paris, the Kings Train encreasing with his Authority, made the Streets so dirty and narrow that there was no going in them. The King sent therefore for the Citizens and their Provost, and enjoined them to remedy it, which they did by paving it with Stone at their own expences.

I find about this time, that one Girard de Poilli, who managed the Exchequer brought in thither of his own proper Moneys or Fund, Eleven thousand Mark in Silver. It is to be imagin'd that he had gotten them by the King: but however we may say, that this Example will be singular, and that we shall never meet a Chequer-man will follow his Example. What ever can be done, that sort of People will sooner go to the Gibet, then be brought to make Requisition.

Gefroy Duke of Brittany and Brother of that Henry, being come to wait on the King who tenderly lov'd him, died of a Distemper at Champeaux, and was Interr'd at Noître-Dames in Paris. He had one Daughter named * Alienor; and one Son only, aged but three years. The Bretons would give him the name of * Arthus, in memory of that famous King whom the Romancers make to be the Author of the Knights of the round Table, and many high feats of Arms. He remained under the Guardianship of his Mother, and the Protection of the King, in despite of all the Efforts of Henry, and Richard his Son, who made several Attempts to seize upon his Person that they might get Brittany into their possession. The Widow Constance afterwards Married Guy Lord of Tbouars.

The memory of Gefroy is still very famous amongst the Bretons, because of that Law he made in his Parliament or Estates General, which was called the Assize of Count Gefroy; Whereby it was ordained that in the Families of Barons and Knights, the Estates should not be shared or equally divided as heretofore; but that the eldest should reap the whole Succession, and bestow such part upon the younger as himself and the rest of his Kindred should think fit. This hath since been thus proportion'd, the Thirds amongst all the younger Children, during Life to the Males, and Inheritance to the Female. In time, the rest of the Gentry, not to yield in Quality to the Barons, would needs be comprehended herein likewise.

Towards the end of the year 1186. a War was raised between King Philip and Henry of England, for two causes; One was, that Richard refused to do Hommage to the King for his County of Poitou, grounded perhaps on this, that it held immediately of the Dutchy of Aquitain. The other, Henry deserr'd to surrender Gisors and other places of the Vexin, which Louis VII. had given in Dowry to Margaret who had no Children by young Henry. Philip sets upon him towards Berry, took Iffondun, and besieged the Castle-Rouel. The King of England and his Son came to its Relief, and sent to bid Battle: but the two Armies being ranged, Henry's heart failed him, he talks of an Agreement, promises Satisfaction to Philip, and leaves him Iffondun for his Expences in that War.

The Fifth of September, Lewis the first born Son of Philip, came into the World, for which the City of Paris expressed so much Joy, that they made the whole week but one Holy-day, keeping all darkness at a distance by the infinite numbers of Flambeaux every where.

Saladin King of Syria and Egypt, who from a low Birth was raised to that high power, not without great desert, after his having obtained many Victories over the Christians, at last tears the Holy City of Jerusalem from them, whereof Guy de Luzignan was then King (it was taken the Second day of October) and all the Holy-Land, excepting only Tyre, Tripoly, Antioch, and some strong Holds.

Thus at the end of Eighty eight years, Ended the Kingdom of Jerusalem, which Title after after it had ambitionly passed through the Houses of divers Princes, does at this day make us part of the Catholick Kings.

At this dreadful news which arrived towards the end of the year 1187. all the Faithful made a great moan: never was any sorrow so great or so universal. The Kings Philip and Henry being sensibly touched, Conferr'd together at Gisors and Trie, and resolved to take up the Cross with great numbers of Princes, Lords and Prelats to recover those Holy Places out of the hands of the Infidels. In remembrance whereof they erected a Cross in the Field, where they had resolved upon this Croisade, and mutually promised to leave all Disputes in the same posture they then were, till after their return from this holy Expedition.

The Month of March following Philip Assembles a Parliament at Paris, where it was resolv'd by Advice of the Bishops and Barons, to take the Tenths of all Goods, Movables and Immovables of all Persons, as well Ecclesiasticks as of the Laity, excepting only the Monks of Cîteaux, the Chartreux de Fontevault, and the Spittles belonging to the poor Leprous People. This Impost was called the Saladine Tithe.

Whilst they were preparing with great cheerfulness and courage for this Expedition, Richard for a not what little Injury received of Alfonso Earl of Tboulouze, renew'd the old Pretention of his Mother Alienor to that County, and endeavoured to recover it by the Sword. Philip to disengage his Brother-in-Law and make a Diversion, falls into Berry, takes all the places the English were possessed of, drove out old Henry who was got thither with an Army, and pursued him as far as Normandy.

Winter brought them to a Truce. In the mean time Richard falls out with his Father, and threw himself into the Arms of Philip. His discontent proceeded from his Fathers delay in giving him Alix of France betroathed to him. Some believe the old Man cast other looks upon her, then he ought towards his Sons Wife, and besides by compleating this Marriage, he had been obliged, according to the Contract; to let his be Crowned, and give him the Title of King.

The Physitian Rigord in the History of Philip relates, That being at Argenteuil, when the Moon was at Full, and the Night very clear, a little before day-break, the Prior of that Monastery, and several of the Monks saw that Planet descend in a Moment to the Earth, where having rested some time, it went slowly up again and took its former place.

The following Spring Philip takes the Field, Conquers all the Countrey of Mayne and the City of Mans, Touraine and the City of Tours, himself having, as by Miracle found a Foard in the Loire which he discover'd to his Army.

At the same time John surnamed Without-Land, the Third Son of Henry, likewise takes up Arms against his Father, who not knowing which way to turn himself, leaves Chinon and advances towards King Philip humbly to desire a Peace: Philip grants it, and reconciles him to Richard, upon condition that one of them should accompany him to the Holy-Land.

But Henry as unfortunate in War as he was unfortunate in his Children, overcome with shame and sorrow, dies three days after he was returned to Chinon. Richard succeeds him: and then Philip his Brother-in-Law generously restores to him all he had Conquer'd of his, excepting Iffondun and the Fiefs he held in Auvergne, settling Gisors and all the Vexin for his Wives Portion.

The two Princes thus united in a Friendship which appeared to be very cordial, and so firm that one would imagine nothing could untie or shake it, fitted themselves for their Expedition to the Holy-Land, appointed the Rendezvous for their Armies at Vezelay, and took Shipping, Richard at Marseilles, and Philip at Genoa. Both of them landed in Sicily; but Philip not so happily as Richard, a furious Tempest having forced him to throw over-board part of his Horses and his Equipage.

Before their departure, Philip with the leave and by the agreement of all his Barons left the Guardianship of his Son and the Government of the Kingdom to the Queen his Mother Alix de Champagne, and to William Cardinal-Archbishop of Reims Brother to that Queen. But fearing they might abuse it, he left an Authentick Order in Writing Signed by the Great Officers belonging to the Crown, which limited their Power and prescribed their Lesson in many cases. Amongst others he would have them bestow vacant Benefices of the Regalia by the Advice of Brother Bernard, who was a devout Hermit living in the Bois de Vincennes, and that during his absence, no Tailles should be levied by any Lords upon their Lands, nor in case he should happen to dye, by the Regents during the Minority of his Son.

He likewise ordered the Sheriffs of Paris, that they should take care to enclose it with Walls and Towers. There were no Ditches made, the Enclosure on the left hand of the River upwards hath been often enlarged and altdred. The Burghers of other other Cities by their example, were ambitious to Wall their Towns and make Ramparts for defence.

"William the Good King of Sicily, Son of William the Wicked or Bad, being dead without Children Anno 1189. He had an Aunt the Daughter of King Roger, named Constance, who being almost Thirty years of Age, not a Nun as some have falsely maintained, who had Married Anno 1186. Henry Son of the Emperor Frederic. This young Prince was raised to the Empire this year 1190. The Emperor his Father having drowned himself while he was bathing in the little River of Serre between Antioch and Nicea, as he was leading great succours into the Holy Land. Now Constance pretended to succeed his Nephew: but Tancred his Bastard Brother had excluded him, and seized on the Kingdom.

Emperor Isaac Angelus, and Henry VI. Son of Frederic I. Reigned seven years, about the end of 1190.

1190. It was he that received the two Kings at Messina, where they landed in the Month of March, and sojourn'd there above six Months. During their stay Richard had great Contests with Tancred, concerning the Articles of his Sister Jane's Dowry, Widow of King William. He was often like to come to blows about it, and had thoughts of forcing the Town of Messina. In fine Philips Mediation procur'd him 60000 Ounces of Gold from Tancred, whereof he had a third for his pains.

1190. Now Tancred, whether it were true, or whether by a Diabolical Artifice, shew'd Richard some Letters, which he affirmed to have been written to him by Philip, wherein that King profer'd him all his Forces to attaque Richard and seize upon him in the night, if he would at the same time fall upon him likewise. Richard believed the Letters to be real, and made a great stir about it. Thus the two Kings were mightily exasperated against each other; Richard for the design contrived against his Life: Philip for the reproach against his Honour.

1191. Towards the end of the Winter Richard makes known to Philip that he cannot Wed his Sister for certain Reasons, which he will not discover, (perhaps it was because old Henry his Father had kept her too long) and declares to him he had betrothed Berengaria Daughter of Garcias King of Navar, and that his Mother Alienor was bringing her thither to Consummate the Marriage.

Philip was not Transported, but wisely suppressing his Anger, left him to his liberty of quitting his Sister, provided he would surrender those Lands he had given him for her Dowry, and would at the first conveniency go along with him to the Holy-Land. Also he consented to a Truce for those Countries during all the time they should remain abroad. Richard accepted of the Truce willingly, but refused to go so soon. These were the chief causes that changed the mutual affection of these young Kings into a cruel hatred.

1191. James d' Avesnes with some Flemish Forces and the remainders of the Emperor Frederic's had already besieged the City of Acre* (it was otherwhile called Ptolemais) very considerable for its Port and its strong Walls. King Philip parted from Messina in the beginning of March, and landed near this place, took his Quarters about the Town, raised his Batteries and made a wide breach.

1191. In the mean time Richard putting to Sea, was driven by Tempest on the Coasts of the Island of Cyprus, It was then in the possession of one Isaac* a Grecian Prince, who having abused and pillag'd his weather-beaten Soldiers, whereas he ought to have relieved them, provoked his just wrath, in so much that he seizes on that Kingdom, and carried away an immense quantity of rich Plunder together with the said Isaac and his Wife, both of them bound in Chains of Gold.

1191. He got not to Acre till two Months after Philip; and far from promoting the taking thereof, he retarded it by the continual disagreement between them. The Siege lasted five Months in all, and caused a great many Princes and brave Men to perish there.

In the end the City surrendered upon Composition, importing that the Besieged should obtain of Saladine the release of all the Christian Prisoners in his hands, and the true Crofs which he had taken in Jerusalem, for which their Limbs and Lives were to be Security till performed, at the Mercy and discretion of the Conquerors. They were therefore, together with all the Spoil, equally shared betwixt the two Kings; and as Saladine would not perform the first of these two Conditions, and the second was not in his power, because the true Crofs was not to be found, Richard too passionate and cholerick put seven thousand of them to the edge of the Sword who were his Prisoners, and reserved not above two or three hundred of the Principal.

In

In this Siege were slain a great number of People of quality, Rotron Earl of Perche, Thibault Earl of Blois, Great Seneschal and Uncle to the King, and Alberic Clement Lord du Mez his Marechal, Son of another Clement who had executed the same Office.

"Our Kings of France in those times had but one, and these Clements were the first who raised or improved this Office by their favour, and extended it to the Soldiery, whereas before them, it had nothing to do but with such as belonged to the Kings Stables.

The contagious distempers destroy'd yet more of their Men, then the Sword. Philip d' Alsace Earl of Flanders, ended his days in the Month of June. He had no Children, but only one Sister whom he had Married to Baldwin Earl of Haynault, from whom were sprung two, Elizabeth who was Married to King Philip, and a Son of the same Name as the Father.

King Philip being likewise seized with a long fit of Sickness, which was suspected to proceed from some ill morfel, because his Nails and Hair fell off, resolved to return into France: but to remove the jealousy Richard might conceive at his departure, he made Oath he would not in the least meddle with his Lands till forty days after he were certain of his being returned into France.

He likewise left with him near Six hundred Horse, and Ten thousand Foot, with their inainance for their three years, under the Conduct of Hugh III. Duke of Burgundy. After that, having taken leave of his Lords, he puts to Sea; and being Convoy'd by three Gallies only, which the Genoeze furnished him withal, landed in Puglia. When he had somewhat recover'd his Health, he sets forward on his journey with a small number of followers, visited the Sepulchre of the Apostles at Rome, and having received the Popes Blessing, parted from thence, and arrived in France in the Month of December. He pass'd his Christmase Holy-days at Fontaine* Eblaud, and from thence came to his dear City of Paris.

After his departure, all the Forces put themselves under the Command of Richard, who did so many prodigious acts of valour, that they surpass the belief, as well as the ordinary strength of Mankind. In a word, he had regained the Holy-City, if the jealousy of Hugh, Duke of Burgundy, had not obstructed his progress.

And indeed he had a design in his Head of forming a great Kingdom in those Countries and that none might dispute the Title with him of King of Jerusalem, he purchas'd it of Guy de Luzignan, giving him in exchange for it, the Kingdom of Cyprus, which the House of Luzignan held, till the year 1473. as we shall observe in its due place.

(We find frequently enough in History, the apparitions of Meteors in the Air, representing Battles, Firing, and as it were engaging one another: but this year a most wonderful thing, some were seen to descend upon Earth near the City of Nogent in Perche, and fought in the Fields, to the great terror of the Inhabitants of that Country.)

In the mean time Philip being returned into France, remembered very well, that Philip d' Alsace Earl of Flanders, had promised upon his Marriage with Queen Elizabeth his Niece, Daughter of the Earl of Hainault, to give him after his death, the County of Artois. He consider'd likewise, that to the Queen belonged some part of the inheritance of the said Uncle. To this end therefore he goes very well attended into Flanders, and forced him to give up all the Countrey of Artois, with the homage of the Counties of Boulogne, Ghisnes, and St. Pol, which till then had ever held of the Earls of Flanders, and extended as far as Neuf-Fosse. This was the first leaven of that mortal hatred, and obstinate feud and wars, between the Flemming and French.

Now the misunderstanding that was between Richard and the Duke of Burgundy, the perpetual jealousy that King lay under, left Philip in his absence should seize upon his Lands, and withal the indisposition of his Body, which had been twice or thrice sorely shaken with Sickness during his stay in that Countrey, would not let him remain any longer in the East. Of a sudden he grew so impatient to return, that he sacrificed all the fruits of his heroick Valour to that longing and pressing desire. For on condition of a three years truce, he renders to Saladine all those Places he had Taken or Fortified in this last Expedition.

Some few days before Hugh Duke of Burgundy died of a fit of Sickness, to whom Odo, or Endes III. his Son succeeded.

After Richard had left what Forces he had yet remaining, and such places as the Eastern Christians had still in Syria, with Henry Earl of Champagne his Nephew, he embarked the 10th of October with little attendance; and because he durst not pass thorough the territories of the King of France, his declared Enemy, he went and landed landed near Aquileia to pass thorough Germany. But the Lords of those Countreys, especially Leopoldus Duke of Austria, whom he had highly offended at the Siege of Acre or Acon, caused him to be so narrowly watched, that notwithstanding he went disguised, and travelled thorough unfrequented Roads, he fell into the hands of that Duke. He delivered him basely up to the Emperour Henry, who kept him prisoner fourteen Months.

When Philip heard of his Captivity, he dispatched Messengers into Germany to negotiate with the Emperour to detain him as long as possibly he could. Some Months after he sends to declare a War against him, incites under hand his Brother John, a Prince without Honour or Faith, to seize upon the Kingdom of England; and heat the sametime falling into Normandy, takes Gisors, and some places in Vexin. Some reckon this last event in Anno 1192. and by consequence before the imprisonment of Richard.

However it were, in the month of February Anno 1193. he took the Town of Evreux which he gave to John, keeping the Castle himself, and went to besiege Rouen, but lost his labour there.

Queen Elizabeth his Wife had been dead about two years, he demanded in Marriage the Princess Isenburge * Sister of Canut King of Denmark, a beautiful and chaste Princess, but one that had some secret defect. And indeed the first night of the Nuptials, they being Married at Amiens, in the beginning of the month of August, he took such an aversion that he would never touch her.

He kept her notwithstanding some time; and afterwards growing weary of that unnecessary Expence, he so contrived it, that the Arch-Bishop of Reims the Popes Legat with some French Bishops, gave sentence of Divorce or Separation. He did it upon the testimony of some Lords whom he produc'd, who asserted they were of kindred within the Fifth and Sixth Degree. In effect Isenburge and Philip, had both of them for Great, Great, Great, Great Grand-Father Jaroslav, or Jarislod, King of Russia. This Jaroslav was Father of Ann, who was the Wife of King Henry I. and of Jaroslav II. whose Son was Vlodimer, that had a Daughter named Isenburge, wife of King Canut IV. This Canut begot Voldemar; and from Voldemar came Canut V. and our Isenburge.

Richard having in fine got himself out of Captivity, in despite of all the obstacles Philip had made use of, endeavour'd to revenge himself by force of Arms: but having drained himself of Moneys to pay his Ransom, his Exploits did not answer his Resentments.

During two years, the two Kings reciprocally destroy'd eithers Countreys with Fire and Sword, demolished a great many places, and then made a Peace about the end of the year 1195. restoring on either side what they had taken from each other, unless it were the Vexin which remained to Philip.

It hapned in this War, that as Philip was passing by Blain, the English who had laid themselves in Ambuscade, took all his Baggage, amongst which (as the Grand Seigneur does to this day) he made them carry all the Titles, or Papers belonging to the Crown. Thus they were all destroy'd or lost, to the great damage of the Kings affairs, and the French History. He caused Copies to be collected where ever they could meet with them, to compleat and furnish the Treasury of his Charters or Papet-Office.

In the Month of March of the year 1196. the great overflow or inundations of Waters, especially the Seine, were so terrible and frightful, that Paris, and the Isle of France feared a second Deluge. We take notice of it, because it was the greatest of any wherof the Histories of France make mention.

The Peace betwixt the two Kings lasted hardly six Months. Philip commences the War against Richard for two reasons: One, because he had built a Fort in the Island d' Andely on the Seine. And the other, because he had taken the Castle of Vierzon in Berry, from the Lord to whom it belonged, who claimed Justice of the King their Sovereign Lord.

The next year Baldwin XI. Earl of Flanders, grudging in his heart that Philip had taken from him, the half of his Succession left by his Uncle, Leagued himself with Richard against him; as did likewise Renault, Son of the Count of Dammartin, notwithstanding Philip had assisted him in getting the Heirefs, and the Earldom of Boulogne.

Amongst all the events of this War, which amounted only to Burnings and Plunderings, is to be observed what hapned to Philip de Dreux Bishop of Beauvais, Cousin-german to the King. This Bishop being taken in the War Armed and Fighting, by by some of Richard's Soldiers, was detained a long time in an uneasy prison. The Pope would interpose his recommendation to Richard for his deliverance, and in his Letters he call'd this Bishop His most dear Son. But Richard having sent word back, in what posture and manner he was taken; and having sent his coat of Maille all Bloody, with order to him that carry'd it, to ask him, Behold Holy Father, whether this be the Coat of your Son? The Pope had nothing to reply, but that the Treatment they shewed to that Prelat was just, since he had quitted the Militia of Jesus Christ, to follow that of the World.

Death of the Emperour Henry. As he had manifested himself as rude an enemy to the Popes as his Predecessors; and besides, was very odious for his cruelties; Innocent III. strongly opposed the Election of Philip his Brother, excommunicating all his Adherents, and stood up for Otho, Son of the Duke of Saxony, and a Sister of Richards, who was Crowned at Aix la Chapelle: so that there was a Schism in that Empire, which had often occasioned one in the Church. The King of England, the Earl of Flanders, and the Arch-Bishop of Coleu supported Otho, and King Philip on the contrary made a League with his Rival.

The same year died in the City of Acre, or Acon, the generous Henry, Earl of Champagne, Titular King of Jerusalem; his Nephew Thibault, or Theobald III. of that Name, Earl of Blain, inherited those Lands he had in France, in prejudice of his Uncles two Daughters. The eldest was named Alix, and was Queen of Cyprus, and by her was born a Daughter of the same Name, whom we shall find making War against Thibault IV. The Second was called Philippa, who was Married to Erard de Brienne.

These bloody and obstinate Wars, the particulars whereof cannot be brought within the compass of an Abridgement, caused much mischief in France: but the greatest was, that Philip grew extremely covetous, and became too greedy in heaping up Treasure, under pretence of the necessity of raising and maintaining great numbers of standing Forces; which are truly very proper to make Conquests, and new Acquisitions; but sometimes become oppressiv to the Subjects, and destructive to the Laws of the Land.

As he was the First of the Kings of France that kept Men in pay, and would have Soldiers always ready, to employ them in what he pleased; he set himself likewise upon making great exactions upon the People, ransoming or taxing the Churches, and recalling the Jews, who were the introducers of Usury and Imposts. But, however he was very frugal, and retrencht himself as much as possible, knowing and considering that a King who hath great designs, ought not to consume the substance of his Subjects in vain and pompous expences.

At the end of two years War, the Pope by his intercession, procured a Five years truce between the two Kings: during which, Richard as covetous of Money as he was proud, having intelligence that a Gentleman of Limousin had found a vast Treasure, and carried it into the Castle of Chalus, he went presently and besieged him: he was wounded there with a Cross-bow; and his debauchery having envenom'd his wound, he died of it the Eleventh day of April, in this year 1199.

He had introduc'd the use of Cross-bows in France; before that time, Sword-men were so generous and brave, that they would not owe their Victory but to their Lances or Swords: they abhor'd those treacherous weapons, wherewith a coward sheltered or conceal'd, may kill a valiant Man at a distance, and thorough a hole.

He had no Children, therefore the Kingdom of England and the Duchy of Normandy, belonged of right to young Arthur Duke of Bretagne, as being the Son of Gefroy his Brother, elder then John, without Land: but John having seized the Money, gained Richards Forces, and stept into the Throne.

In the mean while the Earl of Flanders with his Allies, regained the Cities of Aire, and St. Omers. It hapned that the Kings party took his Brother Philip, Earl of Namur, and Peter, Bishop Elect of Cambray. The King refusing to release this last, the Popes Legat puts the Kingdom of France under a prohibition; so that after three Months time he was constrained to set him free.

The day of the Ascension, in the year 1200. Peace was concluded at a solemn Conference between the two Kings, between Vernon and Andeley. It was warranted by Twelve Barons on either part, who made oath to take up Arms against him that should break it: and moreover, confirmed by the Marriage of Blanche, Daughter of Alfonso VIII. King of Castille, and Alienor, Sister to King John, with Lewis the eldest Son of Philip; to whom King John, in favour of this Alliance, yielded up all the Lands and Places which the French had taken from him.

Each had a care to secure his Partisans, John was oblig'd to receive his Nephew Arthur into favour, who did homage to him for his Dutchy of Bretagne, but yet remained with Philip. Reciprocally Philip pardon'd Renald Earl of Boulagne, and some while after Treated the Marriage between his Son of his own name, whom he had by his Queen Agnes, and that Earls Daughter.

Since the repudiation of Ifemburge of Denmark, King Philip had kept her in a Convent at Soissons; and at three years end, that is, Anno 1196, he had espoused Mary-Agnes, Daughter of Bertold, Duke of Merania and Dalmatia. Pope Celestine III. upon the complaints of King Canut, Brother of the Divorc'd Lady, had Commissioned in the year 1198. two Legats to take cognisance of this Affair, who had assembled a grand Council at Paris, of the Bishops and Abbots of the Kingdom: but all those Prelats, being partly terrify'd, and some corrupted, durst give no Sentence, and the Legats were suspected to favour the Cause of Agnes. Afterwards the Holy Father more importunately desired to do Justice, had sent two more; One of them in the month of Decemb. in the year 1199. having called the Prelats of France to Dijon, notwithstanding the Appeal interjected by Philip to the Pope, pronounced Sentence of prohibition upon all the Kingdom, in presence, and by consent of all the Bishops; and nevertheless that he might have leisure enough to get away into some place of safety, he was willing it should not be publish'd till twenty days after Christmasts.

He had reason to fear Philip's anger. In effect, it burst out with fury against all his Subjects; against the Ecclesiasticks first whom he believ'd to be all accomplices in this injury: for he drove the Bishops from their Sees, cast the Canons out of their Churches, put the Curats from their Parishes, and confiscated and plundered all their Goods; Then against the Laity, vexing and loading the Citizens with new Imposts, and unheard of Exactions, tiercing, or thirthing the Gentry, that was, taking away Thirds of their Revenues, and of all their Goods, which had never been heard of in France.

The Interdiction lasted Seven Months: during this time, Philip solicited the Pope so earnestly, that he gave order to his Legats to take it off, upon condition he should take Ifemburge again, and in six Months, six Weeks, six Days, and six Hours, he would have the Cafe of her Divorce decided by his two Legats, and the Prelats of the Kingdom; the Friends and Relations of that Princess being assigned to defend her.

The Assembly was held at Soissons, by Ifemburge's choice, King Canut sent the ablest people in his Kingdom to sollicite and plead her Cause. After twelve days juggling and proceeding, Philip had intimation that Judgment would be against him; he goes one fair Morning to fetch Ifemburge from her House, and setting her up on Horse-back behind him, carries her thence, having order'd notice to be given to the Legat, not to give himself so much trouble about examining whether the Divorce he had Decreed were good or not, since he owned it, and would have her for his Wife. Nevertheless he used her but little better then before, nor did shew any more kindness, besides some little Civilities to her.

Before the years end, Agnes her Rival died, having been five years with the King. She had two Children by him, One Son and One Daughter, whom Pope Innocent III. Legitimated.

Died likewise Thibauld Earl of Champagne, who had then only One Daughter, a Minor. The King would have the * Guardianship-Noble: but soon after the death of Thibauld, his Wife was brought to bed of a Post-humus Son, who had his Fathers Name, and the Surname of Great. The Daughter lived not long after the birth of the Posthume.

In those times Usury and Uncleanness Reigned bare-faced in France; God raised up two great and virtuous Men, Fulk, Curate of Neuilly in Brie, and Peter de Roucy a Priest in the Diocess of Paris, to Preach against these Vices, with so much power and efficacy, that they reclaimed a great many Souls from those Sins and Follies.

Now it hapned, that a few Months before the death of Thibauld, Fulk, who had this gift of perswading People to what he approved, by his earnest Exhortations, knowing there was to be a great meeting of Princes, Lords and Gentlemen, at a Tournament or Jests, at the Castle d'Ecris, between Braye and Corbie, went thither, and exhorted them so earnestly and effectually to undertake the voyage to the Holy Land; that the Earls Baldwin of Flanders, Henry d'Anguien his Brother, Thibauld de Champagne, Louis de Blois his Brother, Simon de Montfort, Gautier, or Gualtier de Brienne, Matthew de Montmorency, Stephen du Perche, and several other Lords * Crossed themselves: nevertheless they could not set forwards till two years after.

The

The reconciliation between the two Kings, seemed perfect and sincere. This year they conferr'd at Andeley. Nay, Philip had the the King of England with him to his City of Paris, and Treated him with all the magnificence, and all the demonstrations of friendship he could desire.

But John had begun to contrive his own unhappiness, by casting off his Wife Avice or * Avoise, Daughter of the Earl of Glocestre, to Marry Isabel, only Daughter of Aymar Earl of Angoulesme, and Alix of Courtenay, whom he ravished from Hugh le Brun, E. rl de la Marche, to whom she was affianced.

From that time, the said Lord sought all manner of ways to revenge himself for that injury. He began to hold private intelligence with Philip, he endeavour'd to make an insurrection in Poitou; and Rodolph his Brother, Earl of Eu, began to commit Hostilities on the skirts of Normandy. John chastised them for their Rebellion, by depriving them of their Lands, especially some Castles in the County d'Eu. They make address to the King of France their Sovereign Lord, and demand Justice of him.

Upon this difference, the two Kings saw one another near Gaillon; where Philip who had laid his design; spake high, and summon'd John to appear in his Court, that right might be done, not only upon the complaint of Hugh, but likewise of Prince Arthur, who demanded Maine, Anjou, and Touraine.

The Earl of Flanders and the other Lords that had taken the Cross, departed for the Holy Land; and as in those times there were but few Vessels upon the coasts of Provence, they had taken their way by Venice, where they hop'd to find a great many well fitted; and there Thomas I. Earl of Savoy, and Boniface, Marquis of Montferrat joyned them. But the Venetians would not furnish them with Vessels, till they had first employ'd their Arms to recover the Cities of Sclavonia, especially that of Zara for the Republicque, from whom they had withdrawn themselves to own the King of Hungary; which retarded them above a year in those parts.

In the year 1195. Isaac Angelus, Emperour of the East had been deprived of his Empire, his Sight, and his Liberty, by his own Brother Alexis. And the Son of that Isaac likewise named Alexis, had made his escape into Germany, flying to Philip of Serbia * pretended Emperour, who had Married his Sister. This young Prince having notice, that there was an Army of the Cross'd at Venice, went thither to implore their assistance. Several difficulties hindred them from going into the Holy Land; besides the Venetians hoped to find it better for their purpose to make a War in Greece, because the spoil and plunder promised more gain, and seemed more certain to them; and more-over, all the Latine Christians were ravish'd to meet with this occasion and opportunity, to revenge the Treachery and Outrages the Greeks had practis'd since the beginning of the Holy War. They concluded therefore to turn their Arms that way, upon condition the young Alexis would defray the charges of their expedition, allow them great rewards, and submit the Greek Church to the Obedience of the Pope.)

To provide for the expences of his War, King Philip endeavour'd to accustom the Clergy to furnish him with Subsidies; and they excused themselves upon their Liberties, and for that it was not lawful to employ the Moneys belonging to the Poor in profane uses: they only promis'd to assist him with their Prayers to God. Now it hapned that the Lords de Coucy, de Retel, de Rosey, and several others went and pillag'd, and invaded their Lands; they fly to the King for protection, who in their own coin, assisted them with his Prayers to those Lords: but as they understood one another, they proceeded to worse dealing. Then the Prelats redoubled their intreaties, and besought him to employ his Forces; to which he replied, that Soldiers could not be kept without Money. They soon understood what he desired, and the mischief pressing hard upon them, they were constrain'd to give, and immediately the Lords desisted from plundering.

In the interim, John King of England summon'd for three several times, to answer the accusation in King Philip's Court, endeavour'd to gain time, and made all delays. But Philip finding himself strong in Men, and provided with Money, having no counter-poise in his Kingdom, because he held in his own hands the Garde-noble of the potent House of Champagne, and the Earl of Flanders was gone into the Levant; had resolv'd to push on against him. He therefore gave some Forces to Prince Arthur, to pursue his Right, having before betrothed his Daughter Mary to him. At the same time he entred upon Normandy, where he forced five or six places; and received the most considerable Lords of the Countrey into favour, amongst the rest, Hugh de Gournay, and the Earl of Alençon, who assured him of their Service and their Towns.

1201. Arthur on his side attacks Poitou, the Earls de la Marche, and d'Eu, Gefroy de Luzignan and their friends being joyned with him. His Grand-Mother Alienor had put her self into Mirebeau; he besieges her there: King John hastens thither with so much diligence, that he surprizes him one fair Morning napping in his Bed, takes him prisoner, and sends him to the Castle of Falaise.

1202. Normandy and Poitou being shaken in this manner, comes a Legat from the Pope, who ordains the two Kings to assemble the Bishops and Lords of their Countreys, and by their Consultations, put an end to these Disputes. John would readily have consented to this Order, but Philip who was not willing to give over so fair a Game, obliged his, who were assembled at Mantes, to throw in an Appeal from the Sentence of the Legat to the Pope himself, which was to gain time, and continue his progress.

1202. The respect for Queen Alienor had still with-held King John from staining his hands in the Blood of the unfortunate Arthur: Soon after her death, he caused him to be brought to the Castle of Rouen (he kept his Court in that City: and in a very obscure night he drew him forth from thence, and led him to such a place, that afterwards he was never seen.

It being justly presum'd that he had murder'd him. Constance, the Mother of that young Prince, demanded Justice of King Philip for that parricide committed in his Territory, and upon the person of one of his Vassals. He caused John therefore to be summoned before his Peers or Pairs; where not appearing, nor sending any to excuse him, he was by judgment of that Court, Condemned, as attainted and convicted of Parricide and Felony, to lose all the Lands he had in France, which should be confiscated and forfeit to the Crown, and all such as should defend them, reputed Guilty de Lese-Majestatis.

1203. In prosecution, or rather execution of this Decree, Philip partly by force, partly by intelligence, took from him this year, almost all the higher, or upper Normandy, whilst this unworthy lazy Man, pass'd away the time with his Wife at Caen, as if all had been in a profound Peace.

We may imagine that if he would have taken some care of his Affairs, Philip could not so easily have conquer'd so many places, since the single Castle de Gaillard near Andeley, situate on a Rock, both very high and steep on all sides, endured a Five months Siege: but both Heaven and Earth had declar'd against him, his friends betray'd him, his Subjects became unfaithful, and he meanly abandon'd himself.

1204. The following year Philip made himself Master of all the Cities of the Lower Normandy, almost without a blow. Rouen it self, which was the Capital of the whole Province, environ'd with a double Wall, and very affectionate to her natural Dukes; After a Siege of forty days, being informed by the Deputies sent to King John, that no Relief or assistance could be had from him, surrendered to the Conquerour, upon condition he should maintain the Citizens in their Franchises and Privileges: which he agreed to, and they obtained Letters, or a Charter to secure it; a precaution as feeble against an absolute Power, as Paper is against Steel.

1204. Two or three other places which yet defended themselves, follow'd the example of Rouen; and so it was that in less than three years he gained all Normandy, which had had Twelve Dukes of that Nation (whereof John was the last) who had Govern'd them about Three hundred and sixteen years.

At the same time William des Roches who had quitted John's party to joyn with Philip, secured the Counties of Anjou, du Maine, and de Touraine; and Henry Clement, Marechal of France, conquer'd all Poitou for him, excepting only Niort, Tonnais, and Rochel.

1205. The next year the King himself having gotten a great Train of Artillery, forced the Castle des Loches, and some places that remained in the hands of the English in Touraine.

1203. The French and the Venetians sailing to Constantinople with only 28000 Men, forced the Harbour, and afterwards the City, though there were above Threescore thousand Fighting Men there, deliver'd Isaac out of prison, and caused the young Alexis his Son to be Crowned. The Tyrant Alexis and his Brother-in-law Theodorus Lascaris having made their escape over the Walls, retir'd to Adrianople.

1204. Whilst this Army of the Cross wintered about Constantinople, and Isaac and his Son endeavour'd to make good what they had promis'd them for their reward; the people upon whom they Levied very great sums of Money, mutined, One certain Alexis Ducas, surnamed Murzuffle, Great Master of the Wardrobe to young Alexis headed the the sedition, seized on that Prince, whilst Isaac was in his last Agonic, and strangled him with his own hands. Then caused himself to be Declared Emperour, and went forth with the City Militia against the aforesaid Army, but they were presently beaten back, Constantinople besieg'd, and within Sixty days taken by Storm, swimming in Blood, and a great part consumed by Fire.

The Conquerours gave power to Twelve of the chief amongst themselves, to elect an Emperour, upon condition, That if he were a French man, the Patriarch should be a Venetian, and so on the contrary. The intrigues of the Venetians, for whose interest, Boniface Marquis of Montferrat was not so convenient, though he seemed most worthy of the Empire, manag'd it so, that the Electors conferr'd it upon Baldwin Earl of Flanders, and the Patriarchat upon Thomas Morosini a Venetian.

After they had settled things in order within the City, they easily conquer'd all what the Grecian Empire possess'd in Europe, and formed several Principalities there, of which the Marquis de Montferrat, who married Isaac's Widow, had Thessaly for his share, with the Title of a Kingdom: upon which condition he gave up the Island of Candia to the Venetians. The Grecian Princes preserved Asia to themselves, where they established divers Sovereignties, Theodorus Lascaris attired himself with Imperial Robes at Nicea in Bithynia, and had the largest Dominion for extent. Of the Family of the Comnenes, Michael had part of Epirus, David Heraclea, Ponicus and Paphlagonia; and Alexis his Brother the City of Trebisond on the Pontus-Euxinus.

There was the Empire of Trebisond formed, which still remained separate and distinct from that of Constantinople, till the Turks devoured both the one and the other.

Baldwin enjoy'd not the Empire two years; for going to besiege Adrianople, Joanitz, or Caloian King of Bulgaria, coming to assist the Greeks, drew him into an Ambuscade, made him prisoner, and having carried him into Bulgaria, cut off his Arms and Legs, and cast him into a Precipice, where he languish'd for three days. It was thus given out; but many are of opinion that he escaped from that imprisonment. However it were, his Brother Henry succeeded him in the Empire. He left two Daughters, the eldest Married Ferrand, Brother of Sancho, King of Portugal, who by this means was Earl of Flanders, the youngest had Children by Bouchard d'Avesnes.

King John not attributing his misfortunes to his crime, his cowardize or sloth, but to the ill-will of his English Subjects, particularly the Clergy who had not assisted him in his necessities, sets himself upon molesting and vexing them by all manner of exactions.

Guy de Tonnais who Govern'd Bretagne, being Husband to the Dutches's Constance, had turned to Philips party, and assisted him not a little in his late Conquests. He had likewise brought over to him the Vicount Tonnais his Brother: but this year both of them were at variance with him. Guy would Canonize himself in Bretagne, the King begirts him in Nantes, and compels him to return again to his Service; how-ever, the Vicount remained for the English Interest.

That King having Levied vast sums of Money, and a powerful Army in England, comes and Lands at Rochel: the Vicount Savary de Maulcon, and some other Lords joyn with him; Philip finding himself too weak, contents himself only with providing and strengthening his Towns in Poitou with all speed, and then retires to Paris. John marches into Anjou, takes Angers, dismantles it, and presently after, remembering that it was his Ancestors native City, causes the Walls to be rebuilt.

At the same time there were some Bretons, who seizing upon the Promontary de Garplic, built a Fort there, to favour the approaches of the English upon those Shallows.

These were all the Effects of the great Prowess of King John; for being soon tir'd, he caused a Truce to be propounded, by the interposition of the Pope, who threatned Excommunication in case of refusal. Philip agrees it for two years, against the opinion of the French Lords, who proffer'd him all assistance, and engaged not to forsake him, although the Pope should proceed against him by censures.

"The two contenders for the German Empire, Otto and Philip had agreed, An. 1207. in such sort, that Otto who had the approbation of the Pope, but was the weaker, should leave the Empire to Philip, whom if he hapned to die with"out Children, Otho should succeed him, and in the interim Marry his Daughter. "Now this year Philip being Murthered in his Sick Bed by Otho Palatine of Viel-spak, the Empire fell to his Competitor, who the following year went into Italy, "and was Crowned at Rome. Immediately after he had a quarrel with the Pope, about some Enterprize upon the Lands belonging to the Church, and those belong- "ing to Frederick King of Sicily, Feodary to the Holy See, for which he was Ex- "communicated, An, 1210.

He was elected at the age of 35 years.

* Moines de
Cîteaux.

Innocent III. was then Pope, a Prelat of great courage, rare merit, and who being in the strength of his age, was stirring in every place, and concern'd himself in every thing, driving all things to the height, where he met with a weak or divided party. England made an unhappy Experiment. King John being absolutely resolv'd not to accept of Cardinal Stephen Langton for Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, whom the * White Friars had Elected to the Popes liking, but without the Kings consent, and the Pope standing stiffly up to maintain and justify this Election, the contest grew so hot, that the Pope sends to three of the English Bishops, a Sentence of Interdiction to be laid upon the whole Kingdom. John was so enrag'd, that he confiscated the Estates of all the Clergy, and resolv'd utterly to abolish Episcopacy in the Nation, Commanding them immediately to depart; and to secure himself against any personal effects of the Excommunication, wherewith he was threatned, he took Hostages of the Towns and Nobility.

The Pope not being able to reduce the Hereticks of Languedoc, who had almost gained the whole Province, falls upon Raimond Earl of Toulouse, because he was their chief promoter and encourager, and had caused one of his Legats to be massacred; it was Peter de Chasteau-neuf, a Monk of Cîteaux, or White Fryer, and the First that exercised the Inquisition. He Excommunicated that Earl, Absolv'd his Subjects of their Oath of Fidelity, and gave his Lands to the first Occupier, but without prejudice to the right of the King of France his Sovereignty.

Such an apprehension seized on the Earl, that being come to Milon the Popes Legat at Valence, he intirely submitted; gave up eight places of strength to the Roman Church to perpetuity, as a pawn of his Conversion; and the following year to obtain Absolution, suffred himself to be scourged with Rods at the Gate of St. Giles's Church, where Peter de Chasteau-neuf lay buried, and thence dragg'd to that Friars Tomb by the Legat, who put the Stole about his Neck, in presence of Twenty Arch-Bishops, and an infinite multitude of People. After which he likewise cross'd himself, or put on the badge of the Cross, and joyned the next year with those that took his, and the Towns of his Allies.

It was not his penitence that humbled him to undergo so horrible a shame;
it was the fear he had of a dreadful storm, just ready to break and fall upon his Head. For the Pope having turned that fervent Zeal which animated the People so much, to go in defence of the Holy Land, had this very year order'd a Croisade to be Preached against the Albigenses, and many Lords, Prelats, and great numbers of common People, had list'd themselves in this Militia; the King himself set out Fifteen thousand Men, that were to be maintain'd at his own charge.

"These bore the Cross upon their Breast, to distinguish them from such as went to the Holy Land, who wore that badge upon their Shoulder.

"Amongst these Heretiques, there were some whom they called the Poor, others "who named themselves the Humbled. The First made profession of an Evange"lical poverty; the Second undertook to Preach wherever they came. To con"tradict or countermine these, two Religious Orders were instituted: viz. The "Friars Mineurs or Cordeliers, and the Preaching Friars, or Jacobins. The First "Foundation of that was laid in Italy by St. Francis d'Assise; of the other in Lan- "guedoc by St. Dominique of the Noble Family of the Guzmans in Spain, and Can"non of Osma, who came into this Province with a Bishop, to Convert the Al- "bigenses.

King Philip would have been himself in this Expedition, or would have sent his Son; (for these Sectaries had committed some Hostilities in his Territory, acknowledging his Enemy King John) had he not feared a Landing of the English in Bretagne, under favour of the Fort du Garpie. He went not therefore beyond the Loire, but Commanded the Nobility that held of him to arm themselves, and take that Fort, as in truth they did this year.

The

The Bishops of Orleans and Auxerre who had been sent thither with their Vassals upon this Expedition, being return'd again without leave, pretending not to be oblig'd to march with the Army but when the King was there in Person: the King commanded their Regalia to be seized, that is to say, what they held in Fief of him, not their Tithes, Offerings, and other dues necessarily belonging to People of that Function. They made complaint, by their Envoys, to Pope Innocent III. then went themselves. The Pope having examined the matter, found they had failed and transgressed against the Customs and Laws of the Kingdom, so that they were fain to pay a Mult to the King to re-enter upon their Temporals.

The number of these New-Cross'd Soldiers were not less then 500000 Men, (not all Combatans as I believe) amongst whom there were five or six Bishops; the Duke of Burgundy, the Earls of Nevers, St. Poll, and de Montfort. The general Rendezvous was at Lyons about the Feast of St. John. Thence going into Languedoc, they assault the City of Bezierr, one of the strongest held by the Albigenses, forced it, and put all to the edge of the Sword, there being slain above threescore thousand Persons. Those in Carcaffonne terrified with this horrible Slaughter, surrendered upon Discretion, thinking themselves very happy to escape naked, or only in their Shirts.)

The Lords in this Army having called a Council, elected Simon Earl of Montfort, chief Commander in this War, and to govern the Conquests they had and should make upon those Hereticks. That done, the Earl of Nevers returned with a great Party of those Soldiers, and soon after the Duke of Burgundy with another; so that Simon was left ill attended, yet he maintained himself by a more then Heroick Valour, and Conquer'd Mirepoix, Pamiers and Alby. In so much as in a little time he made himself Master of the Albigois, the Counties of Bezierr and Carcaffonne, and above an hundred Castles.)

"In these times, the School at Paris flourish'd more then ever. They gave it the "name of University, because all sorts of Sciences were univerally taught there, al"though in effect the desire to Study or Learn, and the affluence of Scholars were "much greater then their Doctrine. A certain Priest of the Diocefs of Chartres
"named Almaric, beginning to Preach up some Novelties, had been forced to recant, "for which he died of grief. Several after his Death following his Opinions were
"discover'd and condemn'd to the Fire, he Excommunicated by the Council of Paris, "his Body taken out of the Grave, and his Ashes cast on the Dunghil. And because "they believ'd the Books of Aristotles Metaphysicks lately brought them from Con-

"prohibited either the keeping or reading them upon pain of Excommunication.

Guy Count d' Auvergne for the violence and injustice he committed against the Clergy, particularly the Bishop of Clermont whom he had imprison'd, was deprived of his County by King Philip, and could never be restor'd again.

The Emperor Otho grew stubborn in the defence of the Rights of the Empire, and prepared to go into Italy wholly to subdue it with a mighty Army, which he raised with the Money his Nephew King John had sent him, upon condition that from thence he should fall upon France. Thereupon he was thunder-struck with Excommunication by Pope Innocent; and a little after a great part of the German Princes elected Roger-Frederick II. Son of the Emperor Henry VI. about the Age of Seventeen years, and who in his Fathers Life-time had already been named King of the Romans. The Pope consented to this Election, and the following year Frederic, who was then in his Kingdom of Sicily, passed into Germany.

Every other while there came new Bands of Soldiers of the Cross to the Earl de Montfort, even from Flanders and Germany, but slipt away again within six weeks or two Months. With these Recruits he carried all the Places and Castles not only of the Hereticks, but likewise of other Lords. The King of Arragon, of whom divers in those Countries held their Lands in Under-Fiefs because of some Lordships he was possessed of, wrote to the Pope about it, and the Earl of Toulouse went even to Rome to make his Complaints, where his Holiness receiv'd him well enough, and promis'd him Justice.

But at his return they propounded an Agreement with Montfort, if he would let him have all he had already taken. He could never consent to it, and Milon the Popes Legat Excommunicated him in the Council of Avignon, because he levied certain new Tolls upon his Lands. The King of Arragon, came in Person to another Council which was held at St. Gilles, to endeavour to accommodate Affairs, and restore the Earl of Foix and the Vicount de Bearn who were dispossest as favourers of Hereticks : but he could not obtain any thing.

1211. The Toulouzain, after so many mean and ruinous Submissions, takes the Bit in his Teeth and puts himself in a posture to defend his own. Then is he openly Excommunicated, and his Lands exposed to any that could Conquer them. Montfort besieges Toulouze, but the grand Recruits that were come with him stealing away in a little time, he is forced to raise the Siege. The Earls of Toulouze and de Foix with their Confederates pursue him and besiege him in Chasteauneuf; a thing incredible, above 50000 Men could not overpower or force three hundred, are beaten and shamefully retreat.

1211. The young Princes Frederick II. and Lewis eldest Son of King Philip, delegated by his Father, Confer at Vaucoeurs upon the Frontiers of Champagne, to renew the Alliance between France and the Empire, and to unite themselves more closely against Otho and against King John his Uncle, two irreconcilable Enemies.

* Or Reynold. Renauld * Earl of Boulogne had served Philip very well since his Reconciliation, and had likewise been very well recompenc'd, by a great deal of good Land bestow'd upon him in that Country. Nevertheless the King suspecting him of holding Correspondence with the King of England, demands his strong Holds of him; and upon his refusal to deliver them, he attacks them, and press'd upon him so briskly that he durst not defend them, but went away to the Earl of Bar his Kinsman, and from thence to Flanders.

1212. Although King John had been Excommunicated the precedent year by the Popes Legat, he scoff'd at those Censures. But he was hugely astonished when he understood, that by a more terrible Sentence the Pope had absolv'd his Subjects of their Allegiance, and expos'd his Kingdom as a Prey, and that King Philip made great preparations to invade it, having already a prodigious number of Vessels ready at the mouth of the Seine.

The Legat by secret Informations increases his fears, and disturbs him to that height as he promises to make his Kingdom hold of the Holy See, and to pay a thousand Mark of Silver as a yearly Tribute, besides the Peter-Pence.

When the Legat had wire-drawn all he desired from him, he tries to persuade Philip to waive his Enterprize : but he was too far engag'd in Honour and Expence to break off so.

1213. All the Lords of the Kingdom in a Parliament held at Soissons the Morrow after Palm-Sunday, had promis'd to assist him with their Lives and Fortunes. There was only Ferrand * Son of Sancho I. King of Portugal, Earl of Flanders that refused to accompany him in this Expedition, unless he would restore the Cities of Aire and St. Omer which he had gotten from him, to have his consent that he might Marry the Heiress of Flanders who was the eldest Daughter of Baldwin V.

* Or Ferdinand.

The King thought that his approach might bring him back to his Duty, when he should see him on those Coasts ready to Embarque. Therefore when he was at Boulogne, he sent him order to come and meet him at Graveline : The Earl made them wait for him, but he appeared not : so that the King resolv'd before he took Shipping to put him in a Condition not to be able to hurt him.

1213. The Towns of Ipres, Cassel, and all the Country to Bruges submitted to his Sword, His Naval Force consisting of One thousand seven hundred Sail, having cast Anchor at Dam. While the greatest part were in the Road with scarce any Men, comes the English Fleet Commanded by the Earls of Boulogne and Salisbury, (who took and sunk a great many, and laid Siege to the place. Philip decamping from before Ghent, routs those they had sent on shoar and slew two or three thousand. Nevertheless they keeping the Seas, and his Vessels not being able to get out without falling into their hands, he took out all their Furniture, and caused them all to be burnt, and the City of Dam afterwards.)

1213. Then having wasted and plundered the Territory of Bruges, squeezed great Sums of Money from those Citizens, as likewise from the Inhabitants of Ghent and Ipres, sack'd and dismantled L'Isle, he left his Son Lewis, and Gaucher Count de Saint Pol in that Country with a strong Body of Horse, and Garisons in the Cities of Doway and Tournay only.

When he was retir'd out of Flanders, the Earl Ferrand re-entred, and soon Master'd Tournay and L'Isle which Lewis was beginning to repair, as in revenge Lewis sack'd and burnt Courtray. Philip for the second time goes into Flanders to secure his Conquests; and presently Ferrand withdraws : but as soon as Philip was gone, Renauld Earl of Boulogne took the Field with some Forces he brought out of England; But without without doing any Exploit, only after he scowred about the Country once or twice, and attempted two or three Sieges in vain, he forced Henry Earl of Louvain and Duke of Brabant, who had Married one of the Kings Daughters to joyn with him.

On the other side King John landed at Rochel with a great Army, and having patch'd up again with the Earls de la Marche, d'Eu, d'Angoulesme, de Lezignan, and other Poitievins who assisted him with their Forces, crosses Poitou, made himself Master of some places in Anjou, and began to rebuild the Walls of Angers his Native City.

To hinder this Progress, the King recall'd his Son out of Flanders, and sets him in opposition. This Prince takes his head Quarters at Chinon, and was seconded with the Forces of Bretagne by Peter de Dreux, who this year had Married the Heiress of that Dutchy. It was Alix or Alice Daughter of the Dutchiefs Constance and Guy de Tonars.

In the mean while the English wrought diligently about the fortifying Angers, and enclosed that part towards the River of Maine with a Wall. His Soldiers made excursions to the very Suburbs of Nantes on the other side of the Loire, surpriz'd Robert the eldest Son of the Earl of Dreux in an Ambuscade, who was got over the Bridge to attack them, cut his Men in pieces, and made him Prisoner.

Peter King of Arragon having gotten into his League and under his Protection, the Earls of Toulouze, de Foix and de Comenges, the Vicount de Beziers and others whose Lands Montfort had usurp'd, sent his Heralds to desie him. Montfort had left a strong Garison in Muret to make waste in the Neighbourhood of Toulouze. This King lays Siege to it in the Month of September. (His Army consisted of an Hundred thousand Men almost : Montfort who was at Castlenaudry, having hardly drawn together a thousand or twelve hundred, got into the place. From whence making a furious Sally upon the King, who fighting so small a number, set down to eat at the beginning of the Fight, cut all his Army off, threw him on the ground, where his Throat was cut by a private Soldier, took his Royal Standard which was carried in Triumph to Rome, and cover'd the Field with dead Bodies, without the loss of above eight Men.)

1213.

The weighty blow of this Club made the Earl of Toulouze and the Inhabitants of that great City fall down at the Legats Feet; they offer'd to submit to whatever Conditions he would impose : but they could not get off with words, it was resolv'd they should be plum'd of all.

This year 1214. France was shrewdly attack'd by King John, and on the Flanders side by the Emperor Otho, and the Counts Ferrand of Flanders, and Renauld de Boulogne : but both in the one and the other part his Arms remained Victorious. Prince Lewis having drawn his Forces together at Chinon, march'd resolutely against King John who besieged the Castle de la Roche au Moine upon the Loire between Angers and Nantes. Being within a days Journey of that place, that King was frighted, repasses the River in such great haste that he left all his Warlike Engines behind, and part of his Men who were kill'd or drowned upon the Retreat. Never after durst he shew his head in any place where he knew Lewis could come, and abandoned all Anjou to him) and his new Fortifications of Angers which were presently demolish'd.

Before the Month was expir'd after Lewis's Victory, King Philip his Father gained a much more signal one nigh the Village of Bouvines which is between L'Isle and Tournay, against the Emperor Otho and his Confederates. They had an Army of 150000 fighting Men, his was weaker by one half, but strengthened with the flower of the Nobility, and many Princes of the Blood, viz. Endes Duke of Burgundy, Robert de Courtenay, Robert Earl of Dreux, and his Brother Philip Bishop of Beauvais. The Battle was fought the 25th of July, and lasted from Noon till Night. Guerin Knight of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, and a little before elected Bishop of Senlis, to whom the King left all things, drew up the Army in Battalia, Matthew Baron of Montmorency, William des Barres Seneschal to the King, Henry Earl of Bar, Bartholomy de Roze, Gaucher Count de Saint Pol, and Adam Vicount de Melun, had the greatest shares in the Danger and in the Victory. Guerin fought not with his hands, because of his Quality of Bishop, nor did Philip Bishop of Beauvais smite with the Sword, but a Wooden Club, believing that to beat out Peoples Brains was not shedding of Blood.

1214.

The King ran a great hazard in his own Person, having been beaten down, trod under the Horses Feet and wounded in the Throat : but in fine his Enemies were worsted every where, Otho put to flight, his great Standard, being a Dragon with an Imperial Eagle over it, and the Chariot which bore it broken all to pieces, and five Earls, amongst whom were Ferrand and Renauld, with two and twenty Lords that carried Banners, taken Prisoners.)

The Fortune-tellers had assured the old Countess of Flanders, Ferrands Aunt, that there should happen a great Battle, that the King should be overthrown, Horses tread over him, and that Ferrand should enter in Triumph into Paris. The first part of this Prediction held good without Equivocation, the second was likewise true, but after another manner then they imagined: for indeed, they carried him into Paris in Triumph, but in quality of a Captive, loaden with Chains, and linked fast in a Chariot drawn by Ferrand Horses; that is according to the Language then used, of an Iron-grey Colour.

The Parisians made the King a most pompous Entrance, and Celebrated his Victory with Solemn Joy for eight days together. Ferrand was shut up in the Tower of the Louvre without the City Walls, and Renauld in the new Tower of Peronne with Shackles on his Legs, and a Chain that fastned him to a great piece of Timber. Philip had made a Vow in the midst of his Joy for this most happy success to build an Abby in honour of God and of the Blessed Virgin, his Son Lewis performed it by founding that of Notre-Dame de la Victoire, near Saulx.

The Lords of Poitou that had favour'd the English, finding that Lewis was Victorious, sent to tender him all manner of Submission. He would not trust to their words, but went into the Country with his Army to bring things to a full period. The Vicount de Touars, the most considerable of them all, obtained the Kings Pardon without much ado by the intercession of Peter Duke of Bretagne: the rest were utterly lost, and King John who was then in Parthenay, could not have avoided being taken, if he had not bethought himself of interposing the Popes Legat to demand a Truce. That power was so formidable, that the King durst not deny him, and agreed to it for five years.

1215. When that was done Prince Louis or Lewis, whether out of devotion, or jealousy of the Power of Count de Montfort, took up the Cross on him against the Albigens, and made a Voyage to Languedoc; Montfort came to Vienne to meet him, and the Legat to Valence. Montfort who accompanied him received Bulls from the Pope, 1215. which in Consequence of the Decree of the Council of Montpellier held some Months before, gave him the Tolosian Territories in guard or keeping, and all those other that had been Conquer'd by the Adventurers of the Cross, upon Condition to receive Investiture of the King, and render him Feodal Duty. So that we may say, the Pope named, and the King Confer'd upon his Nomination.

From thence Lewis was at Montpellier, then at Beziers, where he gave order the Walls of Narbonne and Tolose should be demolish'd. Mean while the Lateran Council, notwithstanding the pitiful Remonstrances of the Count de Tolose, who was there in Person with his Son, adjudged the propriety of his Lands to Montfort, reserving only those he had in Provence for his Son, and four hundred Marks of Silver yearly for his Subsistence; to be understood if they slew'd themselves obedient to the Holy See. From that time Montfort took on him the Quality of Earl of Toulouse, and came to receive Investiture from the King in the City of Melun.

While Lewis was yet in those Countries, the English Lords sent to offer him the Crown of England and demand Assistance against the Tyrannies of John who was Excommunicated by the Pope, and who had robb'd them of their Liberties and Priviledges, for which cause they had taken up Arms to Dethrone him. They had the City of London and some other places for them: nevertheless their design did not go on well, and their despair forc'd them to seek their safety by some Foreign Assistance.

1215, & 16. The Tyrant seeing his loss infallible, stuck not to abase the Dignity of his Crown to gain the Popes Protection. He satisfies him therefore, and becomes his Vassal and Tributary of a thousand Mark of Silver: but this abasement added scorn to the execration his Subjects had for him. Now the Holy Father resolv'd highly to protect his new Vassal, Excommunicated the English, and sent a Legat into France to divert Lewis from that Enterprize, and desired King Philip to put a stop to it.

Philip makes protestation of all Respect and Obedience to the Holy See, but said he could not impose upon his Son that necessity not to pursue the Rights of his Wife, who was Niece to King John. So that Lewis accepted the Crown of England, and landed with a great Equipage in the Isle of Thanet, thence went to London, where he was solemnly Crowned.

John being excluded from his Capital City retired to Winchester, and by his flight gave him full leisure to receive the Hommage of all the Nobility and secure all about London. The Legat not being able to put a stop to Lewis by any Arguments or Persuasions, Excommunicated him and all his Adherents, but he appeal'd to the Pope, (they had not yet found out the way of appealing to the Councils) and notwithstanding goes on and reduces Sussex, and all the Southern parts, excepting Windsor and Dover.

The Ambassadors pleaded his Cause earnestly at Rome, they shewed that John was justly degraded for his Tyrannies, and because he had been condemned to death for the Murder of his Nephew Arthur by the Pairs of France, and made it out that the Kingdom, since he was Excluded, belonged to his Niece the Wife of Prince Lewis.

Whilst they disputed their Masters Rights, he successfully employs his Sword in Conquering Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk. Having reduc'd them, he returns to besiege Dover, his Father reproaching him for having imprudently left that place behind him.

The Pope offended at his Progress confirmed the Sentence of Excommunication against him, and although Philip protested he gave him neither Assistance nor Advice, profering even, if the Church did so ordain, to Confiscate his Lands: nevertheless he commanded the Bishop of Sens to denounce him Excommunicate likewise, and to put France under an Interdiction; but the Prelats assembled at Melun, declared they would not submit to that Sentence, till they were more fully informed of the Popes Intentions.

Mean while King John who wandred about the Country hating all his Subjects, hapned to dye by Poyson, which as it was believ'd, a Monk had given him. He left three Sons very young, Henry, Richard, and Edmond.

The hatred of the Englishmen towards him expired with his Life, and their Affection for his Son Henry revived, being their Natural Lord, and one whose Innocence and Tender Age called for their Compassion; so that the young Kings Affairs began to prosper, and Lewis's to decline. He perceiving the English forlook him one after another, and his own People affrighted with the thundring Excommunications from Rome, inclined to make a Truce with Henry for some Months.

During this Suspension he returns into France to Consult with the King his Father, but he fearing to exasperate the Pope, refuses to see his Son, and would not Confer with him but by the interposition of others. Lewis upon his return into England, found his Enemies Party were the stronger; his Army was afterwards defeated near Lincoln, and he besieged in London after that rout.

Wherefore to free himself from farther danger, and retire with Bag and Baggage, he was forc'd to Treat with Henry, promising amongst other Conditions, to surrender all the places he held in England, to submit his Pretensions to the Judgment of the Church, to use his utmost endeavour to oblige his Father to restore all what he had taken from King John in France, and if he could not prevail, to do it then himself when he came to the Crown. Which was to promise more then he would or could perform.

Henry Emperor of Constantinople, and Brother to Baldwin, who had been so likewise, died Anno 1216. having Reigned Eleven years. Peter de Courtenay Earl of Auxerre, who Married his Sister Isabel, went this year from France to take that Crown. Passing thorough Italy he was Crowned at Rome with his Wife, took Shipping eight days after and arriv'd in Greece: but as he was crossing Thessalie having Pass-ports from Theodorus Comnenus, he was made Prisoner by that perfidious Man, who slew most part of those Lords that went with them, and having detained him three or four years caused him cruelly to be Murdered. Isabel, a Heroick Woman, govern'd the Empire two years after his death, in which time the Lords sent to profer the Empire to Philip Earl of Nevers his eldest Son, but he refused to accept it; and yielded up willingly that perilous Honour to Robert his younger Brother.

When young King Henry was fully settled in his Throne, his Council sent Ambassadors into France to challenge Lewis of his Promise, and re-demand the Dutchy of Normandy, and other Countries taken from his Father. They were answer'd with the Confiscation that had been ordered by the Judgment of his Pairs.

1213, 18. Whilst the Earl of Montfort in vain besieged the City of Beaucaire, Count Raimond brought some Forces from Arragon, whither he was retir'd, with which he regained several of his places, and especially Toulouse, which he presently fortifi'd with Intrenchments and Pallisado's. Montfort went and laid Siege to it, but after he had held it besieged seven whole Months, he was slain in a Sally. He had three Sons, Amaury who succeeded him in the Rights of his Conquests, Guy who was Married to Petronella, Heiress to the Count of Bigorre, as being Daughter of Estienne, the Daughter and Heiress of Count Centulle, and Simon Earl of Leicester in England by the Grandmother.

1219. Amaury was not strong enough to maintain his Conquests; the King assisted him first with Six hundred Men, then with Ten thousand Foot, who not being yet enough to compass that business, Prince Lewis upon the Popes earnest Request undertakes that Expedition the second time. He happily succeeded in the taking of Marmanda on the Garonne, and some other places in Angoumois, but not in the Siege of Toulouse, because his Father recalled him, fearing the Troubles that were begun in Bretagne might be created by the English, on purpose to let France in a greater flame.

1213, 19, and 20. The business was that the Earls Salomon and Conan, whom Duke Peter had unjustly thrown out of their Estates, being retir'd into the Forests, ravaged and wasted his Country with some Bandits they had got together, and at the same time the Barons revolted against him, because he would arrogate to himself the Guardianship or

* Garde-noble. * Wardnoble of Gentlemen's Orphan-Sons till they had attained to Twenty years of Age. They had Combined in a League, and with Amaury Lord of Craon, very potent in Friends and Alliance, who had declared War against him about a certain Castle that Duke had usurped from him. This Quarrel complicated with several Interests lasted above two years, and ended not but by a great Battle fought near Chateau-briand, where the Duke, much the weaker in numbers of Men gained the Victory, and made Amaury Prisoner. The Barons were not brought so low by this bloody loss, but they continued the War for some Months; but that was only to obtain the better Conditions.

1220, 21, and 22. The Truce with the English being prolong'd, France enjoy'd a Calm for three or four years, during which Philip employ'd himself about the Walling, Enlarging, Fortifying, building Bridges, making Causeys and the like conveniences in all the Cities that were of his Demeasns, or belonging to the Crown, which Expences though for the publick good, was out of his own proper Fund, not raised or exacted upon his Subjects, but paying very justly for all those Grounds and Houses belonging to private Persons which were necessary for him to have towards carrying on these Publick Works.

1222. A prodigious Comet appeared in the Heavens shortly after: and whether it were the Sign, or were the Cause, or perhaps neither the one nor the other, a Quartain Ague seized King Philip, which continuing and wasting him near a year's time, did in the end bring him to his Grave.

Amaury de Montfort had propos'd to give up all his Conquests in Languedoc to Prince Lewis: But Philip knowing the Constitution of his Son was too delicate and tender, could not give consent he should undertake so toylsome a War: notwithstanding the Pope and the Clergy press'd mightily to have them make an utter destruction of those Hereticks, who without any respect still aimed at their Persons and Estates principally. They had therefore at Paris called a grand Assembly of Prelats and Lords to compleat this business. John King of Jerusalem and the Popes Legat were Assistants, Philip sick as he was would needs be amongst them, and went expressly from Chateau de Pacy on the Epte, where he had diverted himself. When he arriv'd at Mantes, the Distemper so encreased upon him that he was forc'd to stop there, and some days after gave up the Ghost the Twenty fifth of July in the year 1223.

The length of his days was Fifty eight years, that of his Reign from his Coronation Forty four. His Monument is at St. Denis, whither his Corps was convey'd with great Ceremony. By his Will made the year before, he ordained and appointed that 50000 * Livers, or 25000 Mark of Silver at 40 Solz to the Mark, should be put into the hands of his Executors, to be restor'd and paid to those from whom it should appear he had detained, or unjustly taken any thing. He bequeathed likewise Ten thousand Franks * to Queen Issemburge to Lewis his Son, to employ for the defence of the Kingdom and no other use; 53500 Mark of Silver to the King of Jerusalem, 2000 to the Templars, and as much to the Hospitallers (of St. Johns) towards the Recovery of the Holy Land, 21000 Livers Paris to the Poor, to Orphans, to Widows, and Leprous People, and 20000 to Amaury de Montfort to redeem his Wife and Children out of the hands of the Albigois.

He Married three Wives, Isabella Daughter of Baldwin IV. Earl of Haynault, Issemburge Daughter of Waldemar the Great King of Denmark, and Agnes Daughter of Bertold Duke of Merania. Of the first he had no Child remaining but Prince Lewis who Reign'd; by the second he had none, but he had two by Agnes, these were Philip who had the Earldom of Boulogne, by Marrying the Heiress, which was Mahault or Matilda, Daughter of the unfortunate Regnault de Dammartin, and Mary who was first joyned in Marriage Anno 1206. with Philip Earl of Namur, and afterwards Anno 1212. with Henry IV. Earl of Louvain, and Duke of Brabant.

He had also a Natural Son named Peter Charlot, who was Treasurer of Tours, and afterwards Bishop of Noyon.

Of all the Kings of the Third Race, he annexed most Lands to the Crown, and most Power to those that succeeded him, wresting Normandy, the Counties of Anjou and Maine, Touraine, Berry, and Poitou from John Without-Land: he did not a little contribute on his part towards the lessening or pulling down the Earl of Toulouse: and by ruining those two Princes, took away the Counterpoise that balanced his own Power in the Kingdom. After which he brought the *Grande*es more easily both to respect and fear him, and the People to bear greater Burthens and Taxes than they had done under his Predecessors. The French gave him the name of Conqueror, which Paulus Emilius has rendered in Latin, Augustus, and this seemed so proper and sounded so well to all that have written since, that they have follow'd and continued it, and have almost forgotten the other.

He was well shap'd and without any Corporal defect, excepting that one of his Eyes was half obscured by an Amblyopia, for which some Italian Authors * have called him One-ey'd. He was a brave Cavalier and excellent Captain, laborious and active, happy in his Enterprizes, because he undertook with Deliberation and Counsel, and executed with celerity and heat; sometimes a little Cholerick and overway'd with Passion, but bating that, a great Politician, who knew where it was fit to use Caresse, where to employ Threats, whom to Reward and whom to Punish; somewhat more enclined to Severity than Mercy; Splendid and Magnificent; highly Charitable to the Poor; zealous in doing Justice to his Subjects, and no less zealous in Religion, taking as much care to preserve the purity of Faith by rooting out all Heresie, and defend the Goods and Liberties of the Church against Usurpers, as to maintain the Rights and Honour of the Kingdom; and therefore he was respected by the Clergy and People, as the Defender of the Church, and Father of his Country.

It is to be observ'd, that in his Reign, and in his Fathers and Grandfathers, there were five great Officers of the Crown, that is the Grand-Seneschal, in Latine Dapifer, great Chamberer*, Butler, Constable, and Chancellor. I believe they were in the Kings Gift, who might both place and displace: I do not know what the Formalities were he us'd, or whether the *Grande*es and Parliament, or General Assembly of Prelats and Lords had any part in the nomination: but I know they were not perpetual, and did in some measure resemble rather Commissions then Offices; that nevertheless their Function was so necessary, that whoever held those Places, signed all Acts and Writings of importance, so that if any one of these were vacant, it was ever noted down at the bottom of such Writing or Act. The Author of the Lives of the Ministers of State, hath very curiously observed, that the Office of Constable was a Member taken from the Grand-Seneschal, and that of Great Chamberlain from the Grand Chamberer. That the Constable had no Power or Command in the Armies till about the year 1218. after Philip Augustus had long left the Office of Grand-Seneschal vacant on purpose to destroy it, as I suppose, because it had too great Power. He likewise proves very plainly, that the High-Chamberlain had the management of the Kings Treasury: and that the Office of Chancellor, was the lowest of the five great ones we have specified; till Guerin Knight of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, and afterwards Bishop of Senlis, having that Place conferr'd on him by Lewis VIII. after he had held the Seal Five and twenty years together, raised it to a higher pitch of Honour and Degree then ever.

Towards the end of this Reign Families began to have fixed, certain and hereditary Surnames. The Lords and Gentlemen, took them most commonly from the names of

of their Lands and Estates they had in possession; Men of Learning from the places of their Nativity, and Jews when they were Converted, as likewise the Wealthy Merchants from the place of their abode. As for what has given Surnames to the Plebeians, some had it from the colour or cut and fashion of their Hair, the habit or defects of their Bodies, from their Dress or Age, Profession, Office, or Trade; some from their good or ill Qualities, others from the Province they dwelt in, or the Town or Village where they were born. But for the most part they were called by some proper name which was current in the Family, or even some Nick-name, which descended to their Generations. Whoever shall take the pains to examine these Heads thoroughly and distinctly, will find that there are few others can be made out.

Through all this Age there were two great and cruel Evils predominant in France, but which were not new, the Leprosie and Usury: the one infecting the Bodies, the other consuming the Estates of most Families. Those that were tainted with the first were secluded from all Society, and shut up in places far distant from the Habitations of other People, but yet upon or near the greatest Roads. The number increased so fast that there was not one City or Burrough that was not forced to build some Hospital for their Retreat. They were called Lazar-houses, and the Leprous Lazars, from St. Lazarus, the Patron of the Poor and the Sick; whom the Vulgar by corruption called St. * Ladre. Now the publick Foundations, the Gifts of the Relations and Kindred of the Infected, the Alms of particular People, and with these the Immunities and Priviledges granted by the King and the Clergy to these miserable Wretches, made them live so much at their ease, that in length of time they became rather Objects of envy than of pity, at least in respect of the meaner sort of People. They were taxed of leading Lives guilty of great Disorders, and sometimes of Crimes. But when they were convicted of any they were burnt alive, that so the Fire might at the same time purifie and purge the infection both of their Bodies and Souls. I have read that there were some Men so apprehensive of this villanous, loathsome and shameful Disease, that they guelt themselves to avoid it, and be preserved from it.

Usury was very common, and yet more excessive, the Jews practis'd it with so much cruelty, that they did not seize upon Peoples Goods only for satisfaction, but likewise upon their Persons and reduced them to slavery. The Popes oftentimes endeavour'd to suppress them, but it was in vain: for the Princes, and especially King Philip upheld them, receiving Tribute from them for suffering their Exactions, and withal they had it in their power to squeeze these Blood-suckers whenever their occasions required it.

* Whence the Hospitals in French are called Ladrecies.

Church of the Eleventh Age.

Schismes.

Since the first Birth of the Church there had not been any Age wherein she was so much shatter'd and rent with Schisms as she was in this same. I speak not of the Schism caused by the Emperor Henry IV. for that was more in the preceding Age than this, though it did never end but with the Life of that Emperor, who died at Liege, Anno 1106. after he was unfortunately deprived of his Empire by his own Son. I must note however that his Tyrannical and Scandalous Deportment, gave a fair opportunity to Gregory VII. whose Life was irreprovable, and exemplary, to constitute himself his Judge, to summon him before his Tribunal upon the universal complaints of his Subjects, to Excommunicate him and depose him from his Empire, and after all this to wrest from him the disposition of great Benefices. Which seem'd the more favourable, because that Prince made a most infamous and shameful Traffick of it, giving them to the worst, and investing them with the Ring, &c. before they were Consecrated. But after this Schism there were three more, two occasioned by the Quarrels that the Emperor Henry V. Son of the abovenamed Henry, and then Frederic II. surnamed Barberossa, had with the Popes: and a third, which hapned between these two through the ambition of Cardinal Peter Leonis. That of Henry V. began in the year 1118. the Emperor having caused one Maurice Burdin Archbishop of Braga in Portugal to be elected, and ended Anno 1122. the Anti-Pope, named Gregory VIII. falling into the hands of Calistus, and Henry afterwards obtaining Absolution of that Pope. The Schism that Frederic caused lasted from the year 1159. under three Anti-Popes, Ottavian, Guy de Crema, and John Abbot de Strume, who assumed the names of Victor IV. Paschal III. and Calistus III. and did not cease till the year 1183. For although Frederic were absolv'd at Venice, Anno 1177. he was not fully reconciled with these Popes till six years afterwards.

The

The Schism of Peter Leonis began in 1139. (for in that year he got to be Elect-ed to the Papacy, concurrently with Alexander III. taking the name of Anaclet (and was extinguished Anno 11—). After his death, the Peace of the Church lasted but Seven years, and then was disturbed by the Rebellion of the City of Rome. Arnauld, Clerk of the City of Bresse stirred it up, in the year 1145. The people of Rome by his instigation, would needs shake off the Priestly yoke, and restore the ancient Republick. These disturbances ceased An. 1155. for that incendiary being expell'd the City, went to the Emperour Frederick, who sacrific'd him to his Interests, delivering him up to Adrian, who caused him to be hang'd and burnt.

During the troubles of these Schismes, and the combustions Arnauld promoted in Rome; there were Five Popes that sheltered themselves in France, Paschal II. An. 1106. Gelasius IV. An. 1118. Innocent II. An. 1130. Eugenius, An. 1147. and Alexander III. An. 1161. without reckoning Calistus II. who sojourn'd there some time after his Election, which was made at Clugny, An. 1119.

The Son of the unfortunate Henry IV. of his Fathers Name, and who had compell'd him to resign the Empire, made it plainly appear he did not rebell against him out of any zeal to Religion, since so soon as he thought himself well settled in the Throne, he began to tread in the same steps, and the very next year following 1107. he made it known to Pope Paschal, and the Council of Troyes, that he intended to enjoy the Apostolique priviledge of instituting Bishops, which he pretended had been given to Charlemain. This question was referr'd to a general Council, to be held at Rome in the year 1110. Paschal therefore returns: but Henry coming thither with an Army, seizes on his person, and forces him to Sign an agreement, wherein he allows him the investitures, obliging both him and his Cardinals by the most Sacred Oaths to observe it. All the Prelats in Europe cried out against this agreement, which by leaving such Elections in the power of Temporal Princes, caused great disorders in the Church. They held many Councils in several Provinces to damne it, Excommunicated the Emperour, and gave out, it was an Heresie to say, that Investitures could be made by the Laity, not considering that this proposition made the Pope himself an Heretique, since he had newly granted it to the Emperour.

The same question of Investitures had also troubled England; the Kings William and Henry maintaining it was a Right and Prerogative of their Crown, and in all times possessed by their Ancestors. For which cause, Anselme Arch-Bishop of Canterbury had lost his See; but at last that difference was compos'd, An. 1107. upon condition the King should for ever relinquish the Investitures in the Church, and that reciprocally the Bishops should render him Hommage.

This was to speak properly nothing but the changing of terms, for he that doth Hommage is a Vassal, and receives, and holds of him to whom he renders it. And indeed the Popes could have wish'd that the Bishops had not done it to Lay-Princes; and they had expressly forbid it to those in France: but the resolution King Lewis the Gros and his Successors shew'd in this point, oblig'd them to relaxe. They durst not at the same time contend both with this great Kingdom and Germany; they must leave some place of shelter in time of need, and besides, they did not so much trouble their Heads to lessen France, with whom they had no contests for Dominion; as to pull down the Emperours, who being very powerful in Italy, had still an aim of restoring their Imperial Throne in the City of Rome. Besides, France was better united, and by consequence more difficult to be subdued than the Empire, where the Subjects (as well those of Germany as those of Italy, and the Kingdom of Arles) being divided amongst themselves, and having all different Interests, have at length ruin'd that vast body by their Jealousies and Rebellions. It was for this reason the Popes made it their business so much to lessen that power; and it is certain, that all other Princes of Europe, growing jealous of it, as the most formidable then in being, joynd willingly with the Popes to suppress it. The defence of the Holy See, and the Authority of the Church, admitting a specious pretence to side with them. This reflection is not useless.

Now to return to our Narrative, Henry V. sunk under all this weight, as his Father had done before. In the beginning his Presence made things prosper in Italy: but when after various success he was driven thence, his burden was left to the mercy of Calistus, who confined him to a perpetual imprisonment. Then he himself tir'd with the daily Admonitions and Remonstrances from all parts, and not able to wade through the many Conspiracies and Rebellions which hourly threatned to overwhelm him, yielded the Cause at last: He utterly renounced the Investitures, and promised to leave the liberty of Elections to the Ecclesiasticks. This was in Anno 1122.

The scandal and persecutions which these Schismes caused in Christendom, gave occasion, in my opinion, for that false prediction which was spread abroad in those days. That the world was near its end, and the Kingdom of Antichrist was then begun. St. Norbert, and some other persons of an irreragable Sanctity, preach'd it as a most certain Truth; which was but little doubted, and begot so much terror, that Pope Paschal, who fled into France to avoid persecution, staid some time in his journey at Florence, to see what the event of this dreadful report would come to.

Soon after the agreement, Henry V. being dead without Children, the Empire was given to Lotharius Duke of Saxony, and after him to Conrad. Those two Princes left the Popes in quiet, and made no breach of Peace with them. So that there was no more fear of Schisme on that side. The Church having rested in tranquillity for eight years; began to be disturb'd again by another most dangerous division: for after the death of Honorius II. which hapned in the year 1134. two contrary Factions, or Interests, in the Sacred Colledge, elected each a Pope on the same day; One the Cardinal Gregory, who took the name of Innocent the II. The other the Cardinal Peter Leonis, who called himself Anaclet. This last had been a Monk at Clugny, a scurvy commendation for him to the Order of the Cisteaux, which was then become the most predominant in France. His Right, if examined in due form, appeared the best; but his ambitious and haughty proceeding spoil'd his Title; the great Gifts he made of things belonging to the Church, to make himself Master of Rome, gave just cause to believe there was somewhat of Simonie in his promotion, and that he deserved not the Popedom, since he bought it. Many good people were of opinion (so says John of Salisbury) that in the like contests, they ought to have owned neither of those concurrents, but have elected a Pope anew, who had not privately made any interest for the Popedom; which is of such a nature, as well as all other Benefices, that whoever bribes for it, renders himself unworthy of it. And indeed King Lewis VII. wavered for some time betwixt both parties, and assembled the Council of Estampes, to resolve him which of the two was the Legitimate. The persuasions of Henry II. King of England, had already a little inclined him towards Innocent: the Council of Estampes fully determin'd it, that Council having been satisfied by the discourses of St. Bernard, who with much zeal and vehemence, set forth the Right and Merits of that Pope. After so solemn a decision, most of the Princes in Europe declared for him; there was only Roger, Duke of Apulia, and William Duke of Aquitain, that supported Anaclet; The First, that he might have a Pope convenient for him, and more easie to be managed than his predecessors: the Second, having been perswaded by Gerard, Bishop of Angoulesme, that his Election was Canonical. It was thrown in Gerard's Teeth, that at first he had been of the contrary party; but his spleen, because he was not continued in his Legation of Aquitain by Innocent, drove him to side with Anaclet; who indeed confirmed it to him. It was one of the handfomest, and indeed most profitable employments the Court of Rome could bestow: for besides the three Aquitains, both Touraine and Bretagne were comprehended in it.

I divide Bretagne from Touraine, because the former had its Arch-Bishop apart, this was the Bishop of Dole, who since the insurrection of Neomene, took upon him to be the Metropolitan. The often reiterated complaints of the Metropolitan of Tours, and the solicitations of the Kings of France in the Court of Rome, could not obtain a Judgment in this matter for a long while: but Philip Augustus tyr'd with their long delays, prosecuted it with so much resolution, and talked so high, that Innocent III. determin'd it by a definitive Sentence, in An. 1198. which restored Dol, and the other Bishopricks of Bretagne, to the Metropolis of Tours.

We find in the Life of St. Bernard, how he withdrew Duke William from espousing the party of Anaclet, so that there was none for him but Roger Duke of Apulia, on whom Anaclet conferr'd the Title of King of Sicilia, upon condition to pay an acknowledgment of Six hundred Crowns yearly to the See of Rome. The Kingdom of Sicilia comprehended the Island so named, Apulia, Calabria, and some other neighbouring Countreys which Roger held in Italy.

Now although William Duke of Aquitain had suffer'd himself to be brought back to the Obedience of Innocent II. in the year 1135. yet Gerard nevertheless stood up obstinately for Anaclet to the end of his days; but some while after he was found dead in his Bed, horribly black, and blew, and swollen. About three years after, viz. in An. 1138. Anaclet died also; his Relations placed another Cardinal in his stead, to whom they gave the name of Victor. In fine, Innocent found it better to buy his Peace peace of them, then to leave these Divisions smothering and smoaking any longer; and when they were agreed, Victor laid down the Tiara, and cast himself at his Feet. Notwithstanding Roger held out still some time, not owning him for Pope, because he would not own him for a King, till having taken him prisoner in War, An. 1193. he came fairly to an agreement with him, and got the Title of King confirmed to him.

Frederick I. being come to the Empire, young, haughty, and ambitious as he was, undertook to recover its dignity, to which the easiness of Pope Anastasius seemed to chalk out a way; but Pope Adrian IV. who succeeded Anastasius, resolv'd to obviate his designs, and keep him under as his dependant. Hence proceeded a mortal enmity betwixt them, which however came not to an open rupture; but made Frederick more plainly sensible that it was necessary to have a Pope at his Devotion. Adrian being dead, An. 1159. it hapned that all the Cardinals, excepting three, elected Cardinal Rowland, who took the name of Alexander III. but whilst he was shewing some kind of unwillingness to accept the Popedom, those three that were not for him, Elected immediately the Cardinal Octavian, who was named Victor. The Emperour having notice of it, favour'd him first underhand, thereby to frighten Alexander, and bring him to his bent; then openly, when he found he could not lead the other as he pleased. So he causes his Election to be authorized by the Council of Pisa, which he had call'd by his own authority, after the example of former Emperours, and employ'd all his Interest to perswade other Princes to adhere to him. The Kings of France and of England, who had been at war, having now agreed, assembled their Bishops, Abbots, and Barons; the one at Beauvais, and the other at Newmarket, to discuss the right of the two concurrents: the Legats both of the one and other side having been heard; Alexander was approved by all, and Victor Excommunicated. This hapned in the year 1161. The good Title and Right of the former was this year confirmed by a great number of miracles, as many Authors write; and yet there is one affirms likewise, that God wrought some in favour of Victor after his decease. In the mean time, this last being most powerful in Rome, Alexander seeks his refuge in France, and remained there three years: at the end whereof, his Affairs going in a better method in Italy, the Clergy and People call him back to Rome, An. 1164. To defray the Expences of his journey, he was forced to impose a Collection on the Gallican Church.

The same year Victor his Rival died in the City of Luca. Some Prelats of his Faction being assembled at the same place, gave the Popedom to one of those two Cardinals that had elected him, which was Guy de Crema. He lived five years, and deceeded An. 1170. Those of his party substituted another, I cannot tell what Abbot, not known but by his debauches; they call'd him Calistus III. and Frederick supported him, as he had done the two others.

At the same time there were great stirrs in England, King Henry stickling to preserve certain pretended Rights, which he called Customs of the Kingdom; and Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury not to suffer them, as being contrary to Ecclesiastical liberty. It would be thought strange in these days, if a Bishop should hold his Head up so high against his Prince for the like cause: but then the best of Men were perswaded, that such Liberties were the pillars of Religion. The contest lasted seven or eight years, and ended not but by the death of the Archbishop, who was murder'd in his Cathedral in the year 1170. and the Kings penitence, which was so great and so publick, that the Church was edified more by such an example, then it had been scandaliz'd by his offence.

The Emperour Frederick was not more fortunate then the two Henrys, so that being shatter'd by the Popes Thunder-bolts, and more severely yet by his ill fortune, driven out of Italy, and apprehending the sudden Revolt of Germany, he could find no other way to save himself, but to ask pardon of the Holy Father, and prostrate himself at his Feet, to gain his Absolution, which was done at Venice, in An. 1177. His Anti-Pope Calistus did as much the following year, throwing himself at the Feet of the same Alexander. Afterwards Frederick had again some Disputes with the Popes Lucius, Urban, and Clement III. of that name; but he was reconcil'd to Clement, and lived well enough with the See of Rome to the time of his death. Henry VI. his Son was Crowned by Celestine III. in the year 1191. He undertook nothing directly against the Popes, but yet he suffer'd himself to be Excommunicated, for detaining Richard King of England prisoner, and for not restoring the Money he had extorted from that Prince to purchase his liberty. He died without Absolution, Anno 1197.

Heresies.

Let us now speak of Heresies. About the end of the Twelfth age, the opinions of one named Rouffelin, had made a great deal of noise. He said the three Divine Persons were three separate or distinct things, as three several Angels were; but in such sort nevertheless, that all three had but one and the same Power, and one and the same Will: and that if custom would permit it, one might say that they were three Gods; or otherwise it would follow, that the Father and the Holy Ghost had been incarnate. These Sophistical impieties were condemned in a Council held at Soissons: notwithstanding the Author did not refrain Teaching in private; and perhaps he might have made a greater progress, if there had not been some watchful persons, amongst the rest, Yves de Chartres, who broke his measures. I cannot tell whether it were the same, against whom St. Anselme, when he was but Abbot du Bec, wrote his Treatise of the Incarnation of the Word, which he sent to Pope Urban II. to examine, An. 1094.

About the year 1125, one Tanchelin, the most profligate of all Mankind, infected Brabant and the neighbouring Countreys with his Errors: he asserted that the Ministry of Bishops and Priests was a cheat, and that the Communion of the Holy Eucharist availed nothing to our Salvation. He drew people after him by the magnificence of his Feasts, and the pomp of his dress and garb, being attird in Cloth of Gold, and his Hair plated, or wove with strings of the same; those that follow'd him were so bewitch'd, that they drank his Urine, kept some as Treasures and Relicks, and took it as a particular favour, that he would in their presence abuse their Wives and Daughters.

At the same time another Innovator wandred through Provence, Gasconne, and Languedoc, named Peter de Bruys, Preaching, that Baptisme was ineffectual before the age of Puberty; that they ought to pull down the Churches, such places not being necessary for Christians to worship in; That the sacrifice of the Mass was nothing; That the Prayers of the Living did not avail the Dead; and above all things he pretended we ought to have the Cross in abomination, because our Lord had been most ignominiously nailed to it. Himself burnt a large heap upon Good-Friday, and with that Fire boiled several pots with Meat, of which he made a publique Meal, and invited the people to eat with him. But Peter de Clugny, going into that Countrey to hunt him thence, the people seized on his Person, and burnt him alive in the City of St. Giles.

His Sect was not blown away with the Wind like his Ashes; one of his Disciples named Henry, made himself their head; this was a Monk that had mew'd his Frock, who becoming a vagabond, because his Apostacy had left him no place of security, set himself to preach up these Heresies from place to place; to which he added some others of his own invention. Peter de Clugny refuted him in an excellent Treatise. St. Bernard in a journey he made into that Countrey, confounded him by his sound Doctrine and moving Sermons, justified with many miracles, informed the poor People he had seduc'd, and follow'd him so close, that at length he was taken and deliver'd up to the Bishop, bound Hands and Feet, An. 1147. They called these Innovators Petrobrusians and Henricians, the names of their two principal Doctors.

The same St. Bernard had likewise to deal with another sort of Hereticks, who gave themselves the name of Apostoliques, bragging they were the only people that followed exactly the Doctrine of the Apostles, and were the true mystical Body of Jesus Christ, none other Christians having the true Belief like them. They held many of the extravagancies, as those who since have been called by the name of the Illuminated, or Enlightened.

We may well reckon amongst the Heresies those over-bold, and too subtil propositions broached by Peter Abailard, touching the Trinity, since they were condemned as such in the year 1140. at the Council of Sens, which was confirmed by the Pope, though it appears to some, that if there were too much presumption on his part, there was also a little too much heat, and some want of understanding on theirs. However it were, his Humility repaired his fault, for having appeal'd to the Holy See, he was easily perswaded to stop at Clugny, by Peter the Venerable, and there spent the rest of his days. His Wife Heloise had also put on the Holy Vail. The History of their Lives and their Loves is well enough known; this is not a place to mention it in.

The Preachings of a certain Monk named Rodolph, were something worse then Heresies, I find that in the times of the Crusado, or Crusado in the year 1146. having assembled I know not how many thousand Men to go into the Holy-Land, he preached preached, that they ought before they went to kill all the Jews, who were much greater enemies to JESUS CHRIST, then the Mahometans. St. Bernard had much ado to save those miserable creatures from the fury of the common people, who are never so easie to be moved, as when some act of cruelty is propounded, and to get the Monk to return into his Covent.

The Popes were persecuted by other Heretiques, whom we might call Politiques, because they would not allow the Church-men should have any dominion nor jurisdiction in Temporals. The Romans stirred up, as we have related, by Arnaud de Bresse, designed amongst themselves to take it from the Pope in their City, and leave him only the Spiritual; So that Eugenius III. flying from their persecution, was forced to retire into France, An. 1147. whilst he was there he called a Council at Reims, where they examined the propositions of Gilbert Poree or Poree, Bishop of Poitiers: who having for Thirty years together profest Philosophy in the chief Cities of the Kingdom, spake of God and the persons of the Trinity, rather according to the Topicks of Aristotle, then conformably to the language of the Holy Scripture: He said the Divine Essence was not God: that the proprieties of the Three Persons were not the persons; that the Divine nature had not been incarnate; that there was no merit but that of JESUS CHRIST, and that none were truly Baptized unless he were to be saved. His Arch-Deacons themselves, moved with Zeal or Enmity, became his Accusers. St. Bernard stoutly Seconds them; the business was debated in two conferences, the one at Auxerre, and the other at Paris, and at last determined in a Third, which was held after the Council of Rheims; the Pope being unwilling before so great an Assembly, to censure a Bishop of so much Learning, and who besides protested he would submit to what his Holiness should think fit to judge of it. His propositions were condemned, he received this judgment with all possible submission; but some of his Disciples were still so confident as to maintain them.

That we may know how prone our humane nature is to be deluded, and led into the most extravagant novelties, we need but consider and mention a wretched fanatical Dotard, who was presented to the Pope in the beginning of this Council. His name was Eon de l'Estole, a Gentleman of Bretagne; he was so ignorant, that having heard them Sing at Church, Per Eum qui venturus est judicare vivos & mortuos, he fancied to himself, and affirmed to others, that it was, he should judge both the quick and the dead. It is almost incredible, how many people were infatuated with this ridiculous extravagancy: they follow'd him as a great Prophet; sometimes he march'd with a stately Train, sometimes he hid himself, then he appear'd again more Glorious then before. They said he was a Magician, and made sumptuous Feasts to allure the World, but that it was but illusion, and that the Meats they eat at his Table, and the Presents he bestowed were only charms that alienated the Mind. The Arch-Bishop of Rheims having taken him, presented him to the Council, and to his Holiness. His Answers full of frantick Conceits and Whimsies, made them look upon him as a mad-Man, or rather a Fool; but yet they clapt them into close imprisonment, where he died shortly after. Many of his Disciples more senseless yet then he, chose rather to be burnt to death then renounce him.

There was certainly some remainders left of that Leaven of the Petrobrusians and Henricians, which infecting many people, did again inspire them with new and dangerous Questions and Propositions; but besides all these, another sort of poysoners came out of Italy into France, bringing along with them the most pernicious venom of the Manicheans; and these were they in my opinion who first infected the Diocess of Alby, for which reason those Heretiques were named Albigensians. They were convinced at a Conference in that City at the Bishops, who was chosen Arbitrator by both parties, in presence of many Lords, Prelats, and Constance the Wife of Raimond Earl of Toulouze, and Sister to the King of France; Gozelin the Bishop of Lodeve, refusing their errors by arguments and proofs drawn out of the New Testament.

This Conquest could not wholly destroy these unwholsom Seeds, they multiplied every day more and more, and soon mastered Toulouze, the capital City of Languedoc. The Kings of France and England were almost resolved to make use of Fire and Sword to destroy them; however, they thought fit to send some Preachers first amongst them, to labour and endeavour to convert them, or confound them, and to cut them off from all communion with the faithful, that they might corrupt no more of them. The Popes Legat went thither in Anno 1178. accompanied with Four or Five Bishops and several other Clergy-men; they discover'd many of these people in Toulouze: amongst the rest the oldest and the richest; and as I may say, the cock of all the others, who let them have his Towers to Meet and Preach in.

Church

* The chief Citizens of Toulouse, and Avignon had Towers or Turrets to their Houses.

in. They forced him to submit to a publique penance, pull'd down his Towers or Turrets, * and excommunicated and banished several of those Heretiques, who retired into Albigensis; that was as it were their Fort or Cittadel, because Roger Earl of Alby favour'd them, and made use of them to keep the Bishop of his City a prisoner.

These Countries of Languedoc and Gascogne, as well because of their distance as their situation, and likewise the fiery warlike disposition of their people, were filled with another sort of wild Beasts, and such as delighted in Blood; I mean Troops, or Herds of Bandits, who hir'd themselves to any one that wanted them to take revenge upon their Enemies, or else roved all about to seek prey for themselves. They fought not only after Money and Goods; but took their Persons or their Lives away, sparing neither condition, nor age, nor sex. They were of no Religion, but help'd the Heretiques, thereby to have some pretence to rob Churches and Church-men; some of them were called Brabanders, Arragonians, Navarrois, and Basques, as coming from those Countreys: Others Cotteneaux and Triarerdins, a Nick-name, whose original I do not know: and their Horse-men Routiers, from the German name Renter. The General Council of Lateran, which was held in Anno 1179. Excommunicated both the one and the other, forbid the burying them in Holy Ground, and exhorted all Catholics to fall upon them, seize upon their Goods, and bring their Persons into slavery, allowing all those that took up Arms against them, Indulgences and Relaxations of penance, proportionable to their Services, and at the discretion of the Bishops.

Amongst these Heretiques, there were some that were called Popelicans, who held a great many strong Castles in Gascogne, where they had cantoniz'd themselves, and made up a body ever since they were cut off from the Church. Henry, who from being Abbot of Clervaux, had been made Bishop of Albe, having in quality of Legat, gathered a good force together by his Preachings and Exhortations, went to visit them with a strong hand in Anno 1181. They feigned to avoid this storm, they would abjure their errors; but the danger being over, they lived as before. This contagion spread it self in many Provinces, both on this and the other side of the Loire; one of these false Apostles, by name Terric, who had kept himself conceal'd a long time in a Grotto at Corbigny, in the Diocese of Nevers, was taken and burnt. Divers others suffer'd the same death in several places, particularly, two horrible old Women in the City of Troyes, to one of whom, as it was said, they had given the name of *Holy-Church, and to the other, that of St. Mary, that so when they were examin'd by the Judges, they might swear by St. Mary, they believed no other then what was the belief of Holy Church.

These Popelicans, amongst other things, did openly repugne the reality of the Body of Our S. J. C. in the Sacrament, for which cause there were divers miracles wrought in those times to confirm people in the faith of that mystery. They were condemned in the Council of Sens, of the year 1198. as were likewise the Vandois, the Patarins, and the Cathares. The name of Patarins came from the Glory they took in suffering for the Truth patiently; that of * Cathares, because, though falsely, they professed great purity of Life. These last were called in Flanders, Pisles, and in France Weavers, because the most part of them lived by the labour of their hands, which they employed in that Trade. It would require a whole Treatise to enumerate and particularize all these Sects, their several Names, and their Opinions, which agreed in some points, and were quite different in others: but in my judgment, they may be all reduced to two, that is * Albigensis, and Vandois * and these two held almost, or very near the same Opinions, as those we call in our days Calvinists.

There arose, if not an Heresie, at least some great doubts, touching the resurrection of the Body, in the time of Maurice Bishop of Paris, by reason whereof to testify what his Faith was concerning this Article, he ordain'd they should engrave upon his Tomb the first Response, which we find in the Office for the deceased. After his example, many other Ecclesiastiques gave Order before their death, that these words should be affixed upon their Breasts in writing, and put into the Graves with them.

These Schismes and Errors thwarting the power of the Pope and the Clergy, confirmed and increased it the more. For First, the Popes gained the whole advantage upon the Emperours, concerning those Disputes about Investitures. Then when they had gotten that liberty of Elections, they would needs extend it likewise to the persons and Goods of the Ecclesiastiques; they said the Church owed no Contribution but to her own Head, who is the Vicar of JESUS CHRIST on Earth, and that the Clergy could not be corrected but by their Superiours, which they founded upon that Power of the Popes.

Maxim, That the less Noble or Worthy, ought not to command the more Noble or Worthy; nor the inferior be judge of him that is above him. However, this point striking at, and diminishing the Authority of all other Temporal Princes, as well as the Emperours, could not pass for current, but in the Countreys of those that were weak, and on the other side of the Mountains.

The third subject of the differences they had with the Emperours, was, they pretended it belonged to them to dispose of, or give the Empire; and that the election of the *Grande*es belonging to it, could make but a King, unless their own Authority would honour it with the Title of Emperour. This belief was grounded upon what they had done for Pepin and Charlemain, whom indeed they first dignified with the Title of Patrician, and afterwards conferred that of Emperour upon Charlemain. As for this point they carried it clearly against the Emperours. The example of Henry VI. puts it out of all doubt; for when he took the Imperial Crown at Rome, in the year 1191. Pope Celestine III. who was upon a Scaffold, and sitting, holding it between his Feet, threw it down upon the ground, to shew, it lay in his power to overthrow it; and the Cardinals having caught it in their hands, put it upon the Emperours Head, who was below, and on his knees, waiting that favour with submission.

But the Popes could not so easily gain a fourth point, which was to hinder the Bishops from paying Homage to their Temporal Sovereigns. They opposed this submission, because they thought it unworthy that those Sacred Hands, which were employ'd in the operations of the most Holy Mysteries of Religion, should be touched or pressed by Hands profane. Now although Sovereign Princes, especially the Kings of France had a great reverence for all that came from the Holy See, they could not for all that yield them this point, nor that concerning the franchise of Goods and Persons. For King Levis VI. would not suffer Rodolph to re-enter the Arch-Bishoprick of Bourges, till he had done him Homage; which Yves de Chartres excused to Pope Paschal, upon the apprehension of a greater inconvenience. And that Pope having granted a Bull, at the requisition of the Clergy of France, which prohibited, upon pain of Excommunication, all Bayliffs and Prevosts * belonging to the King, the exacting any Loan of poor Clerks; the said King wrote Letters full of heat to Yves, threatening he would take the Goods of any Clerks wherever he could find them, if that Bull were not revoked: I cannot say what hapned upon this.

There was a Maxim set up in those ages, which gave the Popes an indirect Dominion over Princes, and right of animadversion on their Government; which was, that although they did not believe the Princes depended upon them for things Temporal, they thought they had good ground, considering the Spiritual, to judge whether their actions were good or evil, to admonish them, to correct them, to forbid them things they held unlawful, and command them to do what they thought was just. When two Princes made War, they concern'd themselves to bring them to a Truce, to refer their business to Arbitration, and oblige them to debate it in their presence. King John pressed upon by Philip Augustus had recourse to Innocent III. who wrote thereupon, that being proposed to the Government of the Universal Church, he found himself obliged by the command of God, to proceed in that Affair, according to the Rules and Forms of the Church, and to pronounce the King of France to be an Idolater and a Publican, if he did not make his Right appear before him or his Legat. For although, said he, it did not belong to him to judge of the Fief, yet he had right to take cognisance of the Sin; and it appertained to the Holy See to correct all persons of what quality soever they could be, and if they proved refractory to his Commands, to employ the Power and Arms of the Church. These were the Excommunications, and also the Interdictions, cruel remedies, which took away the use of the Sacraments, and the Divine Service from the Living, and sometimes the very Burials from the Dead. They were perswaded it was part of their Duty to provide against all publique scandals; of their paternal care, to help and protect all the oppressed; and of the grandeur of their Tribunal, to do justice to the whole World. So they received the complaints of all that were under oppression; nay, they would go to meet them, as it were, and take cognisance of what injustice Princes used towards their Subjects, and of their new exactions. They sometimes denounced Anathema against those that levied them; and sometimes exposed the Goods and Estates of these they Excommunicated as a Prey, and gave Command to seize their Persons, and bring them into slavery. The Sovereigns were not exempted or secure against these Thunder-claps: for whether by virtue of an opinion, commonly received in those days, but in my judgment not to be maintained or made out, that the Excommunicate have lost all Titles to their Estates, or whether they did not believe the

Church.

Government

Church

Government of Catholique people, was not to be left in the hands of Princes revolted from the Church, they proceeded even to the deposing them, declaring their Subjects Absolv'd of all the Oaths they had taken, and forbid them longer to obey them. Gregory VII. began to exercise this Authority against the Emperour Henry IV. He would have practis'd the same towards Philip I. King of France: For he once wrote to all the Grandees of the Kingdom, to hinder the excess he committed, especially towards those Merchants that went to great Fairs: And another time he threatened to dissolve those Bonds and Obligations of Fidelity, which tied his Subjects to him, if he did not forbear the sale of Benefices, and suffer the elect Bishop of Masccon to enter upon his Bishoprick. Victor II. did in effect, Excommunicate him in the Council of Clermont. Other Popes Excommunicated and deposed the Emperours Henry V. Frederick I. and Frederick II. and have attempted the like things against divers other Crowned Heads.

It is admired that Popes who had so great a reputation for their goodness, particularly Gregory VII. and Alexander III. should have undertaken such things, which seem so contrary to the Maxims of the Ancient Fathers, and the Innocency of former ages. We must therefore know, that these supposed Letters of the First Popes, upon which they founded a new Canon right, had made their Predecessors believe, even from the end of the Eighth Century; that their Authority and Power over the Faithful had no limits; that in quality of universal Pastors, they had Power to lay Commands, or to forbid any of the Faithful, in any thing that concerned their Salvation, and the promotion of Religion; to admonish them, and afterwards punish them if they did not obey. That if the predecessors of Gregory had not made use of this power against Emperours; it was because those Princes were then more regular, and the Popes of those times involved in great troubles: but on the contrary, Henry IV. had made himself execrable by his infamous Vices; And Gregory was venerable through all Christendom for his Virtues.

I shall presume to add that there was even some things in the preceding Ages that might give some colour to what that Pope did undertake. For in the Sixth, the Church had assumed power to exclude those who were enjoined publique penance, from exercising any function Civil or Military, or even from Marriage, that it might be the more humble and perfect. S. Leo the Pope had only advised it, his Successors made it a Law, and the Councils of Toledo reduced it into practise towards their very Kings; witness Vamba, one of the most illustrious, and most renowned of their Monarchs: who being ordained Penance, while he was in the agonies of death, not with his consent, for he was deprived of all understanding, but according to the custome of those times, was yet obliged upon his recovery, to renounce his Kingly Office. Observe, if you please, that these Councils of Spain furnished the Popes with great advantages and pretexts, to bring other Sovereigns under their Command and Disposal. For the Visigoth Kings being elective, the Bishops had a great share in their Election, and their Councils were as so many Assemblies, where the Grandees and the Kings themselves were present. There they corrected all the disorders of the Crown, and imposed Laws upon them under the penalty of Anathema, or Deposition if they infringed them. The Bishops of France undertook the same thing by deposing Louin the Debonnaire; and though it were a perfect Faction, that Prince however did not resume the Crown, but by the authority of another Assembly of Bishops. Foulk, Arch-Bishop of Rheims, threatened Charles the Simple, he would withdraw his Subjects from their Obedience, if he made any Alliance with the Normans, who were then Barbarians and Unbelievers. Now the Popes believed it as an Article of Faith, that their power was much greater than that of all the Bishops; and that it had no other limitation than was express'd in the Canons of the Councils, and the Decrees of the Apostolique See, which never had forbid them to Depose Kings, because it cannot be imagined, the thoughts of such a thing could ever enter into their brains. Gregory II. in Anno 730. having thundered his Anathema against Leo Isaurian, suspended at least the payment of all Tribute, and Obedience of his Subjects, or perhaps wholly Absolved them, as some pretended. Moreover, taking upon them, as they did, the Authority of creating Kings, which was allowed by the ambition of such as desired that Title: they imagined they might well take away the Crown from those that were unworthy, since they could bestow one upon such as did deserve it.

There

Church.

There were besides all this many occasions which served not a little to confirm this opinion. Amongst others the Prohibition of contracting Marriage between Kindred, even to the Seventh Degree, and betwixt Allies to the fourth and fifth; The cognisance they took of all great Causes, not only amongst the Ecclesiasticks, but Temporal Princes; and the Croisado's. For as to the first they could easily find enough of Parentage or Alliance to dissolve a Princes Marriage, and by this means made themselves formidable. And for the second, they were not less considerable for the power they had to judge of all Causes, because all Parties have naturally a fear and a respect for their Judges; and they having by this incredible affluence of Business, an opportunity to employ great numbers of People, it drew to their Court all those that had an ambition to be made use of by them, or such as had the curiosity to be fashion'd, or instructed in that most famous School of the whole Universe. In effect all the greatest Wits of Europe flock'd thither to gain Employments; and as we have still an Affection for those by whom we are advanced, when they went from thence, after they had done their Business, or made their Fortune, they proclaimed the Grandeur of the Popes in every Country, with an ardent desire to set up their Maxims.

The Croisado's or Holy War made them likewise very powerful. For in all the Expeditions to the Holy-Land, they enjoined Princes to lift themselves, they held the Sovereign Command of those Armies by their Legats, and in a manner made themselves Lords of all those Adventurers: not only because they exacted obedience from them, but which was more, because they took them under their Protection till their return; which was, as it were an Order of State to stop all Proceedings both Civil and Criminal. In other Croisado's which were undertaken against Schismatics and Hereticks, they made it a Law, That whoever were convicted of those Crimes, should forfeit all their Goods, Honours and Dignities: In pursuance whereof, they deprived those that were guilty, or caused them to be deprived by Councils assembled by their Legats; then gave the Spoil to such as had served well in those Expeditions, without consulting the Sovereign Lords of whom they held those Estates, because they durst not refuse Investiture to those whom so holy a Power had provided in that manner for.

But their greatest Power or Force consisted in that of the Clergy and Religious Orders; Those great Bodies being in those times very firmly united for the maintenance of his Franchises and Liberties, which they positively believed to be Jure Divino, looking upon the Pope as a Chief Head, and Potentate that would never fail them at need. Indeed his absolute Authority lay heavily upon the Bishops Shoulders; but when it pressed too hard, they had recourse to that of the Prince, as Protector of the Goods and Liberties of the Clergy. Reciprocally they made use of the Power of the Pope, to shield them from the Attempts of their Princes: and governing themselves thus between the Power of both, they endeavoured to moderate and qualifie the one by the other.

However they had cause to complain that the Popes took from them a good part of that Authority belonging to them, as Successors to the Apostles; as by drawing immediately to their Tribunal, the Cognisance of all Causes, not leaving them any thing almost to judge of Primarily, or Originally. By obliging them to give them their Oaths according to a certain Form to which Gregory VII. had added some Terms which amounted to Fealty and Hommage; By imposing the necessity for their going to Rome; By arrogating to themselves the Right of Consecrating Metropolitans; By granting Dispensations for not observing the holy Canons, as if the whole Ecclesiastical Discipline depended only upon their absolute Authority; By allowing Exemptions to Inferiors to withdraw them from their Obedience to their Superiors. They complained moreover of their having reserved to themselves alone the power of receiving Caadjutories, and that of dissolving the Spiritual Marriages of Bishops, that is, of separating them, or putting them away from their Churches, by Cession, or Translation, or Deposition; and their taking upon themselves the disposing of most Benefices.

Let us say something more particular upon the chiefest of these points; The differences between particular People were handled only in the Court of Rome in the Twelfth Age: however when the Cause was very important, or concerned the whole Church, or a whole Kingdom, they referr'd it to the Judgment of a Council. Thus Gregory VII. when the Quarrel betwixt him and the Emperour Henry V. came to be renew'd, promised he would assign a Council, in a place of safety, where every one might come Friend or Foe, as well those of the Clergy as the Laity, to judge whether he, or the Emperor had broke the Peace, and to consider of some means to restore it again. Gelasius II. said the same thing, and that he would acquiesce in the Judgment of his Brothers the Bishops, whom God had Constituted Judges in his Church, and without whom a Cause of that Nature could not be determined. Innocent III. wrote word, That he durst not decide any thing concerning the Marriage of King Philip II. without the determination of a General Council: and that if he should do it, he might run the hazard of his Order and of his Office; very remarkable words, for that they seem to insinuate that a Pope may be deposed not only for Heresie, but likewise for abusing his Power.

In those times they were likewise obliged to govern the Church by Advice of the Cardinals; whose Power was raised to such a height, since the year One thousand, that they were the Collaterals and Coadjutors of the Pope, saith St. Bernard; that their Privileges or Rights were greater then those of the Patriarchs and the Primates, and that they had the Power of giving Authentick Censures against the Popes themselves. The assistance and ability of so many great Men chosen out of all the Western Churches, as fill'd this sacred Colledge, did not a little help the Popes in bearing the great burthen of Affairs, and maintaining and encreasing their Authority in the remotest Countries. But when they were once become great enough by their assistance, they freed themselves from their dependance, and now they only ask them their opinions, and do not think themselves at all obliged to follow what they Advise or Counsel.

As for the disposing of Benefices, they had gotten the greatest into their own power, as the Archbishopricks, Bishopricks and Abbies, by making themselves Masters of the Elections, under pretence of judging those Differences that hapned betwixt opposite Parties; and the lesser as the Dignitaries and Canons of Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, by their recommendations to the Chapters in favour of those Clergy-Men that follow'd their Court. When having often obtained the thing desired, they at length turned such Recommendation into an absolute Command by the instigation of Flatterers and interested People; and then that was follow'd with Reservations, and after with Expectatives, the abuse whereof went on increasing still, notwithstanding the Pragmatick of St. Louis, and the Remedies Philip le Bel, or the Faire, would have apply'd, and lasted till the time of the great Schism, when King Charles VI. and after him Charles VII. set roundly upon it, and brought back all Elections, Collations and Presentations to the same method and order as had been Decreed by General Councils, without any regard or respect to those pretences and claims the Court of Rome had taken up and exercised.

In the Fifth Age not only the Bishops, but almost all the Church-men on this side the Mountains, had taken up that pious Custom, of going to Rome to visit the Sepulchres of the Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, as it were to pay their Hommage, and testifie they held the same Faith which those Apostles had preached. At the same time they paid their Respects to their Holy Fathers, who in length of time converted this Voluntary Devotion into an indispensable Obligation, in so much as they highly reproached such as omitted it.

Dispensations were utterly unknown in the first Ages, and when they did begin to give them, it was not to allow them to infringe the Canons, but rather to absolve those that had infringed them. After the Eleventh Age the use grew very frequent. I observe four or five causes; The continual Wars between private Persons as well as between Princes: The multiplicity of Decrees, which were so numerous, it was difficult to avoid breaking some or other of them; The corruption of Manners, and the little regard they had for Ecclesiastical Orders or Rules: insomuch as they obliged to obviate that scorn by granting Dispensations, and they thought to hide or conceal the Transgression by permitting it. The Popes however did not dispense in things against our Faith, nor against good Manners, but in those that were only forbidden or permitted by positive Law. As for the Divine Law, they did not directly dispense with that, but by Interpretation and by Declaration.

As for the Exemptions of Monasteries, we have observed in the Sixth Age, how they began by the concessions of the Bishops, and how all the Grandees affected to obtain them for such as they founded. The first we find that were allowed them was only to free the Monks from Temporal Payments and Duties. Afterwards they obtained some kind of Privileges to be added; amongst others, That they should chuse their own Abbots; That they should be Masters of their own Discipline, and that the Bishops should Ordain Priests for them, at their Request. In fine, they found out means to extend them to the Spiritual Jurisdiction, and free themselves themselves from any dependance upon Bishops: to which three things were required, the Bishops Consent, the Authority of the Holy Chair, and the Pragmatick Sanction of the King.

The number of these Exemptions encreasing day by day, the Pope arrogates to himself the power of giving them, and of submitting the Monasteries to the Holy See, maugre the Bishops Diocesans. He did the very same in relation to some Bishops and some Chapters, subtracting these from their Bishops, and the Bishops from their Metropolitans. Vertuous Men could not hold their Tongues upon these Disorders: their Writings mention it yet: St. Bernard though a Monk and very zealous for the Holy Chair, highly condemned them. For to exempt the Abbots from the Jurisdiction of the Bishops, what was it else, said that great Saint, but to command them to Felony and Rebellion? and was it not as monstrous a deformity in the Body of the Church, to unite an Abby or a Chapter immediately to the Holy Chair, as in a Human Body to joyn and fasten a Finger to the Head?

These favours were not bestow'd gratis at Rome, the Abbots and Monks stript their Monasteries to purchase this independance, and made them oft-times Tributary to the Holy See, of many Silver Marks which they paid yearly.

The Abbots notwithstanding these Exemptions were still obliged after their Election to render Obedience to their Bishops, and by a Writing: but the most part refused it, so that the Council of Reims was forc'd to make a Decree to compel them, and yet they did over-much care to submit to it; which Disobedience was so far carried into a common Right, that Henry II. King of England made bitter complaints to Pope Innocent II. for that Hugh Archbishop of Rouen exacted this said Duty of the Abbots of Normandy. The Pope perceiving with what heat the King wrote to him, sent to the Archbishop that he should for a time forbear to ask that Right too rigorously, for fear of greater inconveniency.

The need the Popes had of the Credit of the Order of St. Bennet during their Quarrels with the Emperors, inclined them, as I believe, to bestow upon the principal Abbots of those Congregations, the Ornaments which had belonged only to the Bishops: Those were, the Miter, the Surplice, the Gloves and the Sandals; some have since added the Crozier. But such as loved the Hierarchy, detested this abuse, and those Abbots that were but somewhat humbly Religious, did not often make use of those Tokens of Honour, believing that what is the Mark of Jurisdiction in a Bishop, is a stain of Ambition in a Monk. Peter de Blois wrote to his Brother, an Abbot in the Kingdom of Naples, to whom the Pope had made a Prefect of these Pontifical Ornaments, that he should send them back again, or rid himself of his Abby. Pope Urban II. beholding the happy Peter Abbot of Caves bare-headed in a Council, sent a Miter to him to cover it; This holy Man having received it with great Respect, would not however put it on, but kept it still upon his Knees. But Hugh Abbot of Clugny did not refuse those Ornaments from that Popes hands, who gave them to him and all his Successors. Calistus II. desiring to gratifie that Abby, because he had been Elected and Consecrated there; gave likewise the Title of Cardinal to the Abbot Ponce de Melgueil, to enjoy it, both he and all the Abbots of that House.

The Popes Originally had Right to confirm only the Elections of the Metropolitans of the Roman Diocess. The sending the Pall to those of the Galican Church, chalkt out the way to usurp it upon them also. In the beginning St. Boniface Archbishop of Mentz, engaged them to seek that Honour, to bring them by that means to the greater dependance, then when they were accustomed to deck themselves with those Ornaments, which in their opinions distinguishd them much from Bishops, the Popes obliged them to receive them always from him, as a thing very necessary, and forbid them all Exercise of their Function till they had received them.

Bishops could not change, or take another Bishoprick, unless they were turned out of their own by the Barbarians, or upon some very urgent necessity; and that by Sentence of the Metropolitan and Bishops of the Province: the Popes notwithstanding permitted it without restraining them to all those Forms. Which was introduced in this Twelfth Age, not all at once, but by little and little, as it were founding the Foord.

The ancient form of Elections was yet preserved as the Soul of the Hierarchy, that is to say, they were made by the Clergy and by the People, afterwards they were examined by the Metropolitans, assisted with the Counsel of his Suffragans. If he judged them good he approved them, and if he found any default, he annul'd it and sent them back to proceed to a new one: that is to be understood, if they had not knowingly and designedly, elected one that was unworthy, or lay under some Canonical impediment; For in such case the Metropolitan and his Suffragans, elected one themselves. The Bishops were not obliged to be personally present at such Elections and Judgments; but sent some Clergy-men who represented their Persons.

The Consecration of Bishops in France was performed by the Metropolitan and his Suffragans, the Pope or his Legat having no right to it: but if the Metropolitan refused to Consecrate the Elect, the Electors appealed to the Pope, who sometimes did Consecrate them himself. When the Metropolitans were suspended from their Episcopal Functions, the Legats, as representing the Holy Father, pretended that that same belonged to them.

The Elections, and the Right the Metropolitans had to Consecrate the Bishops, were not directly overthrown during this Age, but suffer'd great breaches and diminution. For the new Right founded upon the supposed Epistles of the first Popes, having perverted all the Canons, and reduced all Elections to the litigious forms of Proceedings, as there most commonly hapned divers Contests between the opposite Parties electing, or difficulties in the Judgment given by the Metropolitans, one of the two Cabals seldom failed of making an Appeal to Rome, which was an inextricable labyrinth of perplexed Proceedings; and if there were any omission of formality in the Election, the Pope declared it null, and reserved to himself alone the right of providing the Bishop, and of Consecrating the Person whom he chose. Though it were forbidden to take any thing for that, notwithstanding the Officers of the Court of Rome exacted furiously, under pretence of their Salaries, and Paper and Ink: afterwards the Popes themselves, who had so highly condemned all Exactions, converted to their own proper benefit those abuses which they could not hinder. I find that the Bishop of Mansé gave for his Ordination Seven hundred Mark of Silver. In time they settled this Exaction at a years Revenue moderately Taxed, which they and their Cardinals shared amongst them.

The power of the French Bishops was likewise great proportionably. For besides that they were the most considerable Member of the State, and had most power in the great Parliaments, or General Assemblies, the Kings rested much upon their Counsels, submitted to their Remonstrances, and were Crowned by their hands upon every Solemn Feast in the year. So that when any King was Excommunicate, as was Philip I. the Bishops refused to do this Office, and held in a manner, as in suspense, not the Royalty, but the Respect of his People. By the Popes example they sometimes made use of Interdicts, often of Excommunications; which by being so often employ'd upon trivial occasions, became so odious, that the Secular Judges appearing against them, caused those to be apprehended that carried them, tormented them in their Estates, and the Estates of their Relations, and vexed even such as obey'd those Fulminations, or who refused to hold Communication with such as were Excommunicated; And therefore in the year 1274. the Council of Lyons one of the most famous that hath been held in France, Ordained in presence of King Philip the Hardy or Bold, and the Emperors of the East and West, That those that did so hereafter should be cut off from the Communion of the Church, and if they persisted two Months in their Contumacy, should not be absolv'd but by the Holy Chair. Which was allow'd in France, provided those Excommunications were just, and did intrench upon the Rights of the Crown. Now for as much as it depended upon his Officers to judge herein, they eluded them most commonly, and seized upon the Temporals as well of those that pronounced it, as those that submitted, and even caused their Houses to be pulled down.

The reason why they fore-armed themselves so strongly against these Censures, was because that in those times so soon as a Man was Excommunicate, he forfeited the benefit of his Goods, Honours and Dignities, that any one had a right to pilage him; that they denied him the Sacraments and Burial, and he could not be absolved but upon very hard Conditions, and by doing Publick Penance, the Mortification whereof is more cruel then Death it self to such who have much more concern for the shame of this World, then fear of God before their Eyes. And indeed the Clergy reveng'd their Injuries, how great soever, no other ways then by the Spiritual Sword, and were so jealous of their Sentences, that if a Secular Judge would according to the Laws of his Prince have Chastised an Excommunicated Person for killing an Ecclesiastick, they would have oppos'd it, as an attempt upon their Jurisdiction. And therefore the Murtherer of a Layman was punished with Death, and of a Priest, nay even a Prelat, had oftentimes no other Punishment but Excommunication.

Church.

The most part of the Bishops were taken out of Monasteries: for as it went by Election, and those Houses were taken for Schools of Piety and Wisdom, such as aspired to this Dignity or that of an Abbot, which was not so honourable, but much more convenient, thrust themselves into the bottom of a Cloister, and affected a very severe Vertue and profound Humility, falling thus low that they might be raised, and hiding themselves that they might be sought out. Then when their Hypocrisy, had dazzled the Eyes of those silly Folks till they were chosen, they laid aside that mask of austerity and made much of themselves.

But often times those good Prelats who were not zealous for a Bishoprick out of any other Motive then the call from God, when they found their strength decay and grow too weak for that great Office quitted the Bishoprick, and made their retreat into some Monastery to recollect and prepare themselves to render an account of their Administration to their Sovereign Judge.

They had yet the power of declaring to the People whom they might Honour and Pray to as Saints, which is that they call Canonizing; This was ordinarily done in a Council, or in an Assembly of the Fraternity; The Bishop in whose Diocess the Party died that merited this Honour, gave account of the great Vertues had made his Life illustrious, and the Miracles that were wrought on his Grave, according to publick Fame and the evidence of many particular People; and thereupon the Assembly giving their Judgment by Acclamations rather then in Writing, they all went to take up the Holy Body, put it into a Shrine, exposed it to the Devotions of the People, and ordered his Festival should be Celebrated.

It had been a very ancient and abusive Custom in the Eastern Churches, that Clerks should rob and plunder the Bishops Goods as soon as ever Death had clos'd his Eyes. In France, from the year One thousand, at least for as much as I can observe, the Laity took the same Licence as well towards Bishops, as all other that were Beneficed, grounding their so doing upon the Consideration perhaps, that the Goods of the Church belong to and are the Portion of the Poor, and therefore they might justly take them again, when the Pastor to whom they were given for that purpose had kept it so long from them. However it were, this abuse continued notwithstanding all what the Popes and Councils could do to prevent it. Now the Sovereign's who think that all Rights of their Subjects are eminently theirs, because they are head of them, made a Right of this Custom to themselves, and in a short time made it extend to the whole Revenue of vacant Bishopricks, and afterwards to the collation of Canons and all other Benefices depending thereon, excepting such as have the cure of Souls. This Right is called Regalia. This Custom was before the Reign of Philip Augustus, though in his time, it were not approved of by all the World. Ives de Chartres redeemed it of King Philip I. for his Bishoprick, and Lewis VII. permitted Peter Archbishop of Bourges to dispose of the Fruits of that Church by Will, when he died.

The Custom of the Kingdom which obliged the Bishops to follow the Kings because of their Fiefs, was not much unpleasant to such amongst them as delighted more in the Court then in the Church. Nevertheless those that desired rather to have the reputation of good Pastors, then great Statesmen retir'd from Court: but sometimes the Kings interpreted such retreat a want of Duty. We find that Louis the Gros was distast'd with the Archbishop of Sens and the Bishop of Paris: and that Philip Augustus caused the Goods of the Bishops of Paris and Auxerre to be seized, because they came not to his Army. In the end the good and vertuous Bishops gained this point of the Kings that they dispenced with their Personal Attendance in the Wars, provided they sent those numbers of Men to which they were obliged by their Fiefs.

The Parochial Churches of Burroughs and Villages had for a long time been served by Canonical Priests whom the Bishops sent thither, and recalled again when he pleased to his Cathedral. The Lords having erected Chappels in the Country for the conveniency of their Dove-coats, and Peasants, appropriated to them the Oblations, First-Fruits and Collections, for they had not then the Tythe of the Fruits of the Earth and increase of Cattle, but the Lords themselves took those. 'Tis a great question by what Title, I think they were part of their Demeasns, and that it was a Duty they levied upon their Tenants, in most places the Tenth, in others the Eleventh, the Fifteenth and the Twentieth part. However it were, when once they had suffer'd themselves to be persuaded, that of Divine Right they belonged to the Ministers of the Church, and that they were bound to restore them; They gave a good part to the Benedictine Friars, who in those days did the Church very great Service, and gained the love of the Nobility, their Monasteries being like open open Inns for Gentlemen and other Travellers, and Free-Schools to instruct their Children. Upon condition of these Grants they ordered some Priests of theirs to serve in those Chappels; and finding such Funds and Incomes very sweet, as accruing to them without labour, they hooked in as much as possibly they could. The Regular Canons obtained likewise some. In so much as there remained very little for the Secular Priests.

Now these Benedictine Monks thus dispersed through all the Country Villages wandering from the strictness of their Rules, and growing corrupt out of their Monasteries, as the Fish perishes out of the Water: The Council of Clermont in the year 1095. ordained that they should quit those Employments and leave them to the Secular Priests. This Decree was not altogether observed, no more then that of the Council of Poitiers in the year 1109. which prohibited them all Parochial Functions: they held these Cures till Anno 1115. the Latran Council took them all wholly away from them by a general Constitution. However they left them a right of Presentation, and the Tythes likewise, unless it were some small or moderate proportion for the Curate that Officiated in those Churches.

* Augustins.

By this Constitution the Regular * Canons were excepted, upon condition they should have a Companion to converse always with them, that they might not turn absolute Brutes by daily frequenting of rude Peasants, worse then solitude it self. This Companion was but his second, and by consequence the other who Officiated was first in respect of him; for which reason they called him Prior; and hence comes it that those Benefices were named Priories, though in effect they are but simple Cures, no more then those held by the Secular Priests.

There are several proofs in the Acts of the Councils and elsewhere, that Pluralities were forbidden; an Abuse that must be for ever condemned by true Churchmen, who look upon their Benefice as a Charge of Souls, but ever practised by such as consider them only as a Revenue.

The Princes of those times did easily give way to great Revenge, and run into extrem Violence: but when the first heat of their fury was spent, they were easily persuaded to Repentance, as well by the Sentiments of Christianity imprinted in their Hearts, their Religion not being only meer Policy, but true Faith, as by the good Instructions and Arguments of their Bishops and others of the Clergy. For those godly Pastors not knowing how to sooth and flatter Vice in any one, much less give way to Crimes in Ruling Potentates and Grandees that ought to be Exemplary to inferiors, boldly reprov'd them for their faults, which otherwise they knew themselves must answer for at the Tribunal of the King of Kings. They first made use of Admonitions, which they did by word of Mouth if there were opportunity of access, or else by Writing. If afterwards they found the Vice incurable, the Scandal continue and increase, they added reprehensions, and those sometimes publick, and in the end let loose the Censures of the Church upon them. By this Evangelical liberty assisted with the Holy Spirit; they often mollified the hardest hearts, and gained respect by their Apostolick constancy, whilst others were but slighted and condemn'd, as not having the courage to open their Mouths against the greatest Sinners.

When any Church was wronged in her Liberty or Goods, the Priests took down the Shrines and Images of their Saints, and set them on the ground, either to turn the hearts of their Persecutors and bring them to Repentance, or to inflame the indignation of the People against them.

Those that did not believe the reality of the Body of Jesus Christ in the Holy Sacrament, were Hereticks: but the too curious started several Questions touching the manner and the circumstances of that incomprehensible Mystery. Some not being able to conceive what could become of the Sacred Body of Our Lord, after they had eaten it, said it passed with the rest of our Digestion. Rupert Abbot of Tuit, was of that opinion, that the Bread and the Wine remained with the Body and the Blood of Jesus Christ. And it appears that Peter de Blois, believed, that the Cup could not be Consecrated without Water, and that it was no Sacrament without the Chalice, because it is a Mystical Repast; and in a Supper there must be somewhat to drink as well as to eat.

In those times they yet Communicated in both the Species, but divers, and amongst others the Monks of Clugny, to prevent the Profanation in case the Cup should happen to be spilt, or some small drop should remain sticking on the Beard of the Communicant, administred the Bread dipt in the Wine, and that Bread was round and about the thickness of a Crown. Now this method not seeming conformable to the institution of the Sacrament by our Saviour, was often reprov'd and condemned by the Popes themselves, who at length not being able to rectify this abuse, took the Cup wholly from the Laity. Such as impugne the real Presence, however, are mistaken in saying that the word Transubstantiate, was introduced by the Council of Latran, which was held in Anno 1215 for we find it in Peter de Blois, who wrote some years before; but it is true that that Council authorized that Term of Transubstantiation.

The use of publick Penance was yet very common, the Penitents could not come into the Church, nor Communicate, nor receive the Blessing or the Salutation of Peace, nor Shave his Beard, nor cut his Hair, nor put on any Linnen, nor Christen a Child; they eat nothing but Bread, and drank only Water, on Mundays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays in each Week. But this severity was much abated by the Indulgences or Relaxations of Punishments allowed by the Canons. The Popes freely bestowed these Indulgences on such as took the Cross to go into the Holy Land, or against Hereticks and Schismatics; The Bishops likewise when they Consecrated any Church were not sparing to such as would come to visit them, upon condition they would come the day before, and give their Alms or Contribution towards the upholding and maintaining of the Fabrick.

They had then a particular fancy to build Subterranean Chappels. I have observed that at the building their Churches, they would in the Foundations often times bury Vessels full of Silver, that so when either Time, or other accidents should come to destroy them, they might find wherewith to rebuild them anew. Also when any happen'd to fall to ruin, they brought the Relicks of that Saint that was most honour'd by all the Neighbouring Countries, to invite People out of Devotion to contribute largely towards another Edifice. It was impossible but they should be rich, for there was no one died that did not leave them some Legacy. I shall observe by the way, that by their Wills they ever enfranchised some certain number of Slaves according to their Qualities, and we may reckon this amongst others for one main cause which hath by little and little abolish'd Slavery and Servitude in France.

Those Persons that had committed great Sins, though they were not such whom the Canons ordained to do publick Penance, yet they omitted not, especially being at the point of Death, to make a publick Confession; and divers great Princes would needs die flat upon the Ground, lying upon a Cross of Dust and Ashes; some even with a Rope about their Necks, others in the Habit of a Monk, or Friars holy Frock and Cowle, believing that Sacred Livery would shelter them against the Torments in the other World.)

Auricular Confession had ever been practis'd in the Church; Gratian examining in the second part of the Decree, whether it were of absolute necessity or not, after he hath mustred the Reasons on either side, according to his Method, seems to leave every one his Judgment free, assuring us that Persons both very Devout and Pious were many for it, and many against it. But the Church hath determin'd it in the affirmative.

The Monks did not Administer the Sacraments to the Laity, nor did they hear Confessions unless it were from those of their own Coat, it being forbidden them by the Councils to exercise any Curial Function. A certain Abbot of St. Riquier undertook to Confess some Seculars, and to Preach without leave of the Ordinary, of which complaint was made against him at Rome, the Pope caused him to be cited before him, but he pleaded his Cause so well, that the Holy Father allowed him both the one and the other, and gave him Sandals, which in those times were the Marks or Badge of a Preacher.

The Clergy busied themselves mightily in multiplying the Ceremonies, the Ornaments, and practise of Devotions, and in making a great many frivolous Disputes upon each of these.

The profession of Physick, and that of Law, were hardly exercised by any but the Churchmen, the Laity being very little addicted to Study: and as they were very profitable, the Monks and Regular Canons had likewise an itch to practise them; The Council of Latran under Innocent II. did expressly forbid their meddling with either of them.

The Mortifications and Austerities, the Sackcloth, Shirt of Hair, knotted Girdle, and voluntary Fustigation, which they called Discipline, was much in practise, at least in the precedent Age, since Peter Damianus mentions it as a thing that was very common. When they desired to appease the Wrath of God, or obtain some particular favour from his Bounty, the Pope, and sometimes the Bishops of their own

Heads

Church.

Heads would ordain new Fasts. Thus in the year 1187. Gregory VIII. sorely afflicted for the loss of Jerusalem, thought fit thereby to animate the Christians to Arm themselves powerfully for its Recovery, to command all both Men and Women to fast every Friday for five years successively, with the same strictness as in Lent, and to abstain from Flesh the Wednesdays and Saturdays. He enjoyn'd all the Cardinals and their Families to do the same, and imposed it upon himself and all his.

As for the Fast of Lent it was then very strictly observ'd; they eat but once in the whole day, and that after Sun-set, all the Divine Service, and Masses being then over. We may see some footsteps of it remaining to this day, in that they say Vespers with the Mass before Noon. Some gave themselves the liberty of eating at the hour of Noon, which is Three hours after Twelve, or Dinner time. The Friars fasted but till that hour from the Septuagesima to the Quadragesima; but from the Quadragesima till Easter they nor any of the Faithful did eat till after Vespers. The Princes and great Persons did not omit this abstinence, nor fasting neither, which did not so much impair their Health as it abated their Concupiscence: and in these Holy Times, the least Devout were obliged at least in Honour, to give Alms every day.

The Functions of those in holy Orders were yet different and distinct; the Priest seldom did the Office of a Deacon or Sub-Deacon. Many out of humility remained Deacons still, or at least a long time, not taking upon them the Order of Priesthood till near the end of their days. We read that Celestine III. at the time he was elected Pope was but a Deacon, and had lived Sixty five years in that Order without aspiring to be a Priest.

They sometimes tolerated the Marriage of Sub-Deacons, but it was sacrilege in a Deacon.

Baptism was commonly not Ministr'd or Conferr'd but 'at the time of Easter, if those that were to receive it, were not in danger of Death. They plung'd them three times in the Sacred Font: to shew them what operation that Sacrament hath on the Soul, washing and cleansing it from Original Sin.

After they had given the extreme Unction to the Sick, they ordinarily laid them upon a Bed of Straw, where they gave up the Ghost. Some would needs die upon a Bed of Ashes, with their Heads lying on a Stone.

In those times the Clergy call'd all those Martyrs of their Order that were kill'd, though it were neither for Religion, or the maintaining of Christian Doctrines. We find in the Decretals, some Apostolical Letters of Alexander III. which forbids they should honour the Prior of the Monastery of Gristan as a Martyr. The History is strange and odd enough. The Monks of that House distributed to the People I know not what sort of Water which they hallowed with certain Prayers, and by that invention got store of Alms, wherewith they made good Chear. It hapned one day that their Prior being drunk, wounded two of his Friars with his Knife, who immediately beat out his Brains with a Staff that was at hand by chance. The rest of their Fellows instead of concealing this Scandal, had the impudence to make advantage and profit of this accident, and feigned divers Miracles upon his Corps, by virtue whereof they Crowned him with the Laurel of Martyrdom, and the silly People gave credit to the Cheat.

They had been mightily puzzled in the other Age to bring the Priests to Celibacy. There were some yet that could not agree to it. The Popes Calistus II. and Eugenius III. compell'd them by divers Punishments, and amongst others deprived them of their Benefices, and Excommunicated all such as went to hear them say Mass. Now it not being allowed them to make use of the rights of Nature by Marriage, there were some, though but few in number, who made use of things against Nature, burning with such flames of Lust, as ought not to be extinguish'd but by Fire from Heaven. As for the greater part of the rest, the Law of God, that is to say his Church*, forbidding them to have Children, the Author of all Confusion substituted great Throngs and Crowds of Nephews in their stead; and from thence fol- low'd great Disorders: for if those Nephews were Ecclesiasticks, they perpetuated the Benefices in their Families by Coadjutories or otherwise, and possess'd as by Right of Inheritance the Sanctuary of the Lord: If they were of the Laity, and thrifty People, they made their Uncles grow Covetous, Usurers and Extortioners to heap up Riches for them, or else they endeavour'd by all ways imaginable to alienate the Lands of the Church, and joyning them to their own, appropriate all to themselves. Often times they became Masters of their Parents House, and living there with too great a Train, squandred away the Patrimony of the Cross and the Poor, in Feasting, Equi- page page of Hounds and Horses, and sometimes in things much worse. We might quote a great many Examples of this scandalous Nature, I shall instance one which is of the Nephews of an Archdeacon of Paris, who committed extraordinary Violences and Exactions in his Place: whereof Thomas Prior of St. Victors having often given him warning, they Murther'd this holy Holy Friar in the very Arms of the Bishop himself near Gournay, as he returned from a Visit.

Church.

The Councils of the Gallican Church having now but little Authority, because their Decisions were often annul'd at Rome, without hearing their Reasons, the Bishops took not so much care to call any. I cannot tell in which it was where an old Bishop appear'd with ill Cloaths, a Crozier half broken, and a Mitre out of order, to let them see by that Equipage to what a vile Condition those holy Assemblies were reduc'd. Most of those held in France during this Age, were called either by the Popes themselves or by their Legats. The Popes were personally present in Six, Paschal II. in that of Troyes, Anno 1107. and there the Simoniacks, and the Laicks, that conferr'd Benefices were Excommunicated. Gelasius held one at Vienne in the year 1119. where he thundred his Anathema against the Emperor Henry V. and his Anti-Pope. Calistus II. his Successor (Guy Archbishop of Vienne) did the same thing in that of Rheims the following year, which had been denounced by Gelasius. Those that made sale of things Sacred, and took Money for burying the dead, for the Crisome and Baptism, were likewise Excommunicated. Innocent II. held one at Clermont in Anno 1130. and another at Rheims in Anno 1131. where he fulminated the Anti-Pope Anacletus, and his Adherents. Eugenius III. did Celebrate one at Rheims in the year 1137. where divers excellent Regulations were decreed. And Alexander III. one at Tours in Anno 1163. where he gave an account of his Election, and proved the nullity of Ostavian's his Rival.

Councils.

These are a good part of those called by the Legats. One at Troyes in Anno 1104. in which the Bishop of Sens was accused of Simony by some ill designing People, but the Bishops rejected them as no good Evidence. He desired nevertheless to purge himself from that suspicion by Oath before the Legat, to which he was admitted. Two Cardinal Legats assembled, one at Poitiers, in Anno 1109. to reform the Manners and Habits of the Clergy: They were forbidden to take any Benefice from the hands of the Laity: The Abbots to use Gloves, Sandals or the Ring; Monks to Exercise Parochial Function, as to Baptise or to Preach; which nevertheless was allowed to the Regular Canons. There was one at Vienne, Anno 1112. where Godfrey Bishop of Amiens was President, in Quality of Legat, because the Archbishop Guy had no very fluent Tongue. The Emperor Henry V. was Excommunicated there: As were also those guilty of Simony, and such of the Laity as gave the Investiture of Benefices.

There were three in the year 1114. one at Soissons, one at Beauvais, and another at Rheims to Excommunicate Henry V. and Burdin his Anti-Pope. One at Toulouze in Anno 1124. which condemned certain false Brothers or counterfeit Monks who declaimed against the Temporal Riches and Incomes of the Church, and against the Sacraments. One at Troyes, Anno 1127. where the Order of the Templers was confirmed; The Abbots Stephen de Cisteaux, and Bernard de Clervaux were assistant there, and the latter drew up the Rules of that Order of Knights Templers. There was one Assembled at Estampes in the year 1130. to condemn the Anti-Pope Anacletus. One likewise at Jouars the same year, to avenge by Canonical Punishments the Murther of the B. Thomas Prior of St. Victors. Another at Soissons, Anno 1136. which condemned the Errors of P. Abailard. One at Sens four years after for the same business: King Lewis the Young was present there. Another at Veze- lay in Burgundy, in the year 1145. for the Expedition to the Holy Land. That of Paris in the year 1147. confuted the Opinions of Gilbert Poree Bishop of Poitiers, who Recanted before Pope Eugenius at Rheims, after the Council was dissolved which had been held in that City.

That of Fleury in the year 1151. was to annul the Marriage of King Lewis VII. and Alienor of Aquitain. In that of Auranches in Normandy, Anno 1173. the Legats gave for the second time, the Absolution for the Murther of St. Thomas of Canterbury to Henry II. King of England. That of Alby, which was in Anno 1176. condemned the Heresie of the Albigenss. In that of Dijon which was held about Michaelmas in the year 1197. the Legat from Pope Innocent III. put the whole Kingdom of France under an Interdiction, to compel Philip Augustus to quit Agnes de Merania, whom he had Espoused in prejudice of Issemburge his Lawful Wife.

Church.

In that of Sens, which was held in the year 1128. the Abbot of St. Martins of Nevers, and the Dean of the great Church of the same City being present, were convicted of the Heresies of the Popelicans, the Abbot deposed, the Dean suspended, and both of them sent to Rome.

We hardly find above three or four that were called by the Kings order, and the Authority of the Bishops of France. Amongst others one at Rheims, Anno 1109. one at Estampes, Anno 1130. and two at Paris, the first in the year 1186. the other in 1188. Both of them were called by King Philip, to consider of the best means to relieve the Holy-Land; and in the last they agreed to raise the Tenth, which was called the Saladine Tythe. That of Estampes was called by King Lewis VII. to judge whether of the two Popes they were to own, either Innocent or Victor. That of Rheims was by the proper motion of the Bishops of that Province, to do right to Godfrey Bishop of Amiens against the Monks of St. Valery. He had made discovery that certain Letters of Exemption by them obtained of the Holy See were false: their Cause was worth nothing in France, they transferr'd it to Rome, and found such Advocates there as obtained a Sentence to their advantage. The Bishops complained to the Assembly. We find in the LXVIII. Epistle of Peter de Blois, that sometimes the like counterfeit Letters were discovered: These were declared such by the Council. Thus it is related by Nicholas Moine of Soissons, who has written the Life of this holy Bishop. A modern Author hath endeavour'd to invalidate this Narrative by contradicting of the Dates of times assigned: his proofs may be examined.

Monastick Discipline was in its vigour in the newly Establish'd Orders, but some of the ancient Monasteries, as well of Men, as Virgins, and the old Canons, were greatly in disorder having run into much irregularity; Sometimes there were Bishops, that took care to reform them by gentle means: but when the Debaucheries were too great, they put Regular Canons, or some new Monks in those places.

There were time out of mind some Canons in the Church St. Genevieve du Mont, which was called the Chapter St. Peter, and who upon the Recommendation of King Robert had been exempted from dependance on the Bishop, and immediately subject to the Holy See: it hapned that Pope Eugenius being lodged in their House, a Quarrel arose between them and his Officers, these would needs take away a rich Silk Carpet, which the King had made a Present of to his Holiness to cover the place he kneeled on at Prayers; the others pretending it ought to be left to their Church: From words they came to blows, the Canons fell upon the Popes Officers so rudely, that several of them were hurt, the King himself had like to have been so, while he was endeavouring to prevent the Scuffle. For punishment of this Insolence, upon the Popes complaint, the King resolv'd to expel them from that House, and gave it in charge to Suger Abbot of St. Denis: who placed twelve Canons Regulars there whom he took from St. Victor; Thus of a Chapter they made an Abby, the first Abbot they had was named Odon.

As for that of St. Victor, it was built in Anno 1113. or rather amplified by Lewis the Gros, for before that time it was the Habitation of a Recluse, a famous Doctor named Thomas de Champeaux, who taught Divinity at Notre-Dame, having taken on him the Habit of that Order, was Commissioned for the Government and Conduct of the new Institution, and transferr'd the Divinity Schools to that place, where he read, till he was called thence to the Bishoprick of Chaalons. Geduin his Pupil succeeded him, and bare the Title of Abbot. We may say in praise of this House, that they never withdrew themselves from their Obedience to their Bishop, but that they ever allow'd and received his Visitation and his Correction, whereby they have fared so well, that in Five hundred and fifty years, for so long they have been there, they never fell into any so great disorder as hath required a Reformation of the whole, as all the rest have done, who did shake off that Yoke of Lawful Authority.

The Order of Fontevraud, of which we made mention about the end of the last Age, was confirmed by Pope Paschal II. in the year 1117. The following year some Gentlemen zealous for the defence of holy Places, amongst others Hugh de Paganis and Gefroy de Saint Ademar, to that end Instituted an Order of Religious Knights, who were named the Poor Knights of the Holy City, then the Templers, because they had their first Lodging or Quarters near the Temple of Jerusalem, and for the same reason they likewise called those Houses they had in France, Temples, and so in other Countries. Their Order receiv'd its Confirmation, Rules, and Habit at the Council of Troyes in the year 1127. (Their Rules were contriv'd by St. Bernard, and their Habit was to be white for the Knights, and black or grey for the Servants.

Their

Their number was then but small, but it increased in a while to three hundred, I mean of Knights alone, for the Servitors were almost innumerable. The Order de Premontre was instituted in Anno 1120. by Norbert, who was afterwards promoted to the Archbishoprick of Magdebourg. That of the * Carmelites did not begin till the year 1181. as you shall find in the other Age. Church. * Carmes.

The Orders of the Chartreux, de Grandmont & de Cisteaux, were instituted in the preceding Age, as we have observed: They were all in great Veneration because of their austerity: the two first were so still for their horrid solitariness, indeed both of them were reckon'd amongst the Hermits; and besides they consider'd that of Grandmont for their rigorous Poverty. The Friars Converts of this last (they were named the Bearded, because they wore great Beards) having the management of their Temporal Goods, would have the Government of the Order, and bring the Priests under their Ferula or Lash; but in the end they lost their Cause.

The Chartreux have to this day preserv'd their Cloister and their Discipline, having ever avoided all Intrigues of the World, Conversation with Women, and the ambition of attaining to Prelacy. Three Rocks which ever have, and will be fatal to other Orders.

These good Fathers had so much respect for the holy Sacrifice of the Mass, that within their Walls they never celebrated it but upon Sundays and Holidays: nevertheless they sometimes allowed those that had an earnest desire to it, to say Mass every day to such as were indeed devout. We must not wonder at this practise, which would appear strange in these days: St. Francis, in his Letters which are called his Testament, ordains his Brothers, that but one Mass be said each day in the places where they lived, according to the custom of the Church of Rome. Masses were not then the best part of the Revenue and Subsistence of the Convents, and poor Priests.

The Congregation of Clugny had been an hundred years in very high Reputation, but her Monks had made themselves a little too dainty, taking too much delight in being Clothed in the finest Stuffs, providing against the Heat and Cold, avoiding all Labour and the open Air, and seeking the Shades and Rest. They heaped up Riches with both Hands, got all the Cures to themselves to have the Offerings and Tythes, and obliged the Chapters and Bishops to bestow the Prebendaries of their Churches upon them. In so much that when the Reformation of the Cisterians appeared, and those new Friars were observed to follow St. Bennets Rule literally, without omitting one single point, labouring with their hands, refusing to accept of any Tythes, and behaving themselves with great submission towards their Prelats; the Reverence and Devotion of the People turned to them. Thus they acquired much Wealth, as well by Gifts presented to them, as by their assiduous Labour, there being in some of their Houses two or three hundred Friars that clear'd the Lands of the Woods and other Lets to Tillage, drained the Fens and Bogs, digged and planted, and withall lived with great Frugality. Being very poor in their beginning, Pope Innocent would have them exempted from paying Tythes for their Lands; a favour that was allowed to some Abbies, the Lazar-Houses, Canons Regulars, and the Knights Templers and Hospitallers. Now as their great Thriftiness, and Gifts of Pious People, did furnish them wherewith to make new Purchases; the Prelats made great complaint of this Covetousness, which did with-hold from them what they believed to be justly theirs by Divine Right. The Monks of Clugny, who were much prejudic'd or impair'd by them, because they had the Tythes in divers places, made loud complaints and a great stir wherever they could come to be heard, so that in fine the Council of Latran which was held in the year 1115. restraining that Priviledge to the acquisitions they had already made.

This Difference joyn'd with the jealousy of growing too powerful, prompted these two Congregations to decry each other. Both of them were very Potent, the Popes and Kings took their Counsels, gave them notice of their good or ill success, recommended themselves to their Prayers in all their great Undertakings, and made them large Gifts and Presents to be Associates and Partakers of the Merits of their Societies. That of Clugny had acquir'd much Renown by the desert and reputation of four or five of her first Abbots, but lost a little by the irregularity of Ponce, who squandred away a great part of the Wealth of that rich Abby: on the contrary the Cisteaux encreased so much in Credit by the Reputation of her St. Bernard, that those Monks were the Agents or the Organs of all the weighty Affairs of those times.

Church.

I must tell you here, (if I have not mentioned it already) that the Will of the Parents made the Monk, as well as his own choice. The Father might put his Children into the Monastery without acquainting the Mother, and even against her will. He had that power over them till they were Ten years of Age, afterwards that Term was enlarged to Thirteen, says Ives de Chartres; and then to Fourteen, as we find it in Gratian. When the Father had resolv'd and destined his Son to Monachism, he offer'd him to God in the Church belonging to the Convent, wrapped all over, or sometimes only the Arm in the Altar Cloth, and by that Devotion obliged him so fully, that he could not gainsay it. But Clement III. and Calistus III. changed that too unnatural Right and Power, and declared, That those Children ought not to be compell'd to Monastick Life, unless they did by their own free choice oblige themselves when they had attained to years of Discretion.

Cardinals.

The Dignity of Cardinals was in great lustre, their Colledge was numerous, and their Vertue and Birth most eminent. France had as great a share at least in this Advantage, as Italy. Duchefne who has written their Lives very exactly, hath noted in this Twelfth Age above Fifty that were Frenchmen: the greatest part of them having been bred in Monasteries, particularly in the Congregation of Clugny, and Order of Cîteaux; These last were almost all of them the intimate Friends or Disciples of St. Bernard. Galon Disciple of Ives de Chartres, Bishop of Beauvais then of Paris, Guy Brother of Stephen Earl of Burgundy Archbishop of Vienne, and afterwards Sovereign Prelat by the name of Calistus II. Pontius de Melgueil Abbot of Clugny, Stephen Son of Thierry Earl of Montbelliard, William de Champagne successively Archbishop of Sens and of Rheims, Uncle to King Philip Augustus, and very powerful in the Government of the Kingdom, Rodolph de Nesle, Henry de Sully, and Albert Brother of the Duke of Brabant, were all of illustrious Birth, and withall of extraordinary Vertue, excepting Ponce, or Pontius, who was singular for the Disorders of his Life; which were scandalous after his re-entry perforce into the Abby which he had once renounced, that going to Rome, whither he was cited by the Pope, he was confin'd to a perpetual imprisonment, where a Month after he died. And nevertheless a certain Martyrologist quoted by Duchefne does call him Saint.

The end of Albert was also Tragical, but the Cause being brave, his Memory is the more glorious. He had been Elected Bishop of Liege upon the Solicitation of Henry Duke of Brabant his Brother; The Emperor Henry VI. who hated both of them, would not give his consent to this Election; The Pope however confirms him, and Albert comes to Rheims to be Consecrated, which was then the Metropolis of Liege. The Emperor took this for an outrageous affront and slighting, and dispatches some German Cavaliers after him to take his Revenge. These Russians having craftily insinuated themselves into a familiarity with the Bishop, who then sojourned at Rheims, found an opportunity one day to get him out of Town to take the Air and walk, and Murther'd him with Nineteen Wounds, then made their escape to Verdun, and from thence into Germany to the Emperor. Four hundred and twenty years after, that is in the year 1612. the Arch-Duke Albertus of Austria, and his Spouse the Infanta Clara Eugenia, obtained leave of the Most Christian King Lewis XIII. to take his Corps up out of the Cathedral Church at Rheims, where it had been deposited till that time, and caused it to be convey'd to Brussels in great Pomp. Paul V. completed his Crown of Honour by Canonizing him as a Martyr for the liberty of the Church which is the Spouse of Jesus Christ.

I observe Eight or ten other Cardinals, who had no other Nobility but what their Vertue acquir'd: as one Robert de Paris, who with some others so pressed Pope Paschal, that he had made him break the Treaty by which he had yielded up the investitures to the Emperor Henry V. Foulcher de Chartres, Matthieu de Rheims, and Alberic de Beauvais, the first of whom had been Secretary to Godfrey de Buillon in his Expedition to the Holy Land, the second Prior of St. Martins des Champs, or in the Fields, and the third a Monk of Clugny and Abbot of Vezelay; Stephen de Chaalons, Bernard de Rennes, (these two had likewise been Monks) Rowland d'Auranches, and Matthew d'Angers; all which took their names from the places of their Nativity, according to the Mode of Men of Learning who were of mean Extraction.

There were divers others besides whose Parents are unknown to us, as one Ives a Canon of St. Victor raised by his Learning to that Dignity, and one Martin who came from the Abby of Cîteaux, and was Bishop of Ostia, a Prelat of an Apostolick Continence and Frugality. It is related that he being sent as Legat into Denmark for the Conversion of those Infidels, he came back so poor that he Travel'd on Foot as far as Florence, herein much more like the humble Apostles of Jesus Christ, then the other Legats of those times, who coming very beggerlike into those Provinces whither the Popes sent them, went thence again laden with Spoil, as from a Country Conquer'd by them, and returned back to Rome with an Equipage fit for a King. The Bishop of Florence seeing this good Man on foot, made him a Present of a Horse, not out of generosity, but hopes to oblige him to be his Friend in a Process he had at Rome ready to be determined; but when it came to Judgment, and this good Man to deliver his opinion, he Addresses himself to him, and said freely he did not know he was to have been his Judge, and therefore pray'd him to go to the Stable and take his Horse again, that his Vote might be without partiality.

Neither did France want for Bishops, whose Learning, Merits, Zeal, and Piety acquir'd the Titles of Great Men, and of Saints. Not to mention again that Galon, Guy of Burgundy, William de Champagne, and Albert de Brabant whom we lately ranged amongst the Cardinals: France had amongst others seven great Archbishops, Hildebert de Tours, Peter de Bourges, who was of the Family of la Chastre, Odoard de Cambrai, Arnold Amaury de Narbonne, Henry de Rheims, Rotrou de Rouen, and Hugh de Vienne. Arnold had been Abbot of Clerveaux, and was the first Inquisitor to root out the Heresie of the Albigensis; Rotrou was Son of the Earl of Warwick, near of Kindred to the King of England, as Henry was to the King of France, Louis the Gros: but both of them more eminent for their Christian Humility, then high Birth. Hugh endured rather to be expell'd from his See by the Emperor Frederic I. then to renounce Alexander III. whom he believed to be the true and Legitimate Pope. I should never come to an end, if I undertook to give an account of all the Bishops of this Age who deserve Immortality and Renown. But can we forget Ives and John of Salisbury who governed the Church of Chartres, the first in the beginning of this Century, and the last towards the end? Godfrey d'Amiens of whom we shall speak hereafter; Peter of Poitiers, who courageously opposed William VIII. Duke of Aquitain, who would force him to absolve him of the Excommunication wherewith he was fetter'd; Gilbert Poree who held the same See as Peter, but Twenty five years after; Arnoulf Bishop of Lisieux; Robert de Beauvais, he was the Son of Hugh Duke of Burgundy. John surnamed de la Grille who transferr'd the Bishoprick of Quidale to that place now called St. Malo's; Simon de Noyon, and Guerin de Senlis. In the time of Simon, whilst he was at Jerusalem with King Louis VII. (in the year 1146.) the Church of Tournay was cut off from that of Noyon, to which it had been joyned in the days of St. Medard, and had for their first Bishop Anselme who was Abbot of St. Vincent of Laon, Guerin de Senlis was very great in the Reign of Philip II. and of Louis VIII. Keeper of the Seals under the first, Chancellor under the second.

I shall conclude with four Bishops of Paris, whose Memory ought to be dear to that great City, and the whole Gallican Church. Stephen de Garlande, Peter Lombard, Maurice and Odon. These two last bare the name of Sully, Maurice because he was a Native of that place, but of very poor Parents, Odon because he was of that illustrious House, Issue of the Earls of Champagne. Stephen had been Chancellor of France under Louis VI. Peter Lombard was called the Master of Sentences, from that Book so well known through all Christendom, and which was the Foundation of all School-Divinity. (Maurice had a noble Soul) liberal and magnanimous: He founded the Abbies of Herivaux, and of Hemieres, as likewise two Monasteries for Virgins, Gif and Hieres, and laid the Foundation of the Church Nôtre-Dame, one of the greatest Buildings to be seen in France. Odon his Successor finish'd it, and founded a Monastery for Women of the Order of Cîteaux at Port Royal, being assisted in that Pious Work by the Liberality of Matilda Daughter of William de Garland. He laboured also to root out an ancient but ridiculous Custom which had been suffer'd in the Church of Paris, and in divers others of the Kingdom. It was the Holy-day or Feast of Fools; in some places they called it the Festival of Innocents. It was observ'd at Paris, principally upon the day of the Circumcision, the Priests and Clerks went in Masquerade to Church, where they committed a thousand Insolencies, and from thence rode about the Streets in Chariots, mounted upon Theaters or Stages, singing the most filthy Songs, and acting all the tricks and postures the most impudent Buffoons are wont to shew to divert the Rascally and Sottish Populace. Odo or Odon endeavour'd to put down this detestable Mummery, having to that effect obtain'd an order of the Popes Legat, who made his Visitation there: but we may well believe that his desire had not its full accomplishment, that Custom lasting Two hundred and fifty years afterwards, for we find that in the year 1444. the Masters of the Faculties of Divinity at the request of some Bishops, wrote a Letter to all the Prelats and Chapters, to damn and utterly abolish it; and the Council of Sens which was held Church. held in Anno 1460. does yet speak of it as an Abuse which ought to be Rectrencht.

The Bishops labour'd assiduously to edifie and instruct the Faithful by their Works and Doctrine: most part of them have left their Writings, whereof many have been published, the rest as yet lie hid in several Libraries. And truly as this Age was not ingrateful to Persons of Merit, the liberty of Elections giving them opportunities to reward them, there were more Men of worth and parts to be found, then had been heard of in a long time, who improved the Sciences with good success, and drew an incredible number of Students to learn Philosophy and Divinity at Paris.

Human Learning, or Les belles Lettres, made some Attempts and Essays to raise it self, which were not altogether in vain. It appears in the Writings of Hildebert, of John of Salisbury, and Stephen de Tournay. Peter Comestor or the * Eater, Dean of the Church of Troyes, and afterwards a Monk of St. Victor, compiled the Ecclesiastical History; and he was called the Master of it; and Elinand Native of Beauvais, a Monk of Froidmont, wrote the Universal History to the year 1212. in Forty eight Books.

We have three Latin Poets or Versificators, who are not to be despised, Galternus, William le Breton, and Leonius. The first made a Poem of Alexanders famous Exploits, which he intitled Alexandreides. Le Breton in imitation compos'd the Philippides containing the History of Philip Augustus; and Leonius made himself known by several Copies, which though not very long, are gentle and full of Wit. He was Canon of St. Victor.

I shall not set down all those whom in this Age the Church put into her number of Saints; but only the two Bernards, the one being the first Abbot of Tiron of St. Benet's Order, and the other Abbot of Clervaux, whose Wit and clear Judgment, his Zeal and Piety, his Conduct and Capacity in business of the greatest weight, made him appear with more luster then any other in his time. Three Institutors of new Religious Orders, Robert Abbot of Moleme, that of the Cisteaux, Stephen that of Grandmont, and Norbert that of Premonstre; Five Bishops, Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury, whom I place amongst the French, though he were a Native of the Valley d' Aust, because he Studied in France, and was Abbot of Bec; Peter Abbot of la Celle, then Bishop of Troyes; another Peter, Bishop of Poitiers; Aldebert de Brabant Bishop of Liege; and Godfrey, Bishop of Amiens.

They relate an action of this last which our times would sooner wonder at, then imitate. It was the Mode then, for such as would be Gallants, to wear long Hair, curled and tressed: this courageous Prelat one time refuses to admit any to the holy Table who came tricked up in that fashion; and that refusal put them to such shame and confusion, that they all cut it off themselves, chusing rather to lose that vain Ornament of their Heads, then the Comfort of eating the holy Bread of Angels. When he found them so well disposed, he admitted those as Men and Christians whom he before had turned away as dissolute Women, or Men wholly effeminated.

About the year 1180. the People Reverenced a certain Maiden as a Saint, whose name was Elpide or Alpaida, dwelling in the Village of Cudot, in the Diocess of Sens, who for Ten years together would swallow nothing but the Sacred Host; and though a simple Country Girl, had great light and knowledge of things Natural and Divine. This debility hapned after a severe fit of Sickness, which had turned all her Body into a corrupt and stinking purulent Matter extremely infected. I cannot say how long she survived after the year 1180. but there is yet to be seen in the Parochial Church of that place her Monument, and her Effigies also in Stone, which over-head is crowned with Flowers; The People of that Country assure us, That God by divers Miracles hath approved the Devotion they have towards her.

Lewis

Lewis VIII. King XLII.

POPE,

HONORIUS III. All along this Reign, and beyond it.LEWIS VIII. Surnamed the Lyon, and the Father of St. LEWIS, King XLII. Aged Thirty six years compleat.

Philip Augustus had not caused his Son to be Crowned in his Life-time, whether he had a jealousy of him, or thought his Family so well Establish'd that he had no need of such precaution to secure the Crown to him. He was therefore Crowned at Rheims with his Wife Blanch de Castile, the Tenth day of the Month of August.

The King of England did not assist at his Coronation as he ought to have done, in Quality of Pair of France: but sent Ambassadors to summon him according to the Oath he had made at London, to surrender Normandy to him with all those other Countries that had been taken from King John his Father. They receiv'd for Answer, That they had been Confiscated by Judgment of the Pairs, and that they pretended to have the remainder likewise which he held, so far were they from giving back what he demanded.

As the People of Languedoc did easily return again to their Natural Lord Raimond Earl of Toulouse, Amaury finding himself too weak to stay in those Countries, came and resigned and yielded up all the Right and Title he had into the hands of the King; who for Recompence made him High Constable.

It was then but an Employment, lasting no longer then the War; So that we sometimes find such Lords on whom it hath been conferr'd two or three several times.

Raimond Earl of Toulouse having made his Address to Pope Honorius with all imaginable submission, the Holy Father sent to his Legat to call a Council at Montpellier to reconcile him with the Church. After which Raimond before an Assembly of the Clergy in Languedoc, promis'd and sware entire Obedience to the Roman Church, sufficient security to the Clergy for restitution and the enjoyment of their Goods and Profits, and the extirpation of Hereticks throughout all his Country. Upon this satisfaction the Pope received him to Mercy, and owned him for Earl of Toulouse.

But as the resistance and opposition of his Subjects hindred him from making good his Promises, the Pope sent a Legat to the King, it was Romain a Cardinal that had the Title of St. Angelo, to persuade him to undertake that Expedition; which he did the more readily because it suited with his zeal and with his Interests.

The two Kings, Lewis of France, and Henry of Germany, eldest Son to the Emperor Frederic, had a Conference at Vaucouleurs, where they Treated about several Differences between the two Crowns, and made divers Propositions, but came to no conclusion.

At his return from thence, pursuant to a Resolution had been taken to drive the English wholly out of France, Lewis enters Poitou, gains a Battle there over Savary de Mauleon General of the English in Guyenne, makes himself Master of the Cities of Niort and of St. John d' Angely, and generally over all the Places even to the Garonne, and receives the Homage of all the Lords of those parts.

There was nothing left but Rochelle, where Savary de Mauléon defended himself for a long time expecting Relief from England. In fine, being basely disappointed and deceived by the King of England's Ministers who sent him Chests full of old Iron in stead of Silver to satisfy the Garison, he was forced to surrender the Town the 23th day of July; and afterwards pretending, whether true or false, that he had been Treated in England as a Person whose Faith they suspected, he quitted his old Master, and went to the King of France.

After the taking of that important City, the Kings to secure it the better to themselves, had as it were outwied each other, in gratifying it with many great Priviledges, by which means it was raised to a high pitch of Renown, for its Wealth and Liberty: but through their ill management of those Advantages, she hath utterly lost them all in these latter times.

The rest of Guyenne had been gained by the French, if Richard Brother to King Henry had not landed at Bordeaux with a great Army, which raised up the drooping Spirits. He took St. Macaire near Bordeaux by Storm: but La Reoule gave him a great Repulse; and being inform'd that the French Army was at the River Garonne, he Ship'd himself again and left order with Aimery Vicount de Touars to procure a Truce.

There wandred a certain Person about Flanders, near this time, who said he was that Baldwin Earl of Flanders, and Emperor of Constantinople, that had been taken Prisoner by the King of Bulgaria. He related how he made his escape out of Prison, and put them in mind of several Tokens and Circumstances to know him by. The Flemings who mightily loved Baldwin, gave Credit to this Man, and put him in possession of all Flanders.

The Countess Jane Daughter of Baldwin finding her self at a loss (for her Husband Ferrand was still a Prisoner at Paris) had recourse to the King, who sent word to this pretended Baldwin, that he should come to him at Peronne. He came boldly thither: but disdaining or not being able to answer the Questions put to him, which he must needs have known if he were not a Cheat, the King commanded him to depart his Territories within three days, and gave him a safe Conduct. Being afterwards forsaken by all the World, he endeavour'd to escape away in a disguise, but he was taken in Burgundy and carried to the Countess; who after she had made him undergo divers Tortures, sent him to the Gibbet as an Impostor. His Execution did not hinder malicious People from believing that the Daughter had chosen rather to hang her Father then to restore him to his Sovereignty.

1225.

This same year the King being in Touraine, the Legat went to him and obliged him to prolong the Truce with Aymery Vicount de Touars, the only Nobleman that opposed the King yet in Poitou. This Vicount shortly after came to Paris to render Hommage to the King in presence of the King of England's Ambassadors.

1226.

The City of Avignon having refused the Army passage, was besieged the 14th of June. It defended it self obstinately, Guy Count de Saint Pol one of the bravest of the Besiegers was slain there, the Plague got amongst the Soldiers, and the Earl of Champagne Mal-content went away without leave. The King nevertheless swore he would not decamp till he brought the Besieged to Reason; in so much that on the * Assumption-day they were reduced to a Capitulation. They gave up two hundred Hostages, their Walls were pull'd down, their Moats and Gratts fill'd up, and three hundred Houses with Turrets demolish'd. These were Inns belonging to Gentlemen, who had the like at Toulouze, and other great Cities in those Provinces.

* Our Lady-day in Har-vest.

Going thence, the King went into Provence, and all the Towns surrender'd to him within four Leagues of Toulouze. The Season growing bad, and he somewhat tender of Constitution, he takes his way back towards France, leaving the Conduct of his Forces and the Government of those Countries in the hands of Imbert de Beau-jeu.

1226.

Upon his return one of the Grandees of the Kingdom, whom History has not dar'd to name, caused some Poyson to be given him, whereof he died at the Castle of Montpencier in Auvergne, upon a Sunday being the Octave of All-Saints. He had lived Thirty nine years, and had Reigned three, and about four Months. He is buried at St. Denis by his Father.

1226.

The Clergy because of his Piety and his Chastity, reported that his Sickness proceeded from his too great Continence; (for his Wife did not go with him) and that he chose rather to dye then make use of an unlawful Remedy they presented him for Cure.

As he foresaw things in a posture that threatned great troubles after his death, he took the Oaths and Seals of Twelve Lords that were about him, that they should cause his eldest Son to be Crowned, and if he failed, they should put the Second in his stead.

By his Wife Blanche de Castille he had nine Sons and two Daughters; there were but five Sons alive, Lewis, Robert, Alphonso, Charles, and John. According to his Will and Testament Lewis Reigned, Robert had the County of Artois, and propagated the branch of that name; Alphonso had that of Poitou, and Charles that of Anjou. From him sprung the first Branch of Anjou; John dyed at the age of 14 years. Of the two Daughters, only Isabella was left, who having been promised to divers Princes, and grown to be an old Maid, took on the Holy vail, and shut her self up the year 1260. in the Monastery of Lougechamp, between Paris and St. Cloud, which the King her Brother founded for her.

Vacancy of Thirty five Months, from Dec. in the year 1268. the Cardinals not agreeing amongst themselves in the Conclave, about the Election.

in Novembre.

THIS is the Third Minority in the Capetine Race; and the First wherein a Woman had the Regency. Blanche de Castille a stranger, but courageous and able; undertook it, and carried it, being assisted by the Counsels of Romain, the Cardinal Legat, who had great power with her, and grounded upon the Certificates of some Lords, who attested that her Husband being on his Death-bed, had ordered that he would have his eldest Son with the Kingdom, and all his other Brothers, be left to her Guardianship and Government.

1226.

Immediately before the Lords had time to contrive any obstacles to her Regency, she drew all the Forces she possibly could together, and with them, went and caused her eldest Son Lewis, to be Crowned in the City of Rheims. The Episcopal See being vacant, the Bishop of Soissons, who is the Suffragant, performed the Ceremony. It was on the First day of December.

The Lords of the Kingdom had been invited thither by Letters, but the greatest part refused to come; amongst others, Peter Duke of Bretagne, Henry Earl of Bar his Brother-in-law, Hugh de Luzignan, Earl de la Marche, Thibault Earl of Champagne, Hugh de Chastillon, Count de St. Pol, and divers others. They were framing a League amongst them, demanding, that the Regent who was a Stranger, should give security for her good Administration, that whatever had been taken from the Lords during the two last Reigns, should be restored to them, and such as were prisoners should be released, especially Ferrand Earl of Flanders.

After her departure from Rheims, notwithstanding the severity of the Winter, she marched towards Bretagne, where lay the strength of the League. The Confederates being not yet ready, avoided what mischief they could by a Retreat; but she followed so close at their heels, that the Earl of Champagne fell off from the party; party; then the others entered into a Treaty, and promised to appear in full Parliament, which was to be held at Chinon, and which at their request was removed to Tours, then to Vendosme.

In that Parliament which was held in the Month of March, a Peace was patched up between the Regent and the Lords; but the same year they being assembled at Corbeil, plotted to surprize the King as he was coming from Chaftres to Paris; their design had infallibly succeeded, if the Queen Regent had not been informed, and cast her self with the King into Montlebery. The Citizens of Paris having taken up Arms, went thither to guard him, and brought him back with joyful acclamations to their City.

The Earl of Champagne was the man that had given this private intelligence to the Queen. This young Prince had a pretence of Love or Gallantry for her, rather out of some Court-like vanity, then for the power of her charms, she being a Woman of above Forty years of age; she knew how to make her own advantage of his folly, and wished him to continue amongst those discontented People, that he might betray all their intrigues to her.

The King of England would needs concern himself in this quarrel, and promised them his assistance; and the Earl of Toulouze taking his opportunity, during these Brouilleries and Stirs, had got possession again of all his Places. The Queen Regent fearing this Flame might be blown too high, renew'd a Treaty with the Princes of this League, whom by that means she kept from farther proceeding all this year; and in the mean while, she confirm'd the Alliance with the Emperour Frederick, made a Truce with the English for a Twelve-month, and came to an agreement with the Duke of Bretagne, who gave his Daughter to be Married to a Son of hers, named John.

Thus the Earl of Toulouze was left alone. Imbert de Beau-jeu having received a notable re-inforcement, bethought himself, instead of taking the Castles one by one, it would do better to spoil and ruine the whole Countrey about Toulouze, pull down the Houses, root up the Vineyards, and burn the Corn; which so disheartned the Toulousains, that both they and their Earl, were forced to submit to what conditions he pleased.

The Treaty was chalked out at Meaux, and compleated at Paris, the Earl and Deputies of Toulouze being present: The Earl was deprived of all his Lands, excepting some little fragments they for meer pity left him. It was order'd they should all devolve to his Daughter Jane, who should be Married to Alphonso the Kings Brother, into whose custody she was put forthwith; That the Earl should pay Seventeen thousand Marks of Silver, part to the King, some to the Monks of Cîteaux, and the rest for a Foundation of Doctors in Divinity at Toulouze; That the Walls of that City, and of Thirty more should be demolish'd; for performance whereof he should give Hostages, and in the mean time remain prisoner; That there should be an exact search after Heretiques, at his charge; and that for penance he should go and make war five years against the Saracens.

These Articles Signed, he and those of his company that had been Excommunicated, were at Notre-dames of Paris upon Good-Friday bare-footed, in their Shirts, to receive Absolution of the Popes Legat. That done, the Earl returned prisoner to the Tower of the Louvre, till he had given his Hostages. About the Feast of Pentecost the King gave him the Order of Knighthood, and sent him into his own Countrey. The Legat went with him, and settled the Inquisition, which exercised great severities, and was again the cause of many troubles and Massacres.

The Male-contented could not digest that the Government should be in the hands of two Strangers, a Spanish Woman and an Italian Cardinal; they therefore took up Arms again, drew to their party, Robert Earl of Dreux, elder Brother to the Duke of Bretagne, and Philip Earl of Boulogne, the Kings paternal Uncle, to whom they promised the Crown: so that the King feared a second time to be involved by this conspiracy, and had been surprized, if the Earl of Champagne had not run seasonably to him with 300 Horse-men to bring him off.

In Spring the Conspirators turned all their Force against the Earl of Champagne and Brie. They demanded those Counties of him for Alix Queen of Cyprus, Daughter of his Uncle Henry, who died in the Levant; and more then that, called him Traytor, and accused him of having poysonned the deceased King, proffering to convict him by Duel; a reproach that made him so black and loathsome amongst his Vassals, that they joyned in League with his Enemies against him.

They were called Milites.

The Count finding so heavy a burthen on his Shoulders, and his City of Troyes besieged, implores the assistance of the Queen Regent, who caused the King to march to his relief, and commanded them, if they had anything to say against the Earl, they should come and require justice upon him in her Court.

But they who would not acknowledge her Regency, as if the Kingdom had been vacant, elected in a private Assembly or Cabal, the Lord de Coney for King, who was in great reputation for his Wisdom and Justice. The Queen Regent having got intelligence, gave immediate notice of it to Philip Earl of Boulogne, whom they had made believe they would give the Crown to: by this means she took him off from them, then by divers politique contrivances made all their designs vanish, but not their ill intentions.

1228. For a few days afterwards the Duke of Bretagne, by their assistance and Councils, took up Arms again, and called the King of England to his aid, who landed in Bretagne with considerable Forces: but when he saw the King, conducted by the Queen Regent, had taken the Castle de Belesme au Perche from the Duke, which was held impregnable: he Shipp'd himself again. The Duke thus abandoned, was constrained to betake himself to an agreement.

1229. The very next year he broke it, but not without punishment: the King having taken all his Holds and Places, and gained all his Vassals and Friends, shuts him up in his City of Nantes; so that to get out of the Briars, and make the best of a bad bargain, he was forced to render him homage of Allegiance for the Dutchy. The Bretons, who pretended they owed but only single Homage, named him, because of his so doing, Man-clerc, as who should say, Witless, or wanting Judgment and Understanding.

Thibault Earl of Champagne was ill rewarded for the good services he had done the Queen Regent. She took in hand the cause of her Cousin Alix, and condemned him to pay her Forty thousand Marks of Silver, and sell to the King to raise that Money, the Counties of Blois, Chartres, Sancerre, and the Vicount of Chasteaudun.

1230. After all these disorders, there was a calm and peace for four years, which was only a little disturbed by some tumults, caused by the remainders of the Albigensis, and the hurly-burly of the Scholars belonging to the University of Paris. It was then the fairest Ornament of the Kingdom, and the innumerable numbers of Scholars that flocked thither from all parts of Europe, brought great riches to that City, which in a manner made all the other Universities in Christendom submit to it. Now some of them having been ill handled in some scuffle with the Citizens, and not obtaining such satisfaction as they desired; they all resolved to quit Paris; not without having first published a great many Songs, and Licentious Poems, which sullied the reputation of the Queen Regent, and Cardinal Romain the Popes Legat, who swayed her. The Duke of Bretagne and the King of England proffer'd to receive them into their Countries, and to grant them great privileges; but the Kings Council fearing that capital City might be deprived of so great an advantage and benefit, found means to allay their heats, and keep them there.

The Inhabitants of Marcellis, and the adjacent Countreys being revolted against Raimond Berenger, Earl of Provence, called in Raimond, Earl of Toulouse to Command them, because he was next Heir; For we must know that Gilbert Earl of Provence and Nice, had had two Daughters, Faidide, who Married Alphonso, Great, Great, Grandfather of Raimond de Toulouse, and Douce that had married Raimond Berenger, Earl of Bacelonna, from whom was descended the Earl of Provence now mentioned.

He therefore accepted of their Homage, and acted as their Lord, whence follow'd a War that lasted four years between those two Cousins.

This Earl of Provence having been harass'd by divers Revolts, and other misfortunes, was at the end of his days, made compleatly happy, by the Marriage of four Daughters he had by his Wife Beatrix of Savoy, a most Virtuous Princess. For all four of them had the honour to be Married to Kings: Margret, who was the eldest, was the most happy, being joyned this year to Lewis King of France, a Prince that was much greater by his Virtues than his Crown.

The same year the Earl of Champagne, it is not said for what cause, fell again into Rebellion, for which he was punished with the loss of his Cities of Montereau-Faut-Tonne, Bray, and Nogent upon the Seine. These losses did not make him much wiser, he persisted still in his foolish passion for the Queen who had ruin'd him, and retired to his Castle of Provins to write Verses and Songs, for entertainment of his amorous Dotage.

Never-

Nevertheless he was soon diverted by the death of Sancho VIII. called the Strong, King of Navarre, who dying without any Males, left the Kingdom to him as the next Heir and Son of his Daughter * Blanch. So he went and took possession, and transported a great number of Husbandmen from his Lands in Brie and Champagne, who improved, and made that Countrey very fertile and populous.

The Countrey of Artois was erected to an Earldom * Pairrie, in favour of Robert the Kings Brother, on whom his Father had bestow'd it by his Will. Some place this erection in the time of Philip Augustus. However it were, I think we may be confident it is the first of that nature.

At the solicitation of Pope Gregory (who had as well a quarrel to the Emperour Frederick's Forces, his Enemy declar'd, they being in possession of the remainder of the Kingdom of Jerusalem, as to the Saracens) there was a great Crusado of French Lords, over whom the new King of Navarre was made Chief. But these Adventurers had no better success than all the rest; for the ill conduct of these new Soldiers of the Cross, and their Divisions, brought the whole Army almost to ruine, and most part of the Officers and Commanders were slain there, or taken prisoners.

Peter, Duke of Burgundy died in his return from this Expedition, his only Son John, Surnamed Rufus succeeded him. The affairs of Constantinople were no whit better; the Emperour Baldwin comes into France to beg assistance against the Greeks, and for a great sum of Money, sold the Crown of Thorns wherewith our Saviour was Crowned, the Spung, and the Lance, which pierced his Side, to St. Lewis the King, who put them into his Treasury of Reliques in the Holy Chappel, which he had purposely built in his own Palace.

It was now about three years that all the Doctors both Seculars and Regulars of the Sacred Faculty of Divinity at Paris (which was then almost the only School for that Science, and as it were the perpetual Council of the Gallican Church) had resolv'd the question, and were all agreed upon this judgment in a famous Assembly, and after mature deliberation and discussion, that one and the same Ecclesiastical person could in Conscience hold but one Benefice at one time.

This year 1238. William III. Bishop of Paris, held another Assembly of the same Faculty in the Chapter of the Jacobins, where it was unanimously concluded, That one could not, without forfeiture of Eternal Happiness, possess two Benefices at the same time, provided one of them were of the value only of Fifteen Liures * parisis; per annum. There were none but Philip, Chancellor of the University, and Arnold, afterwards Bishop of Amiens, who were obstinately resolv'd to hold their own. The First when he lay on his Death-bed, being earnestly desired, and pressed home by the Bishop William, to discharge himself of that burden which would sink him down to Hell; replied, That he would try whether that were true. How few are to be seen in these days that do not chuse to run the same hazard, or are not troubled that they cannot have the opportunity of such a Trial? But it does not appear so great a risque to them, since the Popes give Dispensations.

The quarrels between Pope Gregory IX. and the Emperour Frederic growing hot, to all extremity of Outrages on either side. Gregory sent to St. Lewis King of France, to proffer him the Empire for his Brother Robert, Earl of Artois. The Lords assembled by the King, upon a proposition so important, did not approve that violent proceeding, and said it was sufficient for Robert, that he was Brother to a King, who was more excellent in Dignity and Nobility, than any Emperour whatever.

The Albigensis could not submit themselves to the Orders of the Inquisition; Trincavel, Son of the Vicount de Beziers, and five or six Lords of the Countrey, putting themselves at the head of them, they seized upon Carcassonne, and some other places, and ran into some parts belonging to the King, in hostile manner. He presently sent some Forces thither, Commanded by John Earl of Beaumont, who drove them out from Carcassonne, and besieged them in Mont-real: where after they had held some time, they made their capitulation, by means of the Earls of Foix and Toulouse.

The old de la Montagne, so they named the Prince of the Assassins, a People that occupied the mountainous Canton of Syria, had dispatched two of his Murtherers into France to kill the King: but soon after, I cannot say by what motive, he repented, and countermanded them by some others; who before they could find them out, adverted the King to have a care of himself.

This old de la Montagne bred up great numbers of young Youths, in pleasant and delicious Palaces, and the hopes of an Eternal Felicity in the other World, if they obey'd his Commands blindfold; and to make them the more capable, and fit to execute his bloody Will in all Countreys, he made them learn all Languages.

1239.

The interests of the Pope and the Emperour were not at all compatible together; and therefore Frederick and Honorius, and then Gregory IX. who succeeded Honorius, fell necessarily into discords, and afterwards into mortal hatred. Gregory lets fly the Thunder-bolts of the Church against Frederick, and his Legat having called the Prelats of France together at Meaux, order'd several of them to go to Rome to hold a Council, where they pretended to degrade that Emperour.

He complained to the King, desired him not to permit his Bishops to go out of France; and his desire not taking effect, he caused them to be way-laid, and watch'd at Sea, and having taken them, distributed them in divers prisons. Then in his turn, he for a while slighted the Kings intercession for their release; which thing made some alteration in that good correspondence, that for some time had continued between France and the Empire.

In the year 1240. The King having assembled the flower of the Barons, and the Knights of his Kingdom at Sammur, gave the Girdle of Knighthood to his Brother Alphonso, (whose Marriage had a little before been compleated with Jane, Daughter and Heiress of the Earl of Toulouse) and also gave him the Counties of Poitou and Auvergne, and all that had been conquer'd in Languedoc upon the Albigensis.

"These years, the Tartars made cruel irruptions; amongst others, one in Hungary; under the Command of Bath, who was one of their Generals; and one in Russia, Poland, and Silesia; whither they were conducted by another of their Generals, who was named Pera.

"These Barbarians were Scythians, Originaries, between the Caspian Sea, and Mount Imaus. Some make them descended from the Ten Tribes of the Hebrews, who were transferr'd by the King of Affyria into those Countreys, and derive their Name from the Hebrew Word, which signifies Forfaken. Others derive it from the River Tatar, which ran thorough their Countrey, and say it was given to the whole Nation of the Mogles, composed of seven principal People, of which they made one: They were Tributaries, and as we say, Slaves to a Christian Nestorian Prince, whose Kingdom was in the Indies; he was called Prefter-John. But Clugis, or Tzingis-Chan set that Nation free about the end of the last age, ruined the States of Prefter-John, and founded a very great Kingdom out of it; from whence divers Colonies went forth and settled in other Countreys * even in some parts of Europe.

The Earl of Toulouse sought out all means, underhand, to repair the shameful Treaty he had made with the King: and therefore he consulted, and contrived with James King of Arragon, who was come to Montpellier, and with the Earl of Provence, though he were the Kings Father-in-law, to Dissolve his Marriage with Sanchia, the Arragonians Aunt, upon pretence of Parentage, that he might Marry the Daughter of the Earl of Provence, and that his Daughter Jane, whom he had perforce given to the Earl of Poitou, might not be his Heiress. An example that proves; to any that might doubt, that amongst Great ones, Honour, Parentage, Alliance and Conscience does easily give way and stoop to their Interest and Humour.

Hugh, Count de la Marche, to his misfortune, had Married Isabella, the Widow of King John, who had formerly ravished her from him. This Womans pride would not suffer him to do Homage to Alphonso, the new Earl of Poitou; the King undertook to compel him, and on a suddain took several of his Towns, and demolish'd them; amongst others, Fontenay, where his Brother Alphonso was wounded with an Arrow.

The King of Englands assistance in behalf of his Mother, was too slow; he and his Brother Richard landed in the River of Burdeaux. The Earl de la Marche had assured them, that all Poitou would rise and joyn with them upon their arrival: but as his promise failed, their courage failed too; the King falls upon them at the Bridge of Taillebourg, fighting desperately in person, making them retreat as far as Xaintes, and from thence to Blaye. The Earl and his proud Dame, being forced to forget she had been a Queen, found no safety but at the Kings Feet. They experimented his Goodness was as great as his Courage; and although she had suborn'd Rascals to Murder him, who had been discover'd, and punished, he pardon'd both her and her Husband, keeping only two or three of their Places in his hands, till he was better assured of their Obedience.

"Italy

"Italy was horribly shatter'd by the Factions of the Guelphs and Gibelins. The First held for the Pope, the others for the Emperour.

1243.

"The jealousy betwixt the Franciscans and the Dominicans, which had its Birth almost with their Orders, encreased likewise proportionably with their growth; Infomuch that the Pope, who stood in need of them, and the King St. Lewis, who cherished them, found it no little trouble to distribute their favours equally, and hold the ballance so even, that they should have no cause to take advantage of each other.

"But both of them took much over all other Religions Orders, whom they despised as more imperfect, and not only set a value upon themselves for their Divinity, wherein sometimes they were so meely notional, and over-subtil as it appeared very near to error, but likewise took upon them the functions of ordinary Pastors, drawing the grists of Alms, pious Legacies, and Burials of rich people to their own Mills, concerning themselves in the directing of Consciences, and the administration of the Sacraments, to the prejudice of the Hierarchy, who from that time hath ever been contending with them to maintain her authority.

The Holy See having been vacant near twenty Months, Innocent IV. was elected. He was thought to be a friend to Frederick; but whether that Emperour had not used him well, or what else it were, he followed the steps of his Predecessors, and began to quarrel with him upon the same score of differences. The feud grew so hot, that Frederick being the stronger in Italy, Innocent went thence, that he might with more safety let fly his Thunder against him, and came into France, where being arrived in December this year 1244. he called a Council at Lyons, for the year following.

In the year 1228. the Emperour Frederick being constrained by the threats of Pope Gregory, was gone into the Holy-Land, where by his Reputation rather than his Sword, he had so contrived it, that the Sultan had given him up the City of Jerusalem, but dismantled, with part of the Holy-Land. The Pope not satisfied with that agreement, had afterwards procured other Adventurers to go, who broke the Truce aforesaid, to the great damage of the Christians; who being mightily weakened; it hapned Ann. 1244. that the Chorasmians, a People drove out of Persia by the Tartars; others say of Arabia, fell upon the Holy-Land, laid it all waste, ruined all the Holy places of Jerusalem, and drowned them in the Blood of Christians.

This news was brought to St. Lewis whilst he was fallen sick at Pontoise, towards the end of December. All those that were about him, despairing of his Life, he made a vow to God, if he restored him to health, that he would go in person to make war against those Infidels: and in truth, being recover'd, he took the Cross from the hands of the Legat, but could not so soon accomplish his pious design.

The Council of Lyons was open'd the Monday after St. John Baptists Feast, in the Abbey de St. Just; and from thence transferr'd to the Cathedral Church of St. Johns. The Emperour Baldwin, the Earl Raimond de Toulouse, and Berenguer de Provence were present there, these two soliciting for the dispensation, that Raimond might Marry with Beatrice, the youngest Daughter of Berenguer: but the Kings of France, and of England, and Richard Earl of Cornwal, who had Married the other three Sisters, hindred the Grant of it.

The Emperour Frederick having quitted his Affairs of Italy to come there, and having in the mean time sent his Ambassadors thither before, received tidings when he was got to Turin, that the Pope and the Fathers had Excommunicated him, with Candles extinguished; and degraded him for divers things imposed upon him: amongst others, That he detained the Church-Lands, That he had intelligence with the Saracens; That he erred in divers Articles of Faith, 1245.

After this deposition all his Affairs crumbled to nothing in an instant. The Milaneses beat him, the other Christian Princes took an aversion for him as an impious person; even the Germans, (that they may not reproach the French for contributing to ruine the Empire) rejected him, and for King of the Romans, elected Henry VII. Landgrave of Hesse and Turingia; when as the King in an interview he had with the Pope at Clugny, endeavour'd to make up the breach, by an agreement betwixt this unfortunate Emperour, and the Roman Church, by virtue of a Procurator he had from him.

1245.

This year 1245. died Raimond Berenguer, Earl of Provence, having by his Testament constituted Beatrice his fourth Daughter, his Heiress. James King of Arragon caused some Forcesto march into Provence, to secure so good a party for his Son. But the King of France did not intend to let a stranger run away with such a prize; He 1245.

He therefore drove the Arragonians out of that Countrey, and by consent of the Daughter, as well as her Mother, and her Uncles the Earl of Savoy, and the Arch-Bishop of Lyons, he so order'd it, that she was promised to her Brother Charles, who was Earl of Anjou. The Marriage was not consummated till the year following.

1245. The same year on the First of December, died also Jane, Countess of Flanders without having had any Children by her Second Husband Thomas, Earl of Savoy, no more then by her First, who was Ferrand of Portugal; her Sister Margaret succeeded her.

This Margret had had Children by two Husbands, John and Baldwin by Bouchard d' Avesue her first Husband, and William, John and Guy, by William de Dampierre her Second. These pretended, that the Sons of Bouchard ought not to inherit, because it had been discover'd that he was in Holy Orders when he married their Mother; and for that reason the Marriage was declared null.

1246. Those of the first Bed observing the Mother favoured the others, had recourse to the King. He sent both parties to a Parliament at Peronne, and therein it was ordained, that those of the first Bed should have Hainault, and the others should have Flanders.

1246. The pretended King of the Romans, Henry Landgrave of Hesse, being dead in Battle, or of sickness; the Germans, who persisted obstinately, under the pretence of Riety, to ruin the dignity of the Empire; elected the year following, William Earl of Holland, potent in Friends and Alliances, whilst Frederic was struggling with his misfortunes, and his enemies in Italy.

1247. and 48. The Duke of Burgundy and some French Lords were Leagued with him to defend the Liberties of their Countreys, against the usurpations of the Court of Rome; being supported by this League, he leaves Lombardy to come to Lyons, whether to invest the Pope, or to mollify him by his Prayers: but he was recalled by a blow the Milanese had given his bastard Son Entius, whom he had left in Parma.

These Affairs, and the great preparations for War, detained the King till the month of May of this year, from accomplishing the Vow he had made three years before. It cannot be written in Characters so great as it deserves, how this pious King being perswaded that Sovereigns are responsible by Laws, both Divine and Humane, for all the miscarriages of their Officers, caused it to be published thorow all his Kingdom, that whoever had suffer'd any wrong or damage by any belonging to him, should make it known, and he would give them satisfaction out of his own State; which was performed punctually.

That done, and having taken leave of the Holy Martyr, and given the Regency to the Queen his Mother, he quitted Paris, being conducted out of the City by all the Orders in Procession: He took his two Brothers Robert and Charles with him, the Queen his Wife, theirs, and an infinite number of Princes, Lords, Prelats, and Gentlemen. He received the Popes Benediction in his passage thorough Lyons, thence he descended by the Rhone, and going on board at Aigues-mortes in Languedoc, the 25th of August, set sail two days after, and landed happily in Cyprus the 25th of September, where he past the Winter, to wait for the rest of his Forces and Ammunition.

In this Island he received at the beginning of December, Letters from Ercathay, one of the chief Chams of the Tartars, and soon after arrived Ambassadors from the King of Armenia. Ercathay sent him word how the Great Cham, and a good number of his Captains had embraced Christianity, and that he had sent him with a great Army to destroy the Sultan of Baldac, or Bagdet, the most potent of all the Mahometan Princes. The Armenian Ambassadors assured him that this news was true, and that their King had vanquished, with the assistance of the Tartars; the Sultan of Iconia or Cogny, to whom they were tributary, and cast off the yoke of those Infidels.

1249. The Saturday after the Ascension, the Holy King having drawn all his Men together from their Winter Quarters in the Island of Cyprus, and received a new reinforcement, brought him by Robert Duke of Burgundy, came the fourth of June into the Road before Damiata in Egypt. The Saracens expected him in good order upon the Shore; he landed in despite of them, and made them give way. They being well beaten, so great a fear seized upon them, that the next day they forsook the Town, after they had set fire to it in several places, and carried off in Boats beyond the River Nilus, all their Families, and the richest of their Goods.

The

The overflowing of the Nile, which infallibly begins some days before the Summer Solstice, hindered the Army from going on at the same time, to take the City of Grand-Cairo, and kept them almost till the midst of Autumn, in so much idleness, as brought them into all manner of debauchery and dissoluteness.

In the Month of September, Alphonso the Kings Brother arrived with new Adventurers of the Cross. Raimond his Father-in-law, who had accompanied him as far as Aigues-Mortes, where he took Shipping with his Wife, died upon his way home in the Town of Millau in Rouergue, giving all the demonstrations of a hearty Repentance. He was the last of the Earls of Toulouse, who had Ruled over the greatest part of Languedoc above 350 years. His Daughter Jane being deceased without any Child by her Husband Alphonso, his Lordships were re-united to the Crown, in pursuance of the Treaty made in the year One thousand two hundred twenty eight.

The 20th of November, the pious King parted from Damiata, and marched against the Saracens, who had drawn all their Forces about the City of Massoura. He encamped on an arm of the Nilus, formerly called Canopus, and in those times the Raschit, which was not foordable; whilst this was doing, their Sultan, named Melidin happened to dye, and till his Son could come, they gave the Command to the most valiant of his Emirs or Sarapes, who was Farchardin.

In fine, the French having passed over the Raschit, gained in two several days two Battles against the Infidels, wherein St. Lewis, animated with a Sampson-like Spirit and Zeal, did prodigious acts of Valour; but in the first which was fought in February, his Brother Robert was slain, pursuing too inconsiderately the flying enemy thorough the City of Massoura.

The Christians Army being Encamped near to Pharamia, to refresh themselves, Melec-Sala, the Son of Meledin, arrives with another Army which he had obtained of the several Sultans of his Religion, wherewith he beset the Christians, stopping up all passages by which they were to receive Provisions, that hunger, and the distemper, now call'd the Scurvy or Scorbut, reduc'd them to a miserable condition. In this extremity it was resolv'd to lead them back to Damiata; but it proved too late, the Army was utterly defeated in their march, and the King taken prisoner with his other two Brothers Alphonso and Charles, and almost all the Officers; there were but very few of his who escaped from captivity or death. This misfortune hapned the 5th day of April.

To this grief of the good King's, the Barbarian Conquerours added an outrage, which touched him yet more sensibly, than either the loss of his Army or his Liberty. They scourged a Crucifix before him, defiled it with spitting upon it, and dragg'd it thorough the Mire. However, the Sultan Melec-Sala took a particular care of his person, so that he restor'd him to his health again. He also agreed a ten years Truce with him; but thereupon, being murder'd by his Emirs, the King was likewise in great danger of perishing in the same storm of rage; notwithstanding him whom they elected for Sultan (he was named Turquemir) preserved him, and confirm'd the Treaty.

By those Articles they gave both him and all the Christian Captives their liberty, with leave to carry away with them all their equipage: they agreed to a Truce for Ten years, and left them all they held beside in the Holy Land, upon condition they surrendred Damiata, and should set free the Saracen Slaves, and give them 400000. Liures ready Money. It is remarkable, that this generous King not enduring they should set a price upon his Person, would needs have that sum to be the ransom for the rest, and the City of Damiata for his; and having notice that upon payment of the said Moneys, the Saracens had mis-told, and taken less then was agreed by a great deal, he sent them the remainder immediately.

It is a Fable that he should give a consecrated Host to those Barbarians for security of his Word: He would have exposed himself a thousand times to death, rather then have deliver'd up his God, to those impious enemies. It is true indeed, that they afterwards coined Moneys, with a Pix stamped upon it, and the Sacred Host over it, and that the same Figures were wrought in some pieces of their Tapistries; and to this day there are the Figures of some Chalice Graved or Carved about the Walls of Damascus, or Damur; perhaps they meant to let the World know by these means, and preserve the memory of it to future ages, what Victories they had obtained against the Christians, and how they had led their God in Triumph.

Qq

1250.

The Sum paid, and Damiata restored, the King and Princes were deliver'd, and imbarquing upon some Gallies belonging to Genova, landed at the Port of Acon: but for the rest of the prisoners, such as were sick, being in great numbers, were knock'd at head, and the remainders constrain'd to pay a new Ransom, or to renounce.

"It hath been said, that the Barbarians put out the Eyes of Three hundred Gentle-men; and that in memory of those Noble Martyrs, that St. Lewis some years afterwards, Founded the Hospital des * quinze-vingts at Paris; but this is no whit mentioned in the Grant or Writings for this Foundation; and I find far before this time, that a Norman Duke built one of the very same sort at Rouen, only it was for maintenance but of One hundred blind People.

* Or Fifteen score.

Of above 30000 Fighting Men who follow'd him in this Expedition, there were hardly Six thousand remaining; too scanty a number for any Enterprize. Notwithstanding upon the Christians earnest intreaties who belonged to those Countreys, and because he knew those Barbarians would break the Truce as soon as ever he were gone, he resolv'd to stay some time; and in the interim sent his Brothers Alphonso and Charles home into France.

"Whilst the Emperour Frederic was again drawing his Sword to be revenged on the Pope, he died at Firenze the 13th of December, perhaps stifled or poison'd by Mainfroy, one of his Bastard Sons. He left the Empire and Germany to his eldest Son Conrad, to Frederic his Grandson, issue of his eldest Son Henry, the Dukedom of Austria, and to the above-named Mainfroy, the Principality of Tarentum. But all that Race was extinct in a few years, for having, say some, opposed the Holy Sec.

1251.

"When Pope Innocent had heard of the death of Frederic, he went from Lyons, where he had staid Six years and a half, to return again to Rome.

1251.

Upon the news of the pious Kings imprisonment, a certain Apostate Monk, by name Master Hungary, pretending, and affirming he had a particular Mission from God, went picking up all the young Countrey fellows over the whole Kingdom, to go, said they, and deliver their Prince, and the Holy Land. These new Brothers of the Cross were called * Pastoraux, i. e. Shepherds, or Graziers.

* Pastors.

The Bandits, Robbers, Heretiques, and all manner of wicked rascally people lifted themselves in this crew; who took the liberty to commit all manner of disorders, especially against the Clergy, and against the Jews. The Inhabitants of Berry, with the Nobility, fell upon them and routed them; some of them were hanged, afterwards this rabble was dispers'd and vanish'd to nothing.

1252.

Queen Blanch afflicted for the absence of the good King her dear Son, and for the sickness of her other Son Alphonso, who seemed incurable, ended her days at Melun the Six and twentieth of November, aged above Sixty and five years. Her Son having founded the Monastery of Maubuisson, of the Order des Citeaux for her; She was conveyed thither in great pomp, upon the Shoulders of the chief Nobility of the Court, sitting in a Golden Chair, her Face bare, being clothed in her Royal Robes over her Religious Habit of that Order, which she had taken some time before her death, being besides, and long before that time, of the third Order of St. Francis, according to the Devotion of those times.

Some modern Historians are much in doubt, whether she were elder or younger than Berenguelle, who was Married to Alphonso, King of Leon. This had the Guardianship of her Brother Henry, and that Prince being dead, succeeded to the Kingdom of Castille; but some have believed that it was by Usurpation upon Blanch her Sister, who was then a great way off from that Countrey: and they go upon this ground, that amongst the Records, they find Letters from nine Castilian Lords to Lewis VIII. in which they own and acknowledge his Son for their * King, and say, that Alphonso IX. King of Castille, had declared by his Will, that in case his Son Henry died without any Heirs, the Children of Blanch were to succeed by right of Inheritance: but to tell the truth, it does not follow from thence, that Blanch was the eldest; it is more probable that these discontented Lords grounded it upon this, that Alphonso and Berenguelle being of kin, within the degrees prohibited, Pope Innocent III. had declared their Marriage to be null, and the Children that should proceed from that conjunction * incestuous, Bastards, and incapable to succeed: So that upon their exclusion, those of Blanch came to the succession of Alphonso IX. their Grand-father: and this is it that gave a Right to the Kings of France, which they held a long time to the Kingdom of Castille.

* That is, St. Lewis.

* Vide the Letters of Innocent III. Printed at Colen.

Some

"Some Months before the death of Blanch, there arose a sharp contest between the Secular Doctors of Theology at Paris, whereof William de St. Amour was as it were the Head; and on the other part the Orders Mendicants of Preaching Friars, and Friars Minors: because those Monks as the others, reproached them, were so far from submitting to the Statutes and Discipline of the University, that they aimed to make themselves the Masters.

1252.

"The thing was obstinately debated five or six years together, St. Amour got the better at Paris, but the Dispute being transferr'd to Rome, he was worsted, and his Book was condemned, not as Heretical, but as scandalizing those good Fathers. They had great credit in that Court, and obtained great Privileges with so much the more facility; as their trampling on the Laws increased the power of the Doctor, and diminished that of the Bishops, to whose prejudice they were granted.

"About the beginning of this quarrel, Robert de Sorbonne, Doctor in Divinity, and very highly esteemed by St. Lewis, built the Colledge of the 1000 Masters of SORBONNE; under which Name the Vulgar are wont to comprehend all the Faculty of Theology of Paris. In effect, it is the most renowned of all those Colledges.

In the year 1253. died Thibault, who was the Fifth of that Name, as Earl of Champagne, but only the First, as King of Navarre. His Successor in all his Estates, was Thibault II. or VI. aged Fourteen years, under the Guardianship of his Mother.

Conrad the Son of Frederic did not find himself strong enough in Germany, to cope against William Earl of Holland, pretended King of the Romans: he was gone into Italy in the year 1251. and some time after, having unhappily caused his Nephew Frederic to be strangled, had seized upon his Treasure, and upon his Kingdom of Sicilia. But this year 1254. was himself poison'd by Mainfroy, to whom, not knowing he was the Author of his death, he left the Regency of the Kingdom, and the Guardianship of his Son Conrad the Young, vulgarly named Conradin, aged but Three years.

It was near Six years since St. Lewis the King went out of France, and Three years and a half that he had been in the Holy Land, visiting the Holy Places with an incredible Devotion, fortifying the Towns, and reviving the courage and affairs of the Christians in those Countreys, as much as possibly he could.

1254.

France destitute of any Pilot by the death of his Mother, most earnestly desired his return. He therefore took Shipping at the Port of Acon, or Ptolemais, on St. Marks Eve, and landed at Marseilles the Eleventh day of July.

1254.

The King of England, who was this year come into Gascongne, desiring to avoid the long voyage by Sea, obtained leave of the good King to cross thorough France, and take Shipping at Boulogne. He met the King at Chartres, who from thence took him along to Paris, where he Treated him Four days together with all the magnificence imaginable. The joy and splendor was the greater, because the four Sisters, Daughters of the Earl of Provence, the eldest Married to the King of France, the Second to the King of England, the Third to Richard his Brother, and the Fourth to Charles, Earl of Anjou, met all there together.

"William Earl of Holland, and King of the Romans, making War against the Frieze-landers, who were Rebels to him, had lately been knocked on the Head by certain Peasants hid amongst the Reeds, when his Horse was sunk into the Snow and Ice. The following year being 1256. the Electors basely selling the Honour of the German Nation, and their Votes, to Foreign Princes, gave the Empire some of them to Richard, Brother to the King of England, others to Alphonso X. King of Castille. Richard went into Germany, and sojourn'd there above two years, having been Crowned at Aix la Chapelle in the year 1247. Alphonso was no way known to them but by his Money, and both of them disputed their Right and Title before the Pope for divers years, without eve coming to any agreement.

The Son of Bouchard d'Avesnes, cast out by Guy Earl of Flanders, and their Brothers of the Second Bed by the same Mother, took Sanctuary with William Earl of Holland, who had vanquish'd Guy, and taken him prisoner with one of his Brothers. The Mother to be reveng'd, had called in Charles, Earl of Anjou, and given him the enjoyment of Hainault and Valenciennes during his life.

Here again those Countreys easily enough from the Hollander, because he found him fully enough employ'd against the Frisons, where he was kill'd, as we have related. His Son Florent who succeeded him, set the two Brothers at liberty for a great Ransom; and St. Lewis obliged his Brother Charles to restore Hainault for a sum of Money, as likewise the parties concern'd, to stand to the award he had made in Anno 1246.

There being an universal calme thorough all his Kingdom, he set himself upon the regulating it by good and wholesome Laws, the banishing from it all violence and oppression, the instructing others by his good examples and by all manner of Just and Holy Works, undertaking the protection of the Weak, the Widdows, and Orphans, procuring with all his Power the advancement of Religion, and the Service of God, providing for the nourishment of the Poor, the Marriage of decay'd Gentlewomen, the maintenance of the Church, and above all, the ease of the People, by the revocation of all Tolls, and extraordinary Subsidies and Taxes, which the malignity, or necessity of former times had introduced and imposed.

The Titles of the Chamber of Accompts which have been shewed us by Mr. d' Herouval, to whose care the History of our Kings of the Third Race is indebted for the greatest part of the new discoveries made known in these last times, tells us, amongst many other rare and curious things, that this, truly, most Christian King, spared nothing for the Conversion of Infidels: that for this end he took up all the Jewish Children that were Fatherless, or in want, caused them to be bred up in the Christian Faith, and allowed them two, four, six Silver Deniers a day for their Dyet or Keeping, which was paid out of his own Demesnes, and pass'd in Dowry to their Widdows, and oftentimes to their Children; that these were called the Baptized, as those who embraced Christianity being of age, were called the Converted; That the Duke of Burgundy, the King of England, and some others, practis'd the like in their Countreys, which brought over a world of Jews from their obstinacy; and that the Kings his successors did imitate him therein, till the Reign of King John.

We have by the same means likewise learn'd that when St. Lewis made a journey any where, there was always a Prelate, which was ordinarily the Arch-Deacon of Paris, and a Lord of some note that follow'd some days after the Court, and made inquiry at all the Lodgings, and in all the Countreys and Places they had pass'd, what wrong or spoil they might have done to the Landlords, or to their Lands; and the just King made present reparation and satisfaction with his own Money, without any complaint made by the party agrieved; so far was it from suffering them to spend and squander away what they had in Fees and Charges to get Justice done to them.

The City of Marseille did not give that obedience to Charles as he expected and desired, wherefore he blocked them up with his Army, and brought them to that low condition by Famine, that they surrendred at discretion to this merciless Prince, who caused many of the principal Citizens to be beheaded.

1256.

Three sorts of People of Italy, the Venetians, the Genouese, and the Pisans, were become mighty powerful in the Levant Seas, and for that reason were grown very jealous of each other. The two first having each of them their several quarters; and their Magistrates in the City of Acon or Acre, fell to quarrelling with each other, upon some private pique, and went together by the ears, to their mutual destruction; which compleated the ruine of the Western Christians in the East.

In an enter-view at Montpellier, the two Kings Lewis of France, and James of Arragon, treated the Marriage of Philip, then Second Son to King Lewis, but who in two years after became the eldest, with Isabella, younger Daughter of James, to whom her Father gave in Dowry, the Counties of Carcassone and Beziers.

1258.

After this they agreed about their other differences in this manner, St. Lewis yielded up to the Arragonian, the Sovereignty which France had still held upon Catalonia, Barcelona, Roussillon, Empurs, Urgel, and Gironde, from the time the French first conquer'd those Countreys of the Saracens. And on the other hand, the Arragonian yielded to him all the right he pretended, whether by Marriage of his predecessors, or otherwise by any Title whatsoever, to the Counties of Razès, Narbonne, Nismes, Alby, Foix, Cahors, and other parts in Languedoc, held in Under-Fief of the Crown of France: as also the Rights he had in Provence, to the Counties of Forcalquier and Arles, and to the City of Marseille.

The English had still a very passionate desire to recover Normandy, and the other Countreys they had lost in France: and if Richard could have fixt himself well in Germany, he and his Brother Henry might have attack'd France very shrewdly on both sides. The pious King was not ignorant of it, but he knew likewise that Henry was so dangerously engaged in a quarrel with his Barons, that it would be easie to content him with a little, and even to oblige him to an acknowledgment; and therefore fore the business having been stated by the Popes Legats, the King of England pass'd over into France, together with his Wife, his Brothers and his Children, and being arriv'd at Paris, confirmed the Treaty.

The substance of it was, That he, his Sons, Brothers and Successors, should for ever renounce all claim to Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Poitou; and that the King gave a great sum of Money to Henry, and released to him and his, that part of Guyenne beyond the Garonne, and on this side Limousin and Perigord, upon condition, to do Homage-Liege to the Kings of France, and take place amongst his Peers, in quality of Duke of Guyenne.

Immediately upon this, the King of England does this Homage, and the eldest Son of France hapning to dye, he was at his Funeral, and helpt to bear his Corps upon his own Shoulders, with the other Lords, part of the way from Paris to St. Denis.

"In the year 1260, a new and strange heat of Zeal inspired many Christian people, which was to whip themselves in publique with small Cords, or with Thongs of Leather. These whippers were called the Devots, and afterwards they were named the Flagellants. This Phrensie begun in the City of Perugia * in Tuscany, by the example and Preaching of a Hermit, named Ragnier, spread it self even into Poland, travell'd as far as Greece, and in the end degenerated into Superstition and Heresies."

1260, says a h

"In the month of July, of the year 1261, a Lieutenant to Michael Paleologus VIII. of that name, Emperour of Greece, who returned from making a War against Michael the Despote * of Epirus, made himself Master of Constantinople, getting entrance by a hole under the Walls of the Town, discover'd to him by some Traitors; a thing of great importance, which he effected the more easily, because the Emperour Baldwin was abroad, having carried his Naval force to besiege a little City upon the Black Sea, or Pontus Euxinus."

1261.

"Thus was it that Constantinople fell again into the hands of the Greeks, from whom about two hundred years afterwards, it fell under the Tyranny of the Turks. The Latins had kept this fragment of the Eastern Empire, about Seven and fifty years, and as it had begun with a Baldwin, it ended with a Prince of the same name."

The Venetians who had a great interest in this loss, put a mighty strong Fleet to Sea, wherewith they Commanded the whole Archipelago, and reduced Constantinople to such streight, that Mannuel was upon the point to abandon it. But the Genouese in hatred to the Venetians, made a League with him, and relieved him, notwithstanding the intreaties of all the Christian Princes, and the Popes Excommunications. The Emperour Baldwin yet held for some time after, the Island of Eubœa or Negropont.

The bastard Mainfroy, not content to have usurp'd the Kingdom of Sicily, without consent of the Holy See, domineer'd over the Pope, and the Countreys belonging to the Church most strangely; Infomuch that Alexander IV. had offer'd that Kingdom to the King of Englands Son Edmund, who had accepted it; and to this end his Father had laid so many Imposts and Taxes upon the People, that most of them made a League against him, and were revolted.

Urban IV. Successor to Alexander, having caused the Crusado against Mainfroy to be Preached, stirred up some French Lords to go into Italy, who at the very first, forced the passages of Lombardy, and beat the Saracen Soldiers, whom Mainfroy entertained in his Service; but soon after, their Pay falling short, they came back into France, leaving the Pope more in the Briers then ever.

The better to fortifie himself against his implacable wrath, Mainfroy contracted Alliance with James III. King of Arragon, giving his Daughter in Marriage to Peter his eldest Son, who disdain'd not the Match, because it gave him approaching hopes of having the Kingdom of Sicily; Mainfroy having no Male-Children. In effect, it is by this means, the Kings of Arragon have attained it, and they must needs own they hold their Right from a Bastard, an Usurper, and Excommunicated person.

126.

The pious King Lewis did not understand this false policy, which has quite other Maxims then are practis'd, taught, or allowed by Christianity, and natural Justice. And for this reason it was, that he endeavour'd with all his power, to decide the quarrels between his neighbours, and not to foment them; with this spirit of Charity, he labour'd to happily to compose the business between the Barons of England, of whom Simon Montford Earl of Leicester was Head, with their King, that they submitted to what he should ordain. He calls his Parliament for this purpose at Amiens, 1263.

Amiens, and pronounced the Sentence in presence of King Henry: However, the Barons found some difficulties and exceptions, and would not abide by it.

Insomuch, that the troubles continuing, the Pope sent to revoke the gift of the Kingdom of Sicily, which he had made to Edmund the King of England's Brother, since he could not pursue it, and invested Charles, Earl of Anjou, Brother of St. Lewis. His Wives vanity, which made her greedily long to have the Title of Queen, as well as her other Sisters, inclined and persuaded him to accept of it.

1264. "It hapned this year 1264, in a Village near Orvieto, that the Sacred Host cast forth Blood upon the Corporal, or fine Linnen, wherein the Sacrament is put, to convince the incredulity of the Priest that celebrated the Mass. Pope Urban satisfied of the truth of this Miracle, instituted the Feast and Procession of the Holy Sacrament, to be solemnized the Thursday after the Octave of Whitsunday. St. Thomas Aquinas, who was then Professor in Theology at Orvieto, composed the Office for it.

"Urban IV. being dead at Perusia the third of October, the Cardinals after a vacancy of Four Months, elected the Cardinal Guy the Gros, a native of the Province of Languedoc, who had been Married before he entred into Holy Orders. He took the name of Clement IV. amongst his Virtues he is admir'd for his rare Modesty, though very little imitated by his Successors: He made a protestation at his first coming to the See, that he would advance none of his kindred; and so exactly did he keep his word, that of three Prebendaries which his Brother had in possession, he obliged him to quit two; and far from Marrying his Daughters to great Lords, as he might well have done, he gave them such small portions, that they chose rather to make themselves Nuns.

"Towards the end of the Month of July, about the beginning of the night, a Comet was observed towards the West, and some while after, a little before break of day, it appeared in the East, pointing its tail Westward. It was visible till the end of September, lasting two Months and a half.

1265. Clement IV. upon his advancement to the Holy See, ratified the Election his predecessor had made of Charles of France for the Kingdom of Sicily, obtained of St. Lewis, a Tenth of all the Clergy of his Kingdom for him, and lent him all the Money he could scrape together, having for that purpose engaged the Revenue of the Churches in Rome.

1265. Charles with this assistance, with the Kings help, and his Wives great care, who sold all her Jewels to raise Soldiers, which she cull'd and chose for the bravest; got a good Army on foot to go into Italy by Land, and in the mean time put to Sea with Thirty great Vessels, and sailed to the Port of Ostia.

He was received at Rome with great Honour by the People, declared Senator of that City (which was as it were Governour, and Sovereign Judge.) And the year following, upon the 28th of June, Crowned King of Sicily by the Pope in St. Peters Church, upon condition, to pay the Pope Eight thousand ounces of Gold, and a white Palfrey every year; never to be elected Emperour, nor to unite that Kingdom to the Empire: For the Popes would have no power left in Italy that was not lesser then their own.

1266. His Land-Army arrived not till about the years end, which he compleated in Rome. The following he marched to Naples, the Guelphes flocking from all parts, to list themselves under his Banner. The Earl of Caserta quitted the passage du Gariglian most basely to him; he afterwards gained the Post of St. Germain, guarded by Six thousand Men; and in fine, the Twenty sixth day of February, in the Campaigne of Beneventum, he gained an entire, but bloody victory against Mainfroy's Army, who was slain upon the place.

All submitted to the Conquerour, both beyond, and on this side the Fare, except the City of Nocera, where Frederic II. had placed a strong Garrison of Saracens, which yet held out a long time. It then appeared, that Charles knew not how to Govern his good fortune with Humanity; for he let Mainfroy's Wife and Children dye in prison, with many Lords of that party, and his Army committed horrid cruelties upon the taking of the City of Beneventum.

1267. Nevertheless, as he shewed himself very obedient to the Popes Orders, he declared him Vicar of the Empire in Italy, with the Title of Keeper of the Peace, and in this quality he by one of his Lieutenants, subdued all the Gibbelins of Tuscany, especially those of Florence, and restored all the Guelphes to their Lands and Dwellings.

In the mean time the young Conradin had sent a Manifesto to all the Princes of Europe, declaring himself to be the rightful Successor to the Kingdom of Sicily, and imploring their assistance to recover that Succession of his Fathers. Insomuch, that with the aid of the antient friends of the House of Souabe, or Swaben, and some adventurers that fought their fortunes, he gathered a huge Army, and came into Italy about the end of October; observing, and giving ear rather to the importunities of the Gibbelines, who pressed him to march on, then the wise Counsels of his Mother, who feared the unexperienced Youth of her Son, scarce Sixteen years of age, would be Ship-wrack'd, against the fortune and courage of Charles.

He had brought with him out of Germany the young Frederic, Son of Herman Marquis of Baden, who said likewise he was Duke of Austria, being Son of a Daughter of Henry, Brother to Frederic, last Duke of those Countreys; and withal, he held himself certain of the assistance of Henry and Frederic, Brothers of Alphonso X. King of Castille, who upon his arrival in Italy, were to declare in his favour.

Those Brothers having been driven out of Spain by the King Alphonso, had retired themselves into Africk to the King of Tunis, where they had acquir'd a great deal of reputation, Money and Friends. Henry having information of the progress of Charles in Italy, was come to proffer him his Service, with Eight hundred Horse, and had lent him a considerable sum of Money. In requital, Charles had gotten him to be chosen Senator of Rome: but because he afterwards thwarted him in his designs of obtaining by the Pope, the Kingdom of Sardinia, that Spaniard was alienated from him, and secretly conspired with Conradin, so that he disposed the City of Rome to receive him, driving thence, or imprisoning all those that contradicted; and when he saw him approaching near, he set up his Flags and Arms upon the Gates and joyned openly with him.

Conradin having spent the Winter at Verona, despising the Popes Thunders, embarked at the coast of Genoa, on some Vessels belonging to Pisa. Being landed in Tuscany, he surprized, and cut in pieces those Forces that Charles had left there; and at the same time Conrad * being come from Antioch, caused all Sicily to Revolt, except only Messina and Palermo.

These prosperous beginnings betraid young Conradin, and flattered him to bring him to his death: while he was entering into the Kingdom of Sicily, Charles quitted the Siege of Nocera, and came to meet him, resolved to decide the quarrel by a Battle: it was fought the Five and twentieth day of August near the lake Fucin, now called the lake Celano: the French gained it, but not without much hazard, and much blood. Conradin, Frederic Duke of Austria, and Henry of Castille saved themselves by flight; but being discover'd, they were taken and brought back to the Conquerour.

After this Victory, he took upon him again the dignity of Senator of Rome, which he had been obliged to lay down, and by the Pope was constituted Vicar of the Empire in Tuscany. His Fame would have been beyond a parallel, had he been but as merciful as valiant, and had not exercised such mortal severities upon his prisoners of War, and such people as revolted from him.

They were so great, that being resolved to pass into Africk with St. Lewis the King, not knowing what to do with Conradin and Frederic, whom it was very dangerous to keep, and more to set them free in a Kingdom full of Factions and Rebellion; he caused their Process to be made by the Syndics of the Cities of that Kingdom. Those Judges having condemned them to death as disturbers of the Churches quiet, their Heads were cut off upon a Scaffold in the midst of the City of Naples the Twenty seventh day of October: an execution which makes posterity tremble yet with horror, but which seemed a retribution of the Divine Justice, for those yet more horrible barbarities, which Frederic the Grand-father of Conradin had used to all the Family of the Norman Princes.

Henry de Castille had his Life given him, but was confin'd to a prison, from whence he got not out till Five and twenty years after, to return into Spain.

Almost at the same time, this Conrad Prince of Antioch, Son of one Frederic, a bastard of the Emperour Frederic II. who was come from the East, to the assistance of Conradin, and had contributed to make the Island of Sicily revolt, being taken by some belonging to Charles, was hanged: and thus ended by the Hangmans hands, that famous and glorious Race of the Prince of Swaben, of whom there have been so many Kings and Emperours.

* See hereafter in Anno 1269.

I should have told you before, that Conradin being upon the Scaffold, after he had made bitter complaints of his misfortunes, and the cruelty of his Enemies, threw down his Glove in the Market-place, as a token of the investiture of his Kingdoms to such of his kindred as would prosecute his quarrel: a Cavalier having taken it up, carried it to James King of Arragon, who had Married a Daughter of Mainfroy's.

The abuses and the designs of the Court of Rome were grown to such a height, and come to that pass, that the King St. Lewis, though very devout to the Holy See, made this year a Pragmatique, to stop the current of them in France, especially, touching the dispensation of Benefices.

This same year the Marriage of his Daughter Blanch was made with Ferdinand, eldest Son to Alphonso X. King of Castile, the Pope having given his Dispensation for the near consanguinity between the parties. The Nuptials were celebrated at Burgos; Philip, Brother to the Bride, Edward Prince of England, James King of Arragon the Bride-grooms Grand-father, Alhumar, King of Granada, and divers other Princes, and great Lords honoured the Solemnity with their Presence; and it was expressly said in the Contract, that if Ferdinand died before his Father, her Children should represent him, and succeed to the Crown.

The affairs of the Christians in the Levant being reduced to the last extremity by Bendocabar, Sultan of Egypt: the exhortations of the Pope, and the zeal of St. Lewis stirred up those of the West, to make one more great attempt to support them. The King of Arragon, and Edward, eldest Son to the King of England, promised to Second St. Lewis, and his Brother Charles to go thither with all the force of Italy. The number of Adventurers of the Cross, consisted of Fifteen thousand Horse, and Two hundred thousand Foot, which were divided in two Armies, to attack the Saracens in two several places at once.

The Arragonian and the English undertook to go and make War in the Holy Land, the Arragonian being Ship'd, turn'd back again, and only sent some Vessels Commanded by Ferdinand his bastard Son: but Edward did generously make good his Vow.

As for St. Lewis, he turned his Enterprize against the Kingdom of Tunis, the conquest thereof being in his judgment the way to conquer Egypt, without which, they could never keep the Holy Land. Besides, his Brother persuaded him to it, to make the coasts of Africk become Tributaries to his Kingdom of Sicilia, as they had been in the time of Roger the Norman Prince.

Having therefore left the administration of his Kingdom to Matthew Abbot of St. Denis, and Simon, Earl of Nesse, he left Paris, as I believe, the first day of March, in the year 1270. if we begin it in January, or the year 1269. if we make it begin at Easter, as they then did in France. He was accompanied by three of his Sons, Philip, Tristan, and Peter, his Brother Alphonso, his Nephew Robert II. Earl of Artois, Thibault, King of Navarre, Guy Earl of Flanders, and a great number of the Nobility.

He was near four Months, either upon his way, or about Aigues-mortes, where he waited some time till his Vessels were ready. He went on board in the beginning of July with his Brothers, and set sail the day following; his Forces, and the other Lords took Shipping in several Ports, particularly at Marseilles: the Rendezvous for the whole Fleet was appointed to be at Sardinia in the Road of Calary.

He got first thither with four great Vessels, not without meeting with very bad weather; the rest arrived Eight days after him: and having all held a Council together, they persisted in their design to Land in Africk, and secure themselves of Tunis, as well because it was thought important to have that coast, as for that the King of those Countreys had given them hopes he would become Christian, if they would but stand by him with their Forces, against his resisting Subjects; but this was only to amuse them.

The Army being then landed on the African shore, immediately took the Castle and the City of Carthage, built indeed upon the ruins of that famous rival to Rome, but which had nothing now that was great but its name. Afterwards they besieged the City of Tunis, which is situate at the further end of the Lake of Goletta, five miles distant from the Sea.

At five weeks end from the beginning of the Siege, the excessive heats of the Countrey, scarcity of Water, the Sea Air, and the toil the Army endured, having the Saracens perpetually upon them, it bred the pestilential Fever and Dyfentery's amongst them, whereof a great many people of note dyed; amongst others, Prince John, Tristan de Nevers, and Peter de Ville-Beon, Chamberlain to the King, and his intimate Confident.

The

The good King himself being seized with a Flux, was some days afterwards taken with a continual Fever, which put an end to his glorious Labours by a happy Death the 25th day of August, the Seventy fifth year of his Age, and the four and fortieth of his Reign. Being on his Death-bed, he called for his Son Philip to leave most Excellent and most Christian-like Instructions, which he had some time before drawn up and written with his own hand.

He had together all the Vertues of a great Saint and a great King, of a true Christian and a true Gentleman. He was humble to his God, and fierce to the Enemies of the Faith, modest and a hater of Luxury, as to his particular, but brave and pompous in publick Ceremonies; as mild and affable in Conversation, as rough and terrible in Fight and Battle; prodigal to the Poor, and sparing of his Subjects Money more than of his own; liberal to Soldiers and Men of Learning, prompted with a sincere desire to keep the Peace between his Neighbours, enflamed with an incredible zeal for the glory of God, and for the administering of true Justice: in fine, worthy to be the Model of all Princes that desire to Rule according to the will of God, and the good of their Subjects.

Amongst his fervent Exercises of Piety, which never did abate in all the days of his Life, he observed the Fasts Ordained by the Church with great exactness, eating but once that day; and if either his weakness or the unavoidable labour in business did at any time oblige him to eat twice, he redeemed the Transgression according to the Canons of the Church, by some great Alms, feeding an Hundred Poor some other day; I mean an Hundred extraordinary, for he ordinarily entertain'd a very great number, and served Two hundred at Table, upon every great Festival day.

I find that every Lent, he distributed Sixty three Muids of Wheat, sixty eight thousand Herrings, and three thousand two hundred nineteen Livers Paris to the Monasteries and Hospitals, and One hundred pence a day to other poor People. And to make this Alms and Charitable Benevolence perpetual, he charged his own Demesains with it, as also with many other Pious Grants and Foundations, which instead of diminishing the Estate of his Successors, hath been as it were a miraculous Leaven that hath increased and multiplied it.

It were to be wished that that great and good Ordinance he made upon his return out of the Holy Land, to root out the Misdemeanours of Judges, the Debaucheries of Gaming, Drinking, and Women, were as much in our practise, as it is yet in our Books.

I cannot omit that he did never intermeddle in the naming any to Bishopricks and Abbies, but left the liberty of Elections entirely free. Insomuch as an Ambassador of his having brought a Bull to him from Rome which gave him the right of Nomination, he was very angry with him, and threw it into the Fire. For the other Benefices he ever bestow'd them upon the most Worthy, and never on such as were in Employments already, unless they first surrendered the other.

He founded a great many Churches and Monasteries, particularly for the Orders of St. Dominique and St. Francis; several Hospitals, amongst others that for the * Quinze-Vingts, the fair Abby of Royanmont, that of St. Matthew near Rouen, and the Holy Chappel in his Palace, where he put in Canons and Chaplains. They attribute to him the Institution of the University, and the first Parliament of Toulouze. It is certain he was the first, who out of humility, added the Sign of the Cross to the Ceremony of touching those troubled with the Kings-Evil.)

He had Eight Children, four Sons and four Daughters. The Sons were Philip who Reigned, and was surnamed the Hardy * or Daring, John Tristan who was Earl of Nevers, Peter Earl of Alençon, these two left no Posterity; Robert Earl of Clermont in Beauvoisis, who espoused Beatrix Daughter and Heiress of Agnes de Bourbon, (who was so of Archembald Lord of Bourbon) and of John III. Son to Hugh Duke of Burgundy. From this Marriage issued the Branch of Bourbon, who came to the Crown Three hundred years after by King Henry the Fourth, surnamed the Great.

The Daughters were named Isabella, Blanch, Margaret, and Agnes; Isabella was Married to Thibault the II. King of Navarre, and died without Offspring. Blanch à little before this Voyage to Africk, Married Ferdinand, called De la Cerde, eldest Son of Alphonso X. King of Castile, and had two Sons who were unjustly deprived of the Kingdom by their Grandfather, because their Father had preceded him, and Representation had no place. Margaret was Affianced to Henry Duke of Brabant and Limbourg, then that Prince turning Monk, Married to John his Brother and Successor; They had no Children. Agnes espoused Robert Duke of Burgundy, and brought him many.

THE Christian Army wholly disconsolate for the death of their King, and ready to sink under their Toils and Dangers, resumed courage, and received refreshments upon the arrival of Charles King of Sicily, who with his Naval Forces landed at the very time the King his Brother was giving up the Ghost.

Being come ashore he came and paid him his last Duty, and caused his Flesh to be all taken from his Bones, as it was then the Custom when any died in Foreign Countries. He carried the said Flesh to Sicily with him, and buried it in the Abby of Montreal near Palermo; and King Philip kept the Bones, which he deposited in St. Denis in France. The Funeral being over, they continued the Siege, Charles having the Command of the whole Army, because Philip being fallen Sick could not act.

At the end of three Months, the taking of the place being most infallibly certain, though not till the Winter was over, King Philip's impatience, who much desired to go and take possession of his Kingdom, and yet more the interest of his Uncle Charles who cared for nothing but to get Money, and oblige the King of Tunis to pay him Tribute, were the Motives that made them give Ear to Propositions of Peace with that Barbarian King.

They allowed him a Truce for Ten years, provided he would defray the whole Expences of that Expedition; and that he would pay to Charles as much Tribute, as he paid to the Pope Annually: That he would deliver up all the Christians he then held in Slavery: That he would grant free liberty of Trade, and exemption of Imposts to all their Merchants; and would permit them to dwell in Tunis and have the Exercise of the Christian Religion.

At the end of the Siege Prince Edward of England arrived there with his Forces, hoping that after the taking of that place, the two Kings would go into the Holy Land, as they had promised: but they thought it fitter to return to their own homes, and left him to pursue his Voyage.

Heaven

Philip the Hardy, King XLIV.

Heaven seemed to be angry at their return: all manner of misfortunes followed them. Part of the Vessels wherein Philip was Embarked, arrived happily enough at the Port of Trapani or Trapos in Sicily: but the others that had King Charles and his on board were overtaken with a most furious Tempest, which destroy'd most of them, with the loss of Four thousand Men, all their Equipage and the Treasure that was in them.

Besides all this, Thibault King of Navarre being taken Sick, ended his days at Trapani about the end of December, (his Brother Henry the Fat succeeded him) Isabella of Arragon Queen of France being great with Child, hurt her self by a fall from her Horse, and died in the City of Cosenza; Alphonso Brother of St. Lewis was taken off with a Pestilential Fever at Siena: and his Wife Isabella de Toulouse died in the same place about twelve days after him. So that King Philip clothed in Mourning Weeds for the Death of his Father, his Wife, and his nearest Relations, after so much Expence and Toil, brought nothing back into France but empty Chests, and Coffins full of the Bones of the dead.

He staid in Sicily about two Months, departed towards the end of February, crossed Italy and arrived at Paris in the beginning of Summer. He was Crowned at Rheims the Fifteenth day of August, or as others say, the thirteenth, by the Bishop of Soissons, the Archbishops See being vacant. Of the ancient Pairs of the Laity, there was none assisted at this time but the Duke of Burgundy and the Earl of Flanders; Robert Earl of Artois bore the Sword of Charlemaine, they name it Joyeuse; At their going thence he intreated the King to go and visit his Country, and received him in his City of Arras with such Welcom and Expressions of Joy, as hitherto had not been heard of in France.

This King passing thorough Rome paid his Devotions on the Tomb of the Apostles. At Viterbo finding the Cardinals had been there Assembled for two years together without coming to any agreement concerning the Election of a Pope, he exhorted them to make some end, that the Church might be no longer without a Head. His good Advice did not take effect till Eight Months afterwards, upon their electing of Thibault de Piacenza Archdeacon of Liege, who went Legat into Syria with Prince Edward; he took the name of Gregory X.

The Earldom of Toulouse was vacant by the decease of Jane the Daughter of Raimond and Wife of Alphonso, Philip put himself into possession pursuant to the Terms of the Treaty made with Raimond in the year 1228. but it was King John that annexed it to the Crown.

This year died Richard pretended King of the Romans. The year after his Brother Henry III. King of England followed him, and his Son Edward I. of that name, who was in the Holy Land, succeeded.

In a Bloody Quarrel the Earl of Armagnac had against Gerard Lord of Casaubon his Vassal, it hapned that Roger Earl de Foix, whom the Earl of Armagnac had called to his aid, pursued Gerard and besieged him in a Castle belonging to the King, whither he was fled and had put himself under his Protection. The King angry for the little Respect these Earls had for him, marched into those Countries with an Army capable of striking a terror to the very heart of Spain. He besieged Roger in his Castle de Foix, and being resolved to level a Mountain wich hindered his approach to it, daunted him so much, that he came and threw himself at the Kings Feet; He could not however obtain his Pardon till after he had been detained Prisoner a year in the Castle of Beaucaire.

At his return from the Holy Land Edward passed thorough France, and did Homage to the King. Being afterwards gone to visit his Countries of Guyenne, Gaston de Moncado Lord of Bearn refused to render him Homage; Edward seized upon his Person, and kept him Prisoner in his Train for a while. From whence making his escape, the King of England made complaint to Philip Sovereign Lord of Guyenne. This King having summon'd his Parliament and Debated the Case, gave Judgment in favour of Edward, and compelled Gaston to hold his Lands of him.

The Viscounty of Bearn was Originally a Member of the Earldom or County of Gasconny which held of the Dutchy, but had been dismembred and held by Lords who were the Issue of those Dukes, till it came to the House of Moncado by the Marriage of the Princess Mary Daughter of Vicount Peter, and Sister of the Vicount Gaston deceased without Children; This was about the year 1170. The Princess being yet a Minor, having put her self, I know not for what reason, under the Power of Alphonso II. King of Arragon, in whose Dominion she had also some Lands, was obliged to do Homage for Bearn to that King, and to Marry William de Moncado; which Advantage Alphonso procured him as a Recompence for his having brought about the Marriage between Prince Raimond Berenger Earl of Barcelona his Father, and Petronella Daughter and Heiress of Ramir le Moyne King of Arragon. The Family of Moncado is one of the Nine most illustrious of all Catalongne, and are said to be Issue of a Dapifer or Grand Seneschal to Charlemain.

1273. The Electors displeased to see the German Empire so long in confusion, met together at Francfort upon the earnest intreaties of the Pope; and without any regard to the opposition King Alphonso made, resolved never more to make any Emperor that was not of the German Nation. So that at that very time they elected Rodolphus Surnamed Rufus, who had been Master of the Palace to Othocare King of Bohemia. He was Earl of Habsburg, a Family which as well as that of Lorrain, were the Issue of the Earls of Alsatia, and the Mayre Erchinoald.

1273. He was raised to the Imperial Dignity principally by the Suffrage of Vernher Archbishop of Mentz, the only Elector almost that knew him, and whom he had otherwise obliged in some Affair of Importance. Now it was the more easie for this Elector to do him this good Office, because the King of Bohemia, and all the other German Princes refused this Title, as being much more burthensome then gainful or honourable.

1273. Many and different Subjects required the Assembling of a Council; The necessary Regulation for the future in the Election of Popes, the Reformation of Abuses in the Church, and of Morality amongst the Christians, the Differences about the Grecian Empire between Michael and Baldwin, and for that of Germany between Rodolph and Alphonso, the hopes to unite the Greek Church to the Roman, and the pressing necessity for assisting the Faithful that were remaining in the Holy Land, to which the Pope had solemnly obliged himself at the time he received the news of his Election.

1273. For these Reasons he had Convoked a Council in the City of Lyons, which lies, as it were in the midst of the principal Estates of Christendom. He came thither himself about the latter end of this year 1273. and was visited by the King, who let him have several of his Gentlemen and Officers to serve him for a Guard.

1274. The Council was open'd the First day of May in the year 1274. there were present Five hundred Bishops, seventy Abbots, and a thousand others, as well Doctors and Deputies as Chapters. Gregory presided accompanied with Fifteen Cardinals. The Ambassadors from the King, the Emperor Rodolphus, and from several other Western Princes were there. Those from Michael, the Emperor of Greece, arrived there at the Fourth Session, and presented some Letters from him; by vertue of which they were admitted to an abjuration of their Schism, and a profession to follow the Faith of the Roman Church, especially about the Procession of the Holy Ghost. After that, the Pope owned Michael for rightful Emperor of the East, and forbade Baldwin to bear that Title any longer. This was the end for which Michael had feignedly desired the re-union.

The Election of Rodolph was likewise confirmed, but not till after King Alphonso had submitted and referr'd his Right to the disposal of the Pope, upon Condition he might have leave, which was granted him, to take the Tenth's of all the Clergy in his Kingdom, to make War against the Moors. Thus all the Reparations, whatever happens, are ever laid upon the Peoples Shoulders to make satisfaction, who pay for all at last.

There were several Constitutions concerning the Elections, Provisions, and the Residences of Benefices. They Treated about the settling many Differences betwixt the Princes and Cities in Italy: It was Ordained, That the Cardinals should be hence-forward shut up in the Conclave for the Election of Popes; and they made very severe Decrees against Usurers, by vertue whereof the King put them all in Prison throughout the whole Kingdom: but soon after he released them upon the payment of some certain Taxes which he imposed upon them. Which was, to tell the truth, only the way to teach them for the future to take the greater Usury, that so they might have enough both for themselves and for him.

They granted likewise a great many Indulgencies and Priviledges to such as lifted themselves for the Holy Land, or did contribute their Money towards that Expedition; and they suppressed all the Orders Mendicants excepting only the Preachers and the Minors. The Augustines and the Carmelites were tolerated only till a more ample deliberation.

Two great and Holy Scholastick Doctors died in these times, St. Thomas Aquinas near Terracina as he was coming to the Council, and St. Bonaventure in Lyons after he had been assistant there. The first was of the Order of the Preaching Friars, the other of the Minors, and had been made a Cardinal by Pope Gregory X.

Philip

Philip tired with being a Widower four years, cast his Affection upon Mary Daughter of Henry and Sister of John Duke of Brabant, Married her at the Bois de Vincennes in the Month of August, and Crowned her the year following in the Holy Chappel of Paris on St. John Baptist's day. He would needs have the Archbishop of Reims perform the Ceremony, without any regard to the right of him of Sens who was the Metropolitan.

The 21th of July, Henry the Fat King of Navarre died at Pampeluna, his Fat having suffocated him. He left by his Wife Blanch of Artois one Daughter only, named Jane, but Three years of Age. By his Will and Testament he gave the Guardianship to her Mother, and enjoyned she should Marry her in France: but the Lords were divided upon the point, and the greatest Party being against the Mother, gave Don Pedro Sancho de Montagu to the Pupil for her Guardian.

The King of Arragon and the King of Castille had, I know not what, pretences to that Kingdom; under that colour each of them makes his Party to get the Regency, and have the young Heiress in their hands; Peter Infant of Arragon desired to have her for his Son, and Ferdinand Infant of Castille for one of his.

This last entred into Navarre with his Sword in hand, seconding his demand with his force: The Lords of the contrary Party called in the Infant of Arragon and made an agreement with him; but the Widow whose inclinations tended towards France, came and cast her self with her Daughter into the Arms of Philip. Who accepting of the Guardianship, sent Enstace de Beaumarchais to govern the Kingdom in his Name, and immediately all obeyed him.

Ferdinand de la Cerde died in his return from Navarre. He had Two Sons by Blanch of France his Wife, those were Alphonso and Ferdinand, who ought legally to have succeeded to the Crown of Castille after the decease of their Grandfather Alphonso: but Prince Sancho second Son of Alphonso, maintaining that it belonged to him as the nearest, not to his Nephews, (though the contrary was exprest in the Contract between Ferdinand with Blanch) got himself immediately to be acknowledged presumptive Heir. Alphonso their Grandfather, instead of opposing this Usurpation did authorize it with all his might; and to reduce Blanch and her Children to such a low condition that she might not have it in her power to Resent it, he denied that Princess all she was to have by Agreement, and even the means to Subsist.

Queen Yolante could not bear the ill Treatment used towards her Grand-children; so that it was by her Counsel and in her Company that the unfortunate Widow stole away, and fled into the King of Arragons Country. But that Prince being gained upon by Alphonso, suffer'd himself to be persuaded to send her back to him, and detain the young Orphans in a Castle. The Mother fearing to be used like the Children, escaped into France, not without great difficulty. Some say the Castilian set her at liberty upon the earnest intreaty of the King, but the Arragonian still kept the Children in hold.

This year Lewis Son to the King, and the eldest of the first Bed, being dead, Peter de la Brosse, who was not loved by the young Queen, would needs make use of this opportunity to ruine her. He was a Man came from nothing, that had served as Barber to St. Lewis, had been taken into favour by Philip, and by that Prince raised to the highest Degree. In this post, having nothing to fear but the too great Affection the King had for his Wife, he found out an Accuser, that said she had caused Prince Lewis to be Poyson'd. In effect the Child was so made away; And if we believe an Author, she had run the hazard of being burnt alive, if the Duke of Brabant her Brother had not sent a Gentleman who offer'd to prove her Innocency by Duel against the Accuser, who not having courage enough to justify what he had spoken, was Condemned to the Gallows.

There were in the Kingdom three false Prophets, the Vidame of Laon, a wandring Monk, and an old Nun, or Beguine, whom La Brosse, as it was believed, had Consulted and Instructed to foretell something that might cool and change the Kings Affection towards his Wife. Admire the simplicity of this King; Devout as he was, he sends Matthew Abbot de Vendosme, and Peter Bishop of Bayeux to Discourse the Beguine (or old Nun) about that business. The Bishop being of Kindred to La Brosse's Wife, going before, talked alone to the Beguine, to inform her what to say, and brought word back to the King, that she would discover nothing to him, but at Confession. The King dissatisfied with this proceeding, sent again the Bishop of Dol and a Templer to her, who returned with this Answer, That the Queen was Innocent and faithful to her Husband, and all what had been talked to asperse her, was was Falseness and Calumny. From that time the Credit of the Queen was much strengthened, and that of La Brosse began to diminish.

Now after the King, who had undertaken the defence of Blanch his Sister, found that Three several Ambassadors whom he sent to Castille, could obtain nothing from an unjust Uncle, and an unnatural Grandfather, he at length defies them by a Herald, and having gotten a great Army together, not only of French, but Low-Country-Men and Germans, marches directly to the foot of the Pyrenean Mountains, and took a re-view of his Army in Bearn.

1276. This Power had certainly overwhelmed the Spaniards, had not their Gold, which procured them private Agents and Intelligence, stopp'd them there, contriving it so that there was neither Provisions nor Ammunitions to be had for them. So they could advance no farther. Only one Party of them under the Conduct of Robert d'Artois was sent into Navarre. The Castilian Faction had made them rise up against Enlace de Beaumarchais the Kings Lieutenant; and the Rebels who possessed that part of Pampeluna, which they named the City or the Navarrerie, held him besieged in the other part which they called the Burrough.

The Gentry and Souldiery of the Faction having defended themselves for some time, feared they should be over-power'd at length, and retired in the night time; The Burgbers forsaken, and knowing not either how to Capitulate or defend themselves, were soon forced, and a great number fell by the edge of the Sword, the rest were Hanged without Mercy, the fugitive Gentlemen degraded of all Nobility, and by these terrible Examples the Regency of the French was settled in Navarre.

The King was still in Bearn: The Castilian with design to amuse him that he might enter upon Spain, demanded to Confer with Robert, and made him lose five weeks time. In so much that the Army wanting Provisions, Philip decamps on a sudden and marches towards France; whereof the Castilian being informed by some Traytor, does immediately give notice to Robert, who was much amazed at it.

1277. The suspicion of this Treachery fell upon Peter de la Brosse. Now the Court being at Melun, a Jacobin of the Town of Mirepoix delivered a Pacquet to the Kings own hand, which he told he was enjoined to do by a certain Man who died in that City. What it contained was not known, but only that there was a Letter Sealed with the Seal of Peter de la Brosse, and that the King having read it stood much amazed. It must be some Intelligence he gave to the King of Castille. Whatever it were, he was made a Prisoner, carried to Paris, thence transferr'd to the Castle of Janville in Beauvais, then some days afterward brought back again to Paris, where he was Hanged on the publick Gallows, in the presence of the Dukes of Burgundy and Brabant, and of Robert Earl of Artois. Guilty enough, had he committed no other Crime but the bewitching his King, and fettering both his Sacred Person and Mind in his Artificial Snares. The Fortunes of all those whom he had advanced were utterly ruined, the Bishop of Bayeux his Brother-in-Law, made his escape to the Pope, where he remained a long time in Exile.

1278. But the Pope, the Emperor Rodolph, and the Emperor Michael Conspired together to put a stop to that Grandeur which run up too fast, and threatened to stifle theirs. And besides the Pope, (it was Nicholas III. of the House of Ursini) who not only did not desire to have to so Potent a Neighbour, but withall was cruelly offended, for that having demanded one of his Daughters for one of his own Nephews, Charles had received his insolent Proposition with raillery and contempt.

1278. "At the same time the power of Rodolph mightily increased by the Victory he gained over Oshocare King of Bohemia, who was left dead in the Field. Of the "Spoils of that Prince, whose Domestick he had been, he got the Duchy of Austria, "and invested his Son Albertus in it. His Posterity have still preserved it, and have "taken the name of it, as more illustrious then that of Habsburg.

Not

Not to thwart the Pope who sought to pick a Quarrel, Charles quitted the Title of Senator and that of Vicar. He wanted but little in Anno 1279. of losing Provence likewise: Queen Margaret Widow of St. Lewis his Sister-in-Law disputed it with him as being elder Daughter of Earl Raimond Berengier, and implored assistance of the Emperor, of whom that County was held, because of the Kingdom of Arles. Notwithstanding the business being brought to Examination, Provence was left to Charles upon Condition of doing Homage to the Emperor, whose Daughter Clemence should likewise be Married to the Son of his eldest Son. His Name was Charles, as was his Fathers and Grandfathers.

Edward King of England crossed over Seas with Alienor his Wife, and came to King Philip at Amiens to Treat of their Affairs. Philip agreed he should have the Earldom of Aginois, and surrendered up that of Pontieu which belonged to Alienor by right of her Mother. She was Jane the Wife of Ferdinand III. King of Castille, and Daughter of the Earl Simon, and Mary Daughter and Heiress of William, likewise Earl of Pontieu. Reciprocally Edward renounced the Duchy of Normandy, but retained Thirty Livers Rent upon the Exchequer or Court of Justice of the Province.

John otherwhile Lord of the Island of Procida had been divested of his Estate by Charles, for having tamper'd in some Conspiracy. Being therefore prompted by a cruel Resentment, he framed the design to bring the King of Aragon as Heir to the House of Swaben by his Mother, into the Kingdom of Sicilia, and made so many Journeys backwards and forwards to the Pope, the Emperor, and the Sicilians, that he brought the Project to his desired issue.

Mean time Pope Nicholas who had projected for the most part what we shall find to break out in those Countries, hapned to die, and a French Cardinal, it was Simon de Brie, was Elected in his room, he was named Martin IV. This last knew nothing of the Tragical design contrived by his Predecessor, and had intentions quite contrary: but it being already put in motion, he found the effect of it before ever he could foresee the blow.

The Death of Nicholas did not discourage the Conspirators, the Lord de Prochyda * continuing his Voyages disguised like a Monk, brought from Constantinople Three hundred thousand Ounces of Gold to the Aragonian, who was ready to put a great Naval force to Sea under pretence of making War upon the Saracens, and had the Craft, the better to conceal his intentions, to borrow Twenty thousand Gold Crowns of King Philip, and even, as some say, of Charles himself whom he was going to Dethrone.

He lay for some time upon the Coasts of Africa to favour the Enterprize agreed upon, and in the mean while Charles neglected the Advice was given him to stand upon his Guard and be aware, and employ'd all his Forces for the Conquest of the Eastern Empire, in which he did not succeed very well, his Fleet having been worsted at Sea by that of the Emperor Michael. Whilst he is thus lull'd asleep by his ill fate, the Sicilians upon an Easter-day, at the first ringing of the Bell to Vespers, cut the Throats of all the French that were in the whole Island: which they did execute with so much fury and rage, that the good Friars Jacobins, and the Cordeliers, did with pleasure wash their hands in Blood, and Murdered their unhappy Enemies at the very Altars; The Fathers ripping up the Wombs of their own Daughters if great with a French Child, and dashing little Infants against the Rocks. They killed Eight thousand in two hours space, and pardoned but only one by reason of his rare Probity. He was called William des Pourcellets a Gentleman of Provence.

Charles who was at this time in Tuscany, more enraged then frightened at so terrible a blow, Arms himself powerfully by the assistance of the Pope and the King of France, which was brought him by the Earl of Alencon, and besieges Messina. That City terrified with the glittering of his Arms and the Fulminations of the Holy See, would have surrendered at the very first, and all the Island afterwards, if his just Wrath could have received them to any Mercy: but that Prince being grown inexorable, despair puts some courage into their faint hearts, and the arrival of the Aragonian who landed at Palermo, about the end of August, and was Crowned King of Sicily there, re-assured them wholly. So that Charles, whether for that, or for some other reason, raised the Siege at the latter end of September, and went back into Calabria.

The Aragonian notwithstanding, finding himself unequal in Strength to Charles, whom he observed to be daily supplied out of France, bethought himself of a Villanous piece of Subtily, which made him keep Sicily, but with the loss of his Honour. He propos'd Charles to decide this great Quarrel by a Personal Combat between them, each each to be assisted with an hundred choice Knights. Charles more brave then well advised, accepted the Challenge, notwithstanding the contrary Counsel and reiterated Commands of the Pope. King Edward being related to both, undertook to secure the Field for them at Burdeaux, the day was appointed to be the first of July the year following, and upon the word of this perfidious Man, Charles raised imprudently the Siege, and agreed to a Truce.

In the interim the Pope pouring all the Treasures or Viols of his Wrath upon the head of the Arragonian, not only Excommunicated him, but likewise degraded him of his Kingship, and exposed his Kingdom as a prey; but he turned all this into raillery; and as though he would obey the Popes Sentence, he would no longer be called King, but the Knight of Arragon, Lord of the Sea, and the Father of three Kings.

The day of Combat being come, Charles enters the Field with his hundred Knights, and remained there from the Suns rise till Sun setting. The Arragonian appeared not, but towards night comes post thither, goes to the Seneschal of Burdeaux, takes Witness that he had presented himself, and leaves his Arms with him to serve for Testimony, then retires in great haste, feigning he was in dread of some surprisal by the King of France. A very brave act of Apparence or Comparition, worthy the Courage of a Prince, to whom his Subjects have given the Surname and Epithet of Great.

The Pope who had thundred his Excommunication against him the former year, did re-aggravate it again in this, published a Crusado or Holy War against him with the very same Indulgences and Priviledges as for the Holy Land, and gave his Kingdom to Charles de Valois, the second Son of France, whom he caused to be invested by Cardinal John Cholet his Legat, whom he expressly sent into France. And certainly the destruction of Peter having place, that Crown was devolved to this Charles by Hereditary Right, since he was the Son of that Kings Sister.

These Threatnings did not daunt the Arragonian, he was confirmed in his Crime by the good success of Roger de Lauria his Admiral. This Captain, the ablest Seaman of his Age, having gained several Advantages over Charles's Subjects, came and planted himself before Naples in his absence, engaged Charles the Lame, his Son, to a Battle the fifth of June, vanquished him, and carried him Prisoner to Palermo. His Head ran great danger of serving as a Reprizal for the Head of Conradin: The Sicilians had Condemned him to Death, Constantia drew him subtilly out of their hands, and sent him into Arragon to the King her Husband.

The Fathers anguish was the greater, for that he arrived there within three days after the taking of his Son, with a good number of Ships well Armed. He had much ado to keep Apulia and Calabria, and having wrastled six Months longer with his Misfortunes, he died at Foggia in Apulia the 17th of January, in the year 1285, leaving his Son, Charles the Lame, the Heir to his Misfortunes, as well as to his Crown.

The foregoing year Alphonso King of Castille died, dispossessed almost of all his Estate by Sancho his unnatural Son. On his Death-bed he made his Will and Testament, whereby he left him his Paternal Curse, deprived him of the Succession, and recalled Alphonso and Ferdinand, who were the Sons of his eldest Son Ferdinand, and upon their default Philip King of France, to whom Castille already did belong by right of Blanch de Castille the Mother of St. Lewis: but Sancho knew how to keep himself securely enough in possession of it.

The 16th of the Month of August King Philips eldest Son of the same name, and the Surname of Fair, Aged but Fifteen years, Married Jane Queen of Navarre, and Countess of Brie and Champagne, who was but Thirteen, the Pope having given Dispensation because she was his Cousin German.

A Legat of the Pope having caused the Croisado to be Preached, against Peter King of Arragon; King Philip would go himself in this Expedition, to Infall Charles his second Son in that Kingdom. He had no less then Twenty thousand Horse, and four-score thousand Foot. He Shipt part of these Foot-Soldiers in four-score Vessels which he took with him to carry Ammunition, Provisions, and Artillery. James King of Majorca and Minorca, whom Peter his Brother had devested of his Lands, followed him, or to say better, Conducted him in this Voyage, thereby to recover them.

The Army being drawn together at Narbonne, began to march in the Month of May. Perpignau surrendered to James and received the French. Elna was taken by Storm, and all that were within destroy'd, excepting the Bastard de Roussillon, who shewed them a passage through the Mountains. These two Cities were belonging to James.

The

The Arragonian who guarded the narrow Passages, finding the French at his back, quitted his Posts, and left their entrance into Catalonia free. They on the suddain took several little places, and laid Siege to Geronde. That King was lying in wait to relieve it: but being beaten and grievously wounded in an Ambuscade, he had designed to intercept the Convoy which was marching from the Port of Roses, the place surrendered for want of Provisions, after a two Months Siege.

Three Months after the Fight, that King died of his Wounds in Valencia. Alphonso his eldest Son succeeded him in that Kingdom, and James the second Son seized on that in the Island of Sicilia.

The rest of the Campagne was not so happy for the French, the Admiral Lauria knowing, that out of an imprudent Management and Husbandry to save Charges, they had sent back the Vessels belonging to the Pisans and Genoese who were under pay, fell upon the rest of the Fleet and defeated them all, except such as escaped into the Port of Roses. The scarcity of Provisions and Sicknes, brought the whole Army almost to nothing; The King falling Sick, and hoping for no good by the approaching Winter, took his way towards France, and was brought back to Perpignian in a Litter.

Geronde, and all the places he had Conquer'd in Catalongne, held but a very few days after his departure: The Melancholy he conceived upon this Revolution, and the agitation of the Journey increased his Sicknes so much, that he died at Perpignau the 6th day of October. He was in the beginning of the Five and fortieth year of his Life, and the Sixteenth of his Reign. His Fleh and Bowels were interred in the Cathedral of Narbonne, and his Bones brought to St. Denis.

If we consider his Qualities, he was Valiant, Good, Liberal, Just, and very Pious, but too simple, and too easie to be deceived. If his Conduct, it was not over-happy in those undertakings he made abroad, but for his Enterprizes at home they could not succeed better for his Kingdom, since it grew rich and flourishing by a Peace of Fifteen years continuance, without any vexation of Imposts, and the maintenance of a most exact and speedy Justice.

By Isabella, Daughter of James I. King of Arragon, he left two Sons, those were Philip and Charles; The first Reigned, the second was Earl of Valois, and Father of a Philip who came to the Crown. By his second Wife, Mary de Brabant, he had one Son and two Daughters, the Son was Lewis Earl of Euveux. From him sprang the Branch of Euveux, into which the Crown of Navarre was brought by Marriage. The Daughters were Margaret and Blanch, Margaret was Married in the year 1298. to Edward I. King of England; Blanch having been twice Contracted, once with John de Namur, eldest Son of Guy Earl of Flanders, the other time with John d' Avesnes Earl of Ostrevant, eldest Son of John d' Avesnes Earl of Haynault, Married at last in the year 1298. to Rodolph Duke of Austria, eldest Son of Albertus the Emperor, by whom she had a Son, but both the Mother and the Child were Poysoned in the City of Vienna, Anno 1305.

PHILIP IV. Surnamed the Fair, King of France XLV. and of Navarre also by his Wife, Aged Seventeen years, and some Months.

After Philip had brought back into France the remainder of the Army, and conveyed his Fathers Bones to St. Denis, he went to be Crowned at Rheims by the hands of the Archbishop Peter Barbet, the Sixth day of January, with the Queen his Wife.

1286.

Guy de Dampierre had succeeded in the Earldom of Flanders after the death of his Mother, and had done Homage for it to Philip the Hardy, but neither his Mother, nor himself, for want either of will or power, had not as yet caused the Articles to be Sworn to, and Ratified, which were made in the year 1225. between Philip Augustus and Ferrand, because in truth they were very destructive and ruinous to the Flemings. This year the King having threatned Guy, if he did not perform it without delay, to own him no longer for his Vassal, but to declare a War, the Cities and Commonalty of the Countrey were so alarmed and scared, that they obey'd his Will and Pleasure.

Ever since the death of Philip III. Edward King of England had omitted no endeavour to confirm the Treaties with his Successor. In the year 1286. being landed in France about Pontieu, he was received at Amiens by several Lords whom the King sent to meet him, from thence he came to Paris, where he was Treated magnificently, was present at the Parliament which was held after Easter, and going from thence about Whisontide, went by Land to Burdeaux.

The apparent cause of his Voyage was the desire he had to Compose the business of the King of Arragon, because Alphonso the eldest Son, and Successor of Peter, had Married his Daughter Alienor. He forgot not likewise to press earnestly he might have some reparation for Normandy, and those other Countries which both his Father and himself had renounced, but could obtain nothing in either of these two points. Being returned to Burdeaux, he solemnly received the Ambassadors from the Kings of Castille, of Arragon, and of Sicilia, all Enemies to France, which gave no little jealousy to Philip.

John de Launoy Vice-Roy for Philip in Navarre, continued the War against the Arragonians. But a Lord of the Country named John Corbaran, whom he had entrusted with the Command of the Armies, having been worsted by their Forces, a Truce was agreed upon between the two Crowns.

The King of England laboured very seriously to Compose the Difference between the Kingdom of France and that of Arragon and Sicilia. To this purpose he Confer'd with Alphonso and Orlon de Bearn, and afterwards took the pains to make a Voyage into Sicily, that he might Treat with James the Brother of Alphonso, who, as we have related, had seized upon that Island.

The Negotiations of the King of England were somewhat retarded by the Progress some French Lords had made in that Island. But the rest, who were going thither to compleat that Conquest, being beaten and taken at Sea by Lauria the Admiral, they gave a more willing Ear to what was propounded.

The Treaty was carried on so well, that Charles the Lame was set at Liberty, promising he would bring it so about with the Earl of Valois, that he should renounce the Kingdom of Arragon, and with the Pope, that he should invest James of Arragon in that of Sicily, which his Brother Alphonso should yield to him: For security whereof, Charles gave his Three Sons, and Fifty Gentlemen of Quality as Hostages.

When he was deliver'd from his Imprisonment, he did not hold himself obliged to make that good which he had been forced to promise: on the contrary, being in France, he exhorted the Earl of Valois not to desist from his Right to the Kingdom of Arragon, and going afterwards into Italy, he got himself to be Crowned by the Pope, who was then at Geronza, King of Sicilia both on this side and beyond the Fare.

So that James of Arragon perceiving the Treaty was broke, fell upon Calabria, where the City of Catanzara had revolted in his favour. Robert d' Artois laid Siege to it, James and his Admiral Lauria hastned to its relief, and being beaten, went and blocked up Gaeta, thinking to make a Diversion: but Charles and Robert followed at the same time, and besieged the Besiegers so straightly, that they reduced them to Famine.

Then the Sicilian caused, I know not how, the Popes Legat to intervene, who demanded a Truce for two years, and Charles not well informed of the extremity wherein his Enemies were, consented to it a little too easily; at which Robert was so incensed that he retired into France, and carried all his Forces with him.

Don Sancho King of Castille desired earnestly to have a Peace with King Philip; and for that reason he would have given him up the two Sons of Alphonso de Cerda, and to this intent had endeavoured to get them out of the hands of the Arragonian who kept them. Now the Arragonian having denied so to do, he Treated with Philip, obliging himself to give the Kingdom of Murcia to the eldest of those two Brothers, and some other Lands to the second. The Arragonian hearing of this Treaty, made haste to set them at liberty, that so they might be obliged to him, and continue still Enemies to Sancho. In effect, they were so ill advised, as to refuse to stand to the Agreement which Philip their Cousin German had made for them, and immediately took up Arms against the Castilian.

Philip's displeasure for being thus contradicted by these two Brothers was craftily managed by the Castilian, so that those two Kings had Interview at Bayonne, and there made a Treaty; by which Philip, according the Advice of some interested Counsellors, totally abandoned his unhappy Cousins, and withall yielded up and gave to Don Sancho all the rights he might have to the Crown of Castille.

"This year Alexander III. King of Scotland dying without Children, there arose a long and bloody Quarrel for the Succession between two Lords, each of them pretending to be the next Heir. Both of them being of the Blood Royal by their Mothers, who were the Daughters of Scotland; Their names were Robert Bruce, and John de Baliol. This last was Originally of Normandy, History does not mention of what part, for there are divers places have the name of Baliol. These two Competitors, having refer'd their Difference to Edward King of England, he gives Judgment in favour of Baliol, whether he believed his Title to be the better, or whether it were because he made himself his Vassal, as the Scots reproach him, and had promis'd to hold his Crown of him.

"Alfir Sultan of Egypt had in the year 1288. wrested all the Cities of Tripoly, Syria, Lidon, and Tyre, with some other strong Holds out of the hands of the Christians. They had nothing more left in all those Countreys, but the Sea-Port Town of Ptolemais, which made a Truce with the Sultan. The French, the Pisans, the Genoese, and the Venetians had each of them their distinct Quarters and Magistrates. The Pope, the King of Cyprus, the Earl of Tripoly, the Patriarch of Jerusalem, and the Templars contended for the Sovereignty. Amidst these Divisions there was nothing but Murthers, Robberies, and Plunderings, both within and without the City.

"Besides all this, they were so imprudent as to suffer some numbers of new Recruits that were come to them as Adventurers of the Cross, to break the Truce. The Sultan Mebee-Arse who succeeded to Alfir, demanded Reparation, but as it was not in their power to deliver up the Violators, he besieged the City, and after Forty days continual attacks, gained it by Storm, putting to the Sword all that were within, excepting only such as could save themselves on Ship-board.

"Such was the end of the Christians Conquests in Syria, and their Expeditions into the Holy Land. For although the Popes have since caused the Croisado's to be preach'd for the recovery of it, and several Princes and great Persons have made Vow, to go thither for the same purpose: Nevertheless since the loss of Ptolemais, none of them have gone thither, but only some Pilgrims.

Charles the Lame was in the end forced, that he might free his Children and release those Gentlemen he had given in Hostage, and who were all sent into Arragon, to persuade his Cousin Charles Earl of Valois, to renounce the Kingdom of Arragon; upon which Condition King Alphonso engaged himself to go with his Forces into the Holy Land, and in his passage through Sicilia, to do his utmost to induce his Brother James, Usurper of that Island, to restore it to Charles the Lame. Who in the mean while gave his Daughter Clemence in Marriage to Charles de Valois, and for a Portion the Counties of Anjou and Maine.

Otheline Earl of Burgundy ready to be trod under foot by Robert Duke of Burgundy, who would have the Earldom to hold of the Dutchy, and do him Homage; cast himself head-long into the protection of King Philip, bringing to him his eldest Daughter named Jane, that he might Marry her to one of his Sons: and in favour of this Alliance, he from that time gave him up his Earldom, reserving only to himself the Revenue during his Life. This Jane was afterwards Married to Philip the Long, the Kings eldest Son, who was then but in his Cradle, and her Sister Blanch to the second, who was called Charles the Fair.

1291.

The excessive Usury of the Italian Bankers, sucked all the Substance of the poor People: The King had need of Money, he was glad of such an opportunity and pretence to do Justice to get some from them. He therefore caused them all to be seized upon May-day night; This was a sweet Knot or Nose-gay of May-Flowers: but since under the same pretence, they laid hold of many honest Merchants likewise, and raised great Fines or Taxes upon them, as well as upon the Blood-sucking Leeches, this inquiry, which in it self was just and necessary, was converted into a most odious Robbery.

1291.

* The Annunciation.

"It is believed, that this year the holy Virgins little House at Nazareth, where the Incarnation* of the Word was declared to her, was by Angels transferr'd to the top of a little Mountain in Dalmatia, on the other side of the Adriatique-Sea. That from thence, three years afterwards, it was brought to the hither-side in a Wood that belonged to a Widow named Loretta, and that it was removed at two other times into two several places, in the last whereof, the Angels left it. There is a Magnificent Church built there and a pretty good Town, and both are called by the name of Loretta.

1291.

"The Emperor Rodolph ended his days in the Burrough of Genesheim near Spire, the last day of September, having Reigned Eighteen years. He laid the foundation of the prodigious Grandeur of the House of Austria, but undermined that of the Empire in Italy, by neglecting to go thither, and selling the Sovereignty to divers Cities of Tuscany in the year 1286. especially to that of Luca and Florence, who bought it of him with their Money.

"In his room Adolph Earl of Nassau was elected the 6th of January and Crowned at Frankfort; a brave and generous Prince, who would have maintained that Title better than any of his Ancestors, had he but had as much Riches as Vertue.

The Peace between France and England had lasted to this time, to the great satisfaction of both Nations, when the accidental Quarrel of an English Mariner with a Mariner of Normandy upon the Coast of Guyenne, where they had landed to take in fresh Water, set them against one another. First, Ship and Ship endeavour'd to plunder or take what they could singly on each side, then they brought Fleet against Fleet. The English had the worst, their King Edward demanded restitution of such Merchants Goods as had been made Prize in these Scuffles. Philip on the contrary Summons him to appear in his Court of Parliament as his Vassal, Edward sent his Brother Edmund, but Philip not satisfied with that, caused him to be declared Contumacious, and ordered his Lands should be seized.

In Execution of this Decree, the year following the Constable Rodolph de Nesle seized several Cities in Guyenne, and even that of Bordeaux, which was the Capital.

Thus a Riot between Private Men blew their little Sparks of Contention into a flame of War, which, one may say, proved very fatal to France, since it gave way to the overthrowing of her ancient Laws and Liberties, and the introducing and establishment of divers Charges and Subsidies on the People. The increase and burthen whereof is ordinarily followed with Revolutions and Seditions, as it fell out this year by a great Commotion hapning at Rouen; but which had the same end and event as all the like Enterprizes generally come to, that is to say, the Hanging of the most forward and hottest, and the Banishment or Ruine of the rest.

The King of England vexed at the loss of those places in Guyenne, solicited all Princes against France, particularly the Emperor Adolph with great Sums of Money, and Guy de Dampierre Earl of Flanders, with the hopes of the Marriage of his Son, Prince of Wales, with Philippetta, that Earls Daughter. Adolph sent to defie the King in haughty language, but they gave him no other answer but a Sheet of white Paper; For which he shewed no other Reientment but by Threats, and so turned his Arms against some German Rebels.

As for Guy, having been allured to Paris, with his Wife and Daughter, by Letters from the King, fraught with Expressions of Kindness, he was much amazed to find himself made a Prisoner there. It is true, that about a Twelve month after, himself and his Wife were set at liberty, but his Daughter they kept still to break the Measures of that Match, too pernicious to the French.

In the year 1294 the Cardinal Benedict Cajetan, by intrigues, or by deceit and fourbery, obliged Pope Celestin to resign the Popedom, and by the same Methods got himself to be elected, he was named Boniface VIII. His Ancestors were Originally Catalonians, and had taken the name of Cajetan because they first dwelt near * Cajeta, before they transplanted themselves to the City of Anagnia, where he was born.

At his advancement to that Dignity, he endeavours to mediate a Peace between all Christian Princes. He could not procure it between France and England: but he settled that between Arragon and France. King Alphonso was dead, and James his Brother succeeded him. It was agreed, that Charles Earl of Valois should renounce the Kingdom of Arragon, wherein he had been invested by Pope Martin V. upon which Condition the Arragonian repudiating Isabella de Castille for being too high of Kin, should Marry his Daughter, set the three Sons of Charles the Lame, and other Hostages at liberty, and surrender Sicily, and what he had Conquer'd in Abruzzas: but Frederic his younger Brother, to whom Alphonso had by his last Testament will'd that Kingdom, got himself to be named King by the Sicilians.

"Since then, that which we call the Kingdom of Sicilia, was dismembred in two, that beyond the Fare, which was the Island, and that on this side which they called the Kingdom of Naples. They were again re-joynd in Anno 1503. and are to this day in the same hands.

"The Sons of Charles the Lame being set at liberty, the eldest named Charles entered into the Order of the Friars Minors. The following year he was by the Pope promoted to the Archbishoprick of Thoulouze, which he accepted not of till after he had made his Vows.

The King of Englands heart was much set upon two things, the one to Subject the Kingdom of Scotland, and the other to recover the Towns in Guyenne; He thought the first was pretty well advanc'd, having obliged Baliol to render him Homage; and to compass the second, he prepared a mighty Fleet, and had strengthened himself with Friends and Alliances. But Philip to prevent his designs, induced the King of Scotland, already threatened by his Subjects, who scorned to subject themselves to the English, to break the Treaty he had made with Edward, and Allie himself with France; and for security of this new Bond of Alliance, he promised to give the eldest Daughter of the Earl of Valois to his eldest Son, whose name was Edward.

At the same time he caused the People of Wales also to rise, who out of a wild and un-

Emperor Adolph, and Adolphus of Nassau, Reigning Six years and an half, is slain in a Battle.

untamed humour for Liberty, were easily heated and drawn into the Field. The great devastations and spoil they made this time in Pembrook-shire, and thereabout, broke all the King of England's Measures. He was forced to go in Person that way to stop their progress, and lay aside the business of Guyenne, till he had quell'd those hot and stubborn old Enemies; as he did, having overmaster'd almost all of them, in four Months time.

"About this time the Principality of Milan and Neighbouring Cities was fixed and "perpetuated in the Family of the Vicounts, to which Otho Vicount Archbishop of "Milan contributed not a little. Matthew his Brothers Son was created the first "In Pistoia, a City in Tuscany, as then powerful enough, it hapned that the rich "and numerous Family of the Cancellary were divided in two Factions, the one of "the White, the other of the Black; The first joyned themselves with the Guelphes, "the second with the Ghibelins; and that fury and madness spread over all Italy, and "caused infinite Seditions and Murthers.

Pope Boniface was Proud, Haughty, Imperious, and Undertaking, he thought all the Princes of the Earth must bow to his Commands: but he found a Philip of France at the head of them, a young Prince of no very patient Humour, more Potent than any one of his Predecessors, and who had a Council consisting of People that were stout and impetuous. So that Boniface, who ardently pursued the Design he aimed at to oblige all Kings to the Holy War, having sent to tell both him and the King of England, that they must make a Truce upon pain of Excommunication, he made Reply, That he took no Rule or Law from any one in the Government of his Kingdom, and that the Pope had in this case no right, but to Exhort and Advise, not to Command. This was the first occasion of Enmity betwixt these two great Powers.

There were two more almost at the same time; The one, that Boniface received the Complaints of the Earl of Flanders, who implored his Justice, because Philip denied to restore his Daughter to him; The other, for that he erected the Abby of St. Antonine de Pamiez to a Bishoprick, and put the Abbot of St. Antonine into it. Observe, en passant, that this City was otherwhile called Fredalas.

1296.

King Philip was offended at this Erection, and more yet with the choice of the Bishop, (his name was Bernard Saiffet) because he believed him a Factioned Man, and too much devoted to Boniface. Nor would he suffer him to take possession, and therefore Lewis Bishop of Toulouse administered in that Church for two whole years together.

1295, and 96.

The War was still carried on in Guyenne by the Earl of Valois and the Constable de Nesle, and then by Robert Earl of Artois. The English had for Commanders there, John Earl of Richmond, and Edmond the Kings Brother. To what purpose would it be to relate the taking of many petty places, and the divers small Skirmishes? The French say they won two Signal Victories, one of them was gained by the Earl of Valois, and the other by the Earl of Artois. It is certain, that Edmond being beaten by the first near Bayonne, was forced to retire into that City, where he died; and the Earl of Lincoln, who commanded that English Army afterwards, having lost many of his Men before Dags, durst not stay for Robert d' Artois, and retreated.

In the mean while a most dangerous Storm was forming against France. A League was made at Cambray, by the Interest of the King of England, whereinto he entred with the Duke of Brabant, the Earls of Holland, Juliers, Luxemburgh, Guelders and Bar, Albert Duke of Austria, the Emperor Adolphus, and the Flemming himself; all which sent their several Cartels of Defiance to King Philip; but none of them vexed him so much as the Challenge from the Earl of Flanders, because he was his Vassal.

* Or Walter:

The Earl of Bar began the Attaque, by ravaging Champagne: but he retir'd when he heard how *Gaultier * de Crecy* Lieutenant of the Kings Army, burnt and plundered his Country. Soon after the Queen being advanced that way to defend her Country of Champagne, he was so faint-hearted as to surrender himself to her without making any defence. They sent him Prisoner to Paris; from whence he could get no Release but upon very hard Conditions. For he did Homage to the King for his Earldom, which he ever had pretended to hold in Franc Aient, or Free-Tenure; and moreover he was condemned by a Decree of Parliament to go and bear Arms in the Holy Land till the King were pleased to recall him.

As for Florent Earl of Holland, he was kill'd by a Gentleman whose Wife he had Dishonour'd. His Son John died soon after him, by eating of some ill-Morsel. John d' Avelines Avelines Earl of Haynault their Cousin and nearest Relation, inherited Holland and Frisland.

The greatest burthen of the War fell upon Flanders: King Philip marched into the Country with a vast Army, to whom the Queen joyned her Forces after she had subdued the Earl of Bar. He took L'Isle by a three Months Siege, and Courtray and Douay without much difficulty; whilst on the other hand Robert Earl of Artois gained the Battle of Furnes, where the Earl of Juliers was so ill handled, that he died of his Wounds.

Adolphus detained in Germany by the private Troubles the French started amongst them, or the Sums of Money Philip gave him under-hand, did not bring the Flemming that Relief which he expected. Withall they found a way by the all-powerful influence of Money to debauch Albertus Duke of Austria from the Party, who brought over with him the Duke of Brabant, and the Earls of Luxembourg, Guelders and Beaumont. As for the King of England who was there in Person, and had his Navy at Damm, and his Land Forces in the Country Towns, he brought more inconvenience than assistance to the Flemming. Besides we may add, that the greatest Cities in Flanders, as Ghent and Bruges, had been against the making of this War, and amongst them a Faction had declared for the French, who called themselves the Portes-Lys, or the Flower-de-Luce-Bearers.

Now the King being retired to Ghent with the Earl of Flanders, could find no other way to Charm the Swords of the French in those Countries, but by a Truce. The intercession of the Earl of Savoy, and Charles King of Sicilia obtained it with difficulty for them, from the Tenth of October till Twelfth-day, for Guyenne, and to S. Andrews Holy-day for Flanders only.

Edward knew how to employ that time to good purpose; Having passed the Sea, he went against the Scots who had shaken off the Yoke; and not only forced their King John and his Barons to do Homage to him a second time, of which a Charter written in French was Signed and Sealed, and to renounce the Alliance with France: but likewise kept him Prisoner a while with some of those Lords, confining them in the Tower of London, resolving not to release him till he had made an end of his Disputes with the French.

The Truce being expir'd, he made ready to return into Guyenne by the Month of March in the year 1298. Nevertheless, as either of these Kings had partly what they desired, that is, the King of France the Towns in Flanders, and the King of England the Kingdom of Scotland: it was not difficult for their Ambassadors, who met about it at Montreuil on the Sea Coast, to prolong the Truce to the end of the year.

It was agreed, That the Allies of both Kings should be Comprised, by consequence John Balol ought to have been so, but they could never obtain his liberty; and that all the places Conquer'd in Flanders should be in the hands of Philip during that Truce. The King of England had obliged himself by Oath to the Flemming, not to make a Peace till they were restor'd: but in the mean time he agreed his Marriage with Margaret the Sister to Philip, and that of his Son Edward with Isabella the Daughter of that King.

The Money that Adolphus had received on both hands, from the Kings of France and England, was the cause of his Ruine, and on the contrary, what Albertus had taken for the same end, served to raise his Fortune. For this last having made use of some of it to corrupt the Princes of Germany, who were displeased for that Adolphus had given them no share of his, it hapned that in an Assembly they had at Prague for the Coronation of King Venceslaus, they easily suffer'd themselves to be persuaded, that the Pope was consenting to the Deposition of Adolphus, as being useless to the Empire; And in effect, the Cabal was so strong that they did Depose him, and elected Albert Duke of Austria. The two Competitors came to blows about it near Spire the Second of July, Adolph fighting valiantly, but betray'd, or at least forsaken by his Men, lost his Life there.

The Election of Albert was illegal, to rectifie it he was fain to lay it down, at least seemingly, in the hands of the Electors, who elected him the second time with all the Formalities, the Seven and twentieth of the same Month. But the Pope still refused to approve it, and designed that Crown for Charles de Valois, for whom he had a particular Esteem.

1298.

He seemed now as if he would have sweetned the sharp Humours of Philip; for the year preceding he Canonized St. Lewis his Grandfather, and he interpreted the Bull, by which he had forbidden the Clergy to pay any Tenths or Contributions to Princes, very favourably. Philip believing he had done it expressly to choquer him, Emperor Andron. and Albert, elected in Anno 1298. Reigned Ten years.

was offended, several Letters had been written on that Subject to each other, and things were like to have proceeded to the greatest Extremity. However Boniface upon the intreaty of some French Prelats, yielded to reason, declaring, that he intended not to forbid voluntary Contributions, provided they were made without Exaction. He added, that they might be levied without permission from the Pope in times of the Kingdoms necessity; and that, even upon urgent necessities, they might be constrained by the Authority Apostolick, Spiritually and Temporally.

But as their Spirits were already exasperated on either side, the Wound burst open afresh in a short while afterwards. Boniface had been chosen Arbitrator of the Differences between the King, with the English and the Flemming; After the hearing of their Deputies, he gave his Sentence of Arbitration, which ordained, That the Flemmings Daughter should be set at liberty, and his Towns restored; and as if he had been the Sovereign Judge, he caused it to be publicly pronounced in his Consistory. Which so touched the King and his Council, that it being brought to Paris by the English Deputy, the Earl of Artois snatched it out of his hands, rent it, and threw it into the Fire.

The Queen on her part made use of the means within her power to highten the King her Husbands Wroth against the Flemming, for whom she had a mortal hatred. So that the Truce being expir'd, the Earl of Valois had order to enter into Flanders, and carry things on to the last push.

He pursues him so smartly, that having taken Dam and Dixmude from him, he besieged him in Ghent with all his Family. That unfortunate Prince destitute of all succour, and forsaken even by his own Subjects, was advised to render both himself and his two Sons into his hands. The Earl of Valois promised he would carry him to Paris to Treat with the King himself, and assured him, that if within a Twelve-month he could not procure a Peace, he should be set again at liberty, and brought back to the same place where they had taken him. But the King would have no regard to what his Uncle had sworn, detains the Flemming and his two Sons, and disposes them into several Prisons asunder from each other.

The Earl of Valois being picqued for that they violated the Faith he had given the Flemming, or by some other motive of Ambition, went out of the Kingdom, and passes into Italy, whither the Pope had earnestly invited him for at least Three years. He there Married Catharine the Daughter and Heiress of Baldwin the last Emperor of Constantinople, and the Pope gave him that Empire, and made him his Vicar or Lieutenant over all the Lands belonging to the Church, hoping by his means to carry on that great design of the Holy War which was ever rumbling in his Head.

For the third time the Truce was prolonged betwixt the two Kings, by virtue whereof the Prisoners on both sides were set at liberty, and particularly John Baliol * King of Scotland, who was brought into Normandy, and left in the keeping of some Bishops who were willing to take that Charge upon them.

The Emperor Albert could not obtain his Confirmation of Boniface, and Philip was apprehensive of the audacious Undertakings of this Pope: for this reason, both the one and the other to prevent him from taking advantage of their Divisions to ruin them, Conferred together at Vanconleurs. In that Interview they renewed the ancient Confederations of the Empire with France; and to unite themselves more closely, Treated the Marriage between Rodolph the Son of Albert, and Blanch the Daughter of Philip. It was not compleated till the following year.

"At the end of the Thirteenth Age of the Christian Era, the Pope publish'd a general Indulgence or Relaxation of Canonical Pains due for Sins, for all those who being Confessed and Penitent, should visit the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, for a certain number of days. Since that, Clement VI. reduc'd it to Fifty years, and called it the Jubile.

"Boniface hath been reproached, that on this Ceremony he appeared sometimes in Pontifical Habit, sometimes in Habits Imperial, causing two Swords to be carried before him to signify his double power, Spiritual and Temporal. He had so in effect; but the last only in his own Territory. However he did not understand it thus: as his Actions, and the Sixth Book of the Decretals, wherein he boldly affirms, that there is but one Power, which is the Ecclesiastical, does but too plainly shew.

"This Institution of the Jubile seems to have its Original from Secular Pass-times. The Ancient Romans Celebrated them once in every Hundred years; Paganism being abolished, the People did not lay aside their Custom of coming from all parts to Rome the first year of every Age: but sanctifying that profane Solemnity, they paid their Devotions on the Tombs of the Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul.

"Several do in this year place the beginning of that dreadful Family, or House of the Oibomans, and tell us that the Turks having conquer'd much of the Countreys belonging to the Greeks in Asia, divided those Lands into seven Principalities, of which the Province of Bithynia fell by Lot to Osman, or * Oiboman, Son of Ortogules, "who was in great reputation of probity and valour amongst his Country-men. His Succellors have devoured, not only the other six Principalities, but the Grecian Empire, the Kingdom of Egypt, and so many Countreys of the Christian Princes, that "it is to be feared they may swallow up the Western Empire likewise.

* Or Ottoman.

Boniface was grown obstinate in his design for the expedition to the Holy-Land, and perswaded himself he had a right to oblige all Christian Princes to it. He therefore sent Bernard Saisset, Bishop of Pamiez to Philip, with a charge to exhort him to this voyage, and also to summon him to make good his word to the Earl of Flanders, by setting his Daughter at liberty. He acquitted himself of his Commissions in such high terms, and it was told the King that he held discourses upon several occasions so injurious to his Person, and so factious against the quiet and peace of the Kingdom, that he made him be seized and kept prisoner.

Then their hatred ran up to the extremity, the King besides all this being mightily heated by the ill reports of William de Nogaret. For he informed him, that when he was sent Ambassador to the Pope, to acquaint him of his Alliance with the Emperor Albert; he perceived that his Holiness was very ill inclined towards him, that he had bad designs, and that he led a scandalous life, and most unworthy of the Succession to the Apostles.

On his part, Boniface dispatched the Arch-Deacon of Narbonne to Command him to set the Bishop of Pamiez at liberty, and let him know there was a Bull, importing, that the King was under his correction for the sins he committed in his Temporal Administration, as well as for others; That the collation of Benefices did not appertain to him, and that the Regalia was an usurpation. By another Bull he suspended all the privileges granted by his predecessors to the King, to those of his House, and to his Council. And by a Third he ordered all the Prelats of the Kingdom should come to Rome, to find out some remedy against Philips disorders, and the Enterprizes he made upon the Ecclesiastical State.

The King upon the earnest intreaties of the Clergy, put the Bishop of Pamiez into the hands of the Arch-Bishop of Narbonne, his Metropolitan: but he forbid the Prelats for going out of the Kingdom, or the transporting of any Gold or Silver. And for that point which he believed did concern his Sovereignty, he thought it best to support himself with the Authority of all the Estates of his Kingdom against Boniface. The Estates assembled in Notre-Dame the 10th of April, in the year 1301, declared, that they owned no other Superiour in Temporals besides the King; and in conformity to that, the Clergy wrote to the Pope, as the Nobility, and the third Estate did to the Cardinals; who in their answers assured, that it had never been the Popes intention to attribute that Superiority to himself.

"During these quarrels a prodigious Comet appeared in the Heavens; it began to shew it self in Autumn, towards the West, and in the Sign of Scorpio, darting its Rays sometimes to the Eastward, and sometimes to the Westward. It was seen but one Month.

The Earl of Artois, Nogaret, Peter Flote, Chancellor to the King, and the Colona's, whom Boniface had thrust out of all, proscribed and imprisoned, exasperated all things more and more. Many nevertheless were scandalized, that they should contend against the Pope, and therefore it was thought decent to maintain that he was not so, and that by opposing his Person, they did not oppose the Vicar of Jesus Christ, but an ill Man that had intruded himself into the Papacy.

The King being therefore at the Louvre, Nogaret in presence of divers Princes of the Blood, and Bishops, presented a Petition the Twelfth day of March, accusing him of Heresie, Simony, Magick, and other enormous crimes, and demanding the Kings assistance, that there might be a general Council called, to deliver the Church from this oppression.

The Pope had dispatched into France a Cardinal, named John Le Moyne, a native of the Diocess of Amiens, a knowing Man, and very Learned, upon pretence of negotiating some agreement with the King: but indeed, to sound the inclination of the Clergy in his favour. Now being but ill satisfied with the answers the King made to his Quæries; he sent another Bull which declared him Excommunicate, for having hindered the Prelats from going to Rome, forbid them to admit him to the the Sacraments or Mass, Commanded them to be at Rome within three Months, and summoned some by name, upon the penalty of being deposed.

"During these Contrasts, Charles Earl of Valois was gone into Sicilia with a great Army, with design to reduce it to the Obedience of Charles the Lame his Nephew. He made so little progress, that he thought fitter to make peace between both parties. In effect, he succeeded better in it than in his War. The conditions of the Treaty were, That Frederic should marry his Daughter Eleonor, for whose Portion Sicilia should remain to him under the Title of the Kingdom of Trinacria: but if he had no Children by her, the Island should return to Charles the Lame, or to his Heirs, upon their payment of a hundred thousand Ounces of Gold.

"Before his expedition into Sicilia, he had been sent to Florence by the Pope, to calm the Factions wherewith that Republick was most horribly tormented. During five Months time that he remained there, his Care nor his Authority could by no means prevent the Guelphs and Black from proscribing the White, who were for the most part Gibbelins, and from ruining their Houses. Dante Aligeri, one of the rarest wits of his time, who was of the faction of the White, though otherwise he were a Guelph, was put into the number of the banished, and could never obtain to be recalled. He lays the fault upon the Earl of Valois, for not having provided against those injurious proceedings, and tried to place his revenge upon all the House of France, by the cruel bitings of his Pen; which certainly would have made some impression upon their posterity, had there not been proofs much clearer than the Sun at Noon-day, which dispelled that Satyrical calumny.

"There are some Authors that assign in this year 1302. the Invention of the Mariners Compass, or Needle, by one Flavio a native of Melfus; * However, since we find some mention of it in Authors long before this time, we can at most but give this Flavio the honour of having brought it to greater use and perfection.

This same year 1302. Flanders revolted, and was lost as to the French. Those people, irreconcilable enemies to Taxes, and heavy oppressions, could not endure the violence and imposts wherewith their young Governour James de Chastillon vexed and tormented them, by the evil Counsels of Peter Flote, a violent and most covetous Man; and indeed he was one-eyed. They therefore called in William Son of the Earl of Juliers, and a Daughter of Earl Guy's to be their Chief, whose younger Sons, with the Sons of his Brother John, came into the County of Alost to support this Rising.

The Fire began at Malan, but broke out more fiercely at Bruges, where the French Garrison, being all knock'd on the Head, the Towns of Furne, Bergh, Bourbourg, Cassel followed, and Guy Earl of Namur, one of the Flemmings Sons, laid Siege before the Cittadel of Courtray.

The King raised a great Army to chastise the Rebels, and gave the Command of it to Robert d' Artois. That Prince marched to relieve Courtray, with Ten thousand Horse, and Forty thousand Foot; The Flemmings though they were but ill Arm'd, had neither Nobility, nor Cavalry, durst resolutely wait his coming, and gained the Victory, with the slaughter of Twenty thousand French, amongst which number was that Prince himself, above Twenty great Lords with him, and Peter Flote, principal cause of those misfortunes. This was on the 9th of June.

To revenge this bloody affront, the King takes the Field himself, with above an Hundred thousand Men, but the assurance of the Flemmings, and the intelligence sent him by his Sister the Queen of England, that if he hazarded a Battle, he would be betrayed to his own Men, hindered him from proceeding any farther than Donay; besides the Autumnal Rains rendered his march very difficult.

1303.

This War very troublesome in it self, would have been much more so, had the King of England meddled in it; as he ought to have done after he had engag'd the Flemmings. Their troubles help'd to advance his Affairs, after his having prolonged the Truce two or three times with the French, he converted it at last to a final Peace. The Treaty was concluded at Paris the Twentieth day of May 1303. It was agreed that Philip should restore to him all what he had taken from him in Guyenne, and should grant him a Patent for the investiture of that Dutchy. John Baliol was set at full liberty; but the Scots despised him as a Man of little courage, who had twice bowed the knee before the King of England, and would not own him for their lawful King; so that he remained in France, where he ended his days as a private person. It is not said what the fortune of his Son Edward was. However, although the English had wholly subdued Scotland, it nevertheless hapned, that some years years afterwards, Robert, Son of Robert Bruce raised that Kingdom again, which seemed to be extinguished, and freed it from the bondage of England.

Now the courage of the Flemmings being untameable, their old Earl who grew weary of his imprisonment, obtained a Truce, by the means of Ane Earl of Savoy, during which interval they permitted him, leaving his Sons in hostage, to go to his Towns in Flanders, to endeavour to bring them back again to the obedience of the King.

The same year the King having had information, that there was a dangerous Faction brooding in Languedoc, and in Guyenne, took a progress into those Countreys, where he visited, and highly caressed the chief Cities and Nobility: At his return Guy de Luzignan Earl of Angoulesme, and Lord of Cognac having no Children, resigned his Lands to him, to the great prejudice of three Sisters he had, The King, to make those Sisters some manner of reparation, gave them I know not what Lands in Angoulmois.

Queen Jane his Wife, Heiress of Navarre, Champagne and Brie, built and founded in the University of Paris, that famous Colledge that bears the name of Navarre, and which, even to this day has been the Cradle, or rather Nursery of the most illustrious Nobility of France. She died about the end of the same year.

The Earl Guy not having been able to gain any thing upon the Flemmings, the King resolved to make them bend by force. He got together the most numerous Army that had been levied of a long time of French, Germans, Spaniards, and Italians, and put himself at the head of them. At the same time he had a Fleet at Sea, commanded by the famous Roger de Lauria. This Admiral gained a bloody Battle against Philip, one of the Flemmings Sons, who besieged Zirczee, that held for John Earl of Holland, who by this means preserved Zealand and kept it. The King soon after gained another at Land near Mons, the Eighteenth of August, but not without great danger to his Person. Above five and twenty thousand Flemmings were slain there.

For all these rebukes they would not stoop, nor give over; but having shut up shop in all their Cities, and got an Army on foot of Sixty thousand fighting Men, they came before P'Isle, which he then held besieged, demanding Peace, or a Battle. This furious resolution obtained them a Peace, upon condition that they should enjoy their Liberties, Goods, Priviledges, and strong Holds; that the Earl should be restored to his Earldom, excepting those Lands on this side the River Lys, which should remain to the King, as likewise the Cities of P'Isle and Donay, till the Earl should be more fully agreed with him, and the Flemmings paid down the sum of 800000 Livres.

The prisoners set at liberty, the Earl Guy went to visit his Countrey and his Children. Being returned to Compeigne upon his faith, as he had promised to finish the Treaty; he died some few days after, aged Four score years. His eldest Son Robert de Betune succeeded him in his Earldom.

The preceding year before he undertook this Expedition, King Philip had considered how to pre-arm himself against the Bulls of Boniface; and for that purpose had convoked a second general Assembly of his Subjects at Paris. The Earls Guy de St. Pol, John de Dreux, and William du Pleffis, Lord de Vezzenobre, did there accuse the Pope of Heresie, and divers things so horrible, that a Christian can hardly tell how to name, much less to believe them. Du pleffis offer'd to prosecute him before the Council, adhering to the Appeal heretofore brought by Nogaret, and putting himself under the protection of the Council, and the Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul.

The King promised to procure the Convocation, and in case Boniface should any way proceed against him, formed his Appeal as Duplessis had done.

Moreover, fearing his People too much oppressed with Imposts, and dissatisfied with the Government of his Ministers, should chance to fail him in his necessity, he found it necessary to prevent all stirs and factions that might be set on foot in favour of the Pope, to have Writings or Letters of all the Provinces, Cities, Corporations, Churches, Religious Houses, Prelats, and Lords of his Kingdom, who approved of his Resolution, and joyned therein with him.

During these proceedings Nogaret was gone into Italy to seize upon the Person of Boniface, under pretence of bringing him by fair means or by foul to the Council. The Pope had retired himself to Anagnia, the place of his Nativity, where he thought himself in greater security than in Rome; and there he was upon the Birthday of our Lady, to publish a Bull, by which he Excommunicated the King, dispenced his Subjects of their Obedience to him, and gave his Kingdom to the first occupier.

occupier. He had already offer'd it to the Emperour Albert, and to engage him to it, had confirmed his Election.

But the Eve before, Nogaret, who was in a Castle near at hand, assisted by Sciarræ Colonna, whom Boniface had kept in the Galleys, with some other Gentlemen of the Countrey, enemies to Boniface, and Two hundred Horse of those Troops as Charles de Valois had left in Tuscany, enters into Anagnia, gained the People, and having forced his Palace, seized on his Person; which was not done without some sort of Outrage worthy an Italian revenge, and by plundering his Treasures, which were immense, together with the Houses of three or four Cardinals.

1303. The fourth day the People of Anagnia repenting of their baseness, drove the French and their Soldiers out of the Town. The Pope being thus at liberty withdrew to Rome; and there that haughty spirit was assailed by a burning Fever, of which he died upon the Twelfth day of October.

1303. Nicholas, Cardinal of Ostia, of the Order of the Preaching Friars, elected by the Cardinals the Two and twentieth of November (he was called Benedict XI.) carried things with more sweetness, received the Ambassadors sent by the King very honourably, not admitting Nogaret however at their Audience, who was one, and sent three other Bulls which annull'd all those of Boniface, and restored all things to the same condition they were in formerly. He also revok'd the Condemnations of the Colonna's, excepting only that he did not restore those two again to the dignity of Cardinals, who had been degraded: but he proceeded severely against Nogaret, and all such as had assisted at the Capture of Boniface, and the robbery of the Churches Treasure.

1304. He died the Eighth Month after his Election, being the Seventh of July, in the year 1304. The two Factions of Cardinals, whereof the one were French, the other Italians, and friends to the Pope, were almost eleven Months in the Conclave at Perugia, before they could come to an agreement; in the end the Italians named a French man, which was Bertrand Got * Arch-Bishop of Bourdeaux, whom they knew to be a great enemy to the King; and besides, a Subject to the English. The French before they would consent to it, gave speedy notice to the King, who having sent privately for him, and conferr'd with him near St. John d' Angely, declared to him, it was in his power to make him Pope, provided he agreed to Six things which he required of him, whereof he named five of them to him, but reserved the sixth to time and place. The Arch-Bishop a Gascon, and Vain, cast himself at his Feet, and promised him all; by this means he was elected, being absent, the fifth day of the year, 1305.

1305. Instead of going into Italy, as the Cardinals be'ought him, he sends for them to Lyons, to assist at his Coronation, which was performed the Fourteenth of November. The King, his Brother Charles, a great number of Princes and Lords, and infinite multitudes of People came to be present at this Ceremony. The King having for some space held the Reins of the Popes Mule, left that Office to be done by his Brother Charles, and John Duke of Bretagne, whilst he mounted on Horseback, to march along beside the Holy Father. As they were in their march, an old Wall over-charged with People, tumbled down, and by its fall, overwhelm'd the Duke of Bretagne, and a Brother of the Popes, hurt Charles most grievously, the King somewhat lightly, and beat the Tiara off from the Head of the Pope. A presage of the misfortunes the translation of the Holy See into France was to bring to the Kingdom, and to all Christendom, nay, to the Papacy it self, which by this means did submit to the discretion of the secular Power.

1306. Departing from Lyons the Pope returned to Bourdeaux, where he sojourn'd all the year 1306. went the following year to Poitiers; then in Anno 1308. to exempt himself from the importunities of the Court of France, removed his See to the City of Avignon, which belonged to Charles, King of Sicilia his Vassal.

1307. The Residence of the Court of Rome in France hath introduced three grand disorders, Simony the off-spring of Luxury, and Impiety; Litigious Law-suits, the exercise of Scratch-papers, and idle fellows, such as were the swarms of puny Clerks who follow'd that Court; and another execrable irregularity, to which nature cannot give any name.

1306. To make good his promises, Clement continued the Absolution which Benedict had given the King, restored the Colonna's to their Dignities of Cardinals, made a promotion of Ten Cardinals more, Nine of them being French, and explicated or revoked all the Bulls which Boniface had made, that prejudiced the Kings Authority.

Nogaret

Nogaret, and the other persons of the Kings Council, by the despair they were in of obtaining their Absolution, persisted still in their accusation against Boniface; and the King pressed Clement to condemn his Memory, and cause his Body to be burnt, not believing he could otherwise wash himself clean of those censures and reproaches he had bespatter'd him withal; but Clement to elude that pursuit, referr'd it to a general Council, which was assigned to be three years after that at Vienne in Dauphine; and in the mean time there were divers proceedings and instructions towards carrying on that business.

The Jews were still the execration of Christians, and especially of the common people, because they grated, and even slayed them by their cruel Usury, and by the exactions of new Imposts, of which they were the Farmers. And truly in revenge, or retaliation, they were liable to all sorts of affronts; in any sedition, in their Crusado's, they ever fall upon them; and they were every day accused, either of having committed some insolence against the Sacred Host, or the having crucified some Children upon Good-Friday, or for having affronted the Image of our Saviour; and if they did get out of the Judges Hands, they could hardly save themselves from the fury of the Populace. The Princes after they had made use of those cursed Instruments, made them disgorge again, and often drove them out, that they might have Money to recall them back. This year they were seized upon thorough out all France, the Two and twentieth day of July, banished the Kingdom, and their Goods confiscated. Was this Zeal or Avarice?

The King had Ministers obdurate, pitiless, and resolved to squeeze to the last penny. The chiefest and most in power, was Enguerrand le Portier, Lord of Marigny, who in scraping and levying great sums of Money to bring to his Master, did not forget to fill his own Coffers, and to enrich his Family with more Lands, Employments, and Benefices, then a faithful and disinterested Servant ought to do. So the People had extream troubles and vexations to undergo; one of the greatest was the changing of Moneys, they had made it light and weak, of too base alloy, and put too high a value; then they would set them at a lower rate, the loss was great, the people of Paris mutined, pillag'd and ruined the House of Stephen Barbet, Treasurer; from thence ran to the Temple where the King lay, and committed a hundred insolences there: but the sedition over, a great many were hanged in several places.

The Templers were observed to have contributed to this mutiny; it was believed they had done it, because having a great deal of Money, they lost much by this abating the value of the Coin. It is likely that the King, who never forgot an injury, kept the remembrance of this in his mind, and it was one motive that induced him to revenge himself upon the whole Order.

In completing the peace with the Flemmings, several Articles were changed or added; amongst others it was allowed that the King might banish Three thousand of the most factious; that the Cities of Ghent, Bruges, Ipre, P Isle and Donay, should be dismantled, and that if the Countrey in general, or any particular person offended the King, or his Officers, they should immediately be liable to the thunderings of Ecclesiastical censures.

Lewis Hutin the Kings eldest Son, visits his Kingdom of Navarre, fallen to him by the death of his Mother, and is Crowned at Pampelona, the Fifth of June. Before his return, he took off the two Heads of the Factions that had much troubled Navarre, these were Fortunio Almoravid, and Martin Ximenes de Aybar.

The effect of that secret promise the Pope had made to the King, began to appear in his revenge upon the Templers. The too great riches of those Knights, their unsufferable pride, their coverous and disobliging behaviour towards such Princes and Noblemen, as went into the Holy-Land, the little esteem they made either of Temporal or Spiritual Power, their dissolute and libertine Humours, had rendred them obnoxious and very odious, and furnished those with a specious pretence, who were resolved to exterminate them.

This year therefore upon the discovery and confession of some villains amongst themselves, the greatness of whose crimes, or the desire of the Kings mercy and reward had prompted to it; the King by consent of the Pope, whom he had newly held conference with at Poitiers, caused them all to be laid hold on in the same day, the Twelfth of October, throughout the whole Kingdom, seized their Goods, and took possession of the Temple at Paris, and of all their Treasures and Writings.

The Great Master, whose name was James de Molay, a Burgundian, being sent for by Letters from the Pope, to come from Cyprus, where he valiantly made War upon the Turks, presented himself at Paris with Sixty Knights of his Order, amongst whom whom was Guy, Brother to the Dauphin de Viennois, Hugh de Peralde, and another of the principal Officers. They were all arrested at the same time, and their Process was immediately made, excepting the three I have mentioned, whom the Pope would reserve to his own judgment. Fifty of them were burned alive in a slow Fire, but who denied at their deaths what they had confess'd upon the wrack.

Without doubt they were guilty of many enormous crimes, but not perhaps of all the things (I cannot tell whether I should say horrible or ridiculous) that were imposed upon them, and laid to their charge in general. In the mean time upon King Philip's importunity, the Templars were likewise seized on in all the other States of Christendom, and severely punished, yet not with death in many places. This prosecution lasted to the year 1314.

1307. As Edward I. was going to make War upon Robert Bruce, who disputed for the Crown of Scotland, he died upon the borders of that Kingdom.

His eldest Son Edward II. succeeded him, but was neither like his own Father, nor his own Son, but only in Name. This Prince suffered himself to be Governed, first by his Favourite Peter Gaveston, then by the two Spencers; caused great troubles and commotions in his Kingdom.

1307. "This year the first lineaments of the Helvetian Alliance were rough-drawn in a "generous conspiracy of the Three Cantons of Swits, Uren, and Undervald, against "the oppressions of the Lieutenants for the House of Austria who possessed the Duchy of Scamben. But it was not till the year 1315. that they drew up conditions "in writing, and got them confirmed by the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria.

1308. In Anno 1308. the Emperor Albert was slain near Rhinfeldt, under the ancient Castle of Habsbourgh, by the conspiracy of John the Son of Rodolph, Duke of Scamben, whose Countreys he kept from him. King Philip importun'd the Pope extremely, to make the Empire fall into the hands of Charles Earl of Valois: but the Pope dreading the too great power of the House of France, sent to the Electors to make haste, so that they named Henry Earl of Luxemburg, who was the Eighth of that Name.

"The Sixth of May, Charles the Lame, King of Sicilia, on this side the Fare, a "Prince unfortunate in War, but very illustrious in Peace, and highly beloved of his "Subjects, ended his Life and Reign in his City of Naples. He had nine Sons, the "Eldest was named Charles Martel, the Second Lewis, and the Third Robert. The "First was King of Hungary, by Mary his Mother, Daughter of King Stephen IV. "but he was dead before his Father, having left a Son, whom they named Carobert, "Successor in his Kingdom. The Second was Bishop of Toulouse. For the Third "which was Robert, a great question was started between him and Carobert, to wit, "which is preferable to the Succession, either the eldest Son, or the Uncle; and "whether the Son represented the Father to succeed his Grandfather. The Lawyers "of those times, and the Pope himself (as well upon motives for the publique good, "as Reasons and Grounds of Right and Title) were for the Nephew; the Pope admitted him to Homage, Invested him, and Crowned him in Avignon, the first Sunday of the Month of August.

"Observe that Carobert had two Sons, Lewis and Andrew; that Lewis was King of "Hungary after his Father, and of Poland, by his Wife Elizabeth, Daughter of Ladislas, and that Andrew Married to his great misfortune, Jane I. Queen of Sicilia, "Daughter of Charles Duke of Calabria, who was Son of King Robert. As likewise "that Lewis had two Daughters, Mary Queen of Hungary, who Married Sigismund "of Luxemburg, afterwards elected Emperor; and Hedwige Queen of Poland, who "was Married to Jagelson, Grand Duke of Lithuania, in which Family that Kingdom "remained till the year 1572.

1310. The Council of Vienne coming on, the Pope to hinder the obstinate pursuit of the Kings people against the memory of Boniface, gave all the Bulls they could desire for the justification both of the King and his Officers. Nay, even for fear lest Nogaret should blow up the flame anew, he granted him Absolution; but upon condition he should go on certain pilgrimages, and also travel into the Holy-Land.

1310. The Knights of St. John of Jerusalem were retired to the Island of Cyprus, after the loss of Ptolemais; but finding themselves ill Treated by the King of that Island, they sought another Habitation, and gained themselves one by the taking of the Island

Island of Rhodes, and five other neighbouring Islands: they gained it from the Turks after two years Siege; the Turks had taken it from the Saracens, and the Saracens from the Grecian Empire.

A year afterwards the Turks made great attempts to recover it, but the Knights maintained it bravely, by the assistance of the generous Earl of Savoy, named Ame V. who got the Surname of Great by it, and preserved it, as well as he had gained it, by many other generous actions. To this might well be applied the Simbol or Devise FERT, which his Successors retain to this day, and the four Letters might be thus made to say, Fortitudo Ejus Rhodum Tenuit: but it is certain, the Princes of this House bear it a long time before.

The General Council was open'd at Vienne the First day of October, in the year 1311. the Pope declaring it was for the Process of the Templars, for the recovery of the Holy-Land, for the reformation of Manners and Discipline; and for the extirpation of Heresie. Philip came thither the year following about Mid-Lent, with a stately Train of Princes and Lords, assisted at the opening of the Second Session, and took his Seat at the right Hand of the Pope, but on a lower Chair. The Order of the Knights-Templars was there condemned and extinguish'd, their Goods left to the disposal of his Holiness, who bestow'd part of it upon the Knights of St. John. That of the * Begards and Begardes was likewise abolished; they were a sort of Monks and Religious People, that made profession of Poverty, but not of Abstinence nor Celibacy, and who besides were accused of many errors.

As for the most important point, which was the Process against the memory of Boniface, the King, though there present, had no satisfaction in it. For it was declared that Pope Boniface had always been a good Catholique, (the other crimes were not mention'd.) Three famous Doctors, one in Theology, another of the Civil-Law, and the Third of the Canon Law, made it out to the King by several reasons and particulars; and there were two Catalonian Gentlemen that offer'd to justify it by combat, throwing down their Gantlets, which no man there would take up. However, the Pope and Cardinals made a Decree, importing, that the King should never be hereafter reproached for all, or any thing that he had done against Boniface.

The City of Lyons had for a long time held of the Kings of Arles, who had given the Temporal Lordship thereof to the Arch-Bishop: but since the Kings of France taking advantage of the weakness, and the distance of the Emperours, who were Kings of Arles, had by little and little drawn to themselves the Sovereignty of this Kingdom, and the City of Lyons had began to hold of them. Now during the War between Savoy and Dauphiné, the Citizens fearing they might be plundered, had recourse to Philip, who gave them a Warden; who coming within the City, contrary to what had been agreed upon; the Arch-Bishop stirred up the People against him. Prince Lewis Hutin going thither with an Army, brought the Bishop away prisoner and he could never get clear, but by yielding up the Temporal Jurisdiction to the King, for which the Pope helped him to some recompence. But afterwards Philip the Long gave it to him again.

The Emperor Henry who was gone into Italy from the year 1310. thinking to "restore the dignity of the Empire there, found so much opposition from the Guelphs, "the great Cities, and Robert King of Naples, that he perished there, as well as his "Predecessors. He died the Four and twentieth day of August, in the territory of "Sienna, having been poyson'd, as it was reported, with the Sacred Host, by a Dominican Monk, a Florentine.

Robert Earl of Flanders would needs have again his Cities of P'Isle, Donay, and Orchies, affirming that he had paid down the redemption to Enguerrand de Marigny, who governed absolutely both King and Kingdom. The Flemmings refused also to dismantle their Towns, or to pay either the Principal or Interest of those Sums they owed the King; They were therefore forced to begin another War.

To provide for the charges of it, the King summoned the Notables of the People, and from a Theatre raised high, he shewed them his Necessities. The Deputies had suffer'd themselves to be perswaded, and granted him by the mouth of Stephen Barbere, the Impost of Six Deniers in the Livre, and other Subsidies more troublesome yet; but the Cities of Picardy and Normandy oppos'd it highly, and all the rest called for the justice of Heaven to fall upon the Head of Marigny, the Author of all these galling and slaying extortions; These moans and curses did not move him: on the contrary, he aggravated their misery by making new Coins of very bad Gold and Silver.

After

After all, none but himself and the Exchequer-men, or Receivers could get any profit by it. The King having past over the River of Lys, and the Armies in sight of each other, Marigny, who had done his own business, took advantage of the interposing of the Popes Legats, to bring the parties to an agreement, and persuaded the King to an ignominious Truce. Thus that great Army which ought to have conquer'd all Flanders, vanished in smoke.

This disgrace of Philip was followed with one much greater. All the Wives of his three Sons were accused of Adultery; Margaret, Jane, and Blanch. The First the wife of Lewis Hutin, and the Third the wife of Charles, being convicted of that crime with Philip, and Gautier de Launoy, Brothers and Gentlemen of Normandy, were by decree of Parliament, the King being present, confined to the Castle Gail-lard of Andeley; and their two Gallants slay'd alive, dragg'd into the Field de Mau-briſſon, which was newly Mow'd, those parts cut off that had committed the Sin, then beheaded, and their Bodies hung up, being fastned under their Arm-pits upon a Gibbet. Margaret the most guilty of the three, perish'd in prison; Blanch was divorced seven years after, upon pretence of Parentage. As for Jane, who was wife of Philip the Long, after she had been confined almost a year, her Husband was willing to own her for honest, and took her to himself again; Happier, or at least wiser then his two Brothers.

Molay, Grand Master of the Templers, and his three Compagnons, had confessed all whatever they would accuse them of, in hopes of gaining their liberty: but finding they were still kept prisoners, Molay and the Dauphin's Brother retracted; but they were burnt alive upon the eleventh day of the month of March. Molay by his marvellous constancy made every one judge he was innocent. It is related, but without any proof, that he summon'd the Pope to appear before the Tribunal of God Almighty within Forty days, and the King within that year; and indeed neither of them out-lived that time.

"As for the Pope, being tormented with troublesome and cruel distempers, and going to his native Countrey to take the Air, he died at Roquemaure upon the Rhose. He gave order for his Corps to be carried to the Church of Uzest, a Burrough in the Diocese of Bas. The Cardinals met at Carpentras to elect another, after four Months debate, not being able to come to an agreement, and growing weary of their confinement, they set fire to the Conclave and retired some to one place some to another. Thus the See remained vacant two years and three months.

"And afterwards the Empire was so likewise for a time, then fell into a dangerous Schisme, one party of the Electors having given their Votes for Lewis Count Palatine of Bavaris, and the other for Frederic the Fair, Duke of Austria.

About the end of the year, King Philip was seized with a grievous fit of Sickness, which put a period to his days the Four and twentieth of November, whether proceeding from some occult cause, or a fall from a Horse, while he pursued a wild Bore too eagerly. Fountainbleau, which had been the place of his birth, was that of his death, in the Forty eighth year of his age, and the Twenty ninth of his Reign. His Monument is at St. Denis.

Being on his Death-bed, touched with a very late repentance, he took pity of his poor People, put a stop to the Levies of new Imposts, and gave his Son order to moderate them, to Coin good Money, and have a care of the Justice and Polity of his Kingdom.

He had by his Wife Jane Queen of Navarre, three Sons, Lewis Hutin, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, who Reigned after each other, and left no issue-male. He had likewise three Daughters, Margaret, who married Ferdinand King of Castile, Son of Sancho the Usurper; Isabel, who was wife to Edward II. King of England, and Blanch, who died young.

He was the handsomest and best shap'd Prince of his time. He had a proud and haughty Heart, a lively and quick Spirit, a firm and resolute Soul, was magnificent and liberal, and yet very greedy of Money, severe even to hard-heartedness, and more inclined to revenge than pardon.

As to the rest, the furious exactions on his People, the frequent change and alterations of Moneys, and the little progress he made in Flanders with the many vast sums he had raised, the absolute power of his insolent and covetous Minister, his proceedings against his Daughters-in-law for Adultery, and his bitter repentance at death for having so greatly oppressed his Subjects, demonstrates what his Reign was, and his Conduct.

The

The zeal for Croisado's lasted yet all this age, and beyond it. The Popes who were the promoters had found a way to make use of them, not only against the Infidels and Heretiques, but even against their particular enemies, which at first acquired them some kind of grandeur; but at length a great deal of jealousy and hatred from the most Christian Princes, who besides were concern'd to see them undertake to do acts of Sovereignty in Temporals upon every occasion. For they gave away the Lands of Heretiques to those that should conquer them, as they did those of the Albigensis to Simon de Montfort, and reserved a quit-Rent or Tribute to themselves; they took other Lands and their Lords under their protection, and the protection of St. Peter: for in the War or Feuds between particulars, which were then allowed of, and very frequent, there was always safety for the Lands of the Church: they enjoyned Christians to list themselves under the badge of the Cross, gave their Legats the conduct and absolute command of those Armies, imposed Tenths and Subsidies on the Clergy for those expeditions, and distributed them to such Soldiers and Officers, or Noblemen as they pleased. They exhorted Sovereigns, and if they found them a little weak, commanded them to take up, or to lay down their Arms, constituting themselves the Arbitrators and Judges between Kings; and when one party made application to them, they would forbid the other to prosecute him. In fine, they made themselves absolute Masters of Privileges, Dispensations, and of all Discipline; even of most of the Benefices, to which they nominated upon divers pretences.

Councils were held almost every where by their Legats, and none without their consent. As for those of this age, some were called for the extirpation of Heresies, some concerning the quarrels between the Emperour and the Pope, several for the reformation of abuses, others for particular facts.

For the Heresie of the Albigensis, there was a Council de Lavan in 1213. upon the request of the King of Arragon, who desired an accommodation for the Earls of Toulouze, Foix, Cominges, and Bearn; he obtained of the Pope a Truce between the Toulouzeian and Simon de Montfort; but the Holy Father revoked it immediately. That of Montpellier in 1215. gave unto Montfort the Lands he had conquer'd of the Albigensis. This was an act of Sovereignty which Treated the King as a Vassal, and those Countreys as Under-iefs.

That of Toulouze assembled in the year 1228. to compleat the ruine of those Heretiques, confirmed what had been done the same year at Paris, with Raimond Earl of that Countrey. The Cardinal Romain Legate, had assembled one at Bourges in the year 1226. to judge of the said Earls Lands, to which his Son demanded to be restored. There met seven Arch-Bishops; but he of Lyons pretending the Primacy over him of Sens, and he of Bourges over those of Bordeaux, Ausich and Narbonne; they took their Seats as it had been in a Counsel * rather then in a Council. At their breaking up, the Legat endeavour'd to make valid some Bulls, by which the Holy Father reserved the Revenue of two Prebendaries in each Cathedral Church, and of two Monks places in every Abbey, to increase the Revenue of his Court. The Churches grew hot against this enterprize, and stickled so highly, that the Legat was forced to let it fall, and to own the injustice of it.

There was one held at Narbonne in Anno 1235. wherein the Legate, Arch-Bishop of the place presided, to give advice and assistance to the Jacobins, in order to their rooting out the Heretiques. They regulated the method of proceedings against them in the year 1245. in that of Beziers which was composed of Prelats of the Narbonnesian Province. And that of Terragona, Anno 1242. did the same thing against the Vaudensis, whose Opinions were creeping into those quarters.

Besides the Albigensis, the Vaudensis, and that swarm of different Sects which had got in, nestled and increased greatly in Languedoc and Gascogne; there was one Amaury * of Chartres, a Doctor of Paris, who went about teaching his fancies for Truths; saying amongst other things, That if Adam had not sinned, Men would have been multiplied without Generation; that there was no other Paradise but the satisfaction of well-doing, nor any other Hell besides the ignorance and obscurity of Sin; That the Law of the Holy Ghost, or Spirit, had put an end to that of Jesus Christ, and to the Sacraments, as these had accomplished that of Moses, and the Ceremonies of the Old Testament; and that all such actions as were done in charity, even Adulteries, could not be evil. This Doctrine being a great encouragement to lewdness and Scandal, the Author was obliged to go and give an account to the Pope, who forced him to retract, which having done with his Mouth only, and not from his Heart, his Disciples persisted in his whimsies, and added many others to them. Peter II. Bishop of Paris, and Frier Guerin, Principal Counsellor to King Philip, having made discovery both of the Persons, and the Secrets of these Sectaries; by an Emisary who crept in amongst them, caused a great number of Men and Women, Clergy and Laity to be laid hold on. These People having been convicted in a Council held at Paris, in the year 1209. were delivered over to the Secular power, who gave the Women their Pardons, and ordered the Men to be burnt.

The Friers Preachers, and the Friers Minors endeavouring to out-vie each other in Scholastic Subtilties, there were some that lost their way in that Utopian, or Imaginary Countrey, of Terra incognita, and who were as soon restrained and corrected by the Sacred Faculty, or by the Bishops. Thus by Bishop Stephen II. at the Council of Paris, which met in Anno 1277. was William the Frier Minor corrected, who had published divers Heterodox propositions touching the Soul, Free Will, the Resurrection, and the worlds Eternity: but as soon as they were condemned, he retracted them with great submission, contrary to the custom of those singular Spirits, who having once taken their flights, do hardly ever stoop again. We find likewise a certain David of Dinand, who maintained, that God was the Materia Prima; St. Thomas hath Learnedly refuted him. In the Fourth Tome of the Library of the Fathers we read; That Anno 1242. William Bishop of Paris, in an Assembly of the Doctors of Theology, condemned some errors touching the Divine Essence, the Holy Spirit, the Angels, and the place where Souls remain after death, and several other propositions, either rash or false, which all proceeded from the contentious subtilties of Scholastique Doctors.

It would be too tedious to quote all those Councils that were held about Discipline, and for other matters. The two most famous were those of Lyon. Pope Innocent III. presiding in the First, Anno 1245. pronounced a Sentence of Excommunication against the Imperour Frederic II. In the Second, which was in the year 1274. the most numerous that ever was, for there were Five hundred Bishops, Seventy Abbots, and a Thousand other Prelats; Pope Gregory X. made divers Constitutions, amongst others, that which directs the Cardinals should be shut up in the Conclave for the Election of a Pope; and he admitted the Emperour Michael and the Greek Church to a reconciliation with the Church of Rome. Robert de Corceonne, Cardinal Legate, assembled one at Paris in the year 1212. for the reformation of Abuses, and of Clerks, as well Secular as Regulars. Gerard de Bourdeaux held one of his Province at Cognac, in Anno 1238. for the same purpose, and to maintain the Rights of the Church. Vincent de Pilonis, Arch-Bishop of Tours, likewise one of his Province at Rennes, in the year 1263. for the Second point. In that of Bourges in the year 1276. held by Simon de Brie, Cardinal Legat; they Treated of the Liberty of the Church, of Elections, of the power of Judges Delegates, or Ordinaries, of Bishops Courts, of Tithes, of Wills and Testaments, of Priviledges, of Canonical punishments, of the Jews. Simon de Beaulieu, Arch-Bishop of Bourges, Assembled one in the year 1287. where he Collected and Reformed all the Constitutions his Predecessors had made in the divers Councils of that Province.

The Bishop of Beauvais pretending that the King (it was Saint Lewis, but as then very young) had usurped on the Rights of his Church; Henry de Brienne, with all his Province of Rheims, undertook this Cause very vigorously, and held three Councils to have satisfaction, two at St. Quentin in 1230, and 1233. and one at Laon in 1232. when he put the business so home, that in fine, the King gave them satisfaction.

Before Charlemain, the Arch-Bishop of Bourges pretended to no Primacy over the other Metropolitans of Aquitain; but that King having made this City the Capital of the Kingdom of Aquitain, composed of the three Provinces of that name, and the Narbonensis Prima, which is Languedoc, would needs, to link them together the better, that they should all resort for Spirituals to Bourges; and the pope authorized this Novelty, the colour for it being, that Bourges was the Metropolis of Aquitania Prima. Thus this Bishop took up the Title of Primate, and that of Patriarch, over the Arch-Bishops of Narbonna, Bourdeaux, and Auscb. He of Narbonna shook off the yoke at the time the Earls of Toulouze became Marquis de Gotsia; He of Bourdeaux would have done as much when Aquitania Tertia was left to the Kings of England, under the Title of Ditchy of Guyenne. He of Bourges stood upon upon the possession for at least three ages, and the Judgment of several Popes: but the other defended himself by his common Right, and the antient usages of the Gallican Church. The quarrel lasted a long while; he of Bourges assembled many Councils for that business, one amongst the rest in that City, in the year 1212. proceeding always against the other as his inferior; even so far as that Giles de Rome about the year 1302. caused Bertrand de Got to be Excommunicated, by * Gautier de Bragan of the Order of the Minors, and Bishop of Poitiers, because he, like himself, took up the Title of Primate of Aquitain. Bertrand was so offended, that Gautier who was his Suffragan should joyn with that party, and have the confidence to fulminate against him, that when he was raised to the Papacy, being at Poitiers in 1308. he Deposed him, and sent him hack to his Convent: A terrible punishment for a Monk! and indeed he fell sick upon it; and it was easier for him to go out of the world, then get out of the Town of Poitiers, where he died.

The attempts the Friers Preachers and the Friers Minors made for Confessions and Pennances against the Rights of the Ordinaries, by virtue of some Bull they had gotten from Pope Martin the IV. obliged Petr Barbet, Arch-Bishop of Reims, to assemble a Council in his Metropolis, Anno 1487. where it was ordered they should pursue that business in the Court of Rome; the Bishops not finding in themselves a sufficient power to apply any remedy.

In the beginning of this age, France had four Orders of Religious People, which were called the four Mendicants, that is, the Preachers, Minors, Carmelites, and Augustins, who took deep rooting in her Territories, and increased wonderfully; the two latter have no certain Instituters; but were composed of a mixture of several pieces, as we shall observe. That of the *Minors was instituted by Saint Francis, a Merchants Son of the Town of Assise; That of the Preachers by Saint Dominique de Guzman, a Spanish Gentleman; and Canon of Osma; each of them have their Nuns living under the same Rules. Sancta Clara, a Native of Assise was the first that lifted her self in that of Saint Francis. They both had their beginning at the same time, about the year 1208. and were both confirmed in the Council of Lateran, Anno 1215. by Pope Innocent III.

That of the Friers Minors was the first that renounced to the propriety of all Temporal Possessions, and made profession of an Evangelique poverty, to be conformable to JESUS CHRIST and his Apostles. Afterwards the three others were stirred up to follow their example.

It hath multiplied into above Fifty several Branches, produced by different Reforms, Additions, or Retrenchments; notwithstanding the History of them does expressly mention, that the First, who would be particular in the change of his Habit, though he were one of the Eight oldest Compagnons of Saint Francis, was smitten with the Leprosie, and hanged himself in despair.

Now the Patriarch Saint Francis Preaching on Mount Carmelio near Assise, was followed by a vast number of People, both of the one and other Sex, who would never forsake him, till he had received them all for Brothers and Sisters. From whence the Order of the Penitents took its birth, which they named the Third Order, in regard to that of the Minors, and of Sancta Clara. The Friers Preachers would be sure not to want one likewise. Those that enrolled themselves were only Seculars, and for the most part Married; The Religious could not admit them under any Vows, nor have any Superiority over them, because they were Subjects to the Hierarchical Jurisdiction. Since then, at least amongst the Minors, there hath some sort of Religious Institution been made, tied to some Vows, and a Capouch as well as the rest.

The Order of the Carmelites began in Syria after this manner. Several Pilgrims of the Western Regions lived in Hermitages, scatter'd up and down, exposed to the incursions and violence of the Barbarians. Aymarie the Popes Legat, and Patriarch of Antioch, gathered them together, and placed them all upon Mount Carmel, which having formerly been the retreating place of the Prophet Elias, gave them occasion to call themselves his Disciples and Successors. Albert the Patriarch of Jerusalem, a Native of the Diocess of Amiens, and Nephew, once removed to Peter the Hermit, drew up their Rules, or approved them about the year 1205. Pope Honorius III. confirmed them, Anno 1227. Saint Lewis at his return from the Holy Land, brought some into France with him, and settled them in Paris. There were however already some of this Order in divers places,

* Or Gualter, or Walter.

Religious

especially at Bourdeaux: for we find that Simon Stock, an English Man by Birth, their Prior-General, died there in the year 1250. (Their first Habit was White, the Coat or Mantle laced at the bottom with several rows of Yellow.) Pope Honorius having commanded them to change it, they left off lacing their Mantles: but not to lose any of their colours; they took a light * reddish Yellow for their under Garment, with the White Mantle over it.

* Ora Soot and Gray, called Minime in French.

As for the Augustins, that Order was composed by the bringing, or assembling together of several Congregations of Hermits in the West, who were of different Habits, and under different Rules. I have taken notice of one amongst the rest, named, Of the Penitence of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, which had been instituted at Marseilles by the order of Pope Innocent IV. towards the year 1251. and had spread it self in France and Italy. Pope Alexander IV. by his Constitution of the month of May, of the year 1256. assembled them all in one, under the Rule of Saint Augustine, gave them the Black Habit, and for their first General, Lanfranc Septimana, a Milanese. Then they quitted the Deserts, and willingly came to dwell within the Cities.

* Saccati.

(The minds of the Religious in this age, was so much taken with the Wallet, (therefore most of them were named Walletiers, or Budget-bearers *) and in believing the highest perfection consisted in that humble poverty, which begets peoples admiration; that there swarmed great numbers from all parts of these Sects of Mendicants, or Beggars of both Sexes. The most famous, besides those already mentioned, were the Begards and the Beguines: but the Church finding they were over-stocked with these new bands of idle drones, who besides, were proud of their vain poverty, and let loose their fancies to sow new Doctrines: she suppressed them all, and reserved only those four that remain to this day.)

* The Valc of Scholars.

Under the Rules of Saint Augustin, was also established the Congregation of Saint Catherine du Val des Escoliers, in Anno 1217. in the Diocese of Langres, by one William, who having studied in Paris, and afterwards taught in Burgundy, retired into that solitude with his Scholars, and got his Institution to be approved by his Diocesan Bishop. Seven or Eight years before, there was another Order began of the Cisterciens, in the place called Le val des Choux.

* Non a sanctis fabricatus, sed a solo summo Deo.

That of the Holy Trinity, of the Redemption of Captives, was confirmed by the Pope in the year 1209. They vaunt their not being of the invention * of Men, but the appointment of God, who gave the Form and Design of it to the blessed John de Mata, a Gentleman of Provence, and Doctor in Divinity at Paris, and to the Hermit Felix who were both retired into the solitude of Cerfroy, near Meaux. I find that the Religious of this Order, called themselves otherwhile the Friers of the Asses, because they used to ride on them.

* Our Lady of Mercy.

That of * Nostre Dame de la Mercy, instituted to the same end, owes its being to James King of Arragon, in the year 1223. to Raimond de Peguafort, a Dominican his Confessor, and to Peter de Nolasque a Gentleman, Native of the Diocese of Saint Papoul in Languedoc.

* Servants of St. Mary the Mother of Christ.

The Congregation of Des Serfs * de Saint Mary Mere de Christ, was instituted at Marseilles, in the Monastery of Sainte Marie des Arenes, by the Prior, and the Religious of that House, and confirmed by Pope Alexander IV. Anno 1257. The people because of their Habit, called them White Mantles; and the Convent given to them at Paris, retains that name still; it was bestowed on them in 1268. the Benedictins have the House at present.

Devotions.

All these Orders, particularly the Mendicants, applied themselves much for the stirring up peoples Devotion towards the Sacrament, and the Virgin Mary. Saint Dominique instituted the Rosary, which is composed of a certain number of Ave Maria's, and Pater-nosters, which are repeated, and whercof as one may say, they make a Hatband or Coronet of Flowers to put upon the Head of that Queen of Angels. The Carmelites, not to come behind them in their Zeal to the Holy Mother of God, established the Devotion of the Scapulary, to which they attribute great Virtue, particularly to redeem them from the pains of Purgatory, and not to die without Confession. They affirm that Saint Simon Stoe, their General, instituted it upon a Vision he had of the Holy Virgin.

* A Hat is On Chapeau, whence the word Chaplet for Beads.

The

The peoples Devotion towards the Reliques of Saints was still very warm and zealous. Charles the lame, King of Sicilia, and Earl of Provence, at his coming out of his imprisonment, being persuaded by the Revelation of two Friers, whereof one was his Confessor, caused a certain place, named Ville-late, in the Diocese of Aix, to be digged, where they found a Corps, believed to be St. Mary Magdelins, said to be buried by Saint Maximin, and afterwards removed and hid in another place, not far from the first in the time of the Saracens incursions. Charles caused it to be taken out with great ceremony, and built a fair Convent in the same place for the Preaching Friers; the resort of people by succession of time, hath added a Town to it, which bears the name of St. Maximin.

The Benedictine Monks of Vezelay in Burgundy, were notwithstanding able to aver, they had the full possession of this Holy Corps, which had been brought to them from Aix; or as others say, from Jerusalem, by the care of Gerard de Konfalon, Founder of that Abbey about the year 882. The universal concurrence of the whole Nation, the Bulls of divers Popes, even after this invention of Ville-late, the Authority of two Kings Lewis VII. and Lewis IX. who had paid their Devotions in this place, made this believed to be a Truth, above contradiction amongst the French. But that of the Greeks destroyed equally both the pretences of the Monks of Vezelay, and of the Jacobins. For we find in some of their Writers of the Seventh age, that the Body of Magdeline was at Ephesus; and their Historians relate, how the Emperor Leo the Philosopher, who began not to Reign till the year 886. transferr'd it from that City to Constantinople, as also the Corps of Lazarus from the Island of Cyprus.

However it were, after this new discovery at Ville-late, they told how this Holy Woman flying from the persecution of the Jews, had made her escape by Sea into Provence with Lazarus her Brother, her Sister Martha, Marcella servant to Martha, and Saint Maximin, one of Seventy two Disciples of our Lord. That Maximin was the first Bishop of Aix, and Lazarus of Marseilles. That Martha preached the Faith in the Diocese of Aix, and that she vanquished the Dragon whom they called the Tarasque, which hath given name to the City of Tarascon, where the Den of that Monster was. That Magdeline retired into a * Baulme or Grotto, where after Twenty years solitude and mortification, the Angels carried her Soul up to the Region of the Blessed; and many other things unknown in the former ages.

* This is that they call the Holy Baulme.

(The Sciences flourish'd with great luster in the University of Paris, Theology, the study of the Civil and Canon Law, Physick, and Philosophy with the Arts: but not being accompanied, or joyned with humane and polite Learning and Eloquence, which came not into play or use till a long while after, they expressed themselves but in barbarous terms, and learned more Sophistry and shuffling then solid Truths.)

(All the substitutes of the University being Ecclesiastiques,) the skill and knowledge of the Law and Physick was in their hands, and the Pope was owned for Head of that Body, and of all the Men of Learning. As for Physick, they taught little more than the Theory, under the name of Physick, leaving the practical part of Medicines to the Laity. For the Law, the Popes would willingly have reduced it all to the Canons and their own Decretals: (from which we must acknowledge, that France hath taken most of her Forms and judicial Orders,) that so all Christendom making use of the same Laws, both in Temporals and Spiritualls, might accustom themselves to own but one Head, to wit, him who hath all the Laws both Divine and Humane in his own Breast.

(It was for this in my opinion, that Honorius III. by his Bull of the year 1219. did forbid, upon pain of Excommunication, to Teach the Civil Law at Paris; and all other Cities in France: and Gregory IX. renewed it as to Paris. Some are apt to believe those two Popes did it upon the request of the two Kings, Philip Augustus and St. Lewis. In effect, the Letters of King Philip the Fair, for the Institution of the University of Orleans speak the same: but some doubt of the truth of their exposition, and believe the prohibitions of Honorius, and of Gregory, was only intended to have respect to the Ecclesiastiques, whom they would fain have weaned from that too great affection they had to the study of a thing which being very gainful made them lay aside, and desert their Divinity.

Now whether one or other of these Opinions be the Truth, it is certain, that since they forbore not to Teach the Civil Law in the University of Paris, till in the year 1579. that advantage was taken away from them, by virtue of an Article found in the Ordonnance of Blois: but truly it did not flourish there so much as in those of Toulouse and of Orleans.

The

The University of Toulouze was instituted in Anno 1230. by Saint Lewis: that of Orleance was not till the year 1312. by King Philip the Fair. It is true, that above One hundred years before, there was in this last City, as also in Toulouze, Angers, and divers others, a famous School: but which had no Seal, nor the power of making Graduates, and other marks of a Company formed and approved by the Prince. Clement V. in acknowledgment of his having studied there, gave several Bulls, all in the year 1303. to make it an University; The Scholars thinking to have the benefit in the year 1309. before they were approved of by the King, the Burghers opposed them with Sword in hand; and those troubles were not quieted, till the King in 1312. had given a Being to that Body by his lawful Authority.

That of Montpellier, otherwhile very famous for the Art of Physick, because of the commerce and correspondence they had with the Arabian Physicians that were in Africa, had been erected by Pope Nicholas IV. and by the Kings Letters Patents in the year 1289. The others of this Kingdom which are now Ten in number, Angers, Poitiers, Bourges, Bourdeaux, Cahors, Valence, Caen, Reims, Nantes, and Aix, were instituted in the following ages, and at several times.

Learned Men.

Now the University of Paris, which excepting that of Toulouze, was as yet the only singular one in France, drew thither, or bred there all that were then Men of Parts and Learning. Albert the Great, Thomas Aquinas, Vincent de Beauvais, all three of the Order of the Preaching Friars; John Gilles, or Joannes Egadius, who was also of the same Order, Rigord of the Order of St. Bennet, and Chaplain to Philip Augustus, and Richard of Oxford, all three Philosophers and Physicians; James de Vitry Cardinal, John de Sacrobosco, who excelled in the Mathematicks, Roger Bacon an English man by birth, and of the Order of St. Francis, a very subtil Genius, and thoroughly versed and accomplished in all manner of Learning, particularly in Chymistry, in whose Works is to be found the secret for making Gun-powder. Michael Scot, who to acquire the knowledge of these Arts more perfectly, and that of Astronomy and the Mathematicks, Learned the Oriental Languages. Alexander de Hales, Bonaventure his Disciple, and a long time after him, John Duns Scotus, all three of the Order of the Friers Minors, and great Scholastiques. Scotus lived Ten years in the following age, they called him the Subtil Doctor, and he was so indeed. He was excited to some Opinions, opposite to those of St. Thomas, as their two Orders were, which produced in the Schools those two Sects, the Thomists and the Scotists. They also reckon amongst the Learned, Guy le Gros, and Gilles de Rome, famous Lawyers; the first had been Married, and yet became Pope, the other was an Augustine Monk, then Arch-Bishop of Bourges; he lived many years in the age following, and wrote Anno 1302. in favour of Philip the Fair against Boniface, demonstrating, that the Popes Authority does not extend to Temporals. Robert de Sorbonne, a native of the Village of that Name near Sens; William de St. Amour, and Christian de Beauvais, born in those places, and rough adversaries of the Friers Preachers and Minors; William III. and Stephen II. Bishops of Paris; Henry de Grand, a famous Doctor in Divinity, Hugh the Cardinal, William Arch-Bishop of Tyre, and Chancellour to St. Lewis.

Many of these Learned persons joyned a Holiness of Life to their exquisite knowledge. The Church implors the Suffrages of Albert the Great, of Thomas Aquinas, and of Bonaventure; as likewise of Peter de Chasteau-neuf, of the Order of Cisteaux, and Legate from the Pope, Martyr'd by the Albigens in the year 1208. Of Bertrand, Bishop of Cominges who rebuilt that City, to which the name of its Restorer hath been given. Of William de Nevers, who daily fed Two thousand Poor. Of Stephen de Die in Dauphiné, taken out of the Order of the Char-treux. Of Gefroy de Meaux, who renounced his Bishoprick, and retired himself into the Monastery of St. Victor in Paris, which then was, as it is now at this day, most flourishing in Doctrine and Piety. Of William de Valence, under whom the Bishopricks of Valence and Die were united in the year 1275. and of Robert de Puy. This Man very Noble for his Birth, and much more so for his Virtue, being slain by a Gentleman whom he had Excommunicated for his Crimes, the People in revenge razed all the Houses belonging to the Murtherer; and the King banished both him and all his Race out of the Kingdom.

We ought to add to this immortal company, Eleazar de Sabran, a Gentleman of Provence, Earl of Arim, whose perpetual celibacy in Marriage, made him the companion of Angels; and his charitable liberalities the Father to the Poor;

Tves

Tves Priest, Curate and Official of the Diocess of Treguier in Bretagne, a good Lawyer, and who by a more noble interest than that of Money, was ever the Advocate of the Indigent and the Orphan. The Men of that Calling own him for their Patron, but imitate him seldom. He died in the year 1303.

Amongst those that wear the Crown of Glory in Heaven, the great King Saint Lewis, who wore the Royal Crown here below; and his Nephew of the same name, the Son of Charles II. King of Sicilia, are of the highest rank. This last buried the Grandeurs of this World in the Sack-cloath of his penance, turning Monk of the Order of St. Francis, from whence he was drawn out against his Will, to be made Bishop of Toulouze. He died in the year 1298.

Lewis

Lewis X. called Hutin, King XLVI. Aged XXV, or XXVI years.

Vacancy, which began at the end of the Reign of Philip the Fair, and lasted in all Two years, Three Months and a half.

AS soon as Philip was dead, his eldest Son Lewis succeeded him, but he could not get to be Crowned at Reims, till the Third day of August in the following year, as well because he waited for his new Spouse Clemence, Daughter of Charles Martel King of Hungary, as because all the Kingdom was in combustion for the vexation of Imposts, and the alteration of Moneys.

1314.

Though he was in his majority, and had been employ'd in Affairs for divers years: nevertheless Charles de Valois his Uncle, put himself in possession of the Authority, displaced many Officers to advance his own Creatures; and there being no Money to be found for the expences of the Coronation, he upon that score took occasion to inquire into, and examine the Officers of the Treasury, especially Enguerrand de Marigny, with whom he before had some rude-bustlings.

Enguerrand sent for before the King to give an account of the Treasury, had the impudence to tell him who was his Masters Uncle, that he had had the greatest part, and even to return him the Lie: That Princes Sword had punished him at the same time, if Heaven had not reserved him for a more infamous chastisement. He was therefore seized upon some weeks after as he was coming to the Council: this was on the Tenth of March, put in prison in the Tower of the Louvre, and from thence transferr'd into that of the Temple.

The prosecution being slow, it was discover'd that his Wife abused by some Enchanters, sought to bewitch or charm the King, and make him languish to death by means of some waxen Images; Those rascals being taken, the King gives him up to the Law. There were four chief Heads of accusation against him, his having alter'd the Coins, loaden the people with Taxes, stollen several great sums, and degraded the Kings Forrests.

His Process was made in the Bois de Vincennes, by the Lords Pairs, and Barons of the Kingdom, who condemned him to the Gallows the Saturday before the Festival of the Ascension. The Saturday following he was transferr'd from the Temple to the Chasteler, and from thence they carried him to Montfaucon * Where on the highest part of the Gibbet, with the other Thieves he was hanged. His immense Riches sufficiently proved the Justice of this Sentence.

St. Denis.

Afterwards those Receivers or Officers of the Treasury who were of his gang, were laid hold on, and several put to the Wrack: they would confess nothing however; so well those Caterpillars know how to wind up their bottoms, desiring rather in the greatest extremity to lose their Lives, then part with their Money.

They carried on this search even to his very friends, and particularly, Peter de Larilly, Bishop of Chaalons, and Chancellor of France. He was accused of giving the Morfel, that is to say, of having poyson'd the Bishop his Predecessor, and also the late King. He was put out of his Office, and left a prisoner in the hands of the Arch-Bishop of Reims his Metropolitan.

The

The execrable Custom of Poysonning was grown very common in France, and it grew so in my opinion, because the Ministers of the deceased King had been so extream Violent and Vindicative. This Prelat accused of so Villanous a Crime, was referr'd to the Judgment of the Bishops of his Province. To that end there was a Council Assembled at Senlis in the Month of October of this year 1315, where the Archbishop of Reims was present with his Suffragans. The Party accused, upon his request, and according to Law, was first reintegrated to his Liberty, and his Bishoprick; and afterwards it having been proved, that four Women had been Convicted and Punished for Poysonning his Predecessor, he was absolved fully and wholly.

The Gentry and Commonalty of the Country of Artois, having divers causes of Complaint against their Countess Mahaut, the King sent for her, in presence of Ame the Great, Earl of Savoy, and obliged her to give him her Hand, that he might take notice of it.

"This Ame the Great was one of the most considerable Princes of his time. He acquir'd the Title of a Prince of the Empire, which was granted him by the Emperor Henry VII. in Anno 1310. He increased his Territory with the Lordships of Bresse and Bugey, by his Marriage with Sibilla the only Daughter of Guy Lord de Bugey; as likewise with a part of the little Country of Revermont by Purchase of the Duke of Burgundy, who had it of Humbert Dauphin of Viennois, and the Earldoms of Apt and Tress, the first whereof came to him by the Concession of the Emperor Henry VII. the second by the voluntary subjection of the People. His Wisdom made him reign in all the greatest Courts in Europe, the Emperors, King Philip's of France, Edward King of England's, and made him find the Art to be so much a Friend to all these Princes, who were at great variance, that he became the perpetual Mediator, concerning those Differences which Interest and their Jealousie bred amongst them.

1315.

The Truce with the Flemming being at an end about the very time of the Coronation, the King assembled his Forces, and whilst on the other side William Earl of Haynault ravaged the Country along the Scheld, he besieged Courtray. The unseasonable Weather did what the Flemming durst not undertake, and forced him to raise the Siege: but the infinite havock and spoil the Soldiers made, caused a horrible Famine in Flanders.

1316.

About the end of the Month of May, in the year 1316, King Lewis began to feel the effects of those Poysonnings, grown so rife in France; They had given him a Dose so violent (by what hand was not known) that it carried him off the Fifth day of June. An Accident which the Vulgar thought to be presag'd by a Comet, which had display'd its terrible Train in the Heavens the One and twentieth of the Month of December before. He died at the Bois de Vincennes, the Nineteenth Month of his Reign, and the Eight and twentieth of his Age.

1316.

He left Clemence his second Wife with Child, being four Months gone. By his first, which was Margaret Daughter of Robert II. Duke of Burgundy, he had had a Daughter named Jane, to whom belonged the Kingdom of Navarre, and the Counties of Brie and Champagne: but the Kings, Philip the Long, and Charles the Fair, found out pretences to detain them.

REGENCY without a KING for Five Months.

WHEN Lewis Hutin left this World, Philip the Long Earl of Poitiers his Brother was at Lyons, where in pursuance of his Orders he laboured to make them elect a Pope, to supply the See that had been vacant for above three years. He had employ'd himself with so much zeal, that at length he got all the Cardinals to Lyons, and had shut them up in Conclave, in the Jacobins Convent. They had been there together some days, when the news was brought him of the death of Hutin, this made him return to Paris with diligence, after he had left the guard of the Conclave with the Earl de Fores.

After the end of fourty days, the Cardinals could come to no other agreement about the election of a Pope, then to refer it to the single Vote of James Dossa a Cardinal, Bishop of O Porto, who without hesitation named himself, to the great astonishment of the whole Conclave, who notwithstanding let it pass so. He took the name of John, the Twenty second of that name. He was of the Country of Quercy, the Son of a poor Cobler, but very Learned for those times.

The Succession of the Males to the Crown was established, not by any Written Law, but by the inviolable Custom of the French: nevertheless, because in all other Kingdoms, and in great Fiefs the Daughters succeeded, and that in France of a long time no occasion had been offer'd to exclude them: The Friends and Parents of little Jane, particularly Eudes Duke of Burgundy, Brother of her deceased Mother, were on the Watch, pretending the Crown belonged to her, in case the Fruit of Queen Clemences Womb should come to no Perfection.

In the mean time they named Philip the Kings Brother for Regent till the time of her delivery.

Philip

Philip V. King XLVII.

P O P E,

JOHN XXII. Elected the 7th day of August 1317. S. Eighteen years and Three Months, whereof Five years under this Reign.

PHILIP V. Called the Long, because he was Tall, King of France XLVII. and enjoying the Kingdom of Navarre, Aged Twenty six years.

THe Fifteenth of November the Queen brought a Son into the World, whom they named John, but he went out of it again eight days after. He was buried in St. Denis; and in the Funeral Pomp was declared King of France and Navarre. Which hath given some occasion to some Modern Authors, to increase the number of the Kings of France, and to call him John I.

Then the Dispute touching the Crown was renewed with more heat then before. Charles Earl of Valois seemed to favour little Jane, and the Duke of Burgundy her Uncle claimed and stickled for her: but the Grandeess of the Kingdom, and the Pairs assembled in Parliament towards the Feast of the Purification, confirmed the Right of the Males, and gave Judgment in favour of Philip. Who, well attended, went to be Crowned at Reims the Ninth day of January, the Gates of the City being shut, fearing some might have come to make opposition. The Bishop of Beauvais, though only a Count-Pair, carried the Precedency from him of Langres, who hath the Title of Duke.

The Estates being Assembled at Paris, where were present most part of the Lords, the Deputies of Corporations and Cities, and above all the Burghers and the University of Paris, gave their Oaths to the Chancellor, (Peter d'Arablai, afterwards Cardinal) not to acknowledge any other King but Philip and his Heirs Male, to the Exclusion of Females.

Robert II. Earl of Artois had had a Sister named Mahaut, and a Son named Philip. Mahaut was Married with Othelin Earl of Burgundy, and from that Marriage were issued two Daughters, whom the Fair gave unto two of his Sons. Now Philip died in the War of Flanders before his Father: but he left a Son who was named Robert as his Grandfathers name. The Earldom of Artois ought to have belonged to this fame, however the Fair had adjudged it to Mahaut, upon this pretence, that it was not a Fief Masculine, and that according to the Custom of those Countries, Representation did not take place. Robert Armed himself during the Regency of the Long; and got himself into the possession by force: but the business being examined, the Lands were sequestred into the hands of the King, and at last adjudged to Mahaut, whose Daughter Philip the Long had Married. This partial or interested Judgment caused a world of mischief.

For three several times in less then Eighteen Months they began a War against the Flemmings, and three several times it ended in a Truce.

Eudes Duke of Burgundy, could not forbear mentioning the wrong they did to young Jane by detaining the Kingdom of Navarre, and the Earldoms of Brie and Champagne from her. The Long desiring to appease him, gave him his Daughter also named Jane, in Marriage, with the Earldom of Burgundy.

Notwithstanding this tie, Eudes insisted so highly for his Niece, that the King was obliged to Marry her to Philip the Son of Lewis Earl d' Euveux, (this Lewis was 1317.

1318, &c.

1318.

Paternal Uncle to the King) with the Rights she could have to the Kingdom of Navarre, and the Earldoms of Brie and Champagne.

The great Peril France was in after the death of Hutin, about the doubt of Succession, and the cruel War that had afflicted Scotland for a business almost of the same nature after the decease of Alexander IV. was cause, that upon the renewing the Alliance which was made between the two Crowns, they added this Condition, That if ever there hapned any difference for the Succession of one of those two Kingdoms, he of those two Kings that should survive, should not suffer any other to step into the Throne, but him that should have the Judgment of the Estates for him; that he should come in Person to defend it, and should oppose whomsoever would contend for the Crown against him.

1319. The Countess Mahaut was so obstinately bent to change the Customs of the Country of Artois, that the Lords and Commonalties revolted against her; and nevertheless they got nothing by it, being subdued by the Assistance the King and the French Princes lent her.

1319. The Citizens of Verdun molested by Thomas de Blamont their Bishop, put themselves under protection of the King.

A fourth time Robert de Bethune Earl of Flanders broke the Truce; but Ghent and the other Cities in his Country, who in all these Wars had gotten a Power that counterbalanced his, being risen up in Arms against him, he was fain to consent that the Popes Legat, who was a Cardinal, and had been chosen Arbitrator, should come to Paris the following Spring.

1320. The Peace was then concluded the Twentieth of May. The Cities of Douay, L'Isle, and Orchies remained to the King. The Flemmings obliged themselves to pay Thirty thousand Florins of Gold, and gave Oath not to assist their Earl in case he contraven'd to this Agreement. The King promised his Daughter Margaret to Lewis Earl of Nevers, and Rethel Son of another Lewis eldest Son of Earl Robert, upon condition he should succeed his Grandfather in the Earldom of Flanders, though his Father should die before his Grandfather.

1319, & 20. The Gibbelins growing powerful in Italy, Pope John XXII. solicited the King so earnestly, that he sent thither his Son Philip Earl of Valois, who was afterwards King, to relieve Vercel, whom the Sons of Matthew, Viscount, Lord of Milan, held besieged. He had but Fifteen hundred Horse, but the Pope, Robert King of Sicilia, the Florentines, and other Guelphs were to send him Forces to make up a great Army while he was at Mortara; Matthews eldest Son had so wrought upon his Lieutenant by Money, and upon himself by submission and fair words, that he persuaded him to return into France without once drawing his Sword, after he had made I know not what kind of Treaty, which plaistered up a reconciliation between the two Factions in Lombardy.

1320. A like Frenzy, to that we have already seen in the time of St. Lewis, seized the Peasants and Pastors for the recovery of the Holy Land, upon the instigation of a renounced Monk and a Priest put out from his Cure. They made their Muster in the Pre au Clerks at Paris, marched into Aquitain, from thence to Languedoc, massacring the Jews every where, and Plundering their Magazines. The Earl of Foix gave them Chase so smartly that he dispersed them all.

Robert de Cassel second Son of the Earl of Flanders, having accused Lewis his elder Brother, that he would have poisoned his Father, Lewis was made Prisoner, his Servants and Confessor put to Torture; but not being able to make out any proof, he was set at liberty, but upon condition, however, that he should never enter into the Country of Flanders. By this means Robert would chalk out his way to the Succession, to the prejudice of his elder Brother.

* Or, Sheriff. History has not thought it unworthy its Remarks, that in this year 1320. the Prevost * of Paris, named Henry Capperel, for having caused an innocent, but poor Fellow, to be Hanged in the stead of a Rich Man condemned for great Crimes, was by a Sentence of Parliament tied up to the same Gibbet. We every day see his parallels, save the rich Man that is guilty, and punish his innocent Purse.

The Lepers did not give only a horror to all the World, but envy likewise, because they enjoy'd great Wealth, and that loathsome Distemper did not render them incapable of enjoying their pleasures, add, that they paid no Subsidies, wherewith the rest were so overladen. It was perhaps for these reasons they were accused for having by a Compact made with the Jews, (these had been restored in the Reigu of Lewis Hutin) and Intelligence with the Turks, cast some of their Ordures, or some Bags of Poyson into the Wells and Fountains, thereby to infect all those that were were in Health with their fowl Leprosie, or else to poyson them. They were besides guilty of several Crimes against nature: so that great numbers were condemned to the Fire, the rest shut up very close within their Lazar-Hospitals. As for the Jews, the Populace did Justice upon those themselves, and burned a great many. The King drove the whole Nation of them out of the Realm.

His Council had resolved to settle over all France, the same Weights, the same Measures, and the same Coyns: but as under the pretence of some Expence and Charges they would be at, they would likewise take the Fifth part of the Subjects Goods; The Princes and Prelates who had a right of Coyning Money, would not suffer the Kings Commissaries to go on in this Reformation, they appealed to the Estates, and Leagued themselves with the Cities; so that the Impost being not raised, the Reglement was let alone.

During these Disturbances, Philip loaden with the Curses of his People, and hated of the Clergy, because of his too frequent exaction of the Tenth, fell sick of a Quartan Ague, wherewith he languished five whole Months, and in the end died at Bois de Vincennes the Third day of January. He lived One and thirty years, and Reigned Five years and six weeks. His Corps was conveyed with Ceremony to St. Denis, his Heart to the Cordeliers at Paris, his Bowels to the Jacobins. Ever since St. Lewis, these good Fathers claim it as a special Right, to have some part of the Entrails of our Kings, which were not given them without Foundations.

He Married but one Wife, to wit, Jane, who was Daughter of Otheline Earl of Burgundy, and was also his only Heiress, her Sister Blanch having been forced to Encloister her self to expiate her Crime. By this Jane he had Three Daughters, Jane Countess of Burgundy and Artois, who Married Eudes IV. Duke of Burgundy, and brought him these two Earldoms; Margaret, who had for Husband Lewis Earl of Flanders, Nevers, and Rethel; and Isabella, who first Married Guignet Dauphin of Viennois, and afterwards John Baron de Faulconmey in Franch-Comté.

Charles

Charles IV. King XLVIII.

P O P E,

JOHN XXII. During all this Reign.

CHARLES IV. Called the Fair, King of France XLVIII. and enjoying the Kingdom of Navarre, Aged Twenty eight years.

1322.

THe Succession of the Males being well settled, Charles came to the Throne, and was Crowned at Reims the Eleventh of February without any opposition, all the Pairs assisting thereat, excepting the King of England and the Earl of Flanders.

The named Gerard de la Guerre Native of Clermont in Auvergne, and of mean Parentage, had held the Sovereign management of the Treasury under Philip the Long, and had been the grand Projector of the Imposts. In the beginning of this Reign being sought for and taken for his Depredations, he was put to the Wrack and Examined, which they did so rudely, that he died in the midst of those Torments. This prevented not the dragging his Body thorough the Streets, and hanging him on the Gallows at Paris.

There was afterwards a general search made for all the Farmers, and such as were any ways concerned in the Revenues, who were for the most part Lombards and Italians, horrible Usurers and Exacters. Their Goods were all Confiscate, and they sent back into their own Country, * as beggerly as they came thence.

The King had been indulgent enough in not putting his Wife Blanch to Death, who had been condemned for Adultery: When he came to the Crown, the desire of having Children prompted him to repudiate her under pretence of Parentage; and after she had taken on the Vail at Manbuisson, he Espoused Mary Daughter of the Emperor Henry of Luxembourg. Who dying in the year 1324. in her first Child-bed, and the Infant some few days after, he Married for the third time Jane Daughter of Lewis Earl of Eureux his Uncle, having to that end obtained a Dispensation from the Pope.

After the death of Lewis de Nevers, Earl of Rhetel, which hapned at Paris (for he had retir'd himself into the Court of France) and also the death of Robert de Be-thune, his Father, Earl of Flanders, which followed soon after, the eldest Son of Lewis bearing his Fathers name, enjoy'd all those three Earldoms.

But Robert de Cassel his Uncle, pretending to be the nearest by one degree, because he was the Son of Robert, whereas Lewis was but Grandson, presented himself to the King, demanding the Investiture of that of Flanders. In the mean while, Lewis went immediately to take possession, without rendring him that Devoir. Which so irritated the King, that although this young Prince were his Nephew, he caused him to be summoned before the Parliament, and kept him Prisoner.

The Parliament taking this weighty Affair into their Cognisance, pronounced in favour of Lewis; who being set at liberty, did Homage to the King, and gave Oath never to re-demand the Cities of Lisle, Donay, and Orchies. The King confirmed the Appennage given by the Father to Robert de Cassel. He likewise made an Agreement between William Earl of Hainault and Holland with Lewis, who desisted from disputing with him for the Islands of Walcheren.

One

Oue Jurdain Lord of the Island in Aquitain, had committed many enormous Crimes, and Murthered an Usher of the Kings with his own Mace, as he was summoning him to appear in Parliament. He was notwithstanding so much a fool as to come to Paris, trusting to his great Alliances, and upon his having Married the Niece of Pope John XXII. But for all those Considerations, he was committed Prisoner to the Châtelet, and by Sentence dragg'd at a Horses Tail, and hung up on the Gallows at Paris.

The King had cause to complain of Edward because he had not assisted at his Coronation, and that his Seneschal of Bourdelois had placed a Garrison in a Castle which the Lord de Montpesat had built in a place which was Land belonging to France. Wherefore after some Negotiations, in which the English seemed not to proceed fairly; he sent Charles de Valois, his Uncle, into Guyenne; who set so close upon the Skirts of Edmond Earl of Kent, Brother to King Edward, in the City of la Reonle, that he obliged him to Capitulate, and then pass immediately over into England, to persuade his Brother to give the King satisfaction, promising, that if he could not obtain it, to return as his Prisoner. In the mean time the Earl of Valois made an end of the Conquest of Guyenne, excepting only Bordeaux, St. Sever, and Bayonne.

The Council of England found it necessary that Queen Isabella, who was Sister to Charles the Fair, should pass over into France with Edward his eldest Son to Negotiate the Peace.

She managed the business with a great deal of Skill, and finished the Treaty, contriving it so, that her Son Edward was invested in the Dutchy of Guyenne and the Earldom of Pontieu, for which he did Homage to the King.

The King of England had too near him the two Hugh Spensers, Father and Son: the last having been bred with him in an unbecoming familiarity, had an absolute empire over him, and made him do what ever he desired. The English Lords having made some Conspiracy, and taken up Arms against this Favourite, he drew them to a Parly, where he caused them also to be seized against the Publick Faith, and afterwards chopt off the Heads of Two and Twenty Barons, amongst whom was Thomas Earl of Lancaster, Son of Prince Edmond, who, when living, was Brother to King Edward. Pursuing his design, he kept Queen Isabella and the Earl of Kent, the Kings Brother, at distance from the Court; and likewise did privately seek to destroy them, whether for that they had been in the Conspiracy with the Lords, or that he apprehended their Credit or Interest; and this was the chief ground for their coming into France.

King Charles received his Sister with all the tenderness of a good Brother, kept her a great while in his Court, Treating and Honouring her according to her Quality; and promised her assistance both of Money and Men, as much as he well could, without breaking with the English, to Chastise that insolent favourite, who continued to take off all those Heads that stood in the way which his Ambition led him to.

Unhappy Flanders was hardly ever without Troubles. The Flemmings had but little affection to their Earl, because he was too much French by inclination, and resided but little in that Country. He had a long and bloody Contest with the Citizens of Bruges, Robert de Cassel supported them because he would have had him been kill'd. They made John Earl of Namur, his Uncle, Prisoner, and a while after they also did detain himself. But when the Pope had laid an Interdict upon the Country, when those Mutineers had been beaten by the Ghentois *, and they found the King was sending Forces to his relief, they were forced to bend the Knee and humble themselves before him. He Chastised them by great Fines, the loss of their fairest Privileges, and by the banishment of a great number of the hottest Spirits.

It was above a year that Charles Earl of Valois languished with a Distemper which was very odd, and yet more painful. Who knows whether it were not the effect of some cruel Poyson. The Physicians not knowing either how to find out the true cause of the Malady, nor any Remedies, the poor Prince falls into an imagination that it was a Divine Punishment, for the too eager and severe pursuit he had made against Euguerand de Marigny. They have not forgot to mention his Penitence, and to enumerate the satisfactions he offer'd to his Memory: but perhaps these proceeded from a Mind as sick and as much out of tune as his Body. After all, if God so severely Chastised a Prince for persecuting a publick Robber, and bringing him to Justice by unjust Methods and with an ill intent; what did not that Robber deserve, who for so long a time had tormented Millions of innocent Souls?

The Spensers dreading the Storm which threatned them from the Coast of France, obliged Edward earnestly to re-demand his Wife: and they made use of so many Arts, Arts, and scattered so much Money in King Charles his Court, and even in the Popes, to make him bestir himself for them, that at length Charles, won by their Presents, or frightened with the fears of a Rupture, not only retracted those Promises he had made his Sister, but likewise, upon pain of Banishment, forbid all Knights to assist her, and Commanded her to go out of his Countries.

No sooner was the news of her being landed known, but Henry Earl of Lancaster, the Brother of Thomas came to her, the Earls, Barons, and Knights flock'd thither from all parts. She besieged the King and both the Spensers in Bristol; Spenser the Father, and the Earl of Arundel, Son-in-Law to the younger Spenser, were taken in the City and beheaded. The King and Spenser the Son, who were retired into the Castle, and from thence thought to make their escape in a Bark, were taken at Sea. The Favourite, according to his Sentence given by the Barons, was drawn on a Hurdle thorough the Streets of Hereford, then led to the top of a Ladder, where the Executioner cut off those parts that had transgress'd, and plucked out his Heart, then threw it into the Fire, and quarter'd his Body.

1326. In the mean time young King Edward Married Philippa, the second of the four Daughters which the Earl of Hainault had by Jane Daughter of Charles Earl of Valois.

Divers Bands of Gascon Adventurers, whom they called the Bastards, perhaps because their Chiefs were such, ravaged Guyenne; They went into Saintonge, where they seized upon the City of Xaintes: but perceiving that the Captains whom King Charles had sent thither, were resolv'd to give them Battle, they withdrew in the night having set Fire to the City.

1327. Alphonso of Castille surnamed de la Cerda, who had brought some Forces against them, was fallen sick in that Country; from whence being returned to Court, he died in the Village of Genilly near Paris, at the Inn * of the Duke of Savoy. He had a Son named Charles, who was afterwards Constable, but the cause of great Mischiefs.

* Hostel, Princes Houses are called Inns, as Audley Inn.

1324, and the following.

At the request of the Romans, who were troubled that their City was deprived so long of the presence and emolument of the Papacy, Lewis of Bavaria had passed the Mountains in the year 1324. without coming to any agreement with the Pope. Thus these two great Powers set all Italy in a flame, the Guelphs and the Gibbelins by their Factions renewing their horrible Tragedies.

1327. France it self felt it in the excessive Levies the Pope made upon the Churches to maintain that War, and to revenge himself upon the Milanais, the most obstinate of all the Gibbelins, and his worst Enemies. At the first beginning the King opposed it with vigour, but he relaxed as soon as the Pope had permitted him to levy the Tenth upon his Clergy for two years together. "Thus both the one and the other taught their Successors to share those Sacred Goods between them, and gave the Church a Wound which is so far from closing up, that it grows wider every day."

1327. Upon Christmas-Eve of the year 1327. King Charles grew sick at the Bois de Vincennes, and after he had languished six weeks, died at last on the First day of February, Aged Thirty four years, having swayed the Scepter Six years and one Month. He

He oppressed the People as his Father and his Brother Philip had done; Though he were otherwise of a Nature very liberal and gentle, and loved to take Counsel of those he thought to have the clearest Judgments, and most honesty, having ever about him Noblemen and Prelats of known Prudence.

He Married three Wives. The first was Blanch Daughter of Otheline Earl of Burgundy, who being proved faulty, he was contented only with a Divorce, and chose to cover her Shame under a Sacred Veil. The second was Mary Daughter of the Emperor Henry VII. who having hurt her self when going with her first Child, died with the Fruit of her Womb. The third, which was Jane Daughter of Lewis Earl d'Euveux her Uncle, had only two Daughters; whereof the one named Mary survived her Father but a few years, and the other which was Posthumus, and was called Blanch, Married Philip Duke of Orleans, Son of King Philip de Valois.

R E G E N C Y.

AS Charles the Fair had no Male Children, and that his Wife was pregnant, the Regency of the Kingdom, and Guardianship or Care of the Fruit to come were given to Philip, eldest Son of Charles Earl of Valois, and the nearest Male to the deceased King, whom it was said had so ordained it in his Testament, and last Will.

Two Months afterwards the Queen was delivered of a Daughter, she was named Blanch, who in due time was Married, as we have hinted.

1328, in April.

Thus died up at the Root and perished the whole Descent of Philip the Fair. Whereupon one might say, as a famous Author hath done, That the Divine Providence would not permit that those who had sacked the Kingdom by so many Exactions and Violences, should have any Descendants that should possess it, were it not that the Branch of Valois hath used them yet worse then they had done.

PHILIP VI. De Valois, Surnamed the Fortunate,
King XLIX. Aged Thirty six years.

Although Edward King of England had been excluded from the Regency during the Queens being with Child; he did not hold himself excluded from the Kingdom when that Princess had brought forth only a Girl. He agreed most readily that the Daughters could not attain to the Crown of France, because of the imbecillity of their Sex, neither did he claim it for his Mother: but he maintained that the Sons of the Daughters having not that defect, were not incapable, and that on this score they ought to prefer him, being a Male and Grandson to Philip the Fair, before Philip de Valois, who was but his Nephew.

The Pairs and high Barons were called together at Paris immediately after the death of Charles, upon this great Question: Both Parties made their private and underhand Interests with all the pains and craft imaginable: Robert d' Artois Earl of Beaumont, whose Quality, Eloquence, and Reputation could do a great deal in that Assembly, employ'd himself with all his might for Philip, as thinking the advantage that Prince would receive by his Interest, might be of service to himself in his Cause against Mahaud. In fine, his vehement Persuasions, the force of the Salique Custom, very conformable to the Law of Nature, and that aversion the French had for the Government of a Stranger, obliged the Assembly to preserve the right of the Males, and to declare that the Crown belonged to Philip. Edward acquiesc'd in the Sentence, and confirmed it by several Acts during some years.

Philip was Crowned at Reims with the Queen his Wife the Eight and twentieth of May upon Trinity-Sunday. He was surnamed the Fortunate, because Death had taken his three Cousins out of the World to set the Crown upon his Head.

The Estates of Navarre having sent to intreat he would send them back their Lawful Queen and the King her Husband, he granted their just Request, having taken the Advice of his Lords, whom he called together in Council upon a business of that weight. However he still detained Brie and Champagne, giving to the Queen of Navarre and her Husband several Lands in exchange, which all together were to yield the same Revenue as those two large Counties. They were not Crowned at Pampelonna till the Fifth of March in the following year.

Since the time of Hugh Capet, there was no Reign so much stained with the Blood of War as this same. The beginnings were signalized by the gaining of the famous Battle of Mont-Cassel. The great Cities of Flanders had mutinied against their Earl Lewis, and misused him so strangely, that he durst not go into any of them but Ghent. The King as his Lord and of near Parentage, took his part, and entred Flanders with an Army of Twenty five thousand Men. The Flemmings had posted Sixteen thousand upon a Hill near Cassel to guard their Frontier. He coming to encamp in a Valley beneath them, they had the confidence to go and attack him, and appointed three Bodies at the same instant to make their way to his Tent, to the King of Bohemia's, and to that of the Earl of Hainault; thinking to surprize them all three unawares. His Person was in great danger, but whilst the bravest of his Men stood as a Rampart and put a stop to the Enemy, the rest Armed themselves and charged the Flemmings so stoutly, that the three Princes defeated those three Parties, not one Man of them escaping.

All Flanders quell'd by this great shock, submitted to his Mercy. He caused several hundreds to be Hanged, Banished, and Confiscated, and the year after dismantled five or six of their Towns; which allay'd their heat for some time, but did not extinguish it.

The severest punishment for those that are corrupt Officers of the Treasury, and indeed the most beneficial to the Publick, is not the hanging of them, but to pare their Rapacious Talons so close, that they may not be in a capacity to deserve it. Peter Remy Sieur de Montigny, had succeeded to Marigny and la Guette in the management of the Treasury: their sad example had not so great influence upon him, as the passion to enrich himself as they had done. So that by Sentence of Parliament; where there were Eighteen Knights, Five and twenty Lords and Princes, and the King himself present, he was Condemned to be Drawn and Hanged as a Traytor, at the Gallows of Montfaucon, which he had caused to be rebuilt. His Confiscation amounted to Twelve hundred thousand Livers*, a prodigious Sum for those times.

* It was more then Fifteen Millions is now.
* Perage.

"Of the Six great * Pairries of the Laity, the Kings had appropriated four to themselves, to substitute others in their place, and erected many new; to wit, Beaumont le Roger in Anno 1328. for Robert d' Artois, and Anno 1329. the Barony of Bourbon, this with the Title of Duchy, that with the Title of Earldom; Then afterwards in several years Alençon, Evreux, Clermont in Beauvoisis; all for Princes of his Blood, and upon Lands, truly of much lower Dignity and Consideration than those of the former six Pairries, but as much above those of this Age, as the Princes of the Blood are above Private Gentlemen.

* Who was his Ki. Son.

"Edward Earl of Savoy, was come into France to demand assistance of the * King, against the Dauphin de Viennois and the Earl of Geneva, his perpetual Enemies. Dying at Paris, and leaving only a Daughter, John III. Duke of Bretagne, Husband to this Princess, made earnest sute to have the Succession: but the Estates of Savoy, wherein presided Bertrand Archbishop of Tarentaise, declared, That the Salique Law took place there, and called Aymon Brother of the deceased, to that Crown.

1329.

Upon the first Summons they sent to Edward by two Lords who had express Commission, according to the custom of Fiefs, he promised to come and do Homage to the King of France. The seizure of his Fiefs of Guyenne and Ponthieu was therefore deferred, and he came to Amiens in great Equipage. After he had there in vain demanded the restoring of what had been taken in Guyenne from his Father, he did Homage. But it was with his Tongue, and in general words only, intending to Advise first with his Barons what was to be done. When he was returned into England, he sent Letters to King Philip under his great Seal, in which he declared, That that Homage was Liege, and that he owed it for the Duchy of Guyenne, and the Earldoms of Ponthieu and Monstrenil.

"The

"The Troubles that hapned in England, had hindered him from performing that Devoir sooner. His Mother with her Mortimer had made him believe, that his Uncle Edmund, Earl of Kent, had plotted to take away his Life: Indeed that Earl endeavour'd to get King Edward II. out of prison, who was his Brother, and as he thought yet living. Upon this Information young Edward causes him to be seized and condemned to death somewhat too lightly: but afterwards Mortimer and the Queen his Mistress were Treated in the same manner. For the young King weary of their scandalous deportment, caused the Gallant to be hanged * upon pretence of several Crimes, and his Mother to be shut up in a Castle, where they fastned her end: a very just act, had it been done by any other hand but that of a Son.

with Mortimer.

"The discord between Pope John XXII. and the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria, grew to that extremity, that Lewis being in Italy, after the example of the Emperour Otho, degraded John of the Papal Dignity, and in his place substituted Michael de Corbiere a Frier Minor, under the name of Nicholas V. Michael de Cefenna, General of that Order, and divers of his Monks, supported him mightily by their Preachings and Writings.

"These Monks, and others of the Imperial party, having spread many reproachful and bloody Invectives thorough all Christendom against Pope John XXII. an Assembly of the Clergy was held at Paris, where the Bishop in his Pontifical Habit, attended by many other Prelats and Clergy-men, declared to the People in the Church-Porch of Notre-Dame, the Attempts and Mistakes of Corbiere, and pronounced Excommunicate both the said Corbiere, the Emperour Lewis, and Michael de Cefenna with their Adherents.

"Two things ruined this Party, the Emperours ill Conduct, which forced him to go out of Italy, and the disagreement between the Friars Minors, many of whom having forsaken their General, it weakned his Interest so much, that in the end he was disowned by all of that Order. So that Corbiere after many Adventures, being caught and brought to Avignon in the year 1330. begged pardon of John XXII. with a Rope about his Neck: but he could not get off so; they put him in prison, where he died some Months afterwards.

We must not confound this Assembly above-mentioned with another which was held in the same City, and the same year 1329. upon complaint the Kings Judges made by the Mouth of Peter Cugnieres, Kt. Counsellor and Advocate-General of the Parliament, touching the Usurpations and Attempts of the Clergy upon the Secular Jurisdiction.

The business was discussed in a Council held at Vincennes, then again in the Assembly of Parliament. Cugnieres spake earnestly, and to the good liking of all the Nobility who applauded him. Peter Roger elected Archbishop of Sens, afterwards made Pope, and Bertrand Bishop of Autun, who was a Cardinal, having undertaken the defence of their Body, replied very eloquently. The Clergy was in great danger, not only of being lost off in part, but quite rooted out of their Jurisdiction. The King at last by a Decree of the Twenty eighth of December maintained them in their possession, protesting it was his hearty desire to augment the Rights and Priviledges of the Church, rather than any way diminish or infringe them: for which reason they gave him the Surname of the Good Catholic. Notwithstanding after this shock, the Authority of that Body hath been so much weakned, especially by Appeals in all Cases, that now they really believe they have more just cause of Complaints against the Secular Judges, then the Seculars had in those times against them.

France being in Peace, King Philip, following the foot-steps of his Predecessors, had conceived a desire of undertaking an Expedition into the Holy-Land. To this purpose, upon his return from a Pilgrimage he made to Marseilles with a very small Attendance, in performance of a Vow he had made to St. Lewis Bishop of Toulouse, he visited the Pope in Avignon, and discoursed in particular with him about his design.

Towards the end of the year he summon'd the Estates of his Kingdom, and laid before them the passion he had for the Holy War. By their advice, he sent to demand permission of the Pope to levy the Tenth of all the Clergy in Christendom, and many other things, but so extraordinary that he could obtain no favourable Answer.

The English could not well digest that Edward had so easily renounced to the Crown of France; They ceased not from spurring him on, opportunity seeming to present it self self favourably, because Scotland, which France was wont to make a counterpoise to England, was extremely embroil'd. For Edward the Son of John Baliol*, who for a long time led a private Life at his House in Normandy, with a final Force had recover'd that Crown, and driven out King David who was retired to the Court of France together with his Wife and Children.

After the death of Mahaut, the Earldom of Artois fell to Jane of Burgundy, Wife of Philip the Long, and according to the Articles of Marriage, was given to Blanch her Daughter, the Wife of Eudes Duke of Burgundy. Robert d' Artois who could not yet forbear his pretensions to that Earldom, renewed the Process, and produced certain Grants under the great Seal, which he said he had found by Miracle. He believed the King, being his Brother-in-Law, and owing him so great obligation, would not search too deep after the truth of it. But the King, because it concerned the interest of his Daughter, who was much nearer to him than his Sister, caused these Letters Patents to be examin'd so exactly, that they were found to be false; and a Gentlewoman of Artois that had counterfeited them, was burnt alive for it, they having accused her as being a Sorceress.

Robert enraged for the loss of his Process and of his Honour, flew to reproaches against the King, so much the more injurious as they were true, and so exasperated his anger, that he was pushed on to the utmost extremity against him. They seized upon his Confessor, whom they obliged by force or promises, to bear Witness against him: his Wife was laid hold on, though she were the Kings own Sister; and after some delay, for want of appearing, he was Banished by sound of Trumpet and Proclamation through all the Suburbs of Paris, and his Estate was declared to be Confiscate.

He then knew there was no more quarter for him, and would have taken Sanctuary at the Earl of Hainault: but the Kings wrath did not suffer him to be so near, he excited the Duke of Brabant to make War upon the Hanover. Robert not to be a Cause of the ruine of his Friend, went out of those Countries, and resolved to all the extremities whereunto despair does usually hurry Men of courage; he goes to the King of England, and by force of blowing the Coals, kindled the Flame that set all France on Fire.

1332. In the mean time the King of England strengthened himself with Alliances, Moneys, and all sorts of Ammunitions for some great Enterprize. He had in his Party the Earl of Hainault, the Emperor Lewis his Brother-in-Law, several German Princes, with the Cities of Flanders; and to have the greater power in the Low-Countries and over the Princes along the Rhine, he purchased at a dear rate the Quality of Vicar of the Empire. The King was secure of the Earl of Flanders, the Duke of Lorraine, the Earl of Bar, the Kings of Castille, of Scotland, and of Bohemia: but especially of this last, whom he had made fast by many several ties. For besides that he had Married a Sister of his, and his Son Charles born of that Wedlock had been bred in the Court of France, he also Married his Daughter Bonne to John Duke of Normandy. The Nuptials were compleated at Melun.

Emperor Andronicus the Young Reigned eight years and an half, and Lewis of Bavaria.

The Designs of the English being not yet formed, gave Philip no apprehension; so that he was taking up the Cross for the Holy Land, and with him three other Kings, Charles of Bohemia, Philip of Navarre, and Peter of Arragon, with a great number of Dukes, Earls, and Knights. The Clergy took but small joy in it, so mightily were they oppressed with extraordinary Exactions, as if they had a design to ruine the Churches of France to go and restore those in Palestine.

1333. Upon the design of this War, Philip endeavour'd to make Peace between all his Neighbour Princes, he brought the Duke of Brabant to an agreement with the Earl of Flanders, and the Earl of Savoy with the Dauphin de Viennois. The difference betwixt the first was for the City of Malines. It belonged to the Bishop of Liege and to the Earl of Guelders: the Bishop had sold his part to the Earl of Flanders, the Duke of Brabant claimed it, saying, he was the Lord of the Fief. It was concluded it should remain to the Flemming, unless the Duke would rather chuse to reimburse him 85000 Crowns. With that was agreed the Marriage of three Daughters of the Brabanders, with Lewis eldest Son of the Flemming, William Earl of Holland, and Renauld Earl of Guelders.

Pope John XXII. had publickly preached at Avignon; * That the Vision, or Joyes of the Blessed Souls, and the Pains or Torments of the Damned were imperfect till the final day of Judgment, and endeavour'd to make this opinion pass current for the Doctrine of the Church. The Faculty of Theology of Paris courageously opposed it; He tried to get them to own it by two Nuncios whom he sent to them; 1333. * This opinion had been common enough in the former Ages.

them; the one was the General of the Cordeliers, the other a famous Jacobin Doctor. The most Christian King did not judge the Pope to be infallible, but order'd the question to be discuss'd by Thirty Doctors of the Faculty of Theology, who confounded the Cordelier Nuncio; whereupon a Decree was made, and Sealed with their Thirty Seals, which he sent to the Holy Father, exhorting him to believe those who understood Divinity better, then did the Canonists of the Court of Rome. So that the Pope, perceiving his Opinion was not well received and entertained, said he had propos'd it only by way of Disputation, or Argument.

"He died the year following, leaving an immense Treasure, scraped together by his exactions made upon the Clergy of France: Peter Fournier Cardinal, of very mean and low birth, but greatly eminent for his Moderation and Frugality, succeeded him in the Holy See, and took the name of Benedict, or Beuet XII.

Arthur II. Duke of Bretagne had married two Wives; the First was Mary, Daughter and Heiress of Guy, Vicount Limoges. The Second, Yoland Daughter of Robert IV. Earl of Dreux, and one Beatrix, Daughter and Heiress of Amaury V. Earl of Montfort; by Mary came three Sons, John II. who was Duke after his Father; Guy, who had for his part the Earldom of Pontieu (and from whom came a Daughter named Jane;) and Peter, who died without Children. Of Yoland, came a Son named John, who had the Earldom of Montfort, as his Great Grandfather by the Mother had.

1335. and the following.

Duke John II. having no Children, and his Brother Guy being dead in the year 1330. leaving only a Daughter, which was Jane; it was easie to foresee, that great troubles would arise for the succession of the Dutchy, between this Daughter, and John de Montfort; for this last pretended, that he was one degree nearer then she was; and besides, being a Male he ought to exclude her. Now as Duke John had a particular affection for the House of France, from which he was descended by the Male line, he had it in his thoughts, to avoid the destruction of Bretagne, for to exchange this Dutchy with the King, for that of Orleans, or to leave it in Sequestration in his hands to restore it to which of the pretenders he pleased. The Lords of the Country not able to endure either of these two methods, he bethought him of Marrying his Niece to Charles de Chastillon, Brother of Lewis Earl of Blois, and Nephew by his Mother to King Philip de Valois, upon condition he should take the Name, the Motto, and the Coat of Arms of Bretagne. The Marriage was consummate in Anno 1339. The Duke kept him with him, and Treated him as his presumptive Successor; John de Montfort dissembling those pretences he had to the contrary.

Edward having attained to full majority, prompted by his own great courage, and the Favours Fortune had newly bestowed in a Victory over the Scots, was easily led by the continual instigations of Robert d' Artois, animating him to recover the Kingdom of France by the Sword. He thought it convenient to begin with complaints, and accused Philip before the Pope, for having ravished that Crown from him, during his Minority.

The Pope having given him no other Answer, but an exhortation not to disturb a Prince, who had taken on him the Cross for an expedition to the Holy Land, the young King impatient of such long delay, sent to desie King Philip. All his Allies, every one in particular, except only the Duke of Brabant, accompanied his Cartel with their own; and the Bishop of Limoges was the bearer.

Some time before, the King having intelligence that they were preparing to make the Rupture, went to Avignon with John Duke of Normandy his eldest Son, to visit the Holy Father Benedict XII. as well to justify himself of the accusations of the King of England, as to cut out work for the Emperour Lewis of Bavaria, by rendering his agreement with the Pope more difficult.

The defiance being signified, Gautier de Mauny began first by opening the War on the Flanders-side, surprizing the City of Mortagne, not the Castle, then that of Thin l'Evêque; which he kept to bridle Cambrai, that shew'd it self for the French. The King of England's Lieutenants likewise began the War in Saintonge, by the taking of the Castle of Palencour; the Governour whereof, for having but poorly defended himself, lost his Head at Paris.

Thus the expedition to the Holy Land was broken off, the King called back the Forces he had at Marseilles, and kept the Genoese in his pay, the best Men for Sea-service in those days, with theirs, and the assistance of the Castilians, he sent a Naval force to the coasts of England, where they did a great deal of mischief, there being no less then Sixty thousand of them under pay.

At

1336. At the same time his Land-Army, commanded by Rodolph Earl of Eu, and Guisnes his Constable, entred Guyenne, and gained the Lands of the Vicount de Tartas. The Earl de Foix who succeeded him in that employ, did likewise conquer many other petty places.

1337. The Cities of Flanders, whercof Ghent is as it were the Head, hesitated some time between the fear of the power of the French, and the distress and indigence the English drove them into, expressly having prohibited the carrying to them any Wools out of England into their Countrey; but when an English Army had defeated one of theirs in the Island of Cadfant, James d'Artevelle, whom Edward had gained by the power of Money and Presents, introduced his Ambassadors into Ghent, and Treated his Alliance with that City.

This Artevelle was a private Brewer and Beer-Merchant, but crafty, undertaking and politique, who had acquired almost the absolute Government in Flanders, and maintained Agents in all the Cities. So that the Earl could not possibly stop the torrent, and was constrained to quit the Countrey.

1338. At his return from Colen he encamped some days before Cambray an Imperial City, but wherein the Bishop had suffer'd Prince John, the Son of King Philip to enter. Finding he could do little there, he pass'd the Scheld to give the King battle. The two Armies were nigh each other about the Village of Viron-fosse in Cambresis. The King much the stronger in appearance, forbore to give battle, because Robert King of Naples, a great Astrologer, had sent him word, that in what place soever he should venture to fight the English he should lose the day, and run his Kingdom into an extreme danger. The remainder of the year was spent in picquering, and sending forth small parties to make inroads upon one another.

1339. For the Flemmings, as the three Cities of Piſle, Douay, and Orchies, stuck much in their Stomachs, they proffer'd their Service to the King, in case he would surrender them; which being denied, they acknowledged Edward to be King of France, and gave him their Oaths of Fidelity: then did he begin to take that Title upon him in all publick Acts, and to put the Flowers-de-Lys in his Coat of Arms, and in his Seals. However I find, that the year before, he had by a Declaration forbid any to call Philip, by the name of King of France, but only Earl of Valois.

1339. Having shortly after pass'd over into England to recruit himself with Money, there was nothing done in all this year but sacking or plundering, and some skirmishes that were not decisive. In the mean time the King by his Craft and Money together, had found means to take the Emperour off from the English Interest; inasmuch as he repeated his Title of Vicar of the Empire, which he had sold at so dear a rate to him.

1340. But whatever skill they did make trial of in tampering with the Flemmings, they could not be brought over again; and their Earl not daring to return into that Countrey, nor put any trust in Artevelle, kept himself within Piſle. The Pope upon the Kings request had put their Countrey under Interdict, and all their Priests obey'd very exactly, which did at first cause a great consternation; but the King of England sent some that were less scrupulous amongst them, who opened the Churches, and officiated boldly.

1340. The Duke of Normandy (this was John the eldest Son of Philip) after he had made strange havock in Hainault, laid Siege to the Castle of Tbin-P'Everque on the Sambre, because it did much incommode the City of Cambray. The French and Flemish Armies were there once more near each other, but the Flemish now withdrew themselves without blows; the besieged observing their retreat, set fire to the place, and made their escape.

As soon as the King of England had recruited himself with Money and Men, he came and landed a Second time at Schuse, and overthrew the French Fleet that lay upon that coast in wait, thinking to hinder his attempt. The discord between their Admirals (there were two of them) was the main cause of their defeat.

1340. This advantage having abated the edge of their courage, King Philip retired, and distributed his Army in the several Garrisons. The King of England sent to defie him in single combat, one to one, or else a hundred on either side, or both Armies in a pitch'd battle. He was answer'd, That a Lord accepts of no challenge from his Vassal.

Some

Some days after he besieges Tournay, which was reduc'd to great distress; but the long and vigorous defence of the besieged, saved the place by the Truce that was then made.

Mean time the Flemmings were cut in pieces before St. Omers; Robert d'Artois who Commanded them, was not only in danger of losing his Life there, but afterwards being pursued by the Populace, who cry'd out he had betray'd them, was forced, much wounded as he was, to make his escape to the King of England.

The French Garrisons were drawn together in a Body to relieve Tournay. Philip had made divers attempts for that purpose, had lost all hopes of succeeding in it; when on the suddain Edward condescends to a Truce, whether by the mediation of the Widdow Jane, Countess of Hainault, who was his Sister, and Mother of the Queen of England, at that time retired to the Convent of Fontenelles, or as Villain tells it, because of the desertion of the Duke of Brabant, whom the King had gained by his Money, and besides, being unwilling that City should fall into the English hands, went away from them with all his Forces. It was to last from the Twentieth of September, to the Five and twentieth of June following; and was again prolonged at an Assembly, which shortly after was held at Arras, upon the earnest desires of the Popes Legats.

John II. Duke of Bretagne dying this year 1341. upon his return from Flanders: whither he had attended the King, * that War which he so much apprehended, broke out in his Countrey, and kept it in a flame for two and twenty years space. For John Earl of Montfort being very liberal of those Treasures he had in Limoges, secur'd himself of the best Soldiers, and of the Cities of Brest, Nantes, Kennes, Hennebond, and Auray. Then foreseeing his Antagonist would have recourse to the King of France his Uncle, he goes over into England, where he contracted a secret Alliance with Edward, and also did homage to him.

During this progress, Charles de Blois comes unto the King, as to his Sovereign Lord. The Dutchy was a Fief of the Crown of France, ever since the Dukes Peter de Maulevere, and John le Roux his Son, had acknowledged it to be held of the Crown, and moreover, it was a Pairrie; Philip the Fair having grac'd it with that Title in Anno 1277. in recompence for that John II. had brought him Ten thousand Men to the Siege of Courray. Besides, both of the contenders had presented their Petitions to the King, to be admitted to do homage, which no doubt but either of them would have performed in any manner required: and for this reason the King referr'd it to the judgment of the Pairs, who caused both parties to be summon'd to make out their Right and Titles.

The Duke of Bretagne appeared; but finding by the very first words the King spake to him, that not only his Cause, but likewise his Person was in danger, he makes his escape one fair night into Bretagne, with three more, himself disguised like a Merchant, having left all his Officers at Paris, who put a good face upon it, as if their Master were not fled, but kept his Bed for some indisposition.

The better to cover his evasion, he left a procuration with one of his people, to act and carry on this Cause before the King and Pairs, and produce what Deeds and Papers were necessary to maintain his Right. His adversary had done the same; but either of them notwithstanding without power of concluding on any thing, but only for debating, and putting their Arguments and Titles into a method to instruct the Judges.

Upon these imperfect proceedings, the Pairs received Charles de Blois to homage, and threw out Montforts Petition. Immediately Charles and his friends were putting themselves into a posture to execute the Decree; the Duke of Normandy entred into Bretagne with an Army, and having forced Chantoceaux, besieged Nantes, where Montfort had shut up himself. The Nantois terrified at the misfortune of Two hundred of their Burghers taken in a Salley, obliged Montfort to surrender himself to the Duke, who sent him to Paris, where he was confined to the great Tower of the Lovre.

Thus one would have guessed the business had been at an end; but his Wife Margaret, Daughter of Robert Earl of Flanders, a wise and courageous Princess, who made good use of her Head in Council, and of her Sword upon occasion, as well as the deepest Politician, or the bravest Soldier of her time could have done, upheld that ruined party, and not only so, but even raised it again by her heroick Virtue: She retired to Brest, fortify'd her places, put her Son, who was but four years old, in a place of safety, having sent him into England, and pressed King Edward so earnestly for the assistance he had promised to her Husband, that he sends it by Sea to her.

It came indeed somewhat too late to preserve Rennes, but early enough to save Hennebond, whither he was retired. It was however too weak to maintain the cause; the Enemies were Masters of the Field, and took the Towns: but Charles de Blois, I cannot tell by what motive, gave her some respite by a years Truce, during which, this Princess goes over into England to represent the state of her Affairs there.

"In the Month of April of this year 1342. hapned the death of Benedict XII. This good Pope more concerned and affectionate for the exaltation of the Holy See, then of his own Family, left a vast Treasure to the Church, and nothing at all to his kindred, but good instructions for the saving of their Souls. Peter Roger, Native of the Village of Rosé, in Limosin, and Arch-Bishop of Rouen, succeeded him, by the name of Clement VI. This Man behaved himself quite contrary, he scrupled not at all to make use of his Wealth to enrich his Relations, and restored the * Nipotisme very prejudicial to the Church.

The Countess Margaret acted so successfully at the Court of England, that she brought back a powerful supply, commanded by Robert d'Artois. The Naval Forces of the Genoese and Spaniards, which were under the Command of Lewis of Spain, Brother of Alphonso, who was Constable, set upon them smartly, and might well have hindered their Landing, if a fierce Wind had not obliged him, at night to put out to Sea, fearing his great Vessels should run aground; their Ships being smaller, got to Port near Vannes. Robert d'Artois being landed, besieged that City, and carried it by Assault, which he made upon them in the night, presently after another very hot one, which he had given them in the day time.

But after that the Captains of the contrary party knowing he had sent the greatest part of his Army to besiege Rennes, and that himself staid in Vannes, they came and besieged him, and press'd so hard upon him by repeated Assaults, that they regained the place. Himself was hurt in the last attack, and with much ado saved himself by a postern, and got to Hennebond; from thence he went into England, where he thought to find the best Chyrurgeons: he died of his wounds in London, detested of all good and loyal Frenchmen, and passionately regretted by Edward, who promis'd him to revenge his death.

And in effect, he landed soon afterwards in Bretagne, where all at one time he besieged Vannes, Rennes, and Guineamp, protesting he did not intend to break the Truce made with the French, but only he would defend and protect the Lands of a Pupil; he meant Montfort's Son, to whom he had promised his Daughter in Marriage. On the other hand, the Duke of Normandy thought he did not infringe it if he assisted Charles de Blois his Cousin German.

After divers exploits of War on either part, the Duke hemm'd in Edward before Vannes, both by Sea and Land. Now as the English were reduced to hunger, and the French extremely incommoded with the Autumn Rains; they were glad on both sides to get out of these Straights by a Truce for two years, which was concluded betwixt them only for Bretagne. The Legats of the new Pope brought this about; and withal got the promise of both Kings, that they should send to Avignon to the Holy Father, there to determine all their Disputes by a firm and lasting Peace.

1343.

"The Twenty eighth of January hapned the death of Robert the Wise, King of Naples, who left his Kingdom to Jane, Daughter of his Son Charles; and the Sixteenth of September that of Philip King of Navarre: Charles his Son, who since was surnamed the Bad, came to the Crown, under the Guardianship of Queen Jane of France, his Mother.

1343.

The Duke of Normandy and the English Deputies met at Avignon to Treat about a Peace: and although they could not come to an agreement in any one thing, yet nevertheless it was believed they would conclude a Peace at last; because the Popes Mediation was pleasing to both Princes. But here an unhappy accident falls in their way, and not only stoppt their proceedings towards a Peace, but set them at farther distance then ever they were, and overwhelmed France with a deluge of woes.

Oliver de Clifton, and Ten or Twelve Lords Bretons of the French party, having accompanied Charles de Blois to a Turnament that was held at Paris, the King caus'd them to be all made prisoners, upon some suspicion of their holding intelligence with the English, and soon after beheaded, without any Trial or Hearing of their Case,

Case, to the great astonishment of all the World, and indignation of the Nobility, whose Blood till then, had never been shed but in Battle: and indeed this too severe King, who revenged even his own mistrusts, did so alienate the affection of his Grandees, that they served him but very ill, when he had need of them upon great occasions.

The death of these Lords of Bretagne, enraged the King of England; he was almost like to have done the same to Henry Lord of Leon, of Charles de Blois his party, whom he held a prisoner; but upon the humble intreaties of the Earl of Derby, he gave him his Life and Liberty, upon condition he should go and declare to King Philip, that the Truce was infringed by this Murther, and that he was now going to begin the War anew; as he quickly did, as well in Guyenne by the Earl of Derby, assisted by the Gascon Lords under his obedience, as in Bretagne by Montfort's party, till he could go himself and carry a War into the very heart of the Kingdom.

1344. and 45.

The people of France had liberally granted to King Philip, very notable Subsidies of Money for his Wars; he raised them by much, and which was worse, he settled a new one upon Salt; for which cause, Edward by way of railery, called him the Author of the Salique Law. This impost which makes the Sun and Water to be sold so dear, was the invention of the Jews, mortal enemies to the name of Christians, as the word or term Gabel denotes, which comes from the Hebrew.

The Earl of Derby, after the having refreshed himself at Bordeaux, with the Forces he had brought from England, took the Field to fall upon the Provinces on this side the Dordogne. The Earl of Laille and the Gascon Lords, who had thrown themselves into Bergerac, thinking to obstruct his passage over that River, were constrained to abandon that Town to him, and to let him over-run all the Upper Gascogne, where he conquer'd several small places.

1345.

When he was returned to Bordeaux, the Earl of Laille took his opportunity, having sent for the Lords of that Countrey, he being as it were Vice-Roy, and laid Sieg to Auberoche, but not with the like success. The Earl of Derby coming to its relief with only a thousand Men, defeated his Army, which consisted of Tenthousand, and took him prisoner, with eight or ten Earls and Vicounts more. After which, he with much ease, besieged and took the Cities of la Reole, Angoulesme, and divers others.

John Earl of Montfort had been set at liberty by virtue of the Truce, upon condition that he should not depart the Court: notwithstanding he goes and puts himself at the head of his Forces in Bretagne; he besieged Kemper, but was so far from taking it, that himself had like to be taken. Going from thence he sacked and burnt Dinan: then overburthen'd with grief and anger, for the slow progress in his Affairs he died about the end of September; leaving the management of his pretensions to his Wife and his Son, who was yet very young. He had the same name as his Father, and afterwards gained the Surname of Valiant.

The famous Artevelle had made a promise to King Edward, to procure, that his Son the Prince of Wales should be owned for Earl of Flanders by the great Cities, to the exclusion of their natural Lord. Upon this assurance Edward carries his Son to Schuse: the Deputies of the Cities went to wait on him, he treated them very magnificently, but they would not hear of disinheriting their Earl.

Artevelle's enemies did not fail to make use of this occasion, to stir up the peoples hatred against him. When he was returned to Ghent, having been so ill advised as to remain some days at Schuse, after the other Deputies, the People fell upon him and murther'd him. The King of England retir'd in a fury for the death of his good friend; however, the Cities of Flanders having sent their Deputies to him, he accepted their satisfaction, and the offer they made him, to bestow the Daughter of their Earl upon the Prince of Wales.

There was great reason to put some stop to the Earl of Derby's progress in Guyenne, the Duke of Normandy goes to Toulouse in the beginning of January, with an hundred thousand Men bearing Arms. All this formidable multitude did no more in three Months, besides the taking of two or three little paltry Towns in Angenois, and the City of Angoulesme; whence they fell down upon Tonneins, and after that, came and besieged Aiguillon, seated on the confluence of the Rivers * d'Olt, and de Garonne, well munition'd, and well fortify'd for those times.

In all this age we do not find a more memorable Siege, either for the Attacks, or the Defence. They made three Assaults each day for a whole week together, then they came to their Artillery, and their Engines both by Sea and Land. Philip the Son of Endes Duke of Burgundy, and Earl of Boulogne by his Wife, who was Daughter and and Heyrels of Earl William, was wounded upon a Salley, whercof he died. At last the Battle of Cressy * being lost, drew away the Duke of Normandy from this Siege, which till then he obstinately continued.

The Second day of June, Edward with a Fleet of Two hundred Sail, wherein he had Four * thousand Men at Arms: Ten thousand Archers, and as many Foot, as well Irish as Welshmen, puts to Sea with his eldest Son, with intent to land in Guyenne. He did not relye so much upon his Forces, as upon the secret discontents of the French Nobility, and the intelligence he held with many of the Grandees. He had with him Gefroy, Brother of the Earl of Harcourt; a Lord very powerful in Normandy, who having lost the favour of King Philip in his indignation, and finding no certain security there, went into England.

(The winds having turned Edward two several times out of his road) towards Guyenne, this Gefroy inflamed with revenge, perswaded him that Heaven would have him steer his course for Normandy, a fat and plentiful Countrey, that had not felt a War for two ages; so that he went and landed at the Port de la Hogue. St. Vaast in Constantine, near St. Sauveur, which were Lands belonging to Gefroy, resolved to cross the rough France to go and joyn the Flemmings.

His Army marched divided by day in three Bodies, which joyned together at night. Gefroy undertook the Office of Field Marshal. The Cities of Valognes, Carentan, St. Lo, and Harfleur were his first prey. Rodolph * Earl of Eu and of Guisnes, Constable of France, and the Count de Tancarville, whom the King had sent to Caen, encreased his Spoil and Fame by taking them prisoners, with the defeat of Twenty thousand Men; the Burghers, braver in words then deeds, having forsaken them in the midst of the Fight.

Going from thence, he continued his march by the Bishopricks of Lisieux and Evreux, sacked and burnt all along the Seine, even to Paris, but approached not nigh Rouen, and came and encamped at Poissy; from thence he sent a defiance to Philip, to fight him under the Walls of the Louvre: but after he had staid there five days, fearing to be enclosed betwixt the Rivers of Seine and Oyse, he caused the Bridges to be repaired, and passed into Beauvais, with design to retire into his Countrey of Pontbuen, marking his road all the way with long traces of Fire and Blood.

Philip foaming with rage to behold with his own eyes from his capital City, such Flames in the very heart of his Kingdom, goes forth to pursue him in great haste, that he might fight him before he could pass the Somme. Edward not being able to find any passage over that River, was so happy as to have a prisoner that shewed him the Foord of Blanquetague below Abbeville. Gondemar du Faya Norman Lord could not hinder him with Twelve thousand Men from passing at low Water, and was put to the rout. The same Evening Edward went and encamped at Cressy, and the next day Philip lodged at Abbeville, which is within three Leagues of it on this side; he had not less then an hundred thousand Men, with which he might have hemm'd them in, and reduced them to a Famine in a few days: but he believing that having over-taken them, was conquering them, he marches the next day out of Abbeville, and gives him battle the same day, which was the Six and twentieth of August.

His too hasty March, and three long Leagues of way, had made the French lose both their breath and strength before they engaged the enemy. On the contrary, the English were fresh and recruited, and despair re-doubled their courage. The Genoese the chief strength of Philips Infantry, who were commanded by Antony d'Oria, and Charles Grimaldi, did nothing to the purpose, their Cross-bow strings being made useles by a deluge of Rain that fell just upon the first beginning of their Service; they retreating from before a shoure of the English Arrows, the Count d'Alenfon, who suspected it to be Treachery, rides quite over them with his Cavalry, and so began the rout. We must also take notice, that in this famous Battle, the English had four or five pieces of Canon which gave much terror, for that was the first time they ever saw those thundering Engines in our Wars. To all this add, that some amongst the Grandees, very glad to see Philip engaged upon this occasion, made more shew then they did service. These causes chiefly gave the victory to the English.

The Battle lasted from four in the Afternoon till Two the next Morning. A great flight of Ravens, which a little before the Fight were observed to hover over the French Army, were esteemed as a presage of their defeat.

Of the French side there remained dead upon the place Thirty thousand Foot, Twelve hundred Knights, and Four score Banners taken. John King of Bohemia, Charles Charles Earl of Alenfon, Brother to the King, Lewis Earl of Flanders, and Twelve or Fifteen of the most illustrious Counts lost their Lives. King John stark blind as he was, fought very valiantly, having caused his Horses Bridle to be fastned to the Bridles of two of his bravest Knights horses. His Son Charles, King of the Romans was hurt with three wounds; but it is not true that the Kings of Majorca, Scotland, and Navarre were in this Engagement; the two first were in their own Countreys, busie enough about their own concerns, and the other not above the age of Thirteen or Fourteen years, under the tuition of his Mother.

The King this time Unfortunate, retired out of the Battle, under the favour of the night, and saved his Person in the Castle of Broye, from thence got to Amiens, and so to Paris, to raise another Army.

The next day another slaughter, twice greater then the former was made, by Five hundred Lances, and two thousand Archers, amongst the common People, who being ignorant of what had hapned, were marching to the French Camp.

The English having ravaged all Boulonois at their pleasure, went and laid Siege to Calais about the Eighth of September, and stuck close to it with the more security, upon the news that David King of Scotland was vanquish'd and made prisoner by the Queen of England, upon his falling on the Frontiers.

"Before the Battle of Cressy, the Emperour Lewis was Excommunicated by the Pope, and degraded by Five Electors, who in his stead placed Charles the Son of John King of Bohemia. This Prince after the death of Lewis, which hapned in October the following year, got his Election confirmed, and bought the Claims of two or three others, who disputed their Title to the Empire with him, because they had been named by some of the Electors.

After the Duke of Normandy had raised the Siege of Aiguillon, the Earl of Derby remained Master of the Field, regained all that part of Guyenne which lies beyond the Dordogne, and having passed the Rivers, ravaged and burnt Saintonge and Poitou, took St. John d'Angely and kept it, sacked the great City of Poitiers and quitted it, after he had refreshed himself there for Twelve days together.

The Flemmings having lost their Earl at the Battle of Cressy, sent a Deputation to the King to re-demand his Son who was their natural Prince. Whilst he was in their power, they had affianced him to King Edwards Daughter; but that Alliance being contrary to his inclination, he escaped from them, and returned to the Court of France.

After he had staid there a year, he made a particular peace with the English, by the consent of Philip his Sovereign. It was agreed that he should permit the Flemmings to give them assistance: but as for himself he should not intermeddle with the Affairs either of the one or other of the two Princes.

The Flemmings being at Edwards Devotion, made great inroads upon Artois; and on the other side John de Montforts party got the upper hand in Bretagne by the help of the English. For Charles de Blois, going to besiege la Roche de Rien, Montfort gave him Battle the Twentieth of June, vanquish'd him, and took him prisoner with his two Sons John and Guy, and most of the Lords of his party. His Wife, whom ambition, and the Royal Blood she came of, inspired but with too much courage, gathered up the fragments, and maintained the business so well, that he recover'd once more.

It was but in vain that Philip advanced between Wissant and Calais, with an Army of One hundred and fifty thousand Men, to relieve the City; the English had enclosed his Camp with such good Trenches, that he could find no way to attaque him. The besieged driven to the severest extremity of Famine, were forced to surrender the last day of August.

Fame shall never forget the name of Eustace de St. Pierre, the most noted Citizen of Calais, and his heroick generosity to save his fellow Citizens. Edward mortally enraged at their long resistance, would not receive them on composition, unless they would deliver up to him six of their principal Burghers to do what he pleased with them: The Council not knowing what to resolve, and the whole City remaining exposed to the revenge of a cruel Conquerour; Eustace freely proffer'd to be one of those Six: By his example there soon follow'd enough to make up the number, who went out in their Shirts with Ropes about their Necks to deliver the Keys to Edward. He was so obstinately bent to put them to death, that the Queen his Wife had all the trouble imaginable to obtain his pardon for their Lives. He drove out all

* Or Joane.

"Robert King of Sicilia having no Heirs of his own Body, but Jane * the Daughter of his Son Charles Duke of Calabria, had Married her, Anno 1333. to Andrew, Second Son of Carobert King of Hungary, the eldest of these two being then but seven years of age. It hapned Twelve years afterwards, Andrew not being enough to Jane's liking, and having been Crowned King by the Pope, pretending that the Kingdom did delong to him, certain Conspirators made him rise one night out of the Bed where he was lying with her, and hanged him at a Windore. Charles Prince of Duras, who was likewise of the blood of the Kings of Sicilia, and had espoused Mary the Sister of Jane, was Counsellor, and Author of this infamous act. Jane was not innocent; well might she lament and sigh, her cries and tears signified less towards her justification, then her subsequent Marriage with Lewis her Cousin-German, a lovely Prince, and according to her desires, made for her conviction.

Lewis the Great, King of Hungary, being come into Italy to revenge the death of his Brother Andrew, and to get the Kingdom, Treated Charles de Durus in the same manner as they had used King Andrew. He would have done the like to the Princess and her fair Husband, had they fallen into his hands, for which reason she fled away in good time to her County of Provence, and her Husband soon after her. The Pope shewed her great respect, but taking advantage of the extreme necessity she was reduced unto; he got from her the City and County of Avignon, for which he was to give but Fourscore thousand Gold Florins of Florence *, but over and besides this bargain he approved her Marriage with Prince Lewis, who in requital ratified this sale. It belongs to the Lawyers to judge whether the minority of this Queen, and the Edicts she afterwards made, to declare null all alienations of the Lands in Provence, which had been made as well in the Reign of Robert, as by her self whilst she was yet a Minor, do not make this Contract void and null: but the Emperour Charles IV. confirmed it, and wholly freed this County from the subjection of the Empire, of whom it held, as being an Under-Fief of the Kingdom of Arles.

"We ought to know that when the Earls Alphonso de Toulouze, and Raimond Berenger of Barcelona, married the two Daughters of Gilbert Earl of Provence, and parted his Succession between them (whereof Alphonso had all from the Durance to the Lifer, with the Title of a Marquisate; and Raimond what is from the Durance to the Sea, with that of an Earldom) they likewise divided the City of Avignon betwixt them; and that the Kings of France as Successors to Alphonso de Poitiers, Brother of St. Lewis, who married the Heyrefs of Toulouze, had enjoy'd the one moiety till the year 1290. When Charles the Fair gave it to Charles II. King of Sicilia, upon the Marriage of Charles de Valois his Brother, with Margares the Daughter of that King.

The Lords of Montmorency de Charny and others, who commanded the French Forces in Artois and Picardy, thinking it might not be amiss to recover Calais during the Truce, held some intelligence with Aymery of Pavia, a Lombard Captain in that City; but the double-hearted Traitor gave ear to them only to surprize them; he gave notice of it to Edward, who desiring to be of the party, passed the Sea with Eight hundred Men at Arms, that this great draught might not break out of the Net, so that when it came to be put in execution, they found themselves unfortunately caught in the toyl with the Twenty thousand Crown bargain, and a thousand select Men; whereof One hundred of them who had engaged themselves in a Tower belonging to the Castle, and the rest who waited for entrance, were charged and cut in pieces, after a brave defence.

"In the Month of August of the year 1348, there appeared on the side of Paris a kind of Comet or Star, extraordinary Luminous, the Sun being not then Set; it appeared as not very far distant from the Earth: the following night it was thought to be much greater, and divided in several Rayes: but soon after it disappeared.

France was miserably tormented all manner of ways; it had undergone a horrible Famine Anno 1338. and after that the spoil the Soldiers made, had caused every thing thing to be held excessive dear, and kept the whole Kingdom in great scarcity. This year 1348. A cruel Plague made all the Provinces desolate; the Exactions worse then all these Plagues together, ruined the People utterly; and by I know not what curse, the more the Taxes were increased, the more indigent was the King.

"There never had been any Plague more furious and destructive, then that in Anno 1348. It was universal over all our Hemisphere; there was neither City, nor Village, nor House but was infected. It began in the Kingdom of Cathay, Anno 1346. by a vapour that was most horrible stinking, which breaking out of the Earth like a kind of subterranean Fire, consumed and devoured above Two hundred Leagues of that Countrey, even to the very Trees and Stones, and infected the Air in such manner, that there fell down millions of young Serpents, and other venomous Insects. From Cathay it passed into Asia and Greece, thence into Africk, afterwards into Europe, which it ransacked throughout, to the very utmost bounds of the North. The venome was so contagious that it infected by the very sight; It was observed to last Five Months in its full force and rage, where once it had got footing. Those that suffered least by the Sword of this exterminating Angel, could hardly save one Third of the Inhabitants: but in many places it did not leave above the Fifteenth or the Twentieth person alive.

Money was wanting, they set upon squeezing the Officers of the Treasury; amongst others Peter des Essards the Kings Treasurer, was condemned to the sum of a hundred thousand Gold Florins, which was moderated to the half. Afterwards to stop the peoples Mouths, and daily complaints they chose out for the management of the Treasury, two Bishops, two Abbots, and four Knights, and they expelled all the Italian Usurers, called Lombards, out of the Kingdom. The principal Lottery-Money they had lent, was taken and confiscated to the King; this was but about Four hundred thousand Livres, but their Use-Money, which was two Millions, was remitted to the Owners.

1348.

Queen Jane, Daughter of Robert Duke of Burgundy, being dead in the year 1349 King Philip, though he were yet in mourning weeds, took fire for Blanch, Daughter of Philip, King of Navarre. He had sent for her to be Married to his Son, but he liked her best for himself, and did wed her.

1349.

There had been for many years a mortal War between the Earls of Savoy, and the Dauphins de Viennois. The Dauphin Humbert, feeble in Body and Courage, not able to endure the continual Attaques of Amé VI. called the Earl Verd*, and besides being very melancholy for the loss of his only Son, withal over Head and Ears in debt, and having no love for his kindred, bethought himself of giving up his Countrey to some great potentate, who might plague, and put the Savoyard to as much trouble as he had put him. His inclination was to make an accommodation with the Pope; the People could have wished to be under the Government of the Savoyard, that they might have no more war on that side: but the Nobility liked rather to be under the King of France, who had Employments and Offices to bestow. Henry de Villars Arch-Bishop of Lyons, and John de Chisy Bishop of Grenoble, byas'd the Dukes mind, so as to make it run that way.

1349.

* Or the Green Earl.

He had therefore in the year 1343. made a Donation to King Philip, of the Lordship of Dauphine, and the Lands adjoining, upon condition that all their privileges should be preserved intirely; that it should be incorporated for ever in the Crown of France, and that the Kings eldest Son should enjoy it, and bear the Title and the Arms of Dauphine; for which the King gave him Forty thousand Crowns of Gold, and ten thousand Florins Rent to be levied on the Countrey.

This year 1349. he confirmed the Contract, and afterwards retired himself into a Convent of the Jacobins, where he took on the Habit. The Pope tyed him to the Church by Sacred Orders, fearing he might start back and gainstay the thing. He received them all on Christmasts-day, the Subdiaconal at midnight Mass, the Diaconal at Mass by break of day, and the Priesthood at the Third Mass. The same day he Celebrated, and eight days after was promoted to Episcopacy, and honoured with the Title of Patriarch of Alexandria.

In 1350. Philip had likewise, either by purchase or by engagement of James of Arragon King of Majorca, the Counties of Roussillon and Cerdagna in the Pyreneans, and bought of the same Prince the Barony of Montpellier in Languedoc, which the House of Arragon held in Under-Fief of the Crown of France, for the sum of Six-score thousand Crowns of Gold, currant Money.

1350.

In the Month of June, of the year 1350. the Truces wer prolonged between the Kings for three years.

1350.

Two Months afterwards Philip fell sick at Nogent le Roy, (perhaps of the toil and fatigue of his new Marriage, very often mortal to antient people that take beautiful Wives. Feeling his last hour draw near, he sent for his Children and the Princes of his Blood, and gave them warning and counsel to live in amity and concord with one another, make a Peace if it could be had, maintain good Order, and countenance Justice, ease the People, and other fine and excellent things which Princes oftner recommend to their Successors at their deaths, then practise themselves while they are alive. He expired the Two and twentieth day of August, in the seven and fiftieth year of his age, and in the Three and twentieth of his Reign. Very brave in his own person, more happy in Negotiations then in Battle, hard-hearted towards his Subjects, suspicious, vindictive, and one that suffer'd himself to be too far transported by the impetuosity of his anger.)

(He had two Wives, Jane and Blanche, that the Daughter of Robert II. Duke of Burgundy, and this of Philip d'Eureux King of Navarre: By the First he left two Sons, John who Reigned, Philip who was Duke of Orleans, but had no posterity; and one Daughter named Mary, who Married John Duke of Limburgh, Son of John III. Duke of Brabant. (By his Second he had but only one Daughter, posthumus) she was named Jane, who died at Beziers in the year 1373. as they were conducting her to Barcelona, to marry John Duke of Girona, eldest Son to Peter IV. King of Aragon. (The Queen her Mother survived her Husband almost Fifty years, which she passed in perpetual Widdow-hood.) Thus under the Reign of King John, there were two Queens Dowagers in France, this same, and Jane d'Eureux widdow of Charles the Fair, who died in the Month of May, Anno 1370.

John

John I. King L.

By some called the Good King;

Aged XLII years.

POPE S,

CLEMENT VI. Two years three Months, during this Reign.	URBAN V. Elected the Eighth of October, 1362. S. Eight years and above Two Months, whereof one year and Six Months during this Reign.
INNOCENT VI. Elected in December 1352. S. Nine years, and near Nine Months.

After John had assisted at the Funeral of the King his Father, he was Crowned at Reims, with his Second Wife Jane of Boulogne, the Twentieth day of September. From thence he came and made his entrance into Paris the Seventeenth of October, sat in his Seat of Justice in Paris, gave the Order of Knighthood to his two eldest Sons, to some other Princes and Lords, and began some shew of labouring about the Polity, and the Reformation of the whole Estate.

The Prince having maturity of age, the experience of Affairs, a valour tried in occasions, the example of his Fathers faults before his Eyes, and four Sons that would soon be able to draw their Swords, promised a happy conduct, and a most flourishing Government: yet having the same defects as his Father, too much of impetuosity and precipitation for revenge, little prudence, and as little consideration for the miseries of his poor people, he fell into greater misfortunes, and such as did not let go their hold, but stuck to him till his death.

The Blood wherewith he sullied the entrance of his Reign, was a presage, and perhaps a cause of it, much likelier then the prodigious Comet which appeared this year. Rodolph Earl of Eu and of Guines, Constable of France, a prisoner of War to the English ever since the Battle of Caen, had made divers voyages into France to procure his own deliverance, and that of his Compagnons. Some perswaded the King, were it true or false, that under this pretence he practised some contrivances in favour of the English; he was then arrested by the Prevost of Paris the Sixteenth of November, and the Nineteenth beheaded obscurely, and without form of Process, in presence of the Duke of Bourbon, and seven or eight Lords of note, before whom it was given out in publique he had confessed his crime.

His spoil was thus divided; his Office of Constable was given to Charles d'Espagne de la Cerde, Favourite to the King; the Earldom of Eu, to John d'Artois Son of that Robert of whom we have mention'd so much, and that of Guines to Jane the only Daughter of the defunct, whose first Husband was Gualter Duke of Athenes, and her Second to Lewis Earl of Estampes, of the Branch of Eureux, from which sprung that of the Earls of Eu Princes of the Blood.

That he might not be inferiour in magnificence to the English who was a sumptuous and liberal Prince, who had instituted the Order of the Garter; King John instituted, or rather revived the Order of the Star, in a famous Assembly which he held in his Palace of St. Ouy near Paris, and ordained, that whereas those Knights did formerly wear the Star upon their Helmets or Crest, or hung about their necks, they should now have them embroidered on their Cloaths. The Chapter was held upon Twelfth-day. Charles the Fifth his Son observing this Order, much debased by the multitude of mean people admitted, left it to the Chevalier that Commanded the Watch and his Archers.

Though the Truce was not expired, there was still some enterprize upon one another. The English seized upon Guisnes, having corrupted the Governour with Money. Edward excused it pleasantly; saying, The Truces were Merchandise, and that he did no more then follow the example of King Philip, who would have bought Calais. The Traytor that had sold Guisnes, was taken, and drawn in pieces by four wild Horses.

Guy de Nesle Marechal of France was defeated and taken with Arnold d'Endregben, and several people of note in a rencounter in Guyenne.

and 51.

In Bretagne the two parties of Blois and Montfort, though they had only two Women in the head of them, were perpetually engaging and fighting it out desperately. In those days challenges between Cavaliers, and the chief Commanders of parties that were enemies was very common, but more frequent between a certain number appointed on each side, then singly hand to hand; and indeed they called them Battles. The most remarkable in these years, was that of Thirty Bretons, against as many English. Richard Brembo was the chief of these, and the Lord de Beaumanoir of the others. The victory fell to the Bretons, and the greatest Honour to their Chief.

* Du Guesclin fought another time in a Ring with Brembo, one to one, and slew him.

The following year 1351. Charles de Blois, who had been four years a prisoner in England, was released upon ransom, giving two of his Sons for hostage till the payment of it; and till he had discharged that debt he forbore to take up Arms.

The Lords that had been taken prisoners in their attempt upon Calais, having been discharged, carried on the War with the Marechal de Beaugien about the Countrey of St. Omer; having upon a time surprized the Lombard that had betrayed them, they caused him to be quartered alive.

The Earl of Flanders had deny'd to assist at the Kings Coronation, because they refused to restore his three Cities to him: nevertheless he came to Paris to pay homage for his Lands, and renew the Treaty of Confederation.

"The Sixth of December hapned the death of Pope Clement VI. Cardinal Stephen d'Albert, a Limosin by birth, and Bishop of Clermont succeeded him the Eighteenth of the same Month, and took the name of Innocent VI.

King Charles of Navarre his return into the Kingdom, brought with it a long train of war and calamities. He had all the good qualities that a wicked Soul renders pernicious, Wit, Eloquence, Craft, Resolution, and Liberality.

Though he had this year 1353. married Jane, one of the Kings Daughters, he gave not over from pursuing his pretensions to the Counties of Brie and Champagne, and also Angoulesme. Charles d'Espagne, to whom the King had given this last, dissuaded him from proffering satisfaction. The Navarrais discontented, retires to his County of Evreux; and understanding that the Constable was in his Castle de P' Aigle; he undertakes a thing as base as it was bold; He carries with him a hundred Horsemen, scales the Castle (it was on the Sixth of January) and makes them stab him in his Bed. That done, he had the insolence to own the fact, to justify himself by Letters to the King and Council, and all the good Cities of the Kingdom, to raise Forces, fortifie his Towns, and sollicite all the neighbouring Princes to a League against France.

The King dissembles him and flatters him to draw him to Paris, but he will not come till they grant him conditions very advantageous, of Lands for the value of Brie and Champagne, the independance of his Earldom of Evreux from all others but the King, full and free Absolution for those that had murdered the Constable; and besides all this, a very considerable sum of Money, and the Kings Second Son in Hostage.

1354.

Upon these Securities he appears in the Parliament of Paris the third day of March. The King sitting on his Throne, attended by the Pairs, the Legat, and divers Prelats. The criminal having crav'd his pardon in a studied Speech, intermixed with complaints and excuses; the Constable had order to arrest him, only for forms sake, and lead him out to the next room, while they debated: then straightway he was released upon the request of the two Queens, the Widdows of Charles the Fair, Fair, and of Philip de Valois. The Legat made him a grave Remonstrance, and after all, the King declared him Absolv'd.

Some few days after he retired into Normandy, but went thence immediately without leave of the King, and made a journey to Avignon. He went tierretting up and down till the English should take the Field; whereupon the King enters again into Normandy and seized his Lands: but that Prince returning from Navarre by Sea, having brought Forces that facaged all the Countrey; and besides, it being feared, the English would soon Land, it was thought fitter to make use of kindness; Charles the Kings eldest Son soothed him so finely that he was pacified, and least in appearance, and came with him to Paris.

John Paleologus having deposed Cantacuzena, and Charles IV.

"The Emperour Charles IV. goes to be Crowned at Rome, or rather to be covered with shame, having made that infamous Contract with the Pope, that he would not sojourn so much as one whole day in that City; which brought both himself and the Empire, into the most despicable condition. The year following, upon the Eleventh of January, he made that famous Constitution, called the Golden Bull, of which the Politicians judge very variously.

1355.

Upon a Shrove-Tuesday night the English by Scalado took the Castle of Nantes, and the very same night Guy de Rochefort took it again; and hew'd them all in pieces as a reward for their having broken the Truce.

Gaston Phebus Count de Foix, who Married the Sister of the King of Navarre, was sent prisoner to the Chastellet at Paris, because he refused to hold his Lands of the King, perhaps it might be those holden of the English. But in a Month after he was set at liberty, upon condition he should go into Guyenne, and command the Kings Army against the Prince of Wales.

For the Truce was no sooner at an end, but that young Prince invested in the Duchy of Guyenne by his Father, began to make himself known by ravaging and burnings. He made incursions, even as far as Beziers and Narbonne, without meeting any opposition from the French Commanders; the Earl of Foix, James de Bourbon Constable, and John de Clermont, who were stronger then his party, but too much divided by jealousies amongst themselves.

1355.

His Father at the same time landed at Calais, and ran over all the Boulonois and Artois, even to Hesdin, where he broke through the Park, yet could not force the Castle; but having intelligence that King John was coming directly to him, he presently retires to Calais, and from thence to his own Island, without returning any answer to the generous challenge sent him by that Prince, to fight him, either hand to hand, or Army against Army.

The charges of this War could not be defray'd without great expences; and at that time no extraordinary Subsidies were Levied without consent of the Estates. The King summon'd them to the Castle of Ruel, where having laid open to them the necessity of Affairs, they consented to the maintenance of Thirty thousand Men: To make a fund for this, they were fain to set up that Gabel upon Salt again, which had been laid aside, and moreover, impose Eight Deniers per Liver upon all Merchandise, and a certain annual Tax upon every mans Revenues, whether Lands, Benefices, Offices, nay, even Salaries, and Servants wages.

These excessive Subsidies caused Seditions in many places, especially at Arras. The Marechal d'Endregben going in amongst them, under the notion of a pacificator, seized upon about a hundred of the most turbulent, whereof a score of them had their Heads taken off.

The Navarrais stirred up the people every where, upon pretence of the publique good. But with all his malice, he was nevertheless so much gull'd, as to be allured by the Dauphin, and drawn into the Castle of Rouen with Lewis, Earl of Harcourt, John and William his Brothers, the Lords de Clere, de Graville, de Maubus, de Preaux, and seven or eight more of his Confederates. One day while the Dauphine was Treating them at a Dinner, behold the King comes in at a Postern Gate well armed, seizes upon the King of Navarre and his company, puts the Earl of Harcourt, Graville, Maubus, and Doublet, in two Carts, carries them out into the open fields, and there causes their four Heads to be cut off, without any form of Process or Trial. That done he sends the Navarrais under a strong Guard to the Castle Gailiard d'Audelis, from whence having been removed into several prisons, and often threatned with death, he was conducted to the Castle d'Arlesux in Cambresis.

1356. This violent proceeding had very bloody consequences. Philip Brother of the Navarrais, and Gefroy Brother to the Earl of Harcourt, who had a good many places in Normandy, called in the English, to revenge that outrage done to their Brothers. The Earl of Derby and the Duke of Lancaster with Four thousand Men began the War in that Countrey.

1356. The King went thither in person, gave them chace as far as P'Aigle, and having scatter'd them in the Woods, laid Siege to Breteuil, a little place which defended it self Seven weeks.

"In these unhappy times the smallest Towns fortified themselves, so as to put a stop to the greatest Armies. The very Villages enclosed themselves with Works or Walls against the plundering Soldiers; and this infinite number of Castles served only to lengthen out the War, and devour the People by harbouring Thieves and Cut-throats.)

"The Nobility and Soldiery seemed as it were to triumph in the miseries of the poor common people. Luxtury, who would believe it? took its birth from desolation. The Gentry who had ever been very modest in their Habits, began to adorn themselves with Jewels, Pearls, and Gew-gawes like the Women, to wear plumes of Feathers in their Bonnets, a sign of their levity, and give themselves passionately over to play at Dice all the night long, and all the day at Tennis.)

1356. While the King was at Chartres where he was drawing all his Forces together, he was informed that the Prince of Wales with Twelve thousand Men, of which there were but Three thousand natural English, had pillaged Quercy, Auvergne, Limosin, Berry, and was marching to do the same in Anjou, Tourain, and Poitou. He thought fit to cut off his March upon his Retreat, and led his Army along the Loire. The Prince being advertiz'd, left the Road to Tours, and retired by Poitou: but he could not do it so speedily, but that the Kings Army overtook him within two Leagues of Poitiers. The Prince finding him so neer, entrenched himself amongst the Vines, and strong thick Hedges, nigh the place called Maupertuis.

1356. Cardinal de Perigord the Popes Legat, went often from the one Army to the other to prevent them from coming to blows. Edward offer'd to pay for all the damages he had done in his march from Bourdeaux, to deliver up all his prisoners, and not to bear Arms himself, nor any of his Subjects for Seven years time against France. But King John believing the Victory secure and certain, rejected all his submissions; and blinded with passion and anger, instead of hemming him in and starving him (which could not have failed in three days time) went on headlong with the courage and fury of a Lyon, rather then of a Captain, to attaque him within his fastness the Nineteenth of September. Nay, by the worst advice in the world, he caused all his Horsemen to alight, excepting three hundred select Men, who were to begin the onset, and the German Cavalry who had Orders to second them.

Of the four Sons the King had in this Battle, three of them were a little too soon carried out of the fray by their Governours, together with Eight hundred Lances; and this gave a fair pretence of excuse to all such Cowards as were glad to oallow them. There was only Philip the youngest of the four, who obstinately resolved to run the fortune of his Father, and fought by his side.

The Kings single valour sustained the enemies charge a considerable time, and if one fourth part of his Men had but seconded him, no doubt but he had gained the victory. At length he yielded himself up into the hands of John de Morebeque an Artesian Gentleman, whom he had banished the Kingdom for some crime. Philip his Son was taken prisoner with him. There were but Six thousand French kill'd in this fatal day, but of that number were Eight hundred Gentlemen, and amongst those the Duke of Bourbon, the Duke d' Athenes Constable, the Marechal de Nesle, and above Fifty more of good quality.

The young Prince as courteous as he was valiant, Treated the King as his Lord. The same night he served him at his Table, and endeavour'd to allay his grief and misfortunes by the most obliging and becoming Language he could expresse. The next day fearing this noble prey might be snatched from him, and withal observing his soldiers were so laden with plunder, that they were incapable of further service, he took his March towards Bourdeaux, and carried away the King and his Son along with him, together with a prodigious number of prisoners.

Charles

Charles the Dauphin Lieutenant, then Regent, Aged some XXI years.

There being no Authority left in the Kingdom, and the King before his departure having not settled any thing in order, all was in a most horrible confusion. The Dauphin at the first took only the quality of Lieutenant upon him; he believed it belonged to the general Estates to provide for the Government of the Kingdom, and the redemption of the King, and therefore having called them together at Paris, the Fifteenth of October, he propounded these two things to them.

But that hapned then, which ever happens in such great disorders, where the people have been evilly treated in their prosperity. Instead of assistance he met with nothing but complaints and sharp rebukes. They would deliberate of nothing in the presence of his Commissioners; they demanded to have the Chancellor set aside, this was Peter de la Forest, Archbishop of Rouen, Simon de Bucy, First President, and six or seven Officers more that had mis-mannaged the Treasury; They would have him set the King of Navarre at liberty, and would have him be governed and guided by a Council they chose for him; upon which conditions they promised to maintain Thirty thousand Men, but which should receive their pay from their own hands.

In the mean time they set up a Council for the Government of the Kingdom, whereof Robert le Coq Bishop of Laon was the Chief, and Commissioned People that were at their own Devotion to manage the Treasury. The Dauphin not being able to persuade them to condescend to any other method, nor bias their resolutions, made use of some wile to break up that Assembly, and upon divers pretences obliged the Deputies of the several Cities to return. Afterwards he dispatched others to all the Bailiwicks and Seneschals Courts to demand a subsistence of them severally, hoping that none in particular would dare to refuse him, what when altogether they had boldly denied.

During this confusion, every one imagined, now was the proper time to recover their Rights and Priviledges. The Nobility began to make Alliance with the Cities; The Dauphin found out the way to prevent that union and draw them to himself. The Cities on the other hand grew jealous of the Gentry, so that to preserve themselves from being pillaged by the Soldiery, who had all manner of Licence allowed them, they began to fortifie, especially at Paris, where they chained their Streets, repaired their Walls, made good their Ditches, and enclosed all that quarter of the Street St. Anthoine and St. Pol, which before was but the Suburbs: Stephen Marcel Prevost des Merchants, and Ronsac the Sheriff had full power over the People, and govern'd them at their own pleasure.

The unfortunate Gefroy de Harcourt had sold his Lands in Normandy to the English,* to enjoy it after his decease, disinheriting Lewis his Nephew, because he would not take up Arms against his own Countrey. He had some Forces at St. Sauveur le Vicomte, from whence they made their incursions to the Suburbs of Caen, and even to Evreux. The Estates assembled at Paris, had sent four Captains thither to make head against him; he marching into the Fields to meet them near the City of Coutances, was there defeated and slain; had he been taken alive, they would have made him pay down his Head upon a Scaffold, he chose rather to dye with his Sword in hand.

The Duke of Lancaster, and Philip of Navarre, who made War in Normandy with Philip d' Evreux, not being able to pass over the Loire, to assist the Prince of Wales, amidst the danger he was in before the Battle of Poitiers, were fallen down into Bretagne. The Duke laid Siege to Rennes the Third of December, in this year 1356. but the place was so well defended, that he could make nothing of it in Ten Months time.

After the example of their Sovereign, who had studied more the enlarging of his power then the publique good; every one took care now of his particular interest, and overturned all that lay in his way to attain his own ends. The Deputies whom the Dauphin had sent into all the Provinces, brought nothing back but grievances; the only Countrey of Languedoc, because they had been less oppressed by Taxes then the rest, testified a publique sorrow for the captivity of their Prince, and proffer'd to maintain Five thousand Horse for his Service, the others refused every thing but what should be ordained by the Estates.

1357. Wanting some publique Authority to get himself to be declared Regent, he had summoned the Estates upon the Fifth of February to meet at Paris, at the Cordeliers; but could obtain no more from them then he had done the former time. They forced the Chancellor la Forest to lay down the Seals, turned out all the principal Officers of the Treasury, caused all their Goods to be seized and inventoried, and upon the warm Remonstrances of Robert le Coq Bishop of Laon, removed all the Great Officers of the Kingdom; even those of the Parliament, excepting Sixteen, The Dauphin not finding what he reckon'd on, Adjourn'd the Assembly till Fifteen days after Easter.
- Whether it were the inconveniency of that time of the year, or the greediness and covetous humor of the Gascons, each one of them demanding as much reward, as if he alone had gained the Battle, and taken the King, which hindered the English from removing him out of Bourdeaux; he passed all the Winter there, but Served and Treated as if he had been in his own Cour.
1357. About the beginning of April they transferr'd him into England, where he was entertained with as much Honour and Respect, as if he had gone over only to pay a kind visit to King Edward. They made him a publique entrance at London, he was mounted upon a White Horse, a mark of Sovereignty, and the Prince of Wales on his left hand upon a little Hackney, They lodged him in the Savoy Palace; the King, the Queen, and the Grantees visited him, and gave him all sort of liberty. In the mean time the Popes instant mediation obtained a Truce for two years between both Crowns, in which John de Montfort and Philip d'Evreux were not comprehended.
- The Duke of Lancaster had sworn not to rise from before Rennes, till he had gotten in, and planted his Banners upon their Ramparts; whilst his Army was in apprehension of a second Winter, and the Besieged on the other hand reduced to Famine, Bertrand de Guesclin found an expedient to save the Dukes Oath, which was, That he should enter the Town with nine more, and his Colours should be set up on the Gate for some hours. To conclude this Treaty, they made a Truce between the two parties, which was to last till the year 1360.
1357. The bands of Soldiers being neither cashier'd nor paid, the Robbers flock'd together with all sorts of other rascally people, and scowred all the Countreys about, without any fear or punishment, all the open Countrey lying exposed to their merciless mercy. There were five or six several Gangs, but the most dreadful crew of them was, that of one Arnold de Cernoles, who called himself the Arch-Priest; he entred into the County of Avignon, forced the Pope to redeem the plunder of his Lands at the price of Forty thousand Crowns, and afterwards to give him Absolution, and Treat him at his own Table with as much Honour as if he had been a Sovereign Prince.
1357. The persons Commissioned by the Estates for the administration of the Treasury, made it soon apparent, that they had not taken it in hand to dispossess Knaves, but to have a share in that prize and pillage themselves; so that their corrupt dealing, no less criminal then that of the former Officers so much cried out upon, did much blemish their choice, and by consequence the authority of the Estates.
1357. The Dauphin being therefore better fortified by the arrival of the Earls of Foix and Armagnac, and a great number of the Nobility, did at length shake off their Tutelage, and making le Coq return to his own Bishoprick, his party became the strongest in Paris.
- But immediately afterwards, the Navarrais was set free from his imprisonment by the intrigues of his people, who escalado'd the Castle wherein he was detained: which was not done without connivance of the Lord de Pequigny, to whom King John had committed the keeping of this Prince. Then le Coq returns, and the Council resumed greater power then formerly.
- The Dauphin apprehended nothing so much as the malignity of that Prince, exasperated by a long imprisonment: nevertheless, the importunities of the Council established by the Estates, and the intercession of the two Queens Dowagers, Jean and Blanch, obliged him to give him a safe Conduct, with which he came and lodged in the Abbey of St. Germain des Prez, accompanied with a huge number of his friends.

Some

Some while after having caused it to be proclaimed about the City, That he would entertain * the People upon St. Andrews day; there came above Ten thousand Men to the Tilting-place, which was between the Abbey of St. Germain and the Pré aux Clercs. He mounted the Scaffold, from whence the King was wont to behold Combats or Duels; and there with a most patheticall Eloquence, declared the injustice of his tedious Confinement; the tyrannical execution of his friends, the zeal he had for the good of the Nation; and above all, express'd his mighty affection for the defence of Paris, which was the capital City.

His flattering harangue tickled the People the more, by reason, that for some time they had met with nothing but severities. The next day he was received into the City: the Dauphin and he had an interview in an indifferent place. Le Coq Head of the Council, the Prevost des Marchands, nay, even the University, pressed the Dauphin to home to give him satisfaction, that he was fain to agree to all he pleased. However, when he would have gone into his Towns thinking to take possession, those that commanded there for the King, refused to deliver them up to him or his Commissioners.

Upon this refusal he begins the War anew. Had the English assisted him considerably, he would have over-turned the whole Kingdom; but having dropt an expression in his speech to the People, That he had more right to the Crown of France, then those that disputed for it, they lent him no more assistance then to enable him to draw the War to a great length, that so each party weakening and tiring the other, might both of them be forced to submit to that yoke the English designed to lay upon them.

That zeal the Prevost des Marchands had for the publique liberty, meeting with too great oppositions, degenerated (perhaps in despite of him) into a manifest and most pernicious faction. (The mark or distinction was a kind of a Hood party-colour'd, Red and Blue, which he bestow'd for New-years-Gifts upon the People of Paris. Who being divided and wavering in their Affections, applauded sometimes the Dauphin, who made Speeches in publique to them * then straightway wheel'd about) to their Magistrate, whom they judged to be honest in his designs, and anon they became indifferent to either.

For the third time the Estates were called together at Paris, the Dauphin designing to make himself Master of them, drew some Forces about the Town; the Navarrais had some likewise who kept the Field. This troublesome neighbourhood did greatly incommode the City of Paris and all that lay neer it; Marcel cast the fault upon the Dauphin, and he discharged himself and laid it on the Navarrais.

Upon this brangle a Partisan of Marcells, named Perrin Macé, a Changer belonging to the Treasury, Murthered John Baillet Treasurer of France, and the Deed being done, retired into the Church St. James de la Boucherie. The Dauphin commanded the Marechal de Clermont, John de Chabans, Seneschal of Champagne, and the Prevost of Paris, to drag him thence by force and put him into the hands of Justice. They haled him out, and the Prevost of Paris caused his Hand to be cut off, and sent him to the Gibbet.

The Churches were then inviolable Sanctuaries, the Clergy and People grew into heats, because they had pluck'd a Criminal from the feet of the Altar; and the Bishop of Paris Excommunicated those that had committed this attempt. After this, Marcel having armed Three thousand Trades-men, who all wore those party-colour'd Hoods, entred into the Palace where the Dauphin Lodged, and caused those three Lords to be murder'd in his presence. This was not all, he compell'd him to own the Fact in an Assembly of the Estates, which was held at the Augustins, and in Parliament; to suffer the Navarrais to return to the City; and to give him Lands and great satisfaction for damages; notwithstanding the other Cities refused to joyn with Paris in any thing, otherwise then for the Kings service.

After the Navarrais had remained for some time in Paris, and thought he had well secur'd himself of them; going forth again to give some Order, touching his Affairs; he was no sooner out of Town, when the Dauphin, to lose no time, caused himself to be declared Regent by the Parliament. After that, all Acts were passed in his name, without any mention of the Kings; the little Seal du Chatelet which they used in his absence was laid aside, and they had a great Seal made purposely for the Regency.

He would be no longer at the mercy of the Parisians nor the general Estates, he found it better to hold with particular ones; those of Champagne at Vertus, and and those of Picardy at Compiègne, consented to some Contributions. The Parisians offended that they were despised, endeavoured to seize upon the Posts about their City; not being able to effect it, they proceeded to enclose it with Walls from that part where the Bastille is, even to the Wooden Tower near the Louvre, filled up all their Gates towards the University, excepting that called St. James's, and from that Gate to that de Nesle, caused Ditches to be made before the Walls; for till this time they had not any.

1358. During this Anarchy, the Nobility and other Men of the Sword, exercised all manner of violence upon the poor Country people. Those unfortunate wretches beaten, plundered, hunted like savage Beasts, having for the most part no other places of retreat, but Woods, Caves, and Boggs, did like those hunted Beasts, who being at the last gasp, fly at the Greyhounds throats; they muster'd together in great companies, and were resolv'd to destroy all the Gentry.

* Or James
the Good man.

This fury was begun in Beauvoisis, and for their chief Leader they took one named Caillet a Peasant. They called it La Jacquerie, because the Gentlemen when they pillaged the Peasant, called him in railery * Jacques bon homme. Had the Citizens joyned with these Rustiques, there had been an end of the Nobility and Monarchique Government, as well as in Switzerland; but not one of them open'd their Gates for fear of being ranack'd; they attempted divers to no purpose, destroyed all the little Castles in the Country, amongst the rest that of Beaumont upon Oyse, and made themselves masters of Senlis; but besides all this, they committed so many more then brutish cruelties, that the Nobility of all parties, French, English, and Navarrais, rallied themselves unanimously against them. The King of Navarre defeated Caillets crew, who being taken was beheaded. The Dauphin cut off more then Twenty thousand, and so this insurrection was quashed on a suddain.

* The Market.

* Marché.

In the time the Dauphin was gone towards Senlis, having left the Earl of Foix in that part of the City of Meaux, named *le Marche; the Parisians who were much concerned to secure that Key of the Marne, sent out some Forces under the command of a Grocer to seize upon it. The Mayor of Meaux open'd the Gates to them; but as they were attacking the * Market, the Earl sallied out with Horse and Foot, and cut them all off. The Grocer was slain, the City sacked and burnt, the Mayor and some of the Citizens beheaded.

1358.

Against his promise made to the Dauphin, the Navarrais drew near to Paris, and having confer'd with Marcel at St. Ovin, entered the City, and harangued the People, who declared him their General: but the Nobility affronted to see him carress them less then he did the Citizens, forsook him, and in an Assembly which was held at Compiègne, promised the Dauphin all their assistance for the besieging of Paris. The Factious party having notice of it, engaged the University to go and beg their pardon of that Prince, offering such satisfaction as he pleased, saving their Lives and Honours; to which not condescending, unless they would deliver up to him Twelve of the principal Mutineers: they united themselves together again, as firmly as ever they possibly could, and stuck close to the King of Navarre.

1358.

The Dauphins friends having gotten some credit amongst the People of Paris, insinuated a jealousy into their minds, for that the King of Navarre had brought some English thither; they massacred a great many of those strangers; Marcel to save the remainder, clapt them all in prison, then let them make their escapes: they retired to St. Denis, from whence they cruelly revenged the deaths of their compagnons, upon all those of Paris that they could light upon. The People whatever the Navarrais could urge in his florid Speeches against it, forced both him and Marcel to lead them thither, that they might make a final end of them; but whether by the treachery of those two Commanders, or otherwise, the English drew them into an Ambuscade, and slew above Six hundred of them in the night as they were returning home all in disorder.

1358.

This bloody check redoubled their suspicions, and the Peoples out-cries; Marcel and his associates fearing to be at length deliver'd up to the Dauphin, conspired to deliver up the City rather to the Navarrais, by letting him one night into the Bastille. But as the Dauphins friends had their Eyes and Ears in every corner, one John Maillard, and one Pepin des Essards who were the Chiefs, contrived their business so well, that having got their friends together, just at the nick of time as Marcel was to put his plot in execution, they kill'd both him and all those that accompany'd him before he could get the Gates open.

His

His Corps were dragg'd thorough the Streets, and his death attended with the Massacre, the execution, and the banishment of many of his friends; amongst others, Ronsac the Sheriff, Joffrand the King of Navarre's Treasurer, and Caillard who had delivered up the Castle of the Louvre, all which lost their Heads in the place of Execution, called the Greeve. After this the face of Affairs was wholly changed, the party-colour'd Hoods were thrown into the Fire, and the Dauphin returned to Paris the Twenty fourth day of August.

1358.

But the Navarrais fretted beyond all patience for the death of his Friends and his Officers, protested he would never have peace with the Princes of the House of Valois, nor did he any longer own them for Sovereigns.

1358.

In this heat he got his Forces together from every quarter, sent to besiege the Dauphin, block'd up Paris both by Land and Water, and called to his assistance the Captal de Buch, and Robert Knolles an English Captain.

This Man notwithstanding the Truce, made horrible depredations every where, particularly in Anxerrois, and in Champagne. Now having been forced away from before Troyes by the Count de Vaudemont, he came and joyned with the Navarrais, in hopes to plunder Paris. It was at this time they burnt the City of Montmorency, which was none of the least, as may be guess'd by its ruins; while in the mean time, Philip de Navarre ran about Picardy, and made several attempts upon many Cities, which all miscarried.

The Dauphin durst not stir out of Paris, for fear they should recall the Navarrais, who had yet good store of friends remaining amongst them. In the mean time, as he could settle nothing in order in no part, all France was left exposed to the plunderings of the licentious Soldiers, as well French as English. Now at the very hour that Paris was reduced to the extreamest want, and it was in the power of the Navarrais, and only depended upon him alone to give the mortal blow to France, his heart was changed in a moment, without any apparent cause, but an extraordinary favour of Heaven towards this Kingdom. Inasmuch as he made his agreement with the Dauphin, and referr'd almost all his pretensions to his own free Will, in despite of all the arguments and oppositions of his Brother, who quitted him and retired to the English at Saint Sauveur le Vicomte.

This Peace saved the City of Paris, but did not ease the neighbouring Provinces; * for those Garrison'd places that had held for the King of Navarre, declared for the English, that they might still have opportunities to plunder. The Lord Aubericour a Hennuger, ravaged Champagne, by means of certain Castles he held upon the Marne, and the Seine: Broquard de Fennestranges a Knight of Lorraine, drawn into the Service of France, with Five hundred adventurers, whom he had under his Pay, delivered the Country of him, having defeated and taken him prisoner in a great Fight near Nogent, upon the River Seine: but himself became a more severe scourge, burning and laying all waste, till the Dauphin could give him the Arrears due to his Soldiers.

The Isle of France, Beausse

Picardy, &c.

"During all these Wars with the English, until Charles VIII. had driven them out of France, there were many of these Captains, whereof some paid their Men out of their own pockets, and then hired them out to those that would bid most; and others maintained theirs with the plunder they took indifferently on either side. These last were called Robbers; those that Commanded them were meer Soldiers of Fortune; when they were snapt they found no quarter.

There were Propositions of Peace perpetually on foot between the two Crowns, King John, though he had all manner of liberty, even for Hunting, and all pastimes and gallantries, was very weary of his imprisonment; nevertheless he referr'd those conditions the English propounded for his Release, to the Estates of his Kingdom. They being assembled at Paris for this purpose (it was in the Month of May) found them so hard, that all with one voice chose rather to have War, and offer'd very great sums to carry it on; but these could not be levied so soon.

The King of England nettled with their Reply, raised a formidable Army, tiered were Eleven hundred Vessels, and near an hundred thousand fighting Men, landed at Calais with his four Sons, who began to march, although the Season was very far spent. They let him keep the Field at his own pleasure; the Towns were so well

well provided that he could not take one, neither St. Omers, nor Amiens, nor Reims, where he thought to have been Crowned King of France, nor Chaalons. Burgundy redeemed themselves from plundering for Two hundred thousand Florins, and some Provisions for his Camp. Nivernois compounded likewise, Brie and Gastinois were ransacked.

About the latter end of Lent he came and encamped within Seven Leagues of Paris, between Chartres and Montlebery; and finding they made no one step towards the satisfying his demands, he plants himself just before the City Gates, with design to oblige the French to Speak or to Fight.

1360. After he had tarry'd there some time, without being able to gain either the one or the other, he turns back towards Beaufort, (resolved to refresh his Men along the River Loire, and in case of misfortune, retreat into Bretagne.)

Cardinal Simon de Langres the Popes Legat, and the Dauphins Deputies always follow'd his Camp, and solicited him eternally for a Peace. (One day he being encamped in the Chartrain Countrey, there arose a dreadful Storm, with so much Lightning and Thunder, and such a shower of great Hail, that it grievously maim'd a great many of his Men, and killed above a thousand of his Horses. He took this prodigy as a warning and command from Heaven; and turning himself towards our Lady's Church of Chartres, which was to be seen about five or six Leagues off, made a promise before the Almighty of concluding the Peace; besides, the Duke of Lancaster, with other English Lords, pressed him earnestly, because his Army was much shatter'd, and he had brought over almost all the force of England.

1360. The Deputies on either part met the First of May, at the Village called Brignis, within a mile of Chartres. In this place, Treating in the name of the two Kings eldest Sons; they concluded upon all the Articles in eight days time. "On the one side they gave the English King, besides what he had already, all "Poitou, Saintongne, Rochel, and the Countrey of Aunis, Angoumois, Perigord, Limosin, Quercy, Agenois, and la Bigorre in full Sovereignty, besides Calais, the Counties of Oye, Guines, and Pontieu; and three Millions in Gold for the Ransom, "payable at three several Terms, of King John; who should be brought to Calais, "and set at liberty after the restitution of those places fore-mentioned, and upon "giving up as Hostages his Three youngest Sons, his Brother Philip, and other "Princes of the Blood; and besides all these, Thirty more, as well Earls as Illustrious Knights, and two Deputies of each of the Nineteen Cities, whose Names "were expressly mention'd. On the other hand the King of England renounced the "Title of King of France, and generally all his other pretensions.

1360. And till the two Kings could ratify the Treaty, a Truce was agreed upon for a year. In the Month of July King John was brought over to Calais, where he was immediately visited by his Children, and staid there till the Five and Twentieth of October, when King Edward coming thither, both of them swore to the agreement of Peace very solemnly.

1360. That between the King of England and the Earl of Flanders, and another between the King of Navarre and King John, were made up in the same place, and this last sworn by the two Philips, Brothers of those two Kings; the Treaties were confirmed by the Holy Father, under the penalty of Ecclesiastical censures, against those as should first contravene.

King John being freed from Captivity the Four and twentieth of October, which he had now undergone four years and one Month, went to give Thanks to God at the Church of St. Denis in France. There he received the King of Navarre into Favour, who came and Saluted him. The Thirteenth of December he made his entrance into Paris, and the City testified their joy by a Present of Plate of a Thousand Marks.

1361. The extream necessity he was in for Money to pay his Ransom, made his generous courage stoop to a weakness, judged to be more prejudicial to the Honour of the Noble House of France, then even the Treaty of Brignis it self; which was the selling his Daughter to John Viscount of Milan, for Six hundred thousand Gold Crowns in Marriage with his Son Galeas.

Although the Crown of France and its Sovereignty came to the Eldest wholly, and was not to be divided amongst the younger Brothers; yet they assigned a share of of Lands to them, which was entirely theirs, which descended to the Daughters as well as to the Sons, and which they might dispose of as properly their own. Now the King to keep the Body of his Kingdom in more strength, and not suffer his great Provinces hereafter to be as it were dismembred by such partage, or by any Treaty, united inseparably to the Crown, the Dutchy of Normandy and Burgundy, and the Earldoms of Toulouze and Champagne, by Writings made at the Castle of the Louvre in the Month of November, in the year 1361.

In the foregoing Easter Holy-days, Death had snatched away the young Philip Duke of Burgundy, and in him extinguished the first Branch of those Dukes, which had produced Twelve, and lasted 330 years. He left no Children, Margaret of Flanders his Wife, being as yet but Eleven years of age, and he but Fifteen. He was Grandson of Duke Endes IV. and Son of that Philip who was slain at the Siege of Aiguillon; and of Jane of Boulogne, who for Second Husband married King John, and died the last year.

The Lands belonging to this Prince which came by his Mother, returned to the Heirs of that Line, which were the County of Artois and the Franche Comte, to Margaret, Daughter of Philip the Long, and the Countess Mahaut, and Wife of Robert Earl of Flanders, by consequence, Grandfather of the Wife this young Duke Philip had Married. Boulougne and Auvergne went to the House of Boulougne: as for the Dutchy of Burgundy, the Navarrois challeng'd it, as being the Son of Jane, Daughter of Queen Margaret, who was the Wife of King Lewis Hutin, and eldest Daughter of Duke Robert, Father of Endes IV. Duke of Burgundy: but the King laid his hand upon it, as being, said he, nearer of kindred by one degree, being Son of the Second Daughter of Duke Robert, whereas the King of Navarre was but Grandson of the eldest.

Some will say that he did not understand his Rights well, and that he should have reaped this Dutchy as he was Sovereign, and have maintain'd that Burgundy was a Masculine Fief, which reverted to him for want of Heirs-Males.

The Soldiers of all the parties did not evacuate the places without a great deal of trouble, and committed the same depredations and Robberies as during the War. The Gascons and the Bretons rambled all over Anjou, Poitou, and Tourain for pillage and plunder; and those Bands that were named the Tard-Venus, or Late-Comers, led by some Gascons; having in the same manner treated Champagne, Burgundy, Masconnis and Lyonnois, in a Battle at Brignais near Lyon, defeated James de Bourbon Count de la Marche, whom the King had given Orders to chastise them for their Thefts: after that they divided themselves into two parties, whereof one was hired for Money to go into Italy by the Marquis de Montferrat, who was in War with the Viscounts of Milan; the others fastned on Masconnois, and never let go their hold till they were fully gorged like blood-sucking Leeches.

Those that levy'd the Taxes and Gabelles, tormented the People no whit less then the other Robbers. The burthen and grievance was so great, that infinite numbers of Families quitted France, and sought elsewhere for a more easie livelihood and subjection.

1361. and 62.

Such as did know how to secure themselves from all these miseries, did not know where to find an Asylum against the Pestilence, which for seven or eight years growing worse and worse upon divers returns, seized indifferently upon all sorts of People, both in City and Countreys. There fell by it this year nine Cardinals, and Seventy Prelats in the Popes Court, and above Thirty thousand People in Paris. The Jews were recalled into France for the fifth time; another plague added to the Imposts, the Pestilence and Famine.

It was the Right, or to speak properly, a practise suffer'd time out of mind amongst the French, that they might make War one upon another for their particular quarrels: the King forbid it among all his Subjects, till all the enemies were quite out of the Kingdom. He afterwards added to this Order, a prohibition of all Duels, Challenges, &c. as well during the Peace as in time of War.

Notwithstanding his defence, he durst not take notice of the cruel War that was renew'd between the Earls de Foix and d' Armagnac, because he feared it might offend the King of England, to whom they were Vassals for those Lands in contest between them.

We had omitted to take notice before, how the difference for the Succession of Gaston de Bearn, had given birth to this bloody War between these two Houses. That Gaston who died Anno 1289. had by Mate * Countess of Bigorre four Daughters, * Tis Armata, Constance, Constance, who married William the Son of Richard of England, King of Germany, from whom there came no Children; Margaret who was the Wife of Roger Bernard Earl of Foix, Mate of Gerard Count d' Armagnac, and of Fezenzac, and Guillemeite of Don Pedro, Son of Don Pedro King of Aragon, and Brother to James II. That the first and the last left no Children behind them; that Gaston their Father, by his Testament made them all sharers of the Lands he had in France, as well as those in Catalania; and that in case the first dyed without Children, he then gave Bearn to the Second, who was Countess of Foix.

Neither had we observed how Mate, Countess of Armagnac, finding her self wronged by this Testament, had refused to approve thereof. That in Anno 1294. Bernard her Son (for her Husband Gerard was dead) accused the Count de Foix of having falsified it, and called him to try it in Combat or Duel in the Court of King Philip the Fair. That by Decree of Parliament; in the year 1295. the two parties were admitted to Combat in the City of Gisors: but when they were come into the Field, the King caused them to be put out again, and annul'd the Duel, by taking upon him to let them know, That this private feud should surcease according to the Law, or Rights of the Kingdom, during the publique War between the French and the English; That the same King in the journey he made to Languedoc, Anno 1303. finding he could not bring the parties to an amicable composition, made a Decree to settle and regulate their pretensions; to which Margaret Countess de Foix (her Husband being deceased) would not obey. That the death of Guillemeite, the youngest of the four Sisters, occasioned new debates; and that Philip King of Navarre endeavour'd to determine them, Anno 1229. by a Sentence of Arbitration. But nothing could quench the irreconcilable animosities of these two Houses; nor prevent their seeking all opportunities to destroy each other, as they did this year 1362. and the following.

Whilst they were labouring, but not effectually enough to have the Garrisons vacated; King John took a fancy to go to Avignon and visit Pope Innocent, with design, as was believed, to endeavour a Marriage with Jane * Queen of Naples, the second time a Widow, defamed indeed for her ill life; but who would have brought him in Dower the Counties of Provence and Piedmont: being on his way, he heard of the death of Innocent, but he went forwards, and on the eighth day of October, assisted at the Coronation of William Grimonard, a Native of Montferrat, who was chosen out of the Sacred Colledge, being but a simple Abbot. They named him Urban V.

Whilst he staid at Avignon, the Holy Father Preaching for a new adventure to the Holy Land, he accepted of the Command of Generalissimo in the Expedition. The two Kings Peter of Cyprus, and Woldemar III. of Denmark, took the badge of the Cross for the same purpose in the same place. But the affairs of France not suiting very well with this Enterprize, was so far from being put in execution, that it was not so much as approved of, or countenanc'd.

At his return he took possession of the Duchy of Burgundy; but whilst he was yet in that Countrey, the Burgundians did so positively make him understand that they could not live without a Prince that was Resident amongst them, that he revoked and null'd the re-union he had made of this Duchy to the Crown, and yielded and bestowed it upon Philip his youngest Son, who had deserved the Name of Hardy at the Battle of Poitiers, To hold it for him and his Heirs begotten in lawful Marriage.

About the end of this year 1363. King John Embarked at Boulogne, and went again into England: the occasion of his voyage, was not his love towards a Lady, with whom he had familiarity when he was formerly there: but upon notice that the Duke of Anjou his second Son, and one of his Hostages had escaped out of England, this generous King would repair the Honour of that young Prince, and demonstrate, that he had no hand in that juvenile act; as likewise to dispose, if it were possible, King Edward to the expedition of the Holy War.

Charles the Dauphin, Regent for the Second time.

His eldest Son to whom he had left the Regency, found himself presently attacked by his Cousin the King of Navarre, upon the pretensions he had to the Duchy of Burgundy. This Prince having rashly sent him defiance before he had any Army ready to justify it, lost the Cities of Mames and Meulan, which were taken by Bertrand du Guesclin, whose valour was already raised much above the common standard.

In England King John having had many Conferences with King Edward, when he hoped to have dispatched all his Affairs: was surprized about mid-March, with a distemper which ended his days the eighth of April. He died in the Savoy without the Walls of London, after he had lived Two and fifty years, and held the Scepter Thirteen years and eight Months. His Son the Duke of Berry, the Dukes Philip of Orleans, and Lewis II. of Bourbon, and John of Artois Earl of Eu, all Princes of the Blood heard his last Sighs, and closed his Eyes. The King of England made him a magnificent Funeral, worthy the grandeur of that King, and becoming his own generosity. His Corps was brought back into France, and interred at St. Denis upon the seventh day of May.

He was esteemed to be the bravest, and the most liberal Prince of his time; but the same root which produced these virtues, did likewise bring forth Pride, and the scorn to follow any other Counsel but that of his own Brain, attended with prodigality, precipitation, and that violence which exposed his own Kingdom to pillage and plunder, and his own Person to the mercy of his enemies.

But we must not deny him two great advantages or perfections he had above other Princes, that he was frank and sincere, and did most inviolably keep his word: nor forget that heroick saying, attributed to him; That if Faith and Truth should be banished from all the rest of the world, yet they ought to be found in the mouths of Kings.

He married two Wives who were named Jane, the First, Daughter of John King of Bohemia, in Anno 1332. and the Second of William Earl of Boulougue, and Widow of Philip of Burgundy Earl of Artois, in Anno 1349. By the First he had four Sons and four Daughters; the four Sons were Charles, who succeeded to the Crown; Lewis Duke of Anjou, and Earl of Mayne; John Duke of Berry and Auvergne, and Earl of Poitou; Philip first Duke of Toursaine, then of Burgundy. The Daughters were named Mary, Jane, Isabel, Margaret: the first married Robert, eldest Son of Henry Duke of Bar, the second Charles the Bad, King of Navarre; the third John Galeaz Viscount, First Duke of Milan; the fourth devoted her self to JESUS CHRIST in the Monastery of Poissy. By his Second Wife he had two Daughters that attained not to the ripeness of Marriage.

THe prosperous Conduct of this King is the noblest proof we meet with throughout all the History of France; that the weightiest Affairs are managed better by skill and judgment than by force, and that success in Battle is oftner the effect of the judicious Orders and Contrivances in the Closet, than the valour of those that fight them.

His Coronation was performed at Reims the Nineteenth of May. It is to be observed that Wenceslaus of Luxemburg Duke of Brabant his maternal Uncle, John Duke of Lorraine, and Robert Duke of Bar, though Strangers and Vassals of the Empire, did the Office of Pairs there, the First representing the Duke of Normandy, the Second the Earl of Champagne, the Third the Earl of Toulouse. The Duke of Burgundy and the Earl of Flanders held their natural places, and Lewis Duke of Anjou, that of the Duke of Guyenne.

They had just reason to say, that never King armed himself so little, and yet did so many brave exploits in War as this same; It seemed as if Wisdom had tyed Fortune to his Service. From the beginning he made it appear that the French could beat the English, who had always beaten them in the preceding Reigns. The Navarrais and Montfort not having been comprehended in the Treaty of Bretigny, their people continued the War, and the English Forces and the French took part with them. John de Grailly Captal de Buch, who was come to the aid of the Navarrais, took the Command of all their Forces. The French Officers being met to fight him, found him near the place called Cocherel, and de la Croix St. Leufroy, between Evreux and Vernon. Bertrand de Guesclin, on whom he had conferr'd the Command, upon refusal of the young Count d'Auxerre, behaved himself so well with his companions, that Captals Men were beaten out of their advantageous Post, and he taken prisoner. The King thinking to get him on his side, released him a while after: but he was rather desirous to retaliate his defeat than that obligation.

During

During these Occurrences, Philip of Navarre hapning to dye, Lewis his young Brother got the Forces of that Party together, and fell upon Bourbonnois, and the lower Auvergne, where he rifled several Castles. Nay, some of his Men surprized la Charite upon the Loire, a place very important for the passage it gave; from thence he made a cruel War upon the Countries on this side, whilst on the other hand the Count Montbeliard was fallen upon Burgundy, to serve the House of Navarre, who pretended that Dutchy appertained to them. But Philip of France, to whom King Charles had confirmed the Grant, was order'd to go and defend his Country, and to quit la Beauffe, from whence he had resolved to expel the Robbers, and had already cleared four or five small Castles by turning them out of their Kennels.

He carried the War therefore into Montbeliard, and compell'd the Earl to go out of Burgundy. Then laid his Siege before la Charite. Lewis d'Evreux not finding himself strong enough to make him raise it, retreated with his Forces to Cherbourg in Normandy. The Besieged surrendred upon Composition; which the Duke agreed to by the Kings order, that he might be able to send help to Charles de Blois his Cousin, who was engaged with John de Montfort for the Dutchy of Bretagne.

The Battle d'Auray decided the Controversy between these Contenders. John de Montfort had besieged that place with the assistance of the English led by John Chandois, that Kings Lieutenant in Guyenne; Charles de Blois undertakes to relieve it, back'd by the French Forces commanded by the Count d'Auxerre, and Bertrand du Guesclin. The Armies came to an engagement the Nine and twentieth of September, the Feast-day of St. Michael. The Fight was obstinate and bloody to extremity, in the conclusion Charles lost the day, the Dutchy and his Life. For the Lords of Bretagne had agreed amongst themselves, that to put a period to that tedious Quarrel, they would certainly kill that Chief of the two that was vanquished.

The Children of Charles de Blois were still Prisoners in England, and his Widow had more of Pride than Wisdom and good Conduct. The Duke of Anjou her Son-in-Law would willingly have assisted her with all his power: but the Council of France did not think it fit to drive that business too far, least Montfort should turn Honiager to the English. They therefore made a Peace with him by the Treaty at Guerrande. The Dutchy was left to him, upon condition of paying his Devoirs to the King of France. The Title of Dutcheß to the Widow of Charles during her life; and for all her Posterity, the right of being restored upon want of Heirs descended from Montfort. Moreover she had the County of Ponticure and divers other Lands, with Forty thousand Livers of Rent, for her self alone, to be raised upon the whole Dutchy.

"Although the Holy War had been interrupted by the death of King John, nevertheless Peter King of Cyprus, having collected some assistance of Moneys from the Christian Princes, and gathered up here and there some numbers of Adventurers, together with the Knights of St. John; went and landed in Egypt, where he valiantly forced a part of the great City of Alexandria, and might have brought it all under his power, if those that went with him, having more regard to their Plunder than their Honour, had not returned on board their Vessels with the Spoil.

"With the like Valour and more Perseverance, Ame VI. Earl of Savoy carried his Forces against Amurat Sultan of the Turks and the King of Bulgaria, who would needs dispossess John Paleologus, his near Kinsman, of the Grecian Empire, the Bulgarian holding him already a Prisoner. Ame having taken the City of Calipolis in the Thracian Chersonese by Storm from the Turks, entred Bulgaria, and upon the taking of divers places, forced that King to release the Emperor; into whose hands he also put the City of Calipolis: but the Greeks lost it again immediately afterwards, so much was their Valour declined as well as their Empire.

"The Emperor Charles IV. had much more fancy to design vast Undertakings, than Understanding or Means to put them in execution. He pleased himself with the empty pride and vain-glory of pompous Ceremonies, because he could not attain to those things that were truly real and solid; And as his small Revenues and his great Expences still kept him in a necessitous Condition, when he began any considerable Enterprize it was but only with intent to have Money given him. This year 1365. he visited the Pope in Avignon to make a League with the Holy Father and the other Princes of Italy, against Barnaby Viscount of Milan. He was at Ma's Celebrated by the Pope himself on the day of Pentecost in his Imperial Habit, and "then went and was Crowned King of Arles in the City of the same name. Then "returned again to Avignon, where he obtained permission of the Pope to levy the "Tenth upon all the Clergy of Germany and Bohemia for the Expences of that War, "which he never made.

1363. Guesclin, who had been taken at the Battle of Auvray, was set free upon Ransom, and Oliver de Clifton, who was of Montfort's Party, allured to the Kings service. In the Month of December Montfort came to Paris and did Homage, first for his Dutchy, but only by word of Mouth and without any Oath, then for the County of Montfort, ungirt, and on his Knees, and both his hands joyned together between the hands of the King his Sovereign Lord.

1365. This year we met again with some Troops of those revolted Peasants of the Jacquerie, who being re-inforc'd and joyned with some Companies of Plunderers, went even into Alsatia, from whence they were hunted out, and most of them destroy'd by the Emperor Charles IV. and the other Princes of Germany.

1365. The Forces belonging to the Navarrois continued their Incursions in Normandy, it was believed they might be drawn from thence by a Diversion towards Navarre; A League was therefore made with the King of Arragon his Capital Enemy, who immediately fell with an Army into that Kingdom. The Navarrois had the more apprehension, because he knew that France was necessarily obliged to joyn with that Prince, the King of England having made a League with Peter King of Castille, an Eternal Enemy to the Arragonians. Wherefore Capit de Buch and the rest of his Friends applied themselves with so much zeal, that they made his peace with the King. By this Treaty he renounced all his rights to Champagne and to Burgundy, upon condition he should have the Lordship of Montpellier in Languedoc, which was given him.

1365. "The Habits of Men of Quality, and honest People dwelling in Cities, was a "long Gown, and a Hood almost of the same fashion as the Monks; sometimes "they threw these back upon their Shoulders, and made use of a Cap or Bonnet for "their Heads. Now luxury and folly had shortned their long Robe so much, that "their Thighs and the whole motions of their Bodies from their Reins, was plainly "seen. They had likewise brought in use a certain sort of Shoes, the Toes whereof "were turned up with a long neck, (they named them Poulaines) and at their Heels a "kind of Spurs. The King by his Edicts banished these ridiculous Modes after "the example of his Holiness, who but a while before had by his Bulls condemned "the dissoluteness of Apparel both in the one and the other Sex.

1365. France could not rid her self of those droves of Robbers that knawed her to the very bones. The English tolerated them that they might have their help upon occasion, and there were not Forces enough besides to suppress them; Guesclin found out a way to carry them all off into Spain upon this occasion.

Alphonso XI. King of Castille had had by his lawful Wife a Son named Peter, who succeeded him, and by a Mistress five Natural Sons, the eldest of whom was called Henry, and was Earl of Tristemare. This Peter was rightly surnamed the Cruel, and the Wicked, for he shewed himself more a friend to the Alcoran than to the Gospel, having alliance and amity with the Moorish Kings. He overturned all the Laws, and committed all the Injustice and Cruelties that Tyrants can commit: He lived in publick Adultery with Mary de Padilla, and had in Anno 1361. caused his Wife Blanch to be poison'd, who was Daughter to Peter Duke of Bourbon, and Sister to the Queen of France, a Princess as vertuous as fair, after she had endured all the outrages imaginable for ten years together. He put the Lady to death that had been his Fathers Mistress, and shed the blood of the greatest in his Kingdom almost every day, nor did he spare his own Brothers, having Murthered Frederic one of the five, who was Grand Master of St. James, and often attempted against the lives of the other four. Henry being therefore prompted by a just Resentment for the death of his Brother and his Mother, and besides authoriz'd by the Law of Nature, which allowed him to defend his life, rose up against him with the greatest part of the Nation, Leagued himself with the Arragonian, and made War upon him for some time.

1365. His Cause in the beginning had not so much success as justice, he was overmatch'd and worsted by the Tyrant, and took shelter in France. The King gave him protection the more willingly, because it offer'd a fair occasion to employ his Soldiery.

It

It was thought fit for the better countenance of it, to let John de Bourbon Count de la Marche Cousin German to the late Queen Blanch, have the chief Command in appearance: but for their true Conductor Bertrand du Guesclin who was delivered out of the hands of Chandois, the Pope, the King, and Don Henry having paid down his Ransom.

With these Forces and great numbers of the Nobility Volunteers, even out of those Countries under the obedience of the English, the Count de la Marche and Guesclin carried Henry back into Spain. The Pope, fearing this Army might approach near Avignon, sent them Two hundred thousand Livers with Indulgences. The King of Arragon gave them passage, and the Dutchy of Borgia to Guesclin; and before they entred upon Castille, they regained all those places Peter had taken from him, and put them honestly again into his hands.

Upon the arrival and sight of Henry, all the Nobles of Castille, excepting one single Knight, abandoned the Tyrant; They all cry'd out, Long live King Henry, and open'd their Gates to him; in a word, he was Crowned at Burgos about the end of March. That done, he liberally rewarded with Estates in Lands all such as had follow'd him, and thinking himself secure upon the Tyrants flight, he discharged the most part of his Forces, who would have lain too heavy on his new Subjects, reserving only Fifteen hundred Lances with Guesclin and Bernard Bastard of the Count de Foix.

The Tyrant made his escape first towards Portugal: but the King of that Country having refused to allow him any retreat there, he got into Galicia, and from thence by Sea to Bayonne to implore the assistance of the Prince of Wales. The jealousy that Prince had for the fame of du Guesclin, made him give an ear to his supplications, he promised to restore him, and to act Personnally in the Employment. To this end he retains the Gascon Lords, and the same Companies that had served du Guesclin, who were disbanded by Henry: but the Arragonian keeping the passages shut and well guarded, they could not get to him but with a great deal of difficulty.

There was no other way but by Navarre; King Charles the Bad having made a League with either Party, found himself perplexed; In the end he leans towards the Tyrant, and gives him passage, and three hundred Lances. Whilst he was wavering betwixt both Parties, and endeavoured to delude them both, he was made Prisoner by Oliver de Mauny who held the Castle of Borgia upon that Frontier. It was imagin'd he had contriv'd it so himself, to keep his Faith with Henry: but Oliver treated him as a real Prisoner, and got a good Ransom from him.

When Henry knew that his Enemies had taken the City of Navarrette, he came to meet them, and instead of stopping their passage and hindring their having Provisions brought to them, which he might easily have done, being above three times more numerous then they: he gave them Battle. This was the Fourth of April between Nagera and Navarrette: but he lost it through the Cowardize of his Brother Teilo, who betook himself to flight upon the first Charge. Guesclin was made Prisoner with the Marechal d' Endregben and some other Captains. As for him, having fought very valiantly, and not giving over till the very last extremity, he then escaped into Arragon, then came to France, where he was received by Lewis Duke of Anjou Governor for the King in Languedoc.

The Prince of Wales gained mighty reputation amongst the Sons of Mars, for having Re-conquer'd Spain in one single Battle: but little Honour amongst the better sort, for having restor'd a Tyrant, and yet much less satisfaction or profit; For after the Tyrant had held him some Months in Castille, upon the promise of quickly sending him wherewith to pay his Men, a Sickness got into his Army; and he was forc'd to return again very ill satisfied, and withall very much indisposed in his Body.

After his departure the Tyrants rage redoubled by all sorts of terrible revenge. The Castilians finding they were treated more inhumanely then ever, recalled Henry: The Duke of Anjou and the Earl of Foix did frankly give him all the assistance they could; and du Guesclin and Bernard de Bearn newly set free upon Ransom raised Men for him.

In few words Henry besieged Toledo, the Tyrant attended with Three thousand Horse came to relieve it. When he was gotten near Montiel, a Village situate upon the Hills, which parts the Kingdom of Valentia from New Castille, Henry meets him, the Battle was fought the Fourteenth of March 1369. the Tyrants Forces ran away, and he saved himself in the Castle of Montiel.

There finding himself cooped up without any hopes of escaping, he adventures to come to Guesclin in his Tent, imagining by force of Presents to persuade him to let him slip away. Henry comes just at the same time thither, either by chance or otherwise, they fell to words, then laid hold upon each other, and tumbled on the ground. The Tyrant in the end was brought undermost and kill'd. The manner is not well agreed upon, nor whether it were done fairly: this hapned the Three and twentieth of March 1369. Thus the Kingdom of Castille remained to Henry and those descended from him, who hold it to this day.

The Widow of the Duke of Burgundy, Daughter of the Earl of Flanders, and the richest Heiress in Christendom, was earnestly Courted both by France and England. The Father designed her for Edmond one of the King of England's Sons: but the Grandmother Margaret, French both by Birth and Inclination, opposed that Match with all her power, and had a design to fortifie the House of France. She therefore pressed her Son with exceeding heat, even to the threatening to cut off her Breasts which had given him suck. This touched him to the heart, he bestowed his Daughter upon Philip the Hardy Duke of Burgundy: but the Nuptials were not completed till a year afterwards.

The Prince of Wales had brought nothing out of Spain but great Melancholy, a Mortal Indisposition, and no Money to pay off his Army. He therefore lays an unusual, but very small Impost upon Guyenne; The Lords his Vassals discontented with him, particularly the Lord d' Albret, advises the Tenants to make Complaint to them; Having received their Complaint, they carry it to the Prince, and made him some Remonstrances thereon. He rejects them in a very offensive manner. Whereupon they had recourse to the King of France, lately their lawful Sovereign: The King entertains them five or six Months in the same disposition and humour, waiting a proper juncture to declare his mind.

He was in the mean time putting every thing in order to that purpose, making sure of the Gascon Lords and German Princes with his Money, whereof either of them were very greedy, drew the Soldiery to his service with the same Bait, by the help of Guesclin, in whom they reposed great Confidence, and made up a Stock of Money by the imposition of Subsidies, which the Estates assembled at Paris did freely grant him, and which they raised with so much order and evenness, that the People were not at all oppress'd.

When he had warily taken all his Measures, and knew withal that the Prince of Wales grew daily more Hydropick, he granted his Letters of Appeal to the Gascons, the five principal of them being the Sire d' Albret, and the Earls of Armagnac, Perigord, Cominges, and Carmain. This was signified to the Prince personally by a Knight and a Clerk: but far from consenting to this Appeal, he haughtily reply'd, That he would make his appearance in the same manner as he had done at the Battle of Poitiers, and caused them to be taken upon their way back and kept Prisoners, charging them with the having rob'd their Host.

At the same time Charles amused King Edward with some Complaints which he sent to him, as if he would have brought things to a Negotiation. The King of England returned words for words, not thinking the effects were so near, or that the French durst undertake any thing whilst the Duke of Berry and the other Hostages were in England.

He thought himself absolute Sovereign in Guyenne by the Treaty of Bretigny: but as on his side he had not disbanded the Soldiers, and moreover had committed divers Hostilities, the King pretended that Treaty was nul and dissolved, and that therefore that Prince remained still a Vassal to the Crown. Upon this foot it was that he sent to declare a War against him; and afterwards his Parliament being assembled upon the Ascension-Eve, he sitting in his Seat of Justice, made a Decree, by which for Rebellion, Contempt and Disobedience they declared forfeit and confiscated all those Lands the King of England held in France.

If Edwards astonishment were great to find a Prince who was not a Man of his hands, thus dare denounce War against him who had won so many Battles: his displeasure was no less when he saw this Defiance brought him not by a Person of Quality, as the custom was, but by a simple Valet or Servant; When he understood that the Lord de Chastillon, and the Count de Saint Pol had seized upon Abbeville and the rest of the places in the County of Pontieu, which were unprovided; That the Barons of Gascogne, even before the declaration of War, had defeated his Seneschal of Rovergne; That the Dukes of Berry and Anjou had attacked Guyenne, one towards Auvergne, the other towards Toulouse; That his Son the Prince of Wales being swoln every day more and more, could not act but by his Council; and that several Captains and Companies took Service under the French.

In the interim, till he could raise greater Forces, he sent him Five hundred Lances, and One thousand Cross-bow-men under the Command of Edmond Earl of Cambridge, afterwards Duke of York, his fourth Son, and the Earl of Pembroke his Son-in-Law, who went on shoar at St. Malo's, and cross'd over Bretagne; on the other hand Blue de Caurelee brought him Two thousand Men of those he had in Spain, and then came about twice as many from such as held places in Normandy and Mayne, which they sold to go and joyn with him. The four bravest Captains he had about him were the above-named Caurelee, Enstace d' Auberticour a Hennuyer, John Chandoin Seneschal of Poitou, Thomas Piercy Seneschal of Rochel, and Robert Knolles, all English. To the last of these four he gave the Command of his Forces.

* Of Hay-nault.

To the force of Arms the Wise King joyned the power of Religion and Eloquence, which can do all things on the hearts of the People. He ordered Fasts and Processions to be made over all his Kingdom, and sometimes he went himself barefooted with the rest; When at the same time the Preachers made out his Right and Title, with the justice of his Cause, and the injustice of the English. Which had two ends; the one to bring back again those French Provinces which had been yielded by the Treaty of Bretigny; the other to make those that were under him willing to suffer the Contributions and all other inconveniencies of War. The Archbishop of Toulouse alone, by his Persuasions and Intrigues, regained above fifty Cities or Castles in Guyenne, amongst others that of Cabors. The King of England would have practised the same methods on his part, and sent an Amnesty or general Pardon to the Gascons, with an Oath upon the Sacred Body of Jesus Christ, to raise no more new Imposts; but all this could not reclaim those minds that had bent themselves another way.

Divers incursions were made by the French into Guyenne and Poitou, and by the English into the Neighbouring Countries, and in one of them these last took Isabella de Valois the Widow Dutcheff of Bourbon, and Mother to the Queen of France, at her Castle of Bellepeche in Bourbennois. She was afterwards exchanged for the Prince of Wales his Knight.

The Earls of Cambridge and Pembroke marched even to Anjou, and there took the strong Castle de la Roche-sur-Yon, from whence they scowred all the Country; as they likewise did that of Berry, having gained the City of St. Severe, which is situate in Limosin upon that Frontier. But on their side they suffer'd more loss by far then all this came to, the most considerable being that of Chandoin, who was unfortunately slain in a Rencontre near the Bridge of Leusac in Poitou.

Besides the ordinary Troops which they called Companies, the Lords and Gentlemen often came together, and of their own accord drew themselves into a Body for some great Enterprize, or else to make Incursion; then after such a Riding*, so they then called it, they returned back to their own homes again.

King Charles had undertaken to raise an Army that should land some Forces in England, his Brother Philip was to Command it, and they were to take Shipping at Havfleur. When he was ready to go on board the Vessels, the news was brought him, that John Duke of Lancaster, King Edwards third Son, was landed at Calais, and made inroads upon the French Country. He was advised to quit his design, and turn his force that way. Lancaster seeing him in the Field, posted himself upon the Hill de Tournehan, between Ardres and Guifnes. Philip encamps right against him, as either to attaque or surround him, but before he had been long there, grew weary, and disbanded his Men. Thus Lancaster had leisure and opportunity to over-run the Country of Caux, even to Havfleur, and at his return the Country of Pontieu; where he took Prisoner Hugh de Chastillon, Master of the Cross-bow-men, who had seized upon that Country in the name of the King.

At the same time the Dukes of Guelders and Juliers, moved by the Charms of English Stirling Coyne, sent to besiege the King, who soon set up the Duke of Brabant and the Count de Saint Pol to coap with them, as taking fire upon some particular Interest.

There hapned a furious Battle between both Parties at Bieswilder, betwixt the Rhine and the Meuse, which brought those Princes very low; On the one side the Duke of Juliers was slain, on the other the Duke of Brabant was taken Prisoner. The Emperor his Brother released him, and made up the Quarrel.

* Cheutehee admits of many interpretations, but this is the most proper in this place.

1369.

The Estates being Assembled the Seventh of December, granted to the King an Imposition of a Sol or Penny per Liver upon Salt, of four Livers upon every Chimney in the Cities, and thirty Sols in the Country : as likewise upon the sale of Wine in the Country, the 13th in Gross, and the 4th upon Retail, and upon entry at Paris, fifteen Sols for every Pipe of French Wine, and twenty four per Pipe for Burgundy Wine : To which the Cities joyfully consented, as knowing these Levies would be well managed, and cease again with the War.

1369.

The same year 1369. Hugh Aubriot, Prevost des Merchands, caused the Towers of the Bastille to be built near the Gate St. Antoine, the same as we find them at this day.

1370.

The first years War had not produced any very considerable event : the two Kings prepared themselves with all their might to perform greater matters the second. All the four Brothers of France having held Council together, resolved that the Duke of Anjou, and the Duke of Berry should attack Guyenne, that the former should enter about Toulouze, in that part that lieth betwixt the two Seas, the other about Berry in Limosin, and that they should both joyn at Limoges to besiege the Prince of Wales there.

1370.
* King Charles had also given him the Earldom of Lons-
gueville.

To this effect they thought fit to recal du Guesclin out of Spain, where King Henry had bestow'd upon him the Earldom of Molines and the Lands of Soria*. He came upon the Kings first commands, and having joyned the Duke of Anjou, took, as he was upon his march, the Towns of Moissac, Tonneins, Aiguillon, and other Castles less considerable along the Garonne. On his part the Duke of Berry made himself Master of Limoges, more by his Intelligence with the Citizens, and the Bishop, who betrayed the Prince of Wales, though his Gossip and very good Friend, then by his Sword. After this the two Brothers, knowing that the Prince, too Politick to suffer himself to be cooped up, had taken the Field, discharged their Soldiers.

1370.

The King of England on his part had sent the Duke of Lancaster with some Companies of Men at Arms, and Archers into Guyenne, and given the Command of all his Army about Picardy to Robert Knolls. It consisted of above Thirty thousand Men. His march struck a terror through all France, even to the Loire ; for they sacked Vermandois, Champagne, and la Brie, burnt all round about Paris, made the sound of their Trumpets echo in the very Gates of the Louvre, while neither the smok of those Incendiaries, nor the noise of their Martial Musick could move the wise King to hazard any thing, nor let one Soldier go out to the Enemy.

1370.

Du Guesclin was almost the only Man who was capable of revenging him for all these Affronts : to this end the second day of October, he puts the Sword of High Constable into his hands, which Moreau de Fierres, too much broken with age and toil, could bear no longer, but gave him few Soldiers, that he might only observe the Enemy, and not fight them. Du Guesclin, who had another aim, encreased the numbers at his own expence, having sold all his Jewels and rich Household Furniture he had gotten in Spain, to buy up more Soldiers.

1370.

After he had followed and annoyed the Enemy for sometime, he had an opportunity to be t up one of their Quarters near the Pont Valain in the Country of Mayne. By this means, having broke the ice, he put them to a rout, then defeated them piece after piece, till even Knolls himself had much ado to escape.

1371.

From thence he turned up into Berry, and drove out the English, who fled into Poitou, cleared Touraine and Anjou, and did the like in Limosin and in Rouergue.

1371.

He also rendered a most important piece of Service to France, having brought the King of Navarre to an Interview with King Charles. In the present posture of Affairs that Prince might have done a great deal of mischief, by introducing the English into Constantine, where he held Cherbourg with some other places, and into the County of Evreux, which was all his own. But he being as irresolute as malicious, he neither knew how to keep his Faith, nor break it to his own advantage. Though he had made a Truce the preceding year, he still deferred the concluding of the Peace by his Artifice. In fine, he suffers himself to be led to it when he had least need, and was contented with the City of Montpellier, which was put into his possession. Upon which Consideration he renounced the English Interest, at that time when it would have been more advantage not to do it.

" In

" In the year 1367. Pope Urban V. had made a Voyage to Rome, in appearance to give some Orders for the Affairs of Italy, but indeed out of anger, for that the Army going into Spain had oppressed and extorted a great deal from him. After he had staid there two years and an half, he returned to Avignon, where in short time he died, the 19th of December. The Cardinals placed in the Holy Chair Peter Roger, who was Son to William Earl of Beaufort in Vallee, and Jane Sister of Pope Clement VI.

1371.

" In the Month of May of this same year, David King of Scotland, Son of Robert Bruce, died without Children. Thus that Crown passed into the House of the * Stewarts, by one Robert, who was his Sisters Son. He ratified the Truce with the English, and prolonged it for thirteen years. * Or Steward.

The Maritime Cities of Flanders being all filled with Merchants, had no other Interest to mind but Trade : Wherefore neither considering that of their Earl, nor the Kings, they made a League with the English, thereby to secure their Commerce, which appeared more advantageous from that side, then from the French.

Within a while, after the new Constable had re-conquer'd Perigord, and Limosin from the English, the Prince of Wales, though he could not stir but in a Litter, draws his Men together at Cognac, and went to besiege Limoges. His Hurons* or Miners, of which he had great numbers, having thrown down a great part of the Wall into the Ditches, the Town was taken by Storm. He was so enraged against the Inhabitants, that he took cruel Vengeance even upon the very Women and Children, above four thousand of them dying by the edge of the Sword. This was his last exploit in War, afterwards he retired very much indisposed into England, where yet he languished three years. When he was gone the Affairs of the English ran every day into decay, the greatest part of the Lords, and Commanders in Guyenne, whom his Valour and Bounty tied to his Court, going over to the French.

* That was their name in those days.

He had left the care of his Affairs to the Duke of Lancaster, who stay'd no long time in Guyenne, but went over into England to be present in a great Council which was held about the concerns on this side the Water. At his departure he Married the Daughter of Peter the Cruel, and stiled himself King of Castille : his Brother, the Earl of Cambridge, likewise took the youngest Sister to his Bed.

1372.

This was to declare a Mortal War against King Henry, who besides being engaged to the Crown of France, resolved as well for his own security as out of gratitude, to serve it with all his power. He knew the English were sending an Army into Poitou, Commanded by the Earl of Pembroke ; he put out a Fleet of forty great Ships to Sea, well stored with Canon and Fire-Arms, who lay in wait for the Earl of Pembroke at the chops of the Rochel Channel. The Fight lasted two days, the Eves-eve, and the Eve of St. Johns Feast, the Rochellers looking on in cold blood, not to be persuaded by their Governor to go out to the aid of the English, who in the end were overcome, and all either taken or sunk. The Victors carried away the Earl of Pembroke with the rest of the Prisoners into Spain, all laden with Chains. This was the Custom both of the Spaniards and Germans towards their Enemies, the French and English treated theirs with more generosity and civility.

This disaster was the utter ruine of the English Party. The Constable besieged and took all places with ease. After he had help'd the Duke of Berry in reducing St. Sever, which was believed to be impregnable, he came to take possession of the great City of Poitiers that opened her Arms to him. The Commanders that kept the Field were all amazed at it : but much more astonished upon the defeat of the Capital de Buch, who marching to relieve the City of Soubise, situate at the mouth of the Charente, found himself surrounded and taken by the Spaniards, whose Fleet hover'd about that Coast. No Ransom nor Exchange could persuade the King to set him at liberty a second time, he was shut up in a Tower belonging to the Temple at Paris, where he died four years after.

1372.

The Rochellers could never agree with the English humour, scarce compatible with any Nation whatsoever ; they studied how to withdraw themselves from their Government ; and for this purpose it was that the Spaniards kept so nigh to favour their design. The Castle only hindered them, the Mayor bethought himself of a Wyle. Having given the Captain a Dinner, he presented him certain Letters Sealed with King Edwards Signet, out of which he read, That they were ordered to make a Muster of the Garison in the Castle, and the City Militia. There was nothing of all this in the Letter, but the Captain, who could not read, believed it, and drew out the Garison. The Mayor had laid an Ambuscade amongst some Ruinous Buildings, which which cut off his passage and hindered his return. Ten or twelve Forelorn Wretches that were left in the Castle, Capitulated. After this, the crafty Rachellers, before they would open their Gates to the French, made their Treaty with the King, and obtained to have the Castle demolished, or if we will believe their Memoirs, an Amnesty for having demolish'd it before the Treaty. Besides this, they got so many Privileges and great Advantages, as tended as much towards the putting this City at liberty, as for the exchanging their Master.

After the Constable, who represented the King, had taken their Oaths of Fidelity, he pursued the Conquest of Poitou and Saintonge. Most part of the Lords were retired to Tonars, he laid Siege to it, and forc'd them to Capitulate; That they should put themselves, their Lands, and that place under Obedience of the King, unless the King of England, or one of his Sons, did come with an Army strong enough to fight the Besiegers by Michaelmas-day.

"This sort of Composition was practised as long as there was the least faith left amongst Men. It ever included a Cessation of Arms, during which the Besiegers taking Hostages of the Besieged, raised their Camp, and left them all manner of liberty, excepting only the admitting more Soldiers into the Garison, or to furnish or provide it with Stores.

1372. When King Edward heard of this Capitulation, Honour and Necessity rowzing and bringing to his mind the remembrance of his Victories, he puts to Sea himself with four hundred Vessels, that he might not lose so fine a Country, and so many brave Men. But the Winds refused to be serviceable to him upon this occasion; they tolled him about for six weeks together, and would not afford one favourable gale, but what blew him towards his own Ports of England. The time being expired, the Lords performed the Capitulation: after which the Cities of Saintes, Angoulême, Saint John d'Angely, and generally all the Country even to Bourg and Blaye, returned to the Obedience of their Ancient and Natural Sovereign.

1372. John de Montfort Duke of Bretagne looked with fear upon the Prosperity of the French, his ancient Enemies, and with regret upon the decay of the King of England his Father-in-Law, and his Protector: but he was not Master in his Dutchy, the People would have no more War, the haughty humour of the English was not compatible with their Liberty; and the Berons dazzled with the lustre of de Guesclin and de Cliftons Fortune, had their Eyes turned upon the Employments and Pensions of the Court of France. Thus the Duke was under great constraint; If he admitted any English to land upon those Coasts, the Common People fell upon them; if he quarter'd them in his Garisons, the Lords rose up. Having placed some in Brest, Conquet, Kemperle, and Henneband, they besought the King to send them some Forces to drive them thence, and put the Cities into his hands, as they did Vennes, Renes, and divers others.

The Revenge he would have taken, by laying Siege to St. Malé, did but hasten his loss, and the Constables march with the Duke of Bourbon. Some English Soldiers that he had sent for to strengthen himself withall, had the whole Country against them, and were all cut in pieces; so that although he had some good places left, he durst not shut himself in any of them, but passed over to England to cry out for help.

Whilst he was gone the Constable secured them all excepting three, Brest, Becherel, and Derval, (this last belonged to Knolles) he laid Siege to all these at the same time, as likewise to la Roche-sur-yon in Anjou.

This last being farthest off from all Assistance, surrendered, Brest, Becherel, and Derval promised to do as much, if within a certain prefixed time there appeared not an Army sufficient, and that would hold Battle*, to make the French raise their Siege. As for Brest and Derval they saved themselves by this means. The Earl of Salisbury was then at Sea to guard the English Coasts against the Spanish Navy Commanded by Evans of Wales, whose Father King Edward had put to death to get that Principality. Hearing what danger Brest was in, he landed in Bretagne, encamped and entrench'd himself near that place, then sent his Heralds to the Constable to proclaim that he was come to raise the Siege, and expected him there. The Constable did not think fit to attack him in so well fortified a Post; Thus that place was deliver'd. At their departure thence, Knolles, who had defended it, threw himself into Derval, not thinking himself obliged to stand to the Treaty made by that Garison; which cost the Lives of their Hostages, and by way of Reprizal, the Lives of some Gentlemen whom Knolles had taken Prisoners. As for Becherel it held out a whole year; at the end whereof, no Army appearing on the day prefixed to relieve it, it fell into the hands of the French.

* The Term then used, Qui tint Journée.

The King of England did not fail of his Guaranty to the Duke of Bretagne; he raised an Army of above Thirty thousand Men, whom he gave to the Duke of Lancaster to restore that Prince, who had the confidence to send defiance to the King of France his Sovereign: they landed at Calais the twentieth of July, marched thorough and pillaged Artois, Picardy, Champagne, Fores, Beaujolois, Auvergne and Limo-sin, and descended into Guyenne, instead of going into Bretagne, as Montfort hoped and expected.

It was the constant resolution of this wise King, not to hazard any great Battle against the English; but he ordered his Forces should be lodged every night in some Town, should follow the enemy by day, and never cease from galling and disturbing them, falling upon all straglers, and sitting so near their skirts, as to keep all Provisions and Forage from them; by which means he defeated their great Armies by little and little, and made them moulder away to nothing. These having been observed and pursued by the Duke of Burgundy, as far as Beaujolis, and from thence to the Dordogne by the Constable, were not only prevented from undertaking any thing considerable, but were so much weakened and diminished, that scarce six thousand of them got into Bordeaux.

During this irruption, the Duke of Anjou, Governour of Languedoc, made another, much more advantageous into the upper Guyenne. He conquer'd several places of little or no name at present, but in these days of great importance.

"Two great Judgments, a Famine and a * Plague, tormented France, Italy, and England this year 1373. There likewise Reigned, especially in the Low Countreys, a phrantick passion, or phrensie, unknown in the foregoing ages. Such as were tainted with it, being for the most part the scum of the people, stript themselves stark naked, placed a Garland of Flowers upon their Heads, and taking Hands with one another, went into the Streets and Churches, Dancing, Singing, and running round with so much violence, that they fell down for want of breath. This agitation made them swell so prodigiously, they would have burst, had not great pains and care been taken to swathe them with bands, about their Bellies immediately, such as looked on them too attentively, were often infected with the same distemper. Some believed it an operation of the Devil, and that Exorcisms did much help them. The vulgar named it, The Dance of St. JOHN.

Mal des Ardents mentioned before.

Upon the instant and continual exhortations of the Pope, the two Kings entred into a Negotiation to compose their differences. For this an Assembly was held at Bruges in Flanders, whither they sent their nearest Princes of their Blood, and the most illustrious Lords of their Kingdoms. It lasted almost two years with incredible expence: There was first a Truce made for a year, to commence in the month of May of this year 1375. which being concluded, the Duke of Lancaster and the Duke of Bretagne passed into England.

Bretagne not being comprehended, their Duke returns with an Army of English, and partly by force, partly by correspondence regained St. Malé, St. Briene, and seven or eight other places, whilst John d'Evreux, Brother to the King of Navarre made great spoil and waste all about Kemperlay.

He had built a Fort thereabouts for his retreat, from whence he very much incommoded that City, Clifton, Roban, Beaumont, and other Lords of Bretagne besieged him in it. The Duke hastned thither to deliver him, they quickly marched off, he pursues them and besieged them in Kemperlay: Now when they were just ready to be exposed to his mercy (he would have shewed but little to those whom he proclaimed Traitors and Rebels) a second Truce wherein they comprized him, drew them most fortunately out of his hands.

The minority of the King of France (if I do not deceive my self) lasted to the age of Twenty years, and during all that time, all Command, all Orders, and all Acts were made under the name of the Regent. The wise King considered, that an Authority so absolute, might force or snatch the Crown from his Son, if he left him a Minor; That the people, were it error or custom, did not willingly acknowledge a Prince for their King till he was Crowned; and that it might be feared, lest the Duke of Anjou should make them believe, by some former examples or precedents, that they ought to chuse one that was in Majority, and capable to Govern. For these reasons, or for others we are ignorant of; he made his memorable Ordonnance by the advice of the Princes, Lords, Prelates, University, and other notable persons which imports, "That the eldest Sons of France, as soon as they have attained to the age of Fourteen years, should be held for Majors, and capable of being Crowned, and that they should receive the Homage and Oaths of fidelity from their Subjects. This was made at the Bois de Vincennes in the month of August 1374. and verified in Parliament the Twentieth of May of the following year.

We must not however imagine, that he believed (as much King as he was) that he could advance the course of Nature, and give his Son the Sence and Wit that age alone can bestow, since the same Year, and the same Month, he made a Declaration, which mention'd, that in case he died before his Son should have attained to the age of Fourteen years, he left the Guardianship and Government of him, and of his other Children; as also the Government and Defence of the Kingdom to the Queen Mother (she was then living) and joyned with her the Dukes of Burgundy and of Bourbon, with a necessary and sufficient Council of near Forty persons.

1376. The Popes Legats remained still constantly at Bruges, and kept the Ambassadors of both Crowns there with them to labour for a Peace; But the Propositions on either side being at too great a distance to be brought to a meane, they obtained at least a prolongation of the Truce to the Month of April, in the year 1377.

"In Gascongne the Earl of Armagnac thinking to take revenge upon the Earl de Foix, who had beaten him, increased both his shame and loss. He had taken the little City of Caseres, and put himself into the place without providing it with Ammunition; the Earl de Foix besieges him, and without striking a blow, reduces him to the extremest want; but he would not agree to give him and his their Lives, but upon condition, that they should creep out thorough a hole made purposely in the Wall, which they could not do but by crawling with their Bellies upon the ground. 1376. "Nor were they quit for all this affront, the Earl of Armagnac and twenty more of the principal, paid great ransoms before they could be released. The King of Navarre pass'd his word for that of the Sire d' Albret.

1377. "During the long absence of the Popes, Italy had accustom'd it self to disregard and disown them. The People of Rome set up themselves as several petty Tyrants to preserve some Image of their Liberty; and by the same Spirit, the Cities belonging to the Ecclesiastical State, at the solicitation, and with the aid of the Florentines, had shaken off the yoke, and turned out his Apostolical Legats. Gregory XI. thinking to redress these disorders, and besides, being earnestly pressed by St. Bridget of Sweden, and by St. Catherine of Sienna, two persons who were thought to have a very frequent Commerce with Heaven, resolved to transfer the Holy See back to Rome, from whence it had been removed Seventy two years. He departed from Avignon the three and twentieth of September, embarked at Marseilles, and after very great dangers on the Sea, Signes of the agitations that change had wrought in the Church, he arrived at Rome the Twenty seventh of January following.

1377. King Edward in the mean while had lost the brave Prince of Wales, his eldest Son, who had left a Son named Richard very young; and for two years past found himself much broken, and his Brain decay'd with weight of continual business and contention, though he were but 65 years of age: This was it made him desire to have a Peace, and made him willing to relinquish many Articles of the Treaty of Bretigny. But death prevented the effects of that disposition, and took him out of the World the 21 of June. His Grandson Richard II, Surnamed of Bourdeaux, succeeded him.

"He had seven Sons, whereof five only lived to Mens Estate, and were Married, those were Edward, Lionel, John, Edmond, and Thomas; Edward was the brave Prince of Wales; for the other four, the First was Duke of Clarence, the Second of Lancaster, both of them by the Heiresses of those two Houses, and the Third Earl of Cambridge, then Duke of York, the Fourth, Earl of Buckingham, and afterwards Duke of Gloucester: He had also Four Daughters, Isabella, who Married the Earl of Bedford, Jane, who was Wife to the King of Spain, Mary, that was so to John de Montfort Duke of Bretagne, and Margaret to the Earl of Pembroke. This great multitude of Children was his strength during his life-time, and the ruine of England after his death.

1377. The Wife King had not consented to suspension of Arms, but to prepare himself the better. Therefore he would hear of no more Propositions, and making himself assured allured of the event of the War, he began it anew with five Armies: He sent one into Artois, One into the Countreys of Berry, Auvergne, Bourbonnois, and Lyonnois, One into Guyenne, One into Bretagne, and kept the Fifth near himself, as a reserve to assist either of the other Four that might stand in need of it; They were Commanded by the Dukes of Burgundy, of Berry, and of Anjou, Oliver and the Constable; all which behaved themselves so well, that the English could not preserve any places of importance but Calais in Belgica, Bourdeaux, and Bayonne in Guyenne, and Cherbourg in Normandy, which was sold to him by the Navarrais. 1377.

The eldest Son of that King, named Charles, as himself was, had a great desire to see the King of France his Uncle; his Father was just then upon the point of concluding a bargain with the English, very disadvantageous to France, which was to give them some Lands and Places he held in Normandy, and to take the Duchy of Guyenne in exchange, for the defence whereof they were to furnish him every year with Two thousand Men at Arms, and as many Archers to be paid by them. When his Son therefore went to see his Uncle, he would needs take this opportunity to brew some Plot or Conspiracy in France, and even to poison the King. He had therefore placed about his Son the most crafty, and most wicked Men he could pick out; amongst others la Rue his Chamberlain, and du Tertre his Secretary; but was so unadvised withal, as to send the Captains of his best places of Normandy. 1378.

His design was discover'd, or perhaps prevented; the King caused his Son and his Captains to be seized, and la Rue and du Tertre to be put into the hands of Justice. The Son whatever intercession could be made, remained a prisoner Five years, the Captains were not set free, till the places they belonged to were surrendered to the King; du Tertre and la Rue had their Heads cut off. At the same time some Forces were sent into Normandy, and took all his Holds, to the number of Ten or Twelve, excepting Cherbourg, which after a long Siege remained still in English hands, and immediately dismantled them.

The Duke of Anjou pressed the English very home likewise in Guyenne. The taking of Bergerac, and the gaining of a Battle which was fought near the little City of Aymeret, where almost all the Chiefs and Barons of Gascongne remained prisoners, made himself Master of all the Places above the two Rivers, the Dordogne and the Garonne.

Three things weakned the English so much, that they had neither the Sence nor Courage, nor Forces and Strength to defend themselves. One was the Minority of their King, aged but Thirteen years, the Second a great Plague, which depopulated England, and the Last, the incursions of the Scots, who had broken the Truce, being incited to it by the King, and upon condition of a hundred thousand Gold Florins, with the Pay for Five hundred Men at Arms, and as many Sergeants.

The Pope ceased not to exhort the King of France to make Peace, and pressed the Emperour Charles to make use of his intercession. The Emperour, whether out of affection for the Royal House of France, or to take measures, to secure the Empire to his Son Wenceslaus, or for some other subject, desired to visit that Court, though he were very much tormented with the Gout. The King sent two of the most illustrious Earls, and two hundred Horse to meet him at Cambray, where he kept his Christmas, the Duke of Bourbon to Compienne, and two of his Brothers to Senlis, himself went beyond the Suburbs of St. Denis, to receive him, and lodg'd him in his Palace. 1377. and 78.

All the time he was in France he entertained him with all the magnificence imaginable, paid him all manner of Respects, unless such as denote a Sovereignty, and which hereafter might give a Title to some imaginary pretences. For this reason when they received him into any City, they did not ring their Bells, nor bring their Canopy of State; such as made Speeches did not forget to tell him it was by order of their Sovereign; and at his entrance into Paris, the King affected to be mounted upon a White Horse, and ordered a Black one for the Emperour. He came in thither the Fourth day of January, and went out thence the Sixteenth, returning by the way of Champagne.

During his abode in the Court of France, he gratify'd the Dauphin with the Title of Vicar irrevocable of the Empire, by Letters Patents, Sealed with a Seal of Gold; and by others he likewise gave him the same Office for Dauphiné, with the Castles of Pipet and Chimanx, which till then he was possessed of in the City of Vienne. Since that we do not read, that the Emperours have concerned themselves any more in the Affairs 1378. Affairs of that Kingdom of Arles, nor touching Daupiné, which have remained in complete Sovereignty under the Kings of France; who indeed, even long before, did not acknowledge the Emperour.

"Gregory XI. had scarcely been Fourteen Months at Rome, when either of Melancholy, or otherwise, he fell ill of a detention of Urine, whereof he died the Seventh of March, having declared in his agony, that he foresaw grievous troubles, and that he did heartily repent his having rather given credit to deceitful Revelations, then followed the certain light of true knowledge and good understanding.

"There were in all in the Roman Church three and twenty Cardinals, six whereof remained still at Avignon, and one was gone upon a Legation. Of the Sixteen that were in Rome, there were Twelve of them French-men, and four Italians; all of them foreseeing that the Roman Populace would force them to elect a Pope of the Italian Nation, agreed amongst themselves, that they would elect one feignedly only, to avoid the fury of the People, and another in good earnest, whom when they were gone thence they would own for the true Pope. During this Convention, the heat and violence of the People growing more terrible then they could have imagined; they named the Cardinal Bartholomew * Bontillo a Native of Naples, Arch-Bishop of Barry in that Kingdom, who immediately took himself to be lawful Pope, and assumed the Name of Urban VI.

"The Cardinals in the mean time were forced to dissemble, till they could have fit opportunity to declare the Truth, and to write Letters to all Princes, that his Election was Canonical; however, they gave notice to the King of France, that he should give no faith to their Letters, till they were out of danger. But when upon pretence of avoiding the extream heats in Rome, they were retired to Anagnia; being moreover offended at the proud deportment of Bartholomew, they made the Truth of the matter of Fact known to all Princes, admonished Bartholomew three several times, to desist from pretending to the Papacy, since he well knew they had no intention to elect him; and afterwards they proceeded judicially against him, and declared him an intruder. That done, they retired to Fundy, under protection of the Earl of that place, and there elected one of the six Cardinals that had remained in France. This was Robert, Brother of Peter Earl of Geneva, whose Courage was as high as his Birth. He took the Name of Clement VII.

France after several Assemblies had been held of the most Learned of the Clergy, and the most judicious Prelats and Nobility, adhered to Clement; the Kings of Castille and of Scotland, who were his Allies did the same; the Earl of Savoy, and Jane Queen of Naples also, although in the beginning she had protected his Competitor. But all the rest of Christendom owned Urban, the Navarrois, the English, and the Flemmings out of spite to France, the Italians to preserve the Papacy in their Nation, the Emperour in acknowledgment, because that Pope before he was ever required, had made haste to confirm the election of Wenceslaus his Son; the King of Hungary that he might have a pretence to dispoliate the Queen of Naples; and the rest for divers interests. Peter King of Arragon remained Neutre.

At first Clement was well armed, and in a condition to over-top his adversary, having in his service one Sylvester Bude, a Captain of Bretagne with Two thousand old Adventurers of that Nation, who took the Castle St. Angelo, defeated the Romans in Rome it self, and made themselves Masters of the City. But after another famous Captain who was an Englishman, and was named Hacket *, otherwise Head of the Bands of the Tard-Venus, and now in the service of Urban, had vanquished and taken him prisoner; Clements Affairs went on so ill, that he was driven out of Italy, and retiring himself to Avignon, left his Rival sole Master of Rome.

This Schisme lasted Forty years, either party having great Persons, Saints, Miracles and Revelations, as they said, and even such strong Arguments and Reasons on his side, that the dispute could never be decided but by way of Cession, that is, by obliging the two Contenders to abdicate the Papacy; so that it is great boldness to call those Anti-Popes, who during this Schisme, held the See at Avignon.

"The death of the Emperour Charles IV. fell out upon the Nine and twentieth of November, in the year 1378. in the City of Prague, the 63 year of his age. Wenceslaus his Son who was elected King of the Romans in the year 1376. succeeded him in the Empire, and the Kingdom of Bohemia; a Prince deformed both in Body and Soul;

* Bontillo a mock Pope.

It

It was a kind of Rebellion in the Earl of Flanders to own any other Pope then his King had done, and indeed he shewed him ill will for it, and more yet towards the Breton, who encouraged him in his obstinacy. Besides, it had so fortun'd, that the Flemming by the Counsel of that Duke, had caused one of his Envoyes to be slain, who was passing thorow his Countrey on his way to Scotland, to incite Robert Stewart to break the Truce with the English. The King made complaint to the Flemming, and Commanded him to drive the Breton out of his Countreys; but the Flemming having taken advice of his People, who assured him of Two hundred thousand Combatants, in case he were attacked, refused to give him that satisfaction.

The Breton nevertheless went out of Flanders and took refuge in England. The place of his retreat aggravated his crime; the King orders him to be summoned to appear in Parliament, to be judged by his Pairs. Not presenting himself, he was declar'd, by Sentence of the Ninth of December, attainted of the crime of Felony; and all his Lands, as well in Bretagne, as all others he held in the Kingdom, confiscated, for having defied the King his Sovereign Lord, and for having entred the Countrey in Arms with the enemies of the Kingdom.

That which in appearance seemed likeliest to ruine this Duke, rais'd him. The Bretons, who for a thousand years past, had so generously fought for the liberty of their Countrey, having discover'd that the King designed more against the Dutchy it self, then the Duke alone, and that he would take it away from the guilty, only to apply it to himself, began to complain, to withdraw from their affection to the French, to re-unite amongst themselves, and to make divers Leagues and Associations between the Cities and the Nobles. Even the Widow of Charles de Blois, by Counsel of the friends of her House, sent to protest against that Decree, and alledged that Bretagne was not subject or liable to confiscation, because it was not a Fief, and that if the Dukes had submitted their persons, by obliging themselves to certain Service, it was not in their power to subject their Countrey.

This year a most cruel War was kindled in Flanders, which lasted Seven years. The interior cause of this inflammation was the Luxury of the Nobility, and the dissolute and excessive expences of the Earl; the occasion was a quarrel, that rose between one called John Lyon, and the Mathews, who were six Brothers, both the one and the other were very powerful amongst the Navigators, or Mariners, and between the Cities of Ghent and Bruges, for a certain Canal, or River which those of Bruges would needs make. The Earl took part with these, and was cause that John Lyon formed against him a faction of White Hats in the City of Ghent. He sets up the Mathews to oppose and countermine them. John Lyon was found to be the stronger, and pushed the contest on to the utmost extremity.

The Duke of Anjou was mighty greedy of Money, and a great exactor; his People by his Order, or upon their own Authority, having laid some new Imposts upon the City of Montpellier, which was under his Government, but of the Propriety of the King of Navarre, the People mutined, and killed Four score of them, amongst which number were his Chancellour and the Governour. The Duke hastned thither with some Forces, and caused a most horrible Sentence to be given for punishment of that crime; but it was moderated almost in every point, by the intercession of his Holiness, excepting against the Authors of that Sedition, who paid down their Heads for it. After all, the King coming to know of the capacity of that Duke, took the Government of the Province from him, and bestow'd it on the Earl of Foix.

Whether the King were ignorant of the disposition of the Bretons, or thought he could change them, he sent for the Lords of that Countrey, and screw'd a promise from them that they should assist the Duke of Bourbon, and those other Chiefs he would send into Bretagne to execute the Decree against their Duke. But the Lords on the contrary, sent for him to come thither, and stood by him so effectually with their Forces, and such as he brought over with him from England, that they restored him to most of his Towns.

This was the greatest and almost the only shock this wise King met with in all his Enterprises. He was so transported, and sensibly touched, that he Commanded all the Bretons who should refuse to serve against the Duke, to go out of his Kingdom, and shewed more severity towards some of them, then was agreeable to his nature. But this usage did only strengthen the party for the Duke, and draw those over to his service, that were at that time the ablest Men of the French Armies.

He

He durst not, even upon this occasion, make use of the valour of his Constable, who would but unwillingly have drawn his Sword for the destruction of his native Country: he chose rather to send him into Guyenne to clear some places, from whence the English, and certain crews of vagabonds by their connivance, foraged the Country of Auvergne. After the taking of some Castles, and beating some of those Bands, whilst he was besieging one of them in Chateau-neuf de Randan, between Mendes and le Puy in Velay, he was assaulted by a Fever, whereof he died the Thirtieth of July; his very Name completed the Work, the Besieged surrendred and brought and laid the Keys upon his Coffin. The King (upon the refusal of Enguerrand de Coucy) gave the Constables Sword to Oliver de Clisson, Compagnon, and Countryman of the Deceased, no less valiant then the other, but very unlike in all things else, Unjust, Proud, Covetous, and Cruel.

Bretagne was then the Theater of War, the King had resolved to throw in all his Armies there, when he was constrain'd to quit the World and all his Designs. Some years before Charles the Bad, had caused some poyson to be given him, the violence whereof a Physitian belonging to the Emperour Charles IV. had allayed, by opening an issue in his Arm to discharge part of its venome; that issue being stoppt it took his Life away: He died in the Castle of Beauté upon the Marne, which is beyond the Bois de Vincennes, the Sixteenth of September, the Sixth Month of the Seventeenth year of his Reign and the Four and fortieth of his Life. His Tomb is to be seen at St. Denis; his Heart was carried to the great Church of Rouen, because he had been Duke of Normandy, and his Bowes to Maubuisson, and laid by the Body of the Queen his Mother.

Upon his Death-bed, this Wise King could not forget his care for the Kingdom, he confirmed the Law concerning the Majority, left the Government to Lewis Duke of Anjou his eldest Brother, with a Council, and the Guardianship and Education of his Son Charles to the Dukes of Burgundy and of Bourbon, Commanding them most expressly to take off the Imposts, to make some agreement with the Duke of Bretagne, if it were possible, and to Marry his Son into some potent Family of Germany.

In all his Conduct there appeared much solidity of Judgment, and marvellous clearness of Wisdom and Understanding, a great deal of Moderation and Goodness, much Frugality and Economy, and yet Magnificence and liberality upon occasion. He had been carefully bred in the Study of good Learning, by Nicholas Oresme a Theologian of Paris, and Dean of Rouen, whom he made Bishop of Lisieux; and indeed he had as much affection for the Sciences, and for Learned Men, as aversion for Comedians, Juglers, Buffoons, and all those sorts of People, who under the pretence of Divertisement, corrupt the bravest Souls.

He delighted to hear the Truth from the Mouths of honest Men; and although he merited the loftiest praises, he could hardly endure any, and despised them, because in all times Courtiers have given the very same, both to good and to bad Princes.

The expences of his Wars did not hinder his Magnificence from shewing it self in the Buildings of the Castle du Bois de Vincennes, which subsists to this day, and that of the Louvre; the other parts whereof we have seen demolished, to make room for the proudest Structure that ever Architecture raised upon Earth: but which, how great soever it can be, shall yet be much less then the King that undertakes it.

But above all his Virtues, the fear of God and zeal to Justice did shine in him to a supreme Degree, the care of which being the noblest Function of a King, he took pleasure in dispensing it himself, and very often came to hear the Pleadings in his Parliament, where he made them admire his Reasoning and Eloquence, speaking so fully to the Subject in hand, that there was nothing left for his Chancellor or Attorney-General to say.

He left considerable Treasures behind him in Lingots of Gold and rich Furniture. It is a Problem in the Politiques, whether he did well in heaping it up; In point of Justice it is none, if they may make Millions of People miserable to enrich one single Man: And in truth his memory is not exempt from all blame on that side; but they throw it upon the Cardinal of Amiens, one of his principal Counsellors. His Name was John de la Grange, an obdurate Soul, ambitious tious and covetous, whose great possessions fully demonstrate that he caused the Subsidies to be doubled merely out of design to enrich himself.

By Jane Daughter of Peter Duke of Bourbon, and Isabella de Valois, a Princess much accomplish'd both in Body and Mind; he had two Sons, Charles, who Reigned, Lewis, who was Duke of Orleans, and six Daughters who all dyed very young.

THe Reign of Charles the Wise was happy enough, but too short; this very long and extremely unfortunate. A Minor King, and then alienated in his Understanding, Sick-Brain'd; a Queen, an ill Wife, and unnatural Mother; Princes of the Blood Ambitious, Covetous, Squanderers and Cruel; the Grandees by their example, giving themselves up to all manner of Licentiousness; Subjects mutinous and seditious, tumbled France into an Abyss of all kinds of Miseries, and under the dominion of Strangers.

From the very first day, some jealousies about the Government divided the Kings Uncles. The Duke of Anjou being seized of the Regency, disposed of Commands, and changed the Officers: The Dukes of Burgundy and of Bourbon*, could not suffer it, and would have the King Crowned: he maintained on the contrary, that he ought not to be so till he were Fourteen years of age, according to the Declaration of the late King. About this difference an Assembly of Notables was held, where John des Marais, Advocate-General of the Parliament maintained the Duke of Anjou's Cause, and Peter d'Orgement the contrary.

This conference having only heated them the more, the friends of either party arm'd. themselves: Paris beheld her self surrounded with Soldiers who lived at Discretion. The Lords of the Kings Council mediated an agreement, and prevailed so far, that that the parties referred it to Arbitrators, who concluded, That the King should be Crowned without delay; That afterwards he should have the administration of the Kingdom, that is to say, he should receive the Homages and Oaths, and all Acts should be expedite in his Name; and for this purpose the Regent had aged him, that is to say, Emancipated; That the Duke of Anjou should continue Regent; that the other Two should have the Guard of the Kings Person, with the Revenues of Normandy, and three or four Bailiwicks for his entertainment.

They likewise agreed to chuse a Council of Twelve Persons, necessarily resident at Paris, where by a plurality of Votes they were to ordain all things concerning the Revenue, and Offices belonging thereto, and without whose Authority no part of the Demeasnes pertaining to the Crown, should be alienated either for Life or Perpetuity; and who should make an Inventory of the Revenues, Plate, Jewels and Furniture that was the Kings, which the Duke of Anjou seized upon, and never gave a good account of.

The Imposts having been very excessive, in the last years of the Reign of Charles V. caused some Emotions in the Cities, particularly of Paris and Compiègne: but without any mischievous consequence or accidents. The Cardinal d'Amiens who had been principal contriver of those Subsidies, was now paid part of the reward he so well deserved: for the young King remembered he had checkt him with sawcy Language in his Fathers life-time, and exprest his resentment in discourse to the Chamberlain Peter de Savoisy, in these terms, God be thanked, we are now delivered from the Tyranny of that Chaplain! The Cardinal having notice of it, makes up his pack and retires to Douay, and from thence to Avignon, carrying away an immense Treasure which he had scraped together to the poor Peoples cost, and by picking the pockets of the whole Nation.

Cliffon had been confirmed in the Office of Constable, he had the Commission to conduct the King to Rheims, with that Pomp and Magnificence, as was usual on those Ceremonies. The Duke of Anjou staying some days behind, seized upon the Treasures which Charles V. had concealed in the Walls of the Castle at Melun; having forced Savoisy, with whom the King had entrusted the secret and guard of it, to shew him the place where it lay, which prompted the courage of that Prince, to undertake the unfortunate War of Italy, where himself perished with the choice Flower of the French Nobility. So true it is, that those vast sums of Money collected by Sovereign Princes, does for the most part bring only trouble to their Kingdoms in the end, and that their Treasures are no where so secure, as in the affections of the Subjects, who are ever affectionate and kind, when they are kindly Treated.

The Duke of Anjou having overtaken the King upon his way to Rheims, the Coronation was performed the Fourth of November. Of the Lay-Pairs there were none present but the Duke of Burgundy, who being the first of all, it was by judgment of the Council ordained, That he should take place before the Duke of Anjou, his elder Brother and Regent; and when this last not submitting to that judgment, had seated himself at the Feast made on that Ceremony, next to the King, the Burgundian boldly came, thrust himself between, and took the place above him.

The Princes and their Council of Twelve, had no other aim but their particular Interests. The Duke of Anjou was the most powerful, the Duke of Burgundy made Head against him, Bourbon's Duke floated betwixt both, the Duke of Berry made no considerable Figure.

At the Coronation there was proclaimed the relaxation of the Imposts, pursuant to the last Will of Charles V. but the Duke of Anjou having taken all the Money of the Treasury, and refusing to employ any of it towards payment of the Soldiery, or the Kings Family, in one Month after they were fain to settle new ones, especially upon the City of Paris. The Populace mutined, a Cobler makes himself Head of them, and compell'd the Prevost des Marchands to go to the Palace, attended with a multitude of Mutineers, to demand the Revocation of them; nevertheless the Chancellour (it was William de Dormans, Bishop of Beauvais) appeased that Commotion by fair words, and with a promise that was made, to grant them what they did desire.

The very next day another Troop of the Rabble pull'd down their Courts or Offices, tore their Accounts and Registers; and going thence fell upon the Jews Houses: there were Forty in one Street, plundered them all, and burnt their Writings, took their Children and haled them to Church to Baptize them, and would have beat out the Brains of their Fathers, had they not taken Sanctuary in the Prison of the Chastelet. The King restored them to their Houses again, and caused Proclamation, that every one should give them back what they had forced from them.

In the Month of July, the Earl of Buckingham with a potent Army was landed at Calais, not in Guyenne, as is told us in the History of this Reign, written by a Monk of St. Denis, which is not very true in many places. He crossed Picardy, Champagne, passed near Troyes, where the Duke of Burgundy had made the general Rende-vous of his Army, then by Gastinois, la Beausse, Vendosmois, and Mayne, to go into Bretagne to the assistance of that Duke.

The same day he passed the Sartre, King Charles V. passed into the other World. The news of his death allayed that hatred the Breton had conceived against the French: Inasmuch as the English having laid Siege before Nantes, he even left them there two Months without joining them, as he had promised. They were fain to go and find him out at Vennes. He was mightily perplexed, for the Breton Lords, even those who were the most affectionate, being tired with suffering under strangers, and the miseries of War, and withal, revolted from him by the intrigues of Clisson, and the credit of Beaumanoir, would peremptorily have him agree with France; in effect, they compell'd him to make a Peace with the King, to dismiss the English, and renounce their Alliance; and also gave such cautions as obliged him to make good this Treaty.

Charles V. King of Navarre

They did not breed up the young King conformable to the good instructions of his Father, but according to the inclinations of his age, and airy Nature, to Hunting, Dancing, and running about here and there. One day when he was Hunting in the Forest of Senlis, a large Stag was rowzed, which he would not pursue with his Dogs, but took him in a Toil. They found about his Neck a Copper Coller Gilt, with an Inscription in Latine, which imported * that Cesar had given him it. The young King, because of this, or for that in a Dream he had been carried up into the Air by a Stag that had wings, took two Staggs Volant for Supporters to the Arms of France. Before him our Kings had Flowers-de-Luce Sans number in their Scutcheon, he reduced them to three, we do not know wherefore.

The Children of the Navarrois, to wit, his Eldest, and his Second Son, and one Daughter, who had been taken in one of his places of Normandy, being yet prisoner; the wicked King hired an Englishman to poison the Dukes of Berry and Burgundy, in revenge for that they hindered their being set at liberty. This wretched fellow was discover'd and quarter'd alive. Nevertheless John King of Castille, the Son of Henry, importun'd by the continual solicitations of his Sister, who Married the Infant of Navarre, interceded so effectually with the Kings Uncles, that they released those innocent Children of a very wicked Father.

The meanness and condescensions of the two Popes towards those Princes, of their parties to attain their ends, was a most lamentable thing; nor can it without indignation be express'd what exaction and violence they committed on the Clergy, and those Churches of their dependance. The six and thirty Cardinals of Avignon were so many Tyrants, to whom Clement gave all sorts of Licence. They had Proctors every where with Grants of Reversions, who snapp'd up all the Benefices, the Claustral Offices, the Commandery's, retained the best of them, and sold the rest, or gave them upon pension, or rather Farmed them out.

Clement himself, besides his seizing upon all that any Bishop or Abbot left after his death; besides his taking a years Revenue of each Benefice upon every change, whether it hapned by vacancy, or by resignation, or by permutation, ravaged the Gallican Church, by infinite Concussions, and extraordinary Taxes. Good People bewailed these disorders; there were none but Purloiners that wished they might be continued, and nothing but the particular Interests of Princes kept this Schisme still on foot. Clement allowed the Duke of Anjou the Levying of the Tenth, and the Duke allowed of all his pilferings, and violently reproved all those that durst complain. This unjust proceeding, rather than the Justice of Urban's party, was the cause why many of the principal Doctors of the Faculty put themselves under the Obedience of that Pope; and also made the University begin to desire and demand a Council, as the Sovereign remedy for all these mischiefs.

The Duke of Berry, angry that he had no part in the Affairs, his Father-in-law, the Earl of Armagnac, persuades him to demand the Government of Languedoc, as then in the hands of his Enemy the Count de Foix. The Council consents to his demand, but the Count armed to maintain himself, and the Province, where he was as much beloved for his Justice and his Generosity, as the Duke of Berry was hated for his Thievery, stuck close to him. The Duke enters with an Army to take possession by by force, the Count beat him soundly near the City of Rabastens; but after he had let him know he was able to keep his Government, he yielded it up to him, that he might not be the ruine of those that defended him.

John Lyon chief of the White Hats, had so blown up the troubles in Flanders, that his death could not extinguish the Flame. Most part of the good Towns in that Countrey had joyned themselves to the Ghentois; the Peace the Duke of Burgundy had made betwixt them and the Earl his Father-in-law, lasted but a very short time, the Earl goes secretly out of Ghent, and the Gentry combine against the Cities; Ghent had all manner of ill success; but neither their being thrice let Blood, which cost above Fifteen thousand Lives, nor Waste, nor Famine, nor being forsaken by the other Cities, nor yet the miseries of two Sieges, could quell those stubborn obstinate lovers of their liberty.)

After the loss of most of their stoutest Leaders, they chose one, named Peter de Bois, and upon his persuasions another also; to wit, Philip d'Artevelle, Son of that James, formerly mentioned, much richer than his Father, but less crafty, and much prouder. This last took the upper-hand, and pretended to all the Functions of a Sovereign.

Although they had promised the People to take off the Imposts, the Regent, nor the Treasurers who Governed him, could not resolve upon't. The great Cities took up Arms to oppose it. Peter de Villiers, and John de Marais, Persons venerable with the People, and also very much regarded by the Regent, somewhat appeased the commotion at Paris; but could by no means persuade them to suffer those new Levies. The Burghers took Arms, set Guards at the Gates, created Diseniers *, Cinquantienniers *, Centeniers *, and made some Companies to keep the Avenues and Passages to the City free.

The Duke of Anjou was therefore forced to dissemble for the present, but he had not resolved to let go the thing thus, and intended only to wait till their heats were grown colder to go on as before. It hapned the following year, that having published the Farming of those Imposts at the Chastelet, one of the Officers belonging to the Farmers demanding a Denier * of an Herb-Woman for a bundle of Cresses; the Rabble gathered together upon the noise this Woman made, grew into fury, went and broke open the Town-Hall to get Arms, and took out three or four thousand iron Maillets or Hammers, for which cause this seditious crew were named the Mailletiers. After this they massacred all that were concerned to gather it, plundered their Houses, and razed them, open'd the Prisons and took out all the Criminals; amongst others, Hugh Aubriot Prevost of Paris, whom they made their Captain, but he forsook them the very same night and fled to his own Countrey of Burgundy.

He had been condemned some Months before at the Suit of the Clergy, to end his days between four Walls, for crimes of Impiety and of Heresie, and shewing himself a most bitter Enemy to the Scholars and Heads of the University.

The Sedition at Rouen which hapned at the same time, was called the Harelle *. The Populace took a wealthy Merchant, and perforce gave him the Title of King; then leading him in triumph about the City, compell'd him to declare an abolition of all Imposts.

The King was counsell'd to punish the Mutiniers, and not let fall any of those Impositions. He began with Rouen, going thither in person, he caused a Gate to be beaten down, that he might enter by that breach; Commanded all their Arms to be carried into the Castle, punish'd a great many of the Faction with death, then set up the Imposts with Taxes and Fines.

To compass their ends the more readily amongst the Parisians, they pretended to listen to the intercessions of the University, and a Deputation of some honest Burghers, who went to wait upon the King at the Bois de Vincennes, and to consent at last to the suppression of the Imposts, and forgiveness for all excess committed in their Mutinies; only they excepted those that had any hand in forcing the prisons of the Chastelet. Under this pretence a great many were taken, and the Prevost of Paris not daring to execute them publicly, threw them into the River by night at several times.

This severity not being capable to fright the Parisians, so far as to make them consent to the settling of the Imposts, they fell to Treaty with them, which ever proves advantageous to the Superiour, against his Inferiours. By this means the Court got an hundred thousand Francs of the City, to whom perhaps they would have given double the sum, could they have done it with Honour, to have had the liberty of returning thither.

"England was not less troubled with the like Commotions, having a King under age*, and Governours extremely covetous. Never was that Kingdom in so great danger. The Commons revolted against the Nobility, who in truth kept them in a most servile condition; One *John Valee a Priest of the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, had so well catechised and instructed the Countrey fellows, by divers Discourses after they had been at Church, concerning the equality that God and Nature made amongst all Mankind, that they conspired the destruction of the Rich and Noble. To this end they flock to London in several parties, under pretence of demanding justice of the King, and stirred up all the Counties to joyn with them, like so many packs of Blood-hounds. For some Months the Citizens and Gentry durst not stir; but these Russians having neither Head nor Council, nor Discipline, their Captains being surprized and executed, they were soon dispersed, and beaten home with Cudgels like so many brute Beasts.

Because of these disorders the English entred upon a Conference with the French, to make a Peace; Boulogne was the place they met in: the Deputies not coming to a conclusion, made only a Truce for one year, during which time they went and entangled themselves in that War, which Ferdinand King of Portugal made against John King of Castille. The Earl of Cambridge, who had married a Daughter of Peter the Cruel, carried some Forces thither, fancying he might regain Castille, both to his own advantage, and the Duke of Lancaster's, his Brother, France failed not to assist the Castillans; and thus the French and English having a Truce in these parts, made War upon each other in Spain. Scarce had it lasted eight Months, when the Portugais not receiving from England all that assistance they were promised, claps up an agreement with the Castillans, and made the English their enemies.

The hundred thousand * Francs they drew from the Parisians, was the Duke of Anjou's last hand, who did not forward those Impositions, but only to have the greatest share himself for his voyage to Italy, whereof this was the Subject.

* Or Joane

After Clements party were ruined at Rome, Urban thinking to revenge himself upon *Jane Queen of Naples, perswaded Lewis King of Hungary to send him Charles de Duraz, surnamed Peaceable, to come and take possession of that Kingdom, to whom he proffer'd the investiture, as being the nearest of the Males.

This Prince had all the obligations imaginable to Queen Jane, or Joane, for he was of the very same Blood as she, Son of Lewis Count de Gravines, who was the Son of John VIII. Son of Charles the Lame, and therefore Brother to King Robert. She had bred him with as much care and tenderness in her Court, as if he had been her own Child; she had married him to the Princess Margaret her Niece, she designed to make him her Successor, and kept his Children at this very time in her own Family. The execrable ambition for a Crown rendred him ingrateful, and made him break thorough all these obligations, and noble endearments. The Queen finding he was coming, with an intention and preparation to Dethrone her, had recourse to France her first Original, and adopted the Duke of Anjou for her Son and presumptive Heir, in Anno 1380.

King Charles the Wise, after the example of St. Lewis, would have spared nothing to establish his Brother in the Throne; but hapning to dye, the Enterprize was left in suspense. In the mean while Charles lost no time, for being Crowned King of Sicilia at Rome, in the beginning of the year 1381. he marched towards Naples, where being received without opposition, he besieged the Queen and her Sister Mary, in the Castle del'Ovo, forced them in fine to surrender, after his having defeated and taken Otho of Brunswic, Janes fourth Husband, and caused both of them to be strangled in prison.

Those succors the Duke of Anjou was leading to that unhappy Princess, being now useless, and Charles by that time settled in the Kingdom; the Duke was hesitating whether he should pass the Mountains. Pope Clement, who had but this one way to Dethrone Urban, engag'd him by such great assurances and advantages, as plainly manifested, he did not care whether he ruin'd the Church, both in her Spirituals and Temporals, provided he could but compass his own establishment.

It was about the end of the last year the Duke had certain news that Queen Jane was Besieg'd, and caused his Forces to march towards Provence. The Pope invests him with the Kingdom of Sicilia, and Crowned him at Avignon, the Thirtieth day of May. Jane had been dead eight days, but as it was not known in a long time, he gave him only the Title of Duke of Calabria. The Provençals were not satisfied or or consenting to the adoption of the Duke, much less would they own him for their Sovereign whilst Jane was alive: nor would he take the Crown or leave them, till he had made himself sure; it took him up six Months time to reduce them, and afterwards he loaded them with all manner of Taxes and Imposts, as he had done the French.

After he had exacted all he could, he passes into Italy, his Army consisted of Thirty thousand Horse. Anne VI. Earl of Savoy, one of the most renowned Princes of his time, accompanied him with Fifteen hundred Lances, all Knights or Esquires.

Being entred into the Kingdom by the Marca Anconitana, not without much toil, he took the City of Aquila, and divers other places in Apulia, and Calabria, and was acknowledged by several Grandeas of the Countrey.

Charles, desirous to be rid of him without any hazard against so potent an enemy, had recourse to the inventions of those Countreys, and sends him a crafty poysoner, under the Title of a Herald: this wickedness being discover'd, and the false Herald beheaded and Quartered, he bethinks him of challenging Lewis to a Combat, to amuse him and gain time; their Cartels are to be seen, they are dated in the Month of November; a single Combat between Man and Man was first propounded, then they agreed to decide all Disputes by ten on each side. The Earl of Savoy was to be the Chief on Lewis's part, but Charles by a hundred delays and evasions, temporised till he furnished all his Places, and then openly broke off all that Project.

in November.

"This year hapned the Tragical History of the only Son of the Count de Foix, and Agnes, Sister of the King of Navarre, whose Name, as his Fathers, was Gaston Phébus. The Count not much caring for his Wife, because he entertained a Mistress, took occasion to send her back to her Brother, for that he took no care to pay the Ransom of the Lord d'Albret. Now the Son going to see his Mother in Navarre, this wicked Uncle gave him a Powder to strew upon his Fathers Meat, making him believe, that so soon as he had swallowed any he would recall his Mother. The young Boy too credulous, took that for a Philtre, which in effect was a deadly poyson, and did not conceal what he would do, from a bastard-Brother of his: the Bastard having told the Count, this unfortunate Father, after he had most outrageously used his Son both by Words and Blows, cast him into prison where he lost his Life, either through Grief, or by his hands that had given it him.

1382.

The Earl of Flanders had besieged Ghent, and was himself at Bruges, whose Inhabitants rendred him all possible service to destroy that City their grand enemy. The Ghentois reduced to hunger by their Earl, without being able to obtain pardon, stak'd down all they had left at once. The First day of May, by the advice of Artevelle, and under his Conduct, they went forth to the number of Five thousand Men resolved to dye, and the Third day presented themselves before Bruges.

They had no more Provisions then what was loaded in seven Waggon, and had left none at Ghent. It had been easie for the Count to have famish'd them; nevertheless, blinded with revenge, he chose rather to fight them the same day; he had only Eight hundred Lances, but of the Burghers there went forth above Forty thousand Men. Amidst this terrible multitude, there was more of pride and outward pomp, then inward and true courage, they gave ground upon the very first shock; the Ghentois pursued their point, and entred pell-mell with them into the City, made themselves Masters, sacked it, and slew above Twelve hundred of the principal Tradesmen, their mortal enemies.

The Count that night hid himself in the Garret of a poor Widows House, between the Bed and Matt, where her Children lay, and escaped the next day to Pille; disguised like a Mechanique. This miraculous success brought all the Cities in Flanders over to the Ghentois Faction, only Audenard excepted. Artevelle admired by all as the deliverer of his Countrey, took upon him the garb and state of a Sovereign. Prosperity tumbled him down again, as Adversity had raised him.

The Flemming, thus rudely handled, had recourse to the King of France his Sovereign, by the interest of the Duke of Burgundy his Son-in-law, and Artevelle craved the assistance of the King of England. This last moving but slowly, miss'd an opportunity that would have been of great advantage to him; but those that were of Council to Charles, complying with the humours of that young Prince, which were were conformable to the interests of France, resolved to quell the City of Ghent, which seemed to be the Spring-head of all those popular disturbances.

Having therefore taken out the Standard of St. Denis, named the Oriflamme, with the accustomed Ceremonies, he went into the Field about the beginning of September, Arras was the general Rendez-vous for his Army, which was made up of Sixty thousand Fighting Men, amongst which were Twelve thousand Men at Arms, and almost all the Princes, great Officers and Lords of the Kingdom. Artevelle who had besieged Audenard about two Months, left about Fifteen thousand Men there to keep those Posts, Commanded by Dubois, and marched thence with Forty thousand, resolved to fight the French, although he had no Cavalry. The First brush was about the passage over the River of Lys, where the French twice gained the Bridge de Comines; the Second was near the City of Ypre, where Dubois lost Three thousand Men, and was wounded himself; the Third was a general Battle between Rosbeque and Courtray.

Artevelle was come thither, and had encamp'd himself with so much confidence and presumption, that he commanded his Men to give no quarter but to the King, whom he was to send prisoner into England, whilst he went on to conquer and share all France. Being informed of the great strength and excellent order of the French Army, he would have avoided his personal danger, and have absented himself, upon pretence of going to fetch Ten thousand Men more to joyn with them, but the rest made him stay there as it were perforce.

1382. in November. The Battle was fought the Twenty seventh of November. The Flemmings kept in a very close Order, but did not fight with vigor and alacrity; the French Horse pressed so hard upon them, they had not Elbow-room to strike with much force. There were near Forty thousand of them slain, either in the fight or the pursuit, amongst whom was their General Artevelle, whom they could hardly distinguish in such heaps of dead Carcasses.

The courage of the Ghentois much depressed by this cruel blow, was afresh revived and inspired by Dubois, who brought some Forces to them which he had in Bruges, and by the coming on of Winter, which hindered the Conquerors from besieging them; so that in some overtures that were propounded for an accommodation, their carriage appeared as haughty as if they had gained the Battle.

1382. in December. The other Cities that had sided with them, redeemed themselves by great sums of Money; Courtray did not enjoy that favour, although they had paid down the purchase; the cause of this their misfortune, was said to be the resentment of the French for their annual Festivity, in commemoration of that Battle they had gained over them in the year 1302. with certain Letters from the Parisians, which were found, making mention of a League between the Cities in France with those in Flanders, for the utter rooting out of the Nobility; they were therefore plundered, massacred, and the Town afterwards set on fire.

And in effect, as soon as the King was gone out of France, the Citizens of Paris, Rouen, Troyes, Orleans, and several others, had taken up Arms upon occasion of the Imposts; insomuch that the Princes and the Grandees, who sought to make advantage of Confiscations and Fines; having easily perswaded the King, whether it were true or not; that the People had conspired against the Crown; that young Prince, by their advice and instigation, severely chastised those Cities, by putting great numbers to death, by Proscriptions, revocation of Privileges, and excessive Taxes.

1383. The Parisians as proud, but less courageous than the Ghentois, went armed forth to meet him in the Plain near St. Denis, to the number of Thirty thousand, to pay their respect to him in appearance; but in truth to let him see their strength: Nevertheless, they did too much and too little, for they returned every one to his own home, upon his first word of Command. He entered their City therefore, as into a place conquer'd by force, caused their Gates to be unhinged, their Barricado's to be broken down, took away their Chains and all their Arms, their Prevost of Marchants and Sheriffs Offices; and afterwards a great many of their Lives, who were drowned in the River, or hanged, or else beheaded.

1383. Amongst those of the last number, was the Kings Advocate, John de Marais, more guilty for opposing the Princes exactions, then for contributing towards their popular commotions. After all these punishments, they ordered all the Citizens of both Sexes, to appear together in the Palace-yard. The King sitting on his Throne, which was raised very high, the Chancellor de Orgemont shewed them the horror of their reiterated crimes, in such harsh terms, and terrible expressions, as seemed to bid them all prepare for death. They prostrated themselves upon the ground, the Ladies Ladies with dischevell'd Hair, the Men beating their Breasts, all crying out for Mercy. The Dukes of Berry and Burgundy fell on their knees before the King, who, as if he had been moved at their Prayers, did with his own Lips pronounce, that he did pardon them, and did commute the punishment they had deserved to pecuniary Mulcts and Fines.

This was the true meaning of all that Theatrical project; above one moiety of their Goods was now exacted from them; and then whilst their terror was yet upon them, the Imposts were again settled, and they were levied with unexpressible extortion. The other Cities were Treated in the like manner; and these vast sums went almost wholly into the pockets of the Nobility, who soon squandering them away again in foolish and vain expences, did in some sort justify those commotions, which they so horribly chastised.

The English perceived, but too late, the fault they had committed, in not supporting the Ghentois more early; and therefore the Truce being expir'd, they resolved to assist them. Urban founding his Trumpet of war in every corner against the Clementines, a Croisado had been preached up in England, whereof Henry Spencer Bishop of Norwich made himself Chief. Being landed at Calais, instead of attacking the French, he fell upon Flanders, pretending that Countrey belonged to the King of France, who was a Clementine.

The taking of Gravelin and a Battle he won nigh that place, over twelve thousand Flemmings, brought a terror upon the whole Countrey. After which, having had a re-inforcement from the Ghentois, he laid Siege to Ypres; but the King returning personally into Flanders with a powerful Army, drove him from that place, re-took and sacked Bergh, which the English had forsaken, and shut them up in Bourbourg; he might have taken them at discretion, had not the mediation of the Duke of Bretagne obtained them terms that were honourable enough. The History written by the Monk of St. Denis, speaks not a word of the Bishop of Norwich, but attributes this expedition to the Duke of Gloucester. However it were, he that Commanded was forced to go back into England without much credit, and almost without any of his Men.

This rebuke inclined the English to desire a Peace; Deputies on either side were sent to the Village of Lelighen, in the mid-way between Calais and Boulogne. The Duke of Lancaster would comprehend the Ghentois, and the Earl of Flanders opposed it: which caused the Conference to end only in a Truce from the Month of October, till St. Johns day following, of which it was allowed the Ghentois should be partakers.

The Earl at his going thence, having retir'd himself to St. Omers, was seized with a Malady, whereof he died the Three and twentieth of January, in the year 1384. this grief attending him to his death, that he beheld his Countrey laid in ashes, and glutted with the blood of his own Subjects. Perhaps it wounded his Heart to hear the Duke of Berry reproach him with most injurious terms; That his too obstinate revenge was cause of all those mischiefs. Philip I. Duke of Burgundy his Son-in-law succeeded him in all his Estates, and carried on the War against the Rebels, but with more mildness, and a design of reclaiming those stubborn Spirits, and bringing them to a true submission, rather by policy and perswasion, then by force.

During the Truce there were certain Troops of Robbers who ravaged all Guyenne. The Marechal of Sancerre, Governour of the Province, could not put up their Robberies, they having been so insolent as to attaque himself, wherefore he cut them all off. There was another rising of the Peasants, as cruel as those of the Jacquerie, who over-ran Poitou, Berry, and Auvergne, and most inhumanely butcher'd all those whose Hands were not hardned with Labour; they were named the Tuchins; their Leader was named Peter de la Bruyere. The Duke of Berry drew his Forces together, dispersed them, and put their Ring-leader to death, with many more of his Rustiques.

After the departure of the Duke of Anjou, the Duke of Berry and the Duke of Burgundy engrossed all Authority, but especially this last. The Duke of Bourbon finding he was not able to make head against him, quitted the Government of the Kings Person, and partly to perform a Vow he had made to go into the Holy-Land, went into Africk with the Count de Harcour, the Lord de la Tremouille, and other Lords and Gentlemen, to the number of Eight hundred, and a much greater number of Adventurers of divers Countries, with whom he signaliz'd his Courage and Conduct against the Moors of Barbary.

The King of Armenia Minor, sprung from the Blood of Luzignan, flying from the cruelty of the Turky who had conquer'd his Kingdom, and kept his Wife and Children in Captivity, came for relief, and assistance to the French Court, where the King gave him Honourable Entertainment during all the rest of his days. He enjoy'd it to the year 1404. then died at Paris, and was interred at the Celestines.

As to the Affairs of Naples, Charles de Duraz and his Captains, behaved themselves so well, that cutting off all Provisions from Lewis of Anjou, and either following, or flanking him, so as to prevent his Fighting them, they reduced him to the extremest want of all necessities, even of Cloaths; insomuch as this Prince, who had carried away all the Kings Treasure, had no more left him then a Coat of painted Cloth to wear, and one Silver Bowl to drink in. He had sent Peter de Craon, an Angevin Lord into France, to bring him Money and Succours; this faithless Friend made no haste to return, amusing himself at Venice with the divertisement of some Courtisans. After the unfortunate Prince had waited a long time without any tidings of him, he sunk under his grief, and died the Tenth day of October, in this year 1384. or as some others will have it, the One and twentieth day of September the year following.

"The Earl of Savoy died in the month of March, either of the Plague, or by "drinking Water out of a Fountain that had been poison'd. His Son Amé VII. Succeeded him. We must observe that this Amé VI. was the In-stitutor of the Order of the Collar, which was composed of Love-knots, together with the Symbolical Letters of the House of Savoy, and had at the end a kind of "a Ring, or wreathed Coronet. Duke Charles III. being at Chamberry, Anno 1518.
"changed the name of this Order to that of the Annunciado * to honour the Holy "Virgin in that mystery which is the most agreeable to her; adding Fifteen White "Roles to the Fifteen Love-knots, in remembrance of her Fifteen Joyes, and filled the "Pendant with Figures of the Annunciation.

The unhappy remnants of the Duke of Anjou's Army perish'd by Famine and Want, excepting such as dispersing by small parties, retired into France, begging their livelihood, and receiving more injuries, and opprobrious words in their Travels, then they got bits of Bread.

1385.

The Angevin party was not for all this quite extinct in that Kingdom, it subsisted yet in the hearts of some Lords of that Countrey, whereof Thomas de St. Severin was the Chief, and who afterwards served very well upon occasion. For this time the Kingdom rested quietly under Charles de Duraz.

The Truce with the English being expired, the King, who began to take cognizance of his Affairs, held a grand Council, to deliberate whether they ought to continue it. It was the interest of the Duke of Burgundy, because of his Low-Countries, to have a Peace with the English; but to counterpoise his Power, and to flatter the young Kings heat, they resolv'd on a War, and even to carry it into their own Countrey. To this purpose they fitted up a great Fleet at Sluce, and they sent to the Scots to oblige them to a rupture of the Truce on their side.

By the methods the Kings Uncles Governed, it appeared plainly, they had a mind to suck the Peoples Blood to the very last drop. The Clergy, that they might secure something for their subsistence, held an Assembly, where they decreed that their Revenues should be divided into three parts, the one to be for the maintenance of the Churches, the other for Ecclesiastical Persons, and the Third for the King, without any mention of the Poor.

Pursuant to the recommendation of the late King Charles the Wise, the young Kings Uncles sought a Wife for him in Germany; the opinions in Council were different and divided, the Duke of Burgundy carried it for Isabella, Daughter of Stephen Duke of Bavaria, Count Palatine of the Rhine. The King Married her at Amiens the . . . of July. In the preceding month of April, the Nuptials between John the Duke of Burgundy's Son, and Marguerite, Daughter of Albert Duke of Bavaria; Earl of Hainault, Holland and Zealand were consummate.

"The great design upon England being laid aside, after a vast expence, that something might come of it, John de Vienne Admiral, went with Threescore Sail to Scotland, and there landed to attack the English on that side. He made an irruption into their Countrey and took some Castles, but the savage humour of the Scots, could not comply with the free liberty of the French. Besides, Love had invaded the Admirals Heart and Head, which made him court a Lady of the Kings Parentage; whereat that whole whole Court, not being acquainted with those Gallantries, took such offence, that he found it the best way to make his escape with all diligence.

The obstinate Ghentois would not yet bend, they had two new Leaders, Francion and Atreman, who hardned them against all apprehensions of punishment: This obliged the King to make a third step into Flanders. They had no Port could receive any English Succours but Damm, the King having taken that by force, and afterwards burning all the Houses round about their City; the Rebels in the end began to hearken to Propositions for an accommodation, being inclined by the more pacifique humour of Atreman, one of their new Chiefs, in despite of all the practices of John du Bois, and returned to the obedience of the King, and the Duke of Burgundy their Lord.

This Prince quite wearied with this tedious War which ruined all his Countrey, gave them a general Amnesty for all things that were past, and the confirmation of all their privileges, upon condition they would renounce all Leagues, and that the first that should violate the Peace, might forfeit his Life and all his Goods. The Treaty was Signed the Eighteenth of December.

A Truce was renewed likewise between France and England for some Months.

Charles de Duraz, not being satisfied with having invaded the Kingdom of Naples, went also into Hungary and usurped that upon Mary, one of the Daughters of Lewis the Great his Benefactor, who died Anno 1381. and Wife to Sigismund, Brother of the Emperor Wenceslaus, whom he detained in captivity with the Widow Queen his Mother. After so many Treacheries and cruel Ingratitudes, Heaven suffer'd him to be murder'd himself, by the order of Nicholas Gato, one of the Palatines of that Kingdom, who was very affectionate to the Princesses, which hapned the Sixth day of January, in the year 1386.

The same year the Widow-Queen and her Daughter going into the Countrey, fell into the hands of Horvat, Governour of Croatia, one of King Charles's Partisans or Confederates, who to revenge the death of his Master, caused the Widow and the Murderer Gato to be massacred. He kept the Princess some time, then sent her to Sigismund, having first obliged her by all sorts of Oaths to pardon him. Sigismund did not think himself bound by her promises, and therefore having surprized him, made him dye amidst a thousand torments.

The news of Charles's Murder being brought into Italy, Thomas de Sanseverin caus'd Lewis II. eldest Son of the deceased Duke of Anjou, to be proclaimed King, and Clement VII. to be owned Pope. Afterwards Marguerite the Widow of Charles being retired to Cajeta with Ladislaus or Lancelot her Son, aged about Ten years, he reduced almost the whole Kingdom, and Naples it self. Thus all things went on smoothly for Lewis, till Mary de Blois his Mother and Governess, having sent Clement de Montjoye, Nephew to Pope Clement, with the Title and Authority of Vice-Roy, the Sanseverins thinking themselves under-valued, were alienated from her Service, and turned to Ladislaus.

In the mean while Lewis was put into possession of Provence, and invested with the Kingdom of Naples by Clement, but it was not without great trouble, before the Provençaux would acknowledge him: the Kings Council themselves inciting them underhand to a Rebellion upon divers motives, because they would have disposed them to give themselves up to France.

After Five or Six years Truces and petty Wars, the Council resolv'd to attack the English, not in Guyenne only, but even in their own Island. For this end they made the most formidable preparations of Men, Engines, and Ships, that ever yet were seen. They bought up or hired all the Vessels they could light on, from the Ports of Sweden to those in Flanders; they built a City of Wood which was to be taken in pieces, to shelter themselves upon their Landing. The King went to Sluyce to take a view of his Army and Navy, consisting in Nine hundred Vessels. The Duke of Berry's envy and jealousy retarded the progress; he would needs break the design, because he was not the contriver. In order to which he made them wait for him till the Fourteenth of September, when the Seas began to appear un-navigable. So the Forces drew off into Quarters, part of this numerous Fleet were scattered by Tempests; the English pickt up many that were wrack'd, or stragled.

There was no reason to trust the Duke of Bretagne too much, because of his too many Obligations to the English, and the consideration that their suppression must be his ruine: wherefore they warily minded his actions: but he to justify himself, laid Siege to Brest, which they yet held as a bridle to Bretagne. The Constable assisted him in the undertaking, the place was mightily streightned; but when they were at the last gaspe, the Duke of Lancaster who was going into Spain with great Forces, made them raise the Siege.

The occasion of his voyage was this, Ferdinand, last King of Portugal had no Child, but a Daughter born of a Lady whom he had taken from her Husband. He caused this Girl to be owned as his presumptive Heyress; as likewise the Mother had been owned Queen, and married her to John King of Castille, who was a Widow and had two Sons; but when he died, the principal Cities of Portugal apprehending the Castilian bondage, had more mind to have a bastard Brother of Ferdinands for their King, his Name was John. Froissard names him Denis thorow a mistake, instead of saying he was Grand Master of the Order D' Avis.

The fortune of the War was favourable to the Bastard, he gained a Battle at Jubero against his adversaries, the Castilians having out of an ugly jealousy, suffer'd the Gascous and French to be defeated, who took their part with above Eight thousand Men, and then were afterwards themselves defeated. Notwithstanding this advantage, it was to be feared the Castilian would be able yet to crush them, and therefore the Bastard sent to the Duke of Lancaster, inviting him to come and pursue the right he had to the Kingdom of Castille; as on the other hand the Castilian had recourse to France.

1386. The Duke of Lancaster passed therefore into those Countreys with a huge force, conquer'd a part of Castille, and struck such a terror into all the rest, that King John made some overtures of Peace; but he spun out the Treaty awhile, expecting the French succours: when he found those did not come, the Duke of Bourbon their Conductor marching very slowly, he concluded the Treaty; the Duke of Lancaster Sealed it by the Marriage of two of his Daughters; one with the King of Portugal, and the other with the Castilians eldest Son.

This little piece of Honour cost the English very dear, the losses they suffer'd by contagious Sicknesses in Spain, and afterwards by Storms in their return, were so great, that the Duke of Lancaster hardly carried home the sixth part of his Men, and not one but in a languishing condition, half dead with malady and pain.

At last by a just punishment from Heaven, Charles the Wicked, who had blown up so many flames, and burnt so many entrails with his violent poysons, was most cruelly burnt himself. He had caused his Body to be wrapp'd all over with Sheets drenched in Spirit of Wine and Sulphur, to corroborate the natural heat decay'd by his debauches; this took fire, I know not by what accident, and broiled him to the very bones, whereof he died three days after, being the First of January, in the year 1387. Charles, called the Noble, his Son succeeded him.

1387. The Constable Cliffon, and the Admiral John de Vienne, had so fill'd the King's Head with the expedition for England, that he makes another preparation to execute it this year. The state of Affairs was very favourable, all England was in combustion against King Richard, because he had put mean and vile People into places of the highest Trust who bear all the sway, which his Uncles could not endure, nor indeed would they have the Power lodged in any other hands but their own.

Now when France was on the point of making advantage of these troubles, the Duke of Bretagne, either of intelligence with the English, or without thinking of them, was cause of interrupting the Enterprize this time, as it had been formerly. Cliffon was then in Bretagne, to dispatch the Forces that were at Treguier, that they might go and joyn with those at Sluyce: but at the same time he was Treating of the Marriage of one of his Daughters, with John the Son of Charles de Blois, whom he had purposely got out of the hands of the English, where he had been detained ever since the time his Father Charles had left him there in hostage.

1387. The Duke, not without cause, imagined that this Alliance was making with design to disturb him in the possession of his Dutchy. He sent for the Lords of the Countrey of Vennes, under a pretence of holding a great Council. Cliffon goes thither with his Train; after Dinner the Duke carrying him to see his Castle de P'Ermine, which he was building by the Sea-side; he caused him to be stopt in a Tower, and Beaumanoir with him, and commanded Bavalan, who was Captain of the Castle, to throw them by night into the Sea.

The faithful disobedience of this good Servant, gave the Duke his Master time to repent his having given Command for the death of the Constable; and the intercession of the Lord de Laval, who at the peril of his Life, would never forsake his Brother-in-law; drew him out of prison, upon condition of paying the sum of One hundred thousand Franks, and the surrendring of three Castles. But Cliffon would not forgive as the Duke had forgiven; and the King taking this affront done to his prime Officers much to heart, sent for the Duke to give an account of his actions.

The King went to Orleans expressly, the Duke having made them wait for him a long time, sent to be excused; Cliffon pleaded his own Cause, accused him of Treason, and threw down his gage of Battle, which no body took up. The Duke taking the advice of the Barons, came at length to Paris, and by the favour of the Dukes of Berry and Burgundy, was kindly received by the King, and in some measure, made friends with the Constable, by restoring him both his Money and his Castles.

"That question so much debated, touching the conception of the Sacred Virgin Mother, was begun in the last age amongst the Professors of Divinity. The Jacobins, according to the opinion of their St. Thomas, and their Albertus the Great, maintained, that she had not been exempt of the original stain. The Cordeliers their perpetual antagonists, took occasion upon this point to fall foul upon them, as if they did denigrate the Honour of the Mother of God. The common People, and such as were most zealous, applauded these last; and most part of the Prelates and the Universities adhered to them; but the Jacobins standing up too stiffly against the Torrent, fell under the Peoples hatred, and the reputation of being Heretiques. One of their principal Doctors, named John de Moncon, for having Preached too freely on that point, was condemned solemnly by the Bishop of Paris, and then by the Pope himself, before whom he had brought his Appeal. Which was more, the University forbid them the Pulpit, and cut them off from their Body, to which they were not rejoined till the year 1403. And in the mean time they were to undergoe the indignation of the Court, the shoutings of the common People, and which was worst, great necessity.

William the Son of the Earl of Juliers, and who was Duke of Guelders by his Mother, Daughter of Duke Renauld the I. of that name, had some contest or wrangle with the Duke of Burgundy, who supported the Dutcheffs of Brabant, whom he was to succeed in the detention of certain places of Guelders, which Renauld had otherwise engaged. Now because the Burgundian employed the Forces of France against him, this petit Duke, truly generous and magnanimous, but rash in this point had the confidence to declare * a War against the King, who had twenty Lords in his Train more powerful and considerable then he.

1388.

His bold bragging did not last long, the King fell on a suddain upon the Countrey of Juliers. The Father much astonished disowns his Son, to turn away the storm, demands Peace by the Arch-Bishop of Colens means, and offers his Homage. The Army therefore quits his Territory, and goes into that of Guelders; the young Duke persists a month longer in his obstinacy. In the end the Duke of Burgundy perswades him to crave pardon. Being come to wait upon the King, he disowned his Challenge, though Sealed with his own Seal, and submits, and refers the Disputes he had with the Dutcheffs of Brabant, to him; but did not renounce his Alliance with the English; nevertheless he was presented with such noble Gifts, as proved a temptation to the rest of the Germans, to engage them to the service of France.

* As little ones as he had done it formerly, but they were not alone.

The King had attained to the age of Twenty years, wherefore upon the Proposition which Peter Aisselin de Montaignu, Bishop of Laon, made in Council, he declared that he would take the administration of the Government into his own hands, and that he discharged his Uncles. He kept the Duke of Orleans his Brother near him; the Author of this Counsel, and the Duke of Bourbon not suspected by this Duke, and one whose sincerity was likely to give a fair prospect of good success to the Government. The other two withdrew in discontent. The suddain death of the Cardinal de Laon, which hapned soon after, was held in the opinion of many, for an effect of their resentment.

When the King first began to apply himself to take cognizance of his Affairs, the face of the whole Government looked with a better countenance for some little time. The King made choice of a new Council, wherein three Citizens, Bureau de la Riviere, John le Mercier Sieur de Novian, and John de Montaignu had the best part. He afterwards took off all the new Imposts, set aside the theiving Officers whom the Princes had put in, gave the Provostship which he had newly restor'd, to John Jouvenal the Advocate, an honest Man, Wise and Courageous; that of First Prelident to Ouchard des Moulins, sent all the Prelats to reside on their Benefices; and to have time to heal the Kingdom, whose very Bowels were torn and mangled, made a Truce for three years with the English.

During this calme, he diverted himself with actions of pomp and ceremony; at St. Denis; the Knighthood of Lewis II. King of Sicilia, and Charles Earl of Mayne his Brother, with Tournaments and Tiltings very stately: after that the Funeral of Bertrand de Gueselin, at Melun, the Marriage of his Brother Lewis with Valentine, Daughter of John Galeazzo Duke of Milan, and Earl de Vertus in Champagne; and at Paris in the Holy Chappel, the Coronation of the Queen his Wife.

The Marriage of Lewis his only Brother with Valentine, was in Treaty, Anno 1386. and consummate this year; she brought him in Dower Four hundred thousand Florins of Gold: the County of Ast to be enjoyed from that hour; and that of Vertus in Champagne after the death of the Father, with Rings and Jewels of an inestimable value. These huge sums enabled the young Prince to make great Purchases; These Acquisitions, and the greediness of his Wife inflamed his covetousness, as his birth and quality, inspired him with pomp and magnificence. So that being possessed with two contrary passions, of getting and spending, he succeeded his Uncle the Duke of Anjou, and even exceeded him in the unjust desire of pillaging the Kingdom, and snatching away the Goods of other People.

Upon the Popes intreaty the King made a journey to Avignon, where he was present at the Coronation of Lewis of Anjou, by the Popes hands. From thence he went into Languedoc, where he took information of the Duke of Berry's exactions, of which he heard daily complaints. They punished this Prince in his Ministers, by casting out several of the worst Officers, and making the Process of John Berisac, principal Counsellor and Minister of his violence. He was burnt alive for a crime against nature; and this was a Bon-fire to the People, whom he had most horribly vexed and abused.

From Toulouze the King went into the Countrey of Foix. Gaston Phebus received him magnificently, and having rendered him homage for his Countrey, intreated him that he would be his Heir; which was to deprive Matthew Vicount de Castelbon his Cousin-german by the Father, of his Succession, and get some share of it to fall upon his natural Son.

At his return he took away the Government of Languedoc from the Duke of Berry, and bestowed it upon the Lord de Chevrense; but five years after he restored it again to him, as he was going to make War upon the Duke of Bretagne.

A Second time the Duke of Bourbon, upon a request the Genoese made to the King, for his assistance against the Barbarians of Tunis, who by their continual Piracies, interrupted all manner of Trade, fitted out a Fleet, wherein were Five hundred Men at Arms, all Knights or Esquires, and a great number of Cross-bow Men. Philip de Artois Earl of Eu, the Count de Harcour, the Admiral John de Vienne, Charles Sire d'Abret were Volunteers; the Earl of Derby, Son to the Duke of Lancaster would needs be amongst them, with some Forces made up of his own Countrey-men. Being joyned with the Genoese, they laid Siege to the City of Carthage, at that time the Bulwark of the Kingdom of Tunis. The enterprize was greater then their Forces; at six weeks end they found themselves so disordered through the heats of the Climate, Labour and Wounds, that although they had gained a great Battle, yet they lost either their hopes or courage, and re-embarked again: the Genoese only had the craft to take advantage of the King of Tunis, by a private Treaty for liberty to Traffique.

To continue the abatement of Imposts, they ought to have retrench'd their expences at Court, and the cupidity of the Ministers, but both of these rather increasing then diminishing, their exactions were renewed. An honest Hermit the preceding year came to the King, commanding him in the name of God, not to oppress his Subjects. The words and admonitions of this poor Man, contemptible in the eyes of the Court, having wrought no effect, Heaven it self would make use of a more powerful voice, and express'd it self in wrath. About the midst of July, while the Council were assembled at St. Germans en Laye, to settle some new Impositions, the King and Queen being the same instant at Mais, on a sudden there arose such a dreadful storm of Wind, Hail and Thunder, as almost beat the Castle about the ears of those evil Counsellors, and so terrify'd them, they durst not go forward with their projects.

* Lame is to say Lame, the vulgar say Tamberlan.

"The Turks made mighty progress in Europe, Sultan Amurat gained a bloody Battle in the Plains of Cosm, against the Kings of Servia, Bosnia, and Bulgaria but he perished there; Bajazet his Son, Surnamed the Thunder-bolt succeeded him. About the same time *Themir-lanc King of the Tartars raised himself to great power.

Lewis

Lewis the Kings Brother, buys the County of Blois, and that of Dunois, or Chateaudun, with some other Lands of Earl Guy, who had no Children. He likewise got of the King the Duchy of Orleans, notwithstanding all the Remonstrances the Burghers of that City made, by the mouth of their Bishop.

The chief ground of the mortal feud between the Houses of Orleans and Burgundy, was their disputes for the Government. Having been raked up now for a while, this year it began to break forth anew. The Duke of Orleans pretended to the administration, as being nearest related, and arrived at the age of Twenty years: but the Estates being assembled at Paris, gave their opinion for the Duke of Burgundy.

Gaston Phebus Earl of Foix, who bare the name and devise of the Sun, and who was so renowned for his Victories, his Generosity, his Buildings, his Magnificence, and his Train and Equipage equal to that of a King, died suddenly as they were filling Water for him to wash his Hands before Supper, after his return from Hunting. He had made a Gift of his County to the King, who not desiring to be beneath him in generosity, returned it to his Bastard-Son.

From whence soe're it came, or whose fault soe're it was, the Treaty between the Duke of Bretagne and Cliffon was broken. The Duke was infinitely troubled that France should support his Subject against him, and make a private Gentleman equal with him. The King sent for both of them to Court, the Duke far from coming thither, renewed his antient Alliances with England. Upon this day they dispatch the Duke of Berry, Peter de Navarre, and divers other Lords to him, to complain of the correspondence he held with strangers, his Coyning of Moneys, and making his Subjects give their Oaths to him, and against all others.

He imagined this stately Embassy was only to stir up his People, and was upon the point to seize on all of them as a pawn for his better security. His Wife having some hint of it, though she were great with Child, and at that time half undress'd, took up her Children in her Arms, found him out, and by the powerful influence and rhetoric of her Prayers and Tears, made him change his mind and resolution: She farther prevailed with him to go to Tours where the King was; but he came with Six hundred Gentlemen, and under the protection of the Duke of Burgundy his good Cousin. The King Treated him very civilly, and desired nothing more of him, but only that he would pay the remainder of the hundred thousand Franc's to the Constable, and give up some places to the Earl of Pontieu.

"*John Galeazzo Viscount, had usurped the Seignury of Milan upon Bernard his Uncle, whom he put to death in prison, and had deprived his Son Charles, and a Daughter married to Bernard, Brother to the Earl of Armagnac of his Succession. This Earl for his Brothers sake, and upon the intreaty of the Florentines and Bolognians, whom Galeazzo oppressed, marched into Lombardy to make War upon him. Being more courageous then he, he kept the Field some time; but being less crafty, he fell into an Ambuscade near Alexandria, and was wounded to death; after which, his whole Army was dispersed, and dwindled to nothing.

* Or Galeaze.

The great desire the two Kings, Charles and Richard had, to joyn their Forces against the Turks, brought the Duke of Lancaster to a Conference with King Charles at Amiens, but the Propositions were so high on the English side, that the result at last was only a Truce for a year.

1392.

The more the authority of the Constable and his three dependants was confirmed, the more grievous was their power to the People. The King's Uncles fretted, and grew enrag'd, the Clergy betrayed by some of the Chief of their own Body, were on the brink of losing their immunities, had not the University, from whom they were also taking away all their Priviledges, bestir'd themselves, and put a stop to all School-Exercises and Preaching. When they observed that all Foreigners went away from Paris, and that such an Interdiction made a great noise all over Europe, even those that had undertaken the ruine of that Body, would needs have the honour of procuring them an Audience of the King, who did them justice upon their Complaints.

"The Support and Priviledges the Kings, ever since the time of Lewis the Great, had granted to this famous University, the Mother of all the rest that are in Europe; the infinite numbers of Students that came thither from the remotest Countreys, the strict adherence of the whole Clergy to them, to whom they were a Nursery and Seminary, and the Authority their Faculty of Divinity had acquired,

"to

"to judge of Doctrine, and Matters thereto relating, had rendred them so considerable, that in times of confusion they were called to consult in all Affairs of Importance; if not, they took upon them to make Remonstrances, and knew how to oblige others to follow them.

1392.

Peter de Craon was notoriously guilty of the loss of Lewis Duke of Anjou his Lord, the Duke of Berry had threatned to have him hang'd for it; yet he was no less regarded at Court, where the splendor of Birth and Riches, easily covers baseness and crimes. It hapned that he fell into disgrace with the Duke of Orleans, he fancied the Constable had done him that ill Office; he resolv'd upon revenge: and one Evening, the Thirteenth of June, as he was coming from the King, Assassinated him in St. Catherine's street, being assisted by Twenty Russians whom he had gotten together in his House *. He afterwards easily escaped out of Paris, the Gates having been always left open, ever since the Constable had caused them to be taken down upon his return from Flanders.

* Hofel or Inc., as Great Mens Dwellings are called.

These wounds did not prove the death of the Constable, but they were the ruine of Craon. Three of the Murderers being discover'd and taken, were beheaded, his Goods confiscated and given to the Duke of Orleans; his House turned into a Churchyard for St. John's in Greve, and his stately Seats in the Countrey demolished. He could save nothing but his Person, by flying to the Duke of Bretagne, who kept him carefully conceal'd. Some years after the King granted his Pardon, upon the request of the Duke of Orleans.

When the Constable began to recover of his wounds, both those that were his friends, and such as were no way concerned, called earnestly upon the King to punish this attempt. There was upon this, Command sent to the Duke to deliver up the Assassin, he denies him to be in that Countrey; The Ministers exasperate the King, and perswade him to march towards Bretagne to destroy the Duke. In vain did his Uncles urge that this was but a private quarrel, which ought to be legally determined by the ordinary ways and methods of Justice, and that it was against the common Rights of Mankind, to fall upon the Duke of Bretagne, before he was proved Guilty or Condemned; they could not alter that Resolution.

Marching in the Sun-shine and great heats of weather in August, his Brain already much weakned with the debauchery of his youth, was discomposed with black and noxious vapours. Two unexpected, but frightful objects, heightened and hastned his phrensy. One day as he was going out of Manse, passing thorough a Wood, there came forth a tall black fellow, all weather-beaten and ragged, who laid hold of his Horses Bridle, bawling out, Stop King, Whither goest thou, thou art betray'd, then vanish'd. Soon after a Page who carried a Lance sleeping on horseback, let it fall upon a Helmet which another carried before him. At this shrill noise, and the sight of the posture of the Lance, the Apparition or Fantasmie, and its threatnings came fresh into his mind, his Fancy was disturbed, he imagines they were going to deliver him up to his enemy, and believed all those that were about him to be Traitors. This puts him into a violent fit of Fury, he runs, strikes, kills without Rime or Reason, till he fell into a Swoon. They carry him bound in a Chariot back to Manse.

Witchcrafts and Poysonings were so frequent in those days, that it was believed, his malady proceeded from some such Cause. The third day he recover'd his Senses, and by little and little his Strength (which was attributed to the publick Prayers made for him,) but not the full vigor of his understanding. In this disorder his Uncle resumed the Government, conducted him back to Paris, seized upon the three Citizen Favourites, who having undergone three Months imprisonment, with the continual fear of being led to execution, as was threatned, were set at liberty by the Kings Command, who ordered the greatest part of their Goods to be restored: but declared them for ever incapable of holding any Office-Royal. The Constable was so fortunate as to make his escape to his own Countrey in Bretagne, where he most bravely defended himself against the Duke, by the assistance of the Duke of Orleans and the rest of his friends. The Princes gave his Office to Philip of Artois Earl of Eu. All Offices being as then but Commissions, which were revocable.

* Chartreux.

Urban the Pope of Rome died in the Month of October, Anno 1389. Boniface IX. succeeded him; this Pope shewed himself to be very much inclined to re-unite the Church, dispatched a * Frier to Clement, to consult of some method to bring it about, Clement puts him in prison, but the University exclaimed so, that he released him.

Clement

Clement was therefore compell'd to feign, that he had a desire to put an end to that Schism. But when the University had declared, it was impossible to be effected without the renunciation of both Competitors, he and the Duke of Berry who took his part, highly broke off the Proposition. But they could never stop the mouth of that Mother of all Learning and Piety, from crying out against that scandal, which so afflicted the whole Church.

The 29th of January at the Nuptials of a Lady, belonging to the Queen, while the King and some young Lords were Dancing a Mascarade cloathed like Bears, the Duke of Orleans holding down a Flambeau to discover their Faces, set Fire to the Tow which was fastned upon the Bear-Skins with some kind of Glue. The Hall was in an instant fill'd with Flames, Shreeks, and the astonishment of all the Presence, they almost crouded themselves to death for haste to get out all together; some cried aloud, Save the King; the Dutches of Berry cover'd him with her Gown, which being clapp'd close about him, preserv'd him from that torrent of Fire; Three of those Masqueraders were most miserably broiled. The Parisians hated the Duke of Orleans to death for it, as if it had been a premeditated design, he durst not appear for several days; and to expiate that fault, he founded a Chappel at the Celestines.

This accident did somewhat discompose the Kings health, who was before it, pretty well recover'd; however, the strength of his age and constitution, or the Vows and Pilgrimages he made in Person, as other devout People did for him, did again restore him to a better temper and state: inasmuch as his Uncles having a Rendezvous at Lellinghan, between Ardes and Guisnes, to Treat about a Peace with the Crown of England, in whose behalf the Duke of Lancaster was commissioned; perswaded Lancaster to go to Abbeville, that the English might be satisfied how well he was. But he relapsed into his phrensy the Twentieth day of June, which held him till the Month of January following. They had recourse to Prayers, Fasting, Processions, the ablest Physicians, then Mountebanks, and even to Magicians. All this was in vain, the distemper lasted as long as his life, not continually, but at several times and Fits, and still worse and worse, they drawing him into great debaucheries and disorders in his better intervals.

They did not know well whom to lay the blame upon; the Jews were for the Seventh time enjoyned to quit the Kingdom, or their Religion, and become Christians: some chose to forsake their Religion rather than that Countrey, others sold all they had and went away.

The University continued the pursuit they had began, with mighty earnestness, the King being pleased with it, they held a great Assembly, wherin above Ten thousand of their Members gave their Suffrages in Writing, which tended to bring the Popes to one of these three things, either a Cession, or a mutual promise of Arbitration, or the Decision by a Council. And Nicholas de Clamengis, Batchelor in Divinity, a Man very eloquent, was ordered to compose a Discourse to the King, in an Epistolary Form, to which receiving no favourable answer, they put a Second stop to all their Exercises.

The new Constable, for want of other employment, had leave of the King to go into Hungary to make War upon the Turks, who having withdrawn themselves, the Hungarians employ'd him against the Patarins, these were a kind of Sectaries that were esteemed Heretiques.

1393.

Upon the Remonstrances of considering and prudent People, who laid open the ill consequences of Gaming, ever attended with idleness, the ruine of the richest Families, slinking, swearing, and even blasphemy: the Council set forth an Edict, prohibiting all sorts of sports, but that of the Long-Bow and Cross-Bows. The Courtiers, a very idle sort of People, and such as often neglect to acquire any other stock of virtuous knowledge, whereby to make better use of their spare hours, were concerned at this prohibition, as if it had been a business of great weight, and much to their prejudice, never leaving their intrigues, till they had got it to be repeal'd.

1394.

The free and bold Remonstrances of the University of Paris, being carried to Pope Clement, and read against his will by the Cardinals assembled, made him die through rage and displeasure. This news being brought to Court, the King wrote speedily to the Cardinals, to forbear the Election of a new Pope: but they guessing what his Letters imported before they open'd them, immediately proceeded and named Peter de Luna an Arragonian, who took the Name of Benedict * XIII. Before this Election they took an Oath to labour all they could to heal up this Schism, and that whoever were chosen, should be obliged to lay it down again, if it were judged judged necessary. Peter de Luna confirmed this Oath, and at the first shewed himself well inclined to do so.

* Or Benedict.

1394. Upon this ground the King called an Assembly of the Prelats of France in his Palace; who concluded all unanimously, that a Cession was the most certain, and the most easie method. The Dukes of Orleans, of Berry, and of Burgundy, with Ambassadors from the King, and some Deputies from the University, went to Bennet at Avignon, to propound this expedient to him. Of his Fifteen Cardinals there was but one that withstood it; they therefore pressed him to condescend. He avoided it by a thousand wiles, and did so tire the Princes with his delays and evasions, that they returned again without obtaining any thing; and likewise without taking their leave; nevertheless he stopp'd their Mouths, and pacified them, by granting them power to raise another Tenth.

1395. King Richard and his Uncles, Lancaster and Glocester, were in mortal jealousies of each other for the reasons above-mentioned. Richard desiring to strengthen himself against them, demanded the Kings Daughter Isabella in Marriage, aged but Seven years. This was agreed unto, with the prolongation of the Truce for Twenty eight years. The Marriage was performed by Proxy.

The King relapsed for the third time into his former distemper; Some days he appeared to be quite stupify'd, at other times he would cry out as if they pricked him with a thousand Bodkins. He forgot his own quality and Name, and could not endure the sight of his Wife, but would suffer himself very patiently to be Governed by the Dutcheffs of Orleans; for which reason the common people would needs be perswaded that Italian had bewitched him. Indeed the Duke her Husband had the reputation of seeking for, and conversing with Magicians. The less credulous might well enough imagine, that she charmed the King with something that was a more natural spell, much like to those wherewith the Duke Governed the Queens mind. However it were, fearing the foolish multitude should do her some mischief, her Husband sent her for a while to Chasteau-neuf upon the Loire.

1396. In his best intervals, the King labour'd with all his might towards the re-union of the Church, using all his interest with the Christian Princes for that end. Divers Princes of Germany, the Kings of Hungary, Castille, Aragon, and Navarre, offer'd to joyn with him for the Cession; the English were for the having it to be determined by a Council. Benedict flatter'd and soothed them all, and promised one thing to one, and the quite contrary to another; his greatest care and drift being to keep them from agreeing all together upon one method, or expedient.

1396. The Gallican Church did not allow of Confessors to such as were condemned to suffer death by the Law; in this particular she followed the usage of the antient Canons, which did not admit to the Communion those that were branded with enormous crimes. The Monk of St. Denis observes in this year, that Charles the VI. was the first that granted them this favour, and says, the honour of obtaining it, was attributed to Peter de Craon, because he set up a Cross of Stone nigh Montfaucon, where those poor wretches use to make a stop to be confessed. In those times they did not hang any criminal within their Cities, they would have been thought too much polluted by that infamous execution, but they cut off their Heads. In many places they led the condemned persons on foot to the Gallows, and that before break of day.

1396. The Seignery of Genoa, rather then submit to the command of John Galeazzo, Viscount of Milan, put themselves under obedience of the King, and transferr'd all the right of propriety they had to him. The Kings Commissioners left the Government to the Doge or Duke, after he had first resigned his Power and Dignity into their hands; but in a little time they gave that Command to Boucicaut.

The Factions in that Seignery had very near destroyed and brought it to nought; The City was filled only with Robbers and Murderers, the Noblest were banished thence, Merchants durst not open their Bank, those most in power made War upon each other from street to street, and had raised Towers at each corner of their Palaces, to defend themselves. The Marechal desiring to settle some Order, and his own Authority amongst them, commanded they should bring all their Arms into his Palace, forbad all Assemblies, cut off the Head of Boccanegra, and a dozen or fifteen more of the most Factious, made strict inquiry after such as had committed notorious crimes, raised and entertained several Companies that kept Guards in all the Markets and publique places, and built two Castles which had communication, with each other, the one named the Darse at the mouth of the Port, the other in the City, called the Chasteles.

The

The Twenty seventh of October was appointed for the stately and magnificent interview of the two Kings upon the confines of their Territories, between Ardres and Calais, where they confirmed the Truce. The King of England espoused the Daughter of France, and rendred up Brest to the Duke of Bretagne, and Cherbourg to the King of Navarre: who three years afterwards sold it to the King.

"France having granted succors to the King of Hungary against Bajazeth, the Duke of Burgundy gave them John Earl of Nevers his Son to be their Leader. He had in his Army Two thousand Gentlemen of quality, besides the Earl of Eu Constable, Admiral John de Nienne, John le Maingre-Boucicaut Marechal of France, Henry and Philip, Sons of the Duke of Bar, Guy de la Trimouille his Fathers Favourite, and other Lords.

At first they performed such valiant acts, as are almost incredible, but their follies and dissolute lives, did after render them ridiculous to the very Turks. Besides, their presumption swoln by success, engaged them with the Hungarians in the Siege of Nicopolis, and then in a Battle the Twenty eighth of September, where the Hungarians not caring to second them as they ought, they were all cut off, or taken prisoners. Bajazeth caused above Six hundred to be hewed in pieces, in presence of the Earl of Nevers; and having made him dye almost as often with his threats and terrors, he reserved him with Fifteen more of the great Lords, for whose Ransom he obliged himself to pay Two hundred thousand Ducats. That sum being made good to them five Months afterwards, they were all set at liberty. The Earl of Nevers arrived in France about the end of March following. It is said that Bajazeth was so far from taking any Oath, that he should never make War again upon the Turks, that he exhorted him to take his revenge, and promised he should ever find him in the Field ready to give him any satisfaction.

The King was seized with the Fourth Fit of his Malady more severely then all the former had been. He recover'd it again, but was ever after troubled with it, at least three or four times each year.

The Earl of Eu dying in his imprisonment amongst the Turks, the Earl of Sancerre who was a Marechal of France, was honoured with the Office of Constable.

"We must observe, the better to understand what we shall relate hereafter, that this year King Richard, for some conspiracy, whether real or pretended, put his Uncle the Duke of Gloucester to death, as also the Earl of Arundel, and divers other Lords; and banished the Earl of Derby Son to the Duke of Lancaster, who sheltered himself in France, and began to Reign very tyrannically.

The Emperour Wenceslaus, King of Bohemia took a fancy, for what reason I know not, to visit the Court of France; the King went to meet him as far as the City of Rheims; this was in the Month of March, and received him with as much magnificence as affection. That Prince shewed his brutality the very second day the King had invited him to Dinner; and when the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon went to fetch him from his own Lodgings, they found he was already drunk, and taking his Nap to refresh himself, and digest his load of Wine.

Next day the King Treated him, the Entertainment and Mirth had lasted longer, if the King had not found a Fit coming upon him, which brought him back to Paris. He left the Duke of Orleans with him to keep him company, and confer with him about the means of putting an end to the Schism.

The Kings Council being weary of Bennets playing fast and loose, and daily disappointments, did decree, according as they were advised, by a great Assembly of Bishops, Abbots, and Deputies of the Universities, that the whole Kingdom should be subtracted from his Obedience, till he would condescend to the Session propounded; and that in the mean while the Gallican Church, conformable to her antient liberty should be governed by her Ordinaries, according to the Holy Canons.

Bennets Cardinals approved of this subtraction, and forsook him, retiring themselves to the new Town of Avignon: but he stood it out, and having gotten some Aragonian Soldiers to serve him for a Guard, shut himself in the Palace of Avignon. The Marechal Boucicaut had order from the King to besiege him there; he acquitted himself faithfully, and pent him up so close, that in a few days he would have been reduced to want of Provisions, when order came to him from Court to change the Siege into a Blockade, and suffer refreshments to be carried in. Bennets Artifice and his Money had gained some of the Grandees who contrived this for him. 1398. The Earl of Perigord, Archambaud Taleyrand, tormenting the Countrey with the help of the English, to whom he had ally'd himself, and especially the City of Periguenx which belonged to the King, was forced in his Castle of Montagnac, brought to the Parliament and condemned to death. The King gave him pardon for his life, but bestowed his forfeited Estate upon the Duke of Orleans.

Archambaud de Grailly Capit de Buch, having a Right to the Earldom of Foix, as having married the Sister of Earl Matthew, dead without Children, got into possession of it by the Sword. The King would not endure this, because he was a Vassal to the English, and from Father to Son very affectionate to that party. He therefore sent the Mareschal de Sancerre, who pursued him so close, that he was compell'd to desire a Cessation, during which he came to the King, and submitted himself to the judgment of the Parliament, giving up in the mean time, his two Sons in Hostage. The Parliament declared in his favour, conditionally he would relinquish the English; and the King put him in possession. This was in the year 1400.

1399. Constantinople was invested by the Turks, and in the greatest danger; Pera which is as the Suburbs to it, and from whence they fetched all their Provisions, was very likely to be taken. It belonged to the Seignory of Genoa: the Mareschal de Boucicaut going thither with only Twelve hundred Men, secured it, and by consequence the City. After he had disengaged all the parts round about, and made the Turks retire, whom he worsted in several Rencontres; his Pay, and Soldiers failing him, he came into France to sollicite for a greater reinforcement, bringing the Emperour along with him; leaving the Lord de Chasteaumoran in Constantinople to defend it.

1399. The disorders in the Court of England, caused by the ill Government of Richard, and the ambition of his Uncles, ended in a most Tragical Catastrophe. Henry Earl of Derby became Duke of Lancaster by the death of his Father, puts King Richard prisoner in the Tower of London, Deposed him by the Authority and Consent of Parliament, who degraded and condemned him to a perpetual imprisonment. Then he took the Crown the Eighteenth day of October, and was anointed with a Holy Oyl, which some English say, was brought by the Virgin Mary to St. Thomas of Canterbury, whilst he took refuge in France. This Amponle (or Bottle) that contains the Oyl, is of Lapis, and on the top stands a Golden Eagle enriched with Pearls and Diamonds. Notwithstanding this Unction, some while afterwards he gives way to the outcries of the People, who demanded that the unfortunate King might be strangled. The London Citizens held Richard in execration, because he had deliver'd up Brest and Cherbourg to the French.

1399. The Duke of Bretagne, who enjoy'd some repose, after the many traverses which had disturbed him from his Infancy, died the First day of November in the Castle of Nantes. He left his Children to the custody, not of his Wife Jean of Navarre, but of the Duke of Burgundy, and Oliver de Clisson, who alone were able to trouble them. He had three, John, Arthur, and Giles.

"In the Month of November of this year 1399. a Comet was seen of an extraordinary brightness, and darting its train towards the West. It appeared only for one weeks time, and was by Prognosticators, held as a sign of those great Revolutions that hapned all Chriftendom over, especially in the Kingdom of Naples, and the Empire.

1399. Lewis of Anjou had peaceably enough enjoy'd the better part of the Kingdom of Sicilia, when Thomas de Sanseverin, Duke of Venousia, offended for that he did not conclude upon the Marriage of his Brother Charles, Earl of Mayne, with his Daughter, made him odious to the Neopolitans, and introduced Lancelot and his Mother into the City, where he was Crowned King, and invested by the Pope of Rome. So that Lewis having only some Castles left, returned into France to crave assistance.

1400. "The Electors could no longer endure the Vices and brutish drunkenness of Wenceslaus, they degraded him, and in his stead elected Henry Duke of Brunswic, a generous Prince and great Captain; and this Henry being basely assassinated upon his return from the Diet, by the Count of Waldeck, they substituted Robert Duke of Bavaria, and Count Palatine, who was of the Electoral Colledge.

The Duke of Milan, fearing lest he might dispossess him, shut up all the passages, and hindred him from going to take the Imperial Crown at Rome; and Sigismund King

King of Bohemia, having procured himself to be chosen Guardian to Wenceslaus his Brother, under this Title made many of the German Princes of his party, who adhered to the House of Luxemburgh, or rather made this a colourable pretence to avoid the owning any Sovereign.

This year 1400. the Court of France received Emanuel II. Emperour of Greece, who came to give the King thanks for his assistance, and to crave more help of him. He met with all manner of good Entertainment, but nothing else, unless it were an annual Pension for his subsistence. He remained almost two years in France, at the and whereof, news being brought of the defeat, and taking of Bajazet, by Themir-Lanc, the King lent him the Lord of Chasteaumorand with two hundred Men at Arms, and gave him a sum of Money to re-conduct him to Constantinople.

There was not any thing of advantage presented it self, which the Duke of Orleans did not embrace with passion: he undertook the quarrel of degraded Wenceslaus, and raised a good force to restore him: but being informed of the ruine of his whole party, he came back again.

The desire to Rule, and ambition for Government grew hotter every day betwixt him and the Duke of Burgundy. Twice had they displaced each other from that advantageous Post; and besides, the Burgundian resented it highly, that the Duke of Orleans would have the Duke of Bretagne to be thrust out of all, who was his Wives Cousin-german, and his own surest friend. The frequent punctillo's between their Wives, exasperated them more then their own true interests; the Duke of Burgundy's being the elder, Heiress of a vast Estate, and sprung from very Noble Blood, despising the other, who in truth had been much beneath her, had she not been considered as Wife of the Kings only Brother.

The Duke of Orleans had then the upper hand, and was seized of the management of Affairs; the Burgundian could not quit his part, both the one and the other got their friends together, and Paris was surrounded with Soldiers. The Orleannois had called in the Duke of Guelders with Five hundred Men at Arms, the Burgundian was not weaker: but the Queen, the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon appearing as Mediators, reconciled the Uncle and the Nephew, at least to outward shew.

At that time the King was in his Fits; when he was recover'd, the Duke of Orleans obtained of him that when he was ill, he should have the Government of the Kingdom. He imprudently began it by new Imposts, which rendred him odious to the People.

Infomuch that the Burgundian being returned to Court, found his party strong enough in the Council to obtain the Government again. Soon after the King coming out of another Fit, gave order that they should Govern jointly: but the Council, the Queen, and the other Princes and Lords, prayed him to recal it.

The Duke of Orleans went to take possession of the Dutchy of Luxemburgh, which he had purchased of Wenceslaus King of Bohemia, and made an agreement between the Duke of Lorraine and the City of Mets.

As for the Duke of Burgundy he went into Bretagne, where he rendred a signal piece of Service to France. Jean de Navarre, the Widow of Duke John de Montfort was going to be married with Henry King of England, and was ready to have carried her three Daughters with her; the Duke prevented this, and having taken order to preserve the Dutchy for them, brought them to the Court of France, to be bred up in an affection to that Crown.

Bennet found means to make his escape out of the Palace of Avignon, hearing about him the Body of our Lord, and certain Letters from the King, in which he had made promise never to forsake him. Immediately his Cardinals were reconciled to him, the City craved his Pardon, and the King of Sicilia made him a visit. The Court of France was hugely divided about the business of the Substraction; the Dukes of Berry, Burgundy, and Bourbon, insisted to persevere therein; the Duke of Orleans on the contrary: The Clergy of France were assembled to decide it.

The King of Spain declared by his Ambassadors, that he would take it off. In a word, they bestirred themselves so with the King, that he restored the Kingdom to the Obedience of Bennet. All the Universities consented, even that of Paris at last, unless the Norman People who resisted a long while. And all this change was made upon the Duke of Orleans becoming security for Bennet's good intentions: who after this, settled himself in Avignon, fortify'd it, and got some Soldiers into the City, and others quarter'd round the neighborhood, to maintain himself by power.

The Dukes of Orleans, Berry, and Burgundy disputed daily, and contended daily for the Government: they agreed in no one thing, but the laying of new Imposts: they had had their shares all three, but the odium fell chiefly upon the first for this as well as for the Schilm in the Church.

1404. All the whole time of this Reign, poor France was beaten with divers rods of Affliction, sometimes with parching Droughts, then otherwhiles with Floods of Rain and Inundations of Rivers; sometimes with violent Storms and Tempests, often with contagious or epidemical Diseases. There hapned so great a Mortality at Paris, in the year 1399. that they were fain to forbid all great Meetings. This year another was so rife it carried off an infinite number. Philip Duke of Burgundy dyed of it at Halle in the Countrey of Brabant the Twenty seventh of April. His Heart was brought to St. Denis, his Body to the Chartreuse of Dijon, which he had built most magnificently.

* Or Sequestred. This Prince, without being a King, had the greatest Estate in Lands of any in his Days; but his Magnificence, which we may say hath been Hereditary to the House of Burgundy, which yielded not for number of Officers, nor rich Furniture, to that of the Royal Family, and the excessive expences he was at upon all occasions, had so much impoverish'd him, that his Wife renounced the Community*, and laid down his Girdle, Keys, and Purse upon his Cushin as her surrender.

He had three Sons and four Daughters. Of his Sons, John had the Dutchy and the County of Burgundy, with Flanders, and Artois. Anthony was Duke of Brabant, Lothier and Limbourg: Philip had the Earldoms of Nevers and Rhetel. Of the four Daughters, Marguerite espoused William, eldest Son of Albert, Duke of Bavaria, who was Son of the Emperour Lewis, and Earl of Haynault, Holland, and Zealand, and Lord of Friesland. From them came an only Daughter named Jacqueline, of whom we shall have many things to relate. Mary was wedded with Ame VIII. First Duke of Savoy, who afterwards was made Pope, under the name of Felix. Catharine was Wife of Leopold IV. Duke of Austria and Earl of Tyrol. Bonna died before she was Married.

1404. It was now two years that the Duke of Bretagne's Children had been bred in the Court of France; this year the Eldest who succeeded to the Dutchy (he was called John, and was the Sixth of that name) went to take possession thereof, and shewed himself a better Frenchman than his Father.

They were sensibly troubled in France for the death of King Richard; and they had used all their endeavours to turn that great affection the Cities of Bourdeaux and Bayonne had for Richard, into a hatred against his Murtherer; but they were so strictly tied to the English by their intercourse of Trade, they could not pervert them from their Interest and Obedience, nor gain the least of their ends upon them. And the Kings indisposition would not suffer them to venture to take a revenge for the Murther of his Son-in-law. There were none but the Duke of Orleans and Valeran Count de St. Pol, who had Married Richards Sister, that shewed any resentment. The First sent to defy Henry in very opprobrious terms, but received a futable return. The Second after most outrageous challenges and bravado's much above what was in his power to perform, besieged Mere by Land, from whence he was driven away most shamefully.

1404. Henry had sent back Queen Isabella to her Father with her Portion and all her Jewels, and Truces had been made at divers seasons, but those were more punctually observed on the French side then by the English. For accordingly as Henry settled himself, he loosed the Reins of the Englishmens hatred, who committed many hostilities by Sea and Land in Normandy, and in Guyenne. The Bretons and Normans did not leave them un-retaliated; as likewise at the same time the Constable Albert (he succeeded Lewis de Sancerre in that Office) cleared all the neighborhood of Bourdelois of a great many petty Castles, by means whereof they gathered great Contributions in the Countrey of Guyenne. The Earl de la Marche Son of the Duke of Bourbon, did as much in Limosin.

1404. But this last by his too long delay, ruined that relief he should have carried to Clindon, a Prince of Wales who made War upon the English, and a very beneficial diversion for France.

* House or Inn. Observe we hear a great mark of the power of the University of Paris, as they were going in Procession to St. Catherine du Val, near the Hostel * of Charles de Savoisy, Chamberlain to the King; some of that Lords Domestique Servants quarrell'd with the Scholars, and coming insolently into the Church with their Swords drawn, committed great Outrage there. The University prosecuted this business with so much heat, that by a Sentence in Parliament, to whom the King referr'd it, three of Savoisy's Servants were whipp'd and banished, and his Hostel (or Houle) razed by found of Trumpet, excepting his Galleries, where on the Gate we have seen an Inscription containing the Fact, which was obliterated when they rebuilt the Houle. It is now the Hostel de Lorrain.

The Treasury being quite exhausted by the Duke of Orleans, who was a gulph, that nothing could fill up, or supply fast enough, he called the Council together, to give Orders for some new Levies. John Duke of Burgundy who had taken his Fathers place, opposed it publicly, and thereby gained the love of the Parisians. However, the plurality of Votes inducing him to a compliance with the rest, they laid new Impositions upon pretence of raising great Forces. The Princes had agreed to lock the Money up in one of the Towers belonging to the Palace, and no one was to touch a Penny of it without the knowledge and consent of all: the Duke of Orleans for all this Engagement, scrupled not to come one night with a strong hand, and take away the best part of it.

The Thirtieth of April, Lewis Dauphin of France and Duke of Guyenne, espoused Marguerite Daughter of John Duke of Burgundy; and John's eldest Son (his name was Philip) was betrothed to Michelle the King's Daughter.

When Benet was confirmed in the Papacy, he vexed the Clergy as he had done before, and would have Levied the Tenth: but he found the Univerfity in his way who put a stop to his Undertakings. In the mean time his Soldiers having consumed all his Silver, even his very Plate, the Duke of Orleans, because he had nothing else to give him, went to Avignon to press him in the behalf of the King, to labour for a re-union in the Church, as he had promised. For this purpose he sent a Legation to Boniface, where they set upon him with so many Reasons to consent to the Abdication, that having nothing to reply, he fell sick and died upon it.

His Cardinals elected Cosmo Meliorat, who was called Innocent VII. He likewise appearing to be well enough inclined to some methods of accommodation; Benet resolved to confer with him, promising himself to gain him by his skill, or by the strength of his genius, which was prevalent; Thus he went to Nice, and from thence passed in some Gallies to Genoa, being accompanied by Lewis II. King of Sicilia.*

They were scandaliz'd both at Court and in the City of Paris, at the too close union between the Duke of Orleans and the Queen, especially since the death of Philip the Hardy, whom she ever dreaded, and also, because they took the whole management of the Government to themselves, and oppressed and loaded the Kingdom with redoubled and violent exactions. The Queen they said, sent one part of it into Germany, and employ'd the other in all sorts of profusions, whilst the Kings Children were in a pitiful equipage, and himself was left to rot in his own ordure, without any care of undressing him, or exchanging his foul Linnen.

They were not only hated by the People, but the other Princes; the Dukes of Burgundy and Bretagne retired from Court. The King having a lucid interval, and understanding the reason of his Uncles absenting, and heard the general complaints against the Queen and his Brother, he thought it necessary to call a great Assembly, and sent for the Duke of Burgundy thither. This Duke thought it unfit to come, without bringing a good force along with him, as well for his own security, as because he knew the Queen and her Duke had a design to seize upon the Kings Children and prevent that double Alliance he would contract between his, and them.

Upon the noise of his arrival, the Queen and Duke take Alarm and withdraw to Melun, having left order with Lewis of Bavaria, Brother to the Queen, to bring away the Dauphin, and even the Duke of Burgundy's Children, to the Castle of Pouilly. The Burgundian who was arrived at the Louvre, gets upon his nimblest Horse, with a good guard of brave fellows, gallops thorough Paris without stop or stay, and made so much haste that he overtakes the Dauphin at Juvisy, and brings him back to Paris with his own consent, and in despite of the Bavarian.

This Rupture was followed with justifications on the Burgundians part, who gave his reasons for this action, in presence of the Kings Council and the University; as also for his reproaches, and the drawing of Soldiers together on either side. All Paris was in a perpetual Alarm, the Dukes of Berry and of Burgundy fortify'd themselves in their own Houses: the Duke of Orleans breathed Fire and Flames, and the Burgundian omitted nothing to gain the favour of the People. The Duke of Bourbon and the University labour'd in vain to make a reconciliation; the King of Sicily had as ill success: but at last the King of Navarre, and the Duke of Bourbon, after several goings and comings, brought it about, the two Princes embraced each other in Paris, and swore mutual friendship with their Tongues, but in their Hearts quite other things lay hid.

England

England was in a bad condition, by reason of the Famine that pinched her, and the defeat they received by Henry Percy Earl of Northumberland, who would revenge the death of King Richard. The Constable Albret and the Count d' Armagnac had taken, or by Intelligence and Money, got possession of above Threescore places in Guyenne. The Dukes of Orleans and Burgundy undertook to drive them totally out of France; the first by attacking them in Guyenne, the other about Calais, to which he was to lay Siege.

The Duke of Orleans lost both his time and reputation before Blaye and before Bourgh: the Second after very great expences durst not approach near Calais. Thus neither reaped any thing but shame, and the Burgundian increased his hatred against the other, whom he accused of having spoiled his design, by craftily hindring the Levies of those sums of Money had been allotted for the payment of his Forces.

The valour of the Mareschal de Boucicaut encreased the power and reputation of the French, not only in Italy, but thorough all the Levant. The City of Famagousta belonged to the Signory of Genoa, they having gained it from the King of Cyprus: that King had a design to recover it by force, and to this end had besieged it; the Mareschal having armed himself to relieve it, the Grand Master of Rhodes undertook to make an accommodation.

1406.

Whilst they were in Treaty, the Mareschal employ'd his Arms against the Turks. After he had conducted the Emperour Manuel from Modon to Constantinople, he went and besieged the City of Scandoloro, which he took by assault. Then the Peace with Cyprus being made, he turned his designs towards the coasts of Syria, because he had War with the Sultan of Egypt, for some Merchants Goods, which that Barbarian had taken from the Genoise. The Venetians jealous of their prosperity, and watchful of the Mareschals actions, gave speedy notice by a nimble vessel to all the Ports upon that coasts: So that where ever he would have gon on shoar, he found them armed and well provided to receive him. Thus he missed Tripoly and Sayeta, but he took Barne which he carried by storm.

This good success encreased the Venetians rage so much, that lying in wait for him upon his return, having discharged the greatest part of his Men and Ships, Charles Zeni who commanded their Gallies, set upon him without any War declar'd. How weak soever he was, he defended himself so stoutly that they could not force him; but they took three of his Gallies, wherein was Chasteau Morand, and Thirty Knights of Note.

The mournful Letters these prisoners sent to the Court, because they knew the Venetians never set any free whom they had taken, till the Peace was made, and their friends lamentations to the Princes and the Kings Council, wrought so much, that they sent to the Mareschal, not to revenge himself for this Treachery, but allow of those excuses the Venetians made. The Mareschal knowing they were contrary both to the Truth and his own Honour, published a Manifesto, directed to the Duke and to Zeni, relating the whole Fact in a quite different manner, giving them the Lye, and challenging them to a Combat, either One to One, or Ten against Ten, all Knights, or either of them in a single Galley; to which no answer was made.

The University of Paris did not desist from pursuing the re-union of the Church, and had in order to it, dispatched some Deputies to Rome to Innocent, but Bennet endeavour'd to break these measures by his intrigues in the Court of France. The Cardinal de Chalan his Envoye, was but ill receiv'd; yet he for a while hindred the Decree the Parliament were about to make against the University of Toulouse, who had embraced the defence of that Pope, and written Letters in his favour, injurious both to the King and his Council: but that of Paris addressing themselves to the King with as much zeal, obliged the Parliament at last to give Sentence; That the said Letters should be burnt at the Gates of Toulouse, Lyons, and Montpellier, and those that wrote them should be proceeded against. Notwithstanding they could not obtain that subtraction so many times demanded.

1406.

"During these Transactions, Innocent the Pope of Rome dies, and his Cardinals elected Angelo Coraro a Venetian, called Gregory XII. but obliged him both by Oath and Writing, to abdicate the Papacy when Benedict would do the same, and to give notice of this condition to all Princes.

He at first comply'd with his Promises, and sent an Embassy to his Competitor for the Union. They agreed upon the City of Savonna for their Conference; all necessary Orders for their security, and for their conveniencies were issued out, and the the King omitted nothing that might be helpful, sending his Ambassadors to labour in it, who were well received every where. But the two Anti-Popes, each on his part, fought difficulties and delays, denying to meet personally, and endeavouring to put things off by a thousand tricks. Bennet shuffled a long time before he would give up his Abdication in Writing; Gregory yet longer about his security, and the way he should go. Sometimes he pretended he must go by Sea, another while it must be by Land, finding out most incomprehensible difficulties in adventuring either way.

The Duke of Burgundy, notwithstanding his feigned reconciliation which he daily coloured over with new marks of confidence, causes the Duke of Orleans to be assassinated. The executioner of this so abhorred a Fact, was a Norman Gentleman, named Rodolphe d'Oquetonville, animated by a particular resentment, for that the Prince had put him out of an Office he held under the King. Upon the 23 or 24th of November in the night time, as the Duke returned from visiting the Queen, who was then in Child-bed, mounted upon a Mule, with only two or three Servants about him (he who had Six hundred Gentlemen his Pensioners) the Murderer who waited for him in the Street called Barbette, accompanied with Ten or a Dozen more like himself, first gave him a blow with a Battle-axe, which cut off one hand, and then a Second, that cleft his Head in two; the rest likewise mangled him with divers wounds, and left him lying in the Street. This done, they all saved themselves in the Duke of Burgundy's House, having strowed the way with Calthrops, and set fire to a House that they might not be pursued.

Upon the first noise of this Murder, the Burgundian put a good face upon it, and went to the Funeral of the deceased, bemoaned him, and wept for him: but it being mentioned in Council, that search should be made in all Princes Hostels for the murderers; the horror of this crime did so confound him, that he took the Duke of Bourbon aside, and confessed to him that he was the Author of it. Afterwards being come to himself again, he went from thence, and the next day fled into Flanders with his Cut-throats.

His retreat with his threatnings, gave some apprehension that he would put the Kingdom into a flame; and every man feared the like treachery might fall upon his own Head. And for this reason, instead of prosecuting him, they fought by all mean to appease him. The Duke of Berry and the Duke of Anjou King of Sicilia, took a journey to Amiens to confer with him; he came to them well attended, his ill act leaving him no security but force, and promised to return to Paris, and justify himself before the King, provided they kept no Guards at the City Gates.

In the interim the Dutches of Orleans, who was at Blois when her Husband was murdered, came to Paris with her Sons, she had three, Charles, Philip, and John, the eldest was not above Fourteen years old, to make her complaints to the King. He gave her the Guardianship of her Children, but durst not promise to do her justice, for fear of over-turning his Kingdom. The disconsolate Widow knowing therefore that her Husbands murderer was returning, retired with her young ones to Blois.

According to his word, the Duke of Burgundy came to Paris towards the end of February, at the head of Eight hundred Gentlemen, all armed from Head to Foot, only they did not put their Helmets on. The Queen and Princes received him with all the demonstrations of confidence; but they could not prevail with him to own the murder of the Duke of Orleans publicly: He gave Commission for it to a Cordelier, named John Petit, Doctor in Divinity, his Orator, * and obtained Audience for him in the Great Hall of the Hostel de St. Pol.

1408.

This mercenary Divine endeavour'd in presence of the Princes and Council to make it appear, That the Duke of Orleans had been a Tyrant every way, that he was guilty of the crime de Lese Majestais, both Divine and Humane; That he had once bewitched the King, another time had conspired to kill him, and another to have him Deposed by the Pope: That therefore his death was just and necessary. It was not the Monks Harangue, but necessity and danger that perswaded the Council. They gave him an Act in Writing that abolished this crime, and in appearance reconciled him with the Queen.

The King desired to put an end to the collusion of the Anti-Popes; he resolved to publish an Order for Subtraction the Fifteenth of May. In the mean time Pope Benedict having intelligence of it, sent his Bulls to Paris, forbidding him to do so upon pain of Excommunication. Those that brought them, to wit, Sancho Lupi, and a Rider belonging to the Popes Stable, having delivered them to the King, and the Duke

*Ever since Philip de Valois, Eloquence was in vogue, they having need of it to persuade the People; and because they held divers great Assemblies, as well Civil as Ecclesiastical.

Duke of Berry the Fourteenth of May, were immediately seized on. The Council sat three days, to consider what was to be done; having heard the Opinions and Remonstrances of the University, the King caused a Pen-knife to be stuck into the Bulls, which the Rector of the University afterwards cut in pieces.

1408. The Subtraction was after this published, and then those that brought the Bulls, were tried by Commissioners. Their Sentence was severe, they were drawn on a Sledge twice about the Palace-yard, then mounted upon a Scaffold, where being adorned with Paper Miters, and clothed with long painted Vests, after the Dalmatian fashion; upon which Benedict's Arms were fastned; they were severely reproached by a Doctor, and after led back to their prison. Divers Prelats and Clergy-men that sided with him, were likewise sent to Goal.

Upon this news the two Popes who pretended to be going to Savona, fled each his several way, Benedict into Catalogna, in a Galley; and Gregory by Land to Sienna, both of them forsaken by their Cardinals.

When the Burgundian was again returned to Artois, the Dutcheß of Orleans, supported by the Queen, who had Cantonized her self at Melun, came to intreat the King that he would hear her Orator (this was the Abbot of St. Denis) in justification of the memory of her Husband, and reparation for his death. They gave him Audience in the Castle of the Louvre, the King, the Queen, and Princes of the Blood being at the Council. After this Harangue of the Widows Orator, there were divers Assemblies held, with more animosity, then zeal for Justice, where in fine the Burgundian, notwithstanding his Act of Abolition, was declared an enemy to the State; and it was ordered that Forces should be sent to fall upon him on every side, and that all the ways should be strongly guarded to keep both him and all others from coming near the King.

He was at that instant at L'Isle in Flanders, arming himself to restore John of Bavaria his Wives Brother, to the Bishoprick of Liege. (This false Prelate, who had nothing but the vain Spirit of the World, deferring to take Holy Orders, gave occasion to the Liegeois, to turn him out of the Episcopal See,) and to put in Thierry, one of the Lord de Perruveys sons, whose Original was from the House of Brabant. They were not satisfy'd with having driven him out of their City, but besieged him in Maastricht, and had kept him blocked up for four Months. When they had notice that the Burgundian had taken the Field, they raised the Siege and retired, but those haughty and rude People, hearing that he had in all but Sixteen thousand Men, forced the Lord de Perruveys to seek him out, and give him Battle.

They were three to one, yet were they routed and cut in pieces, Perruvey and his two Sons, and Thirty thousand Liegeois lay dead upon the place: they had no quarter given them, the Bishop, rather a Tyger then a Shepherd, could not have Blood enough to satisfy his cruel Thirst. Their submission did not appease his sanguinary Rage: when he was settled, he fell not only upon the guilty and the ring-leaders, but upon Women and Children, Priests and Religious Votaries: There was nothing else to be seen round about Liege, and those other Cities that were Dependencies, but Forreßts of Wheels and Gibbets, and the Meuse was choaked up with the multitude of their wretched Carcasses, thrown into that River, bound two and two together. From hence began that implacable hatred of the Liegeois against the House of Burgundy.

Had the Duke been worsted in that Battle, all the Orleanois party were ready to have run open mouth upon him: when they had received this news, they found more cause to consult their own safety, then his ruine. The Queen did not believe her self secure in Paris; She departed thence the Thirteenth of November, being attended by the Duke of Bretagne her Son-in-law, and took the King with her to Tours.

1408. The Duke informed of all particulars by the Parisians, soon got to Paris with Four thousand Horse, and Two thousand Foot mounted behind them; they received him with great joyfulness, and sent some Deputies to the King to desire he would return. William Earl of Holland proffers to endeavour an accomodation: A Second Peace was Treated on between both parties, which being well advanced, the widow of Orleans, a haughty and vindicative Princess, died with grief and anger the 4th of December.

The Orphans were forced to consent to a reconciliation with him that had murdered their Father. It was concluded in the City of Chartres about the end of the month of March. The King with the Queen, and the Princes being on a Scaffold in the Great Church, but palliased round about to hinder the People from seeing what they did; the Burgundian fell on his knees before the King, and pray'd him by the Mouth

Mouth of his Advocate, and afterwards with his own to lay aside his anger, and receive him into his Favour: but touching the Murther, he expressed himself thus, That he was ready to justify himself. The Princes that were present, kneeled likewise, and joyned their Requests to his. Then addressing himself to the Princes of Orleans, he desired them to forget what was past, and harbour no revenge in their hearts. After this, they made them embrace and promise amity to each other: and for a farther tie to make this agreement sure, they stipulated the Marriage of a Daughter of the Burgundians, with Philip Count de Verme, the Second of the Three Brothers.

The Peace concluded, the King returned to Paris, and the Burgundian to the Low-Countries. From whence, coming again about the month of July, he took the whole Government upon him; and to give some satisfaction to the People, whose affection he had gained, in shewing his dislike against Taxes; he caused the Council to call the Financiers to Examination and Account. The most of them got off for Money, but it cost John de Montaigu his Life, who had been Sur- * Intendant.

He was a man of mean birth, Son of a Citizen of Paris, whom the Kings favour, without any great desert of his, had raised to the Office of Grand Maistre of his House, and his Brothers, one to the Arch-Bishoprick of Sens, the other to that of Paris. His immense Riches, which never are acquired without crime, did blind this little fellow, and drew the eyes of all great Men upon him; inso much as he had married his Son to a Daughter of the Constable d' Albret, and his Daughters to the greatest Lords of the Kingdom.

Though he had been very serviceable in negotiating the Treaty of Chartres; nevertheless the Duke of Burgundy and the King of Navarre conspired his destruction, because he had given the advice to carry the King to Tours. They caused him to be accused of divers hainous crimes, taking their opportunity, when the King, who loved him, was in one of his Fits of Folly, he was Arrested by Peter des Essards, Provost of Paris, examined by Commissioners of Parliament, and cruelly tormented on the Rack. His sufferings could not draw one word from him; however, his Head was chopt off at the * Halles. At his death he freely of his own accord, confessed his depredation of the Kings Treasure, which in it self contains all the greatest crimes. The Trunk of his Body was hanged on a Gibbet, his Head planted upon a high Pole.

Afterwards the Vicount de Lionnois had interest enough to re-abilitate his memory, and having caused the Body to be taken from Montfaucon, with an honourable convoy, or attendance of Priests, and Torches, carried it to the Celestines Church at Marconssy, which he had founded.

At this examination of the Officers, it was ordered that all the Receivers should Account before the Earls de la Marche, de Vendosme, and de St. Pol, and that till the had so done, nothing should be allowed without Receipts and Vouchers. The Treasurers were likewise all put out, and the management thereof was given to some Citizens, who were esteemed rich and less interested.

Thus the Princes strove to gain the affection of that Queen of Cities. For the same reason they renewed all their former Priviledges, and the Provostship of Marchants, of which they had till now only given them the keeping; and they also granted them, (but to such only as were Natives) the priviledge of holding Fiefs with the same Franchise as any Gentleman.

The Kings sorrow was very great, when upon his recovery he heard of the death of Montaigu, whom he had tenderly loved. But there being no way to recall things past, he would consider of what was to come. Having therefore assembled the Grandees of the Kingdom, he told them, that he desired when he was at any time ill, the Queen should take cognisance of Affairs; and upon her default, the Dauphin Duke of Guyenne, whom he discharged from being under the conduct of his Mother, but would that he should Govern with the Councils of the Dukes of Berry and of Burgundy. This last usurped all the Authority.

Whilst the Marechal de Boucicant was gone to Milan to receive that State under the Kings Protection and Government, (for John Galeazzo chose this, rather then that of the Marquis de Montferrat, and Facin Can de l'Escale, who had halfe subdued it) the Marquis to prevent him in it, had caused the Genoese to rise up in Arms, by means of the Gibbeline party. They massacred all the French within their City, forced the Cittadel, and called him in to be their Lord; but soon after they threw him out as they had done Boucicant.

* Sur-Intendant was not then in use.

* Cut off with an Axe.

1409. "Maugre the fulminations of the two Anti-Popes, Maugre the Councils each of them had called, Gregory in the Patriarchat of Aquileia, and Benedict at Perpignan: that Assembly which the Cardinals of both parties had summoned, was open'd at Pisa the Five and twentieth of March. The Anti-Popes having been cited to appear there, and all the Forms observed, the Substraction was first order'd, then they declared Schismatiques and Hereticks, and Faculty given to the Cardinals to elect another. Their Suffrages agreed in favour of Cardinal Peter Philargi, called of Candia, because a Native of that place. He was named Alexander V.

1409. During the Schism, Ladislaus King of Naples, had seized upon Rome, and the Lands of the Church; which was the cause why the Council, and the new Pope Alexander, more willingly invested Lewis of Anjou with that Kingdom, and gave him the Command of Lieutenant-General of the Church. In the beginning, he had good success, regained all the places that Ladislaus had usurped, and drove him out of Rome; but the end was not alike.

1410. Emp. "The Eighteenth of May, or according to others, the First of June, the Emperor Robert dyed at Oppenheim in Bavaria. The Electors divided into two parties, whereof one elected Sigismund de Luxembourg, King of Hungary; the other his Cousin Jesse, Marquis of Moravia. This last dying soon after, all the Suffrages joined for Sigismund.

1410. R. 27 years. Alexander V. had been a Cordelier Frier, upon this consideration, he granted a new Privilege to the Four Orders of Mendicants, to Administer all the Sacraments in the Parishes, and receive the Tythes, if they were bestow'd on them. The University of Paris much offended at this Novelty, retrenched all these Orders from their Body, unless they would renounce this Bull. The Jacobins, &c. . . . and Carmelites, who found themselves feeble, obey'd this Decree. The Cordeliers and the Augustines remaining refractory, were deprived of the Pulpit and Confessional, of which the Jacobins made advantage, as the Cordeliers had done upon their being in disgrace. Pope John XXIII. revoked all these Privileges, and reduced all things to the same condition they were in before.

6 quotation. "We find amongst Historians, that in these times there were many bloody Battles fought betwixt Birds of all sorts, even amongst the smallest, as Sparrows, and amongst the domestique ones, which proceeded from certain minute Bodies spread in the Air, which pricked, and irritated them in such measure, as provoked and pushed them on to discharge their anger upon one another. This year 1410. in the Countrey of Hainault, the Storks were observed to League with the Herons and Pyles, and give battle to the Ravens, who in their Flocks had Rooks and Choughs; the Storks gained the Victory. In the Countrey of Liege in like manner some Crows or Ravens having insulted over a Faulcon, breaking the Eggs in its Airy; the next day were to be seen in that very place, a vast quantity of Birds of both those kinds, who fought most obstinately, till the Crows betook themselves to flight, after a very great slaughter of their Forces."

1410. It was wisely Counsell'd, whereby to lay asleep all discords, to employ all the Forces of France in a War upon the English, under that specious pretence of revenging the death of King Richard II. The Nobles went about it with much resolution; but the envy which other Princes had against the greatness of the Burgundian, who fate at the Helme, broke off this design.

1410. At the end of August, the Dukes of Berry and Bourbon having made a League at Gyen with the House of Orleans, and with the Duke of Bretagne, the Earls of Alençon, Clermont, and Armagnac, who were all his friends, or picqued against the Burgundian, sent to make their demands of the King. Every one armed himself, the King might command them to lay down their Arms, but it was in vain, for they went on with their Levies. The Burgundian having to little purpose proffer'd them Peace, made use of the Kings Authority to summon the Arrière-ban, puts Ten thousand Men into Paris. The Duke of Berry, and the Princes lodged themselves at the Castle of Wicestre, and began to make the War.

The neighbouring parts round that City were eaten up by Two hundred thousand hungry Soldiers. About the end of November, when all the Provisions were consumed, necessity compell'd both parties to come to an agreement. It was Articled, that the Duke of Burgundy should go out of Paris, and that the Duke of Berry should not go in; That those two Princes should name some Lords that should take care for them them of the Government and the Dauphin's Person; That the King should chuse Council of Twelve Persons not suspected, whose Names he should communicate to them. That all the Princes should withdraw with their Forces, and that none of them should return near the King, unless he were commanded by Letters under the Great Seal, and written in Council.

The Burgundian obey'd with sincerity, and retir'd forthwith; but the Duke of Orleans with those of his party, began immediately to make new Levies. The Queen and the Duke of Berry appeared as Neuters, and offer'd to be Mediators. The King spake for Master, and Commanded them to disarm; the Burgundian lay quiet, and remained in Obedience, but the Orleannois with his Sword in hand, demanded Justice for the death of his Father. After many Letters, and fruitless Negotiations, he sent a very biting Cartel * to the Burgundian, who answered in the same stile. Their Challenges were in the month of August.

The King had ordained the Queen and the Duke of Berry, who were at Melun, to labour for a Peace, and sent thither Persons that were Notables of the Clergy, the Nobility, the Parliament, and the University, the better to Authorize what they should conclude therein; but their design was only to pillage Paris, and deliver themselves to the Orleannois. The Parisians having timely notice, demanded the Count de St. Pol might be their Governour: It was agreed to, but instead of strengthening himself with good honest Citizens, he furnishes himself with Rascals, and raises a Company of Five hundred Butchers, Commanded by the Goix, the Kings Butchers, who committing a thousand insolencies, obliged a great many good Citizens to retire elsewhere.

France then divided her self in two Factions, the one the Orleannois, vulgarly named Armagnacs, from the Count of Armagnac, one of their principal Chiefs; they carried a White Bend, and a * Cross with Right Angles: and the other the Burgundians, who bare the St. Andrew's Cross. The best of the Citizens of Paris inclined towards the First, the Populace towards the Second. From thence proceeded so many Murthers, Plunderings, and Proscriptions, according as the success varied on either side.

The Burgundian party was then the strongest, having the King, the Dauphin, Duke of Guyenne, and the City of Paris on that side; so that they displaced the Prevost des Marchands, and imprisoned and banished divers of the contrary party.

In the mean time the Forces under the Duke of Orleans plundered Reims, and he seized upon Montlebery. Upon this they perswaded the Duke of Guyenne to oblige the King to recall the Burgundian to his assistance. This Duke embraced the opportunity, enters into Picardy with Sixty thousand Men, besieged and forced Ham; but he could go no further. The contest about the plunder of that City, begot a mortal dissention between the Picards and the Flemmings, wherewith his Army was made up; insomuch as the Duke of Orleans approaching with his, the Picards forsook him, the Flemmings withdrew, and he, though much against his Will, with them.

The greediness with which the party Orleannois gaped for the plunder and spoil of Paris, hindered them from pursuing and destroying the Burgundian. They marched immediately to block up this great City, made themselves Masters of St. Denis by a Siege, of the Tower of St. Cloud, by the Treachery of him that Commanded it, and fired the Houses of such Citizens as were not of their Faction. In retribution, the Company of Butchers went and burnt the Castle of Wicestre, which belonged to the Duke of Berry.

The Orleannois thought themselves so very sure of the taking of Paris, that they had already agreed upon their shares in the spoil. But now the Burgundian returns with a relief of English, pierces thorough the midst of their Forces, and the Thirtieth of October is received into the City, as the deliverer of the Kingdom. Then their party declines, St. Cloud is forced out of their hands, with the loss of above Nine hundred Gentlemen; they raise their Blockade, and having drawn all their Men together at St. Denis, retreat in disorder over the Bridges they had laid upon the Seine.

All the misfortunes that attend a routed party fell upon these. The victorious Burgundian causes them to be excommunicate and proscribed, gives them chase every where, puts their Goods to sale by out-cry, imprisons all their Friends and Servants, displaces the Constable Albret, John de Hangest, Hugueville, Grand Master of the Cross-Bow-Men, and the Sire de Rieux, Marechal, to give their places to the Count de St. Pol, the Lord de Rambures, and Lewis de Longny his partisans. All the neighbouring Cities about Paris enter into the same interests; Orleans alone remains of the the side of her Princes. The other places, and of such as followed them, are forced to abandon them; even Guyenne and Languedoc submit, and renounce the Government of the Duke of Berry.

1412. That party being reduced to despair, and finding themselves ruined even in those Provinces of the Kingdom where they had been strongest; makes an Alliance with the English, but upon Conditions very prejudicial to France. The King being again restored to his health, and finding this Treaty was agreed upon, vowed their destruction as the greatest of his enemies. After he had been at St. Denis, and set up the Standard of the Oriflamme, which never was display'd but against the publique enemy, and against Infidels, he went in Person to besiege the Duke of Berry in the City of Bourges (this was in June) and marched with so much eagerness, that he did not stop one day in all that march, although he received a kick on his Leg from one of his Horses. In the mean time his other Commanders made War upon the Orleanois in several other parts.

There were too many brave Men in the Town, and too much Division and Treachery in his own Army to gain it easily. The Siege drawing out in length, Sickness invades his Forces, and constrained him to grant a Peace to the Princes. The English who landed at the same time in Normandy, under the conduct of Thomas Duke of Lancaster, the Kings Brother, to assist them, made themselves formidable to both parties; the dread they had, made them hasten the execution of the Treaty. But the Duke of Orleans who had called them in, was obliged to satisfy them at his own expence and gave them his Brother John Earl of Angoulême for hostage.

1412. The Treaty having been confirmed at Auxerre, they carried the King, whom they found to be falling again into his distemper, to Melun, and from thence when he was grown better, to Paris. He made his entrance in great pomp, together with the Queen and the Dauphin, and caused the Peace to be proclaimed, to the unspeakable joy of the People.

1413. in January. The University and the honest Citizens of Paris, the only Members of the State that were not utterly corrupted, observing that the Grandees and such as were in Office, desired no other but to continue those troubles, that they might fleece the People: And that besides, unless it were prevented, the English had undertaken to conquer Guyenne, persuaded the King, who ever intended well, to labour towards the Reformation of his Kingdom, that so he might be the better enabled to resist them.

For which purpose he calls an Assembly of Notables at Paris, towards the latter end of January. The University thoroughly noted all the disorders in the administration of the Revenue, in Courts of Justice, the Chancery, the choice of Officers, and the Mint; such as were guilty were not spared, not even the Chancellor Arnand de Corbie, who was accused of Concussion.

There were Commissioners chosen of all the three Orders, to reform the State in all these particulars; but neither the Princes, nor others that were in power, could endure to be obliged to be honest, they must have lost too much by it; especially those that were about the Dauphin Duke of Guyenne.

⊕ This young Prince, aged but sixteen years, was fantastical, inconstant, and debauched; Besides, they bred him up in all manner of Licentiousness and disorder, as "Gaming, Women, Feasting, and dissolute Dancing; and worse yet, in Maxims of "irregular Government; very proper indeed for such a life as he would lead; for "to enable ones self to commit all Licentiousness, a Man must set himself above all "Laws.

1413. These People put it into his Head, that to be absolute Master of France, Paris must be quell'd, and the Citizens disarmed, whom he might afterwards load with Taxes, even as he pleased. It was therefore by their advice, that he seized upon the Castle of the Bastille, by the means of Peter des Essards. The Burghers took the Alarm, the Burgundian under-hand exasperates the People, and incites his Companies of Butchers. He gets together Ten or Twelve thousand Men, who having a Chyrurgion at the head of them, named John de Troyes, ran all about the streets; one part of them surrounds the Bastille, the rest went and planted their City-banner before the House of the Duke of Guyenne. He shews himself at the Window to appease those furies, John de Troyes lets him understand that they came thither to take away those from about him, who mischievously corrupted his youth. The Chancellor having desired they would name them, they delivered him a List of them, wherein he found his own Name to be the very first, and forced him to read it aloud twice over.

At

At the same instant they beat open the Gates, search every where, and carry away above twenty Persons, of whom were the Duke of Bar, Cousin-german to the King, John de Vailly Chancellor to the Duke, James de la Riviere his Chamberlain, whom they led Prisoners to the Louvre. The next day Peter des Essards surrenders the Bastille, and himself to the Duke of Burgundy, who kept him very strictly in the Chastelet, because he had been accused of a design, to have carried away the King and the Duke of Guyenne.

The University refused to joyn with those Factionous people; the Princes of the Blood detested such attempts; but they were glad in their hearts, that the Duke of Guyenne had met with such correction.

In the beginning of May, the Factionous bethought them of making White Hoods*, they carried some to that Prince, and John de Troyes usher'd in the Fine present with a very rude Remonstrance. A Doctor of Divinity, named Eustatious de Pavilly, a Religious Carmelite, being their Mouth, very freely told him of his extravagant manner of life. He scrupled not to say, that the misfortunes of the King his Father, and of the Duke of Orleans, was a punishment due for their Debaucheries; And added likewise, that if he did not suddenly change, he would render himself unworthy of the Crown, and give just occasion to transfer his Birthright to his Brother. Which he urged with the more confidence, because the Queen had often menaced him in the same manner.

* Chappetons.

He would very fain have freed himself out of the hands of these impertinent Pedagogues, but the doors were too well guarded, the People being Masters. One day as the King was going to Noſter-Dame, John de Troyes obliged him to put on a white Hood. Two days after he came to the Hôtel de Saint Pol, justified before the King, by his Spokesman de Parilly, the imprisonment of the Duke of Guyennes Servants, and named many others yet that were to be rooted out; then Addressing himself to the Duke of Guyenne, demanded him to deliver them up.

Whatever Intreaties he could make, they took away a great many more; not only Private Gentlemen, but likewise Lewis of Bavaria the Queens Brother, several Ladies that belonged to her, to the Dutcheſs of Guyenne, and to the Countess of Charolois, whom they accused as Instruments of the most pernicious Intrigues, and dissolute Actions at Court.

It was not without ground that they accused the Burgundian of bringing Fuel to maintain this scorching Fire of Sedition, though in effect he could not govern their hot Heads as he would. In the mean while all were forced to give way to this Torrent. The King was forced to consent they should bring their Prisoners upon their Trial, to go to Parliament in his white Hood, and publish certain Ordinances for reforming some abuses touching his Revenue, displace Arnand de Corbie his Chancellor, who surrendered the Seal to Eustace de Laitre his Son-in-Law, and to deliver up to Execution an Esquire belonging to the Duke of Guyenne, and Peter des Essards, whose Heads were cut off.

⊕ James de la Riviere Chamberlain to the said Duke, rather than undergo so great ignominy, beat out his own Brains with a large drinking Bowle, or else was kill'd in Prison by Helion Jaquerville a Captain of Paris: but however it hapned, they dragg'd him to the Gallows as one that had despair'd and Murther'd himself.

So violent a Government could not last long. The Duke of Guyenne privately agreed with the Leagued Princes; they made use of the Kings name, and a pretence of confirming the Peace of Chartres, which was not fully executed, to enter upon a Conference with them at Verneuil. Their Deputies being come to the King at Paris, the Seditious often broke up their Assemblies where they were Treating about the Peace: but yet could not by all their art or insolent rudeness prevent so good a work from going on.

To attain their ends, an Enterview was propounded between the Duke of Berry and the Duke of Burgundy, then a Conference concerning the other Princes at Pontoise by Deputies. All that were soundest and wisest, the University, the Parliament, and the honest Citizens, inclined to Peace, the Burgundian had but little stomach to it, as promising but slender advantage to him: however it was concluded at Pontoise the first day of August; and the King agreed the Princes should come and Congratulate him in Paris.

This being so settled, the Duke of Guyenne puts himself in Arms at the head of the honest Citizens, and having gotten together above Thirty thousand Men well fitted, marched through the Streets. The Chiefs of the Factionous who held the Bastille, the Louvre, the Palace, and the Town-Hall, left those places to him, and withdrew.

Then

1413.

1413.

1413.

Then he sets free all those they had imprisoned, he changes the Sheriffs, and putting out the Chancellor whom they had put in by force, gave that Office to John Juvenal, then restores the Seals to Arnaud de Corbie, who gave them up to Henry de Marie the first President.

The Burgundian not thinking himself too safe, resolved to be gone before the Orleanois were come. Having therefore got the King one day forth a Hunting, he takes his leave on a sudden, and without bidding adieu to Paris, hastens to Flanders by long days Journeys, though very well attended.

1413. After his retreat there was an absolute Revolution. The Duke of Orleanse was so much in the Kings favour, that he would have him ever near his Person, and would have him Cloathed in the same Stuffs as himself wore. The Countable d'Abret returned to Paris with great splendour; the Chiefs and Authors of the Sedition were sought for, some executed, some proscribed, all the Burgundians Creatures were removed, divers Gentlemen and Burghers Friends to him imprisoned.

They went farther yet, the Declarations that had been made against the Princes were declared a surprize, their Innocency owned and published, and he on the contrary detested as an execrable Murderer. And for the greater affront, Lewis of Anjou King of Sicilia sent him back his Daugher who had been put into his hands in order to be Married to his eldest Son; and two months after he gave one of his own to Charles Earl of Pontieu the Kings third Son, who was not fully Twelve years of age; by this means making both himself and his Son-in-Law, mortal Enemies to the House of Burgundy.

1413. The ill Treatment was hard to be digested: the Burgundian complained to the King, wrote of it to the Citizens of Paris, the Parliament and the University: but neither his Complaints nor Letters effected any thing. Finding he did not succeed that way, he found means to renew some kind of Correspondence with the Duke of Guyenne his Son-in-Law; who in effect was angry to be detain'd at Court, and as it were a Prisoner in the Louvre.

This was pretence enough for him to raise a great Army and take the Field to come and deliver him. He was received at Noyon, at Soissons, and at Compiègne; but Senlis shut her Gates against him. He made himself Master of St. Denis by Intelligence, and afterwards presented himself before Paris, notwithstanding the King had forbid him to come near upon pain de Lèse Majesté. He thought to have received the former humour of the People, and have made some rising that would have given him entrance. Thereupon the King being recover'd of a Fit, made a thundering Declaration against him: When he found this, he was afflicted, and retreated in most horrible confusion.

1414. Every one baw'd after him, stop Traitor, stop Murderer! The Bishop of Paris Brother of Montaigne, and the Faculty of Theology having examined the Heresie of his Orator John Petit, who was then dead, drew seven Propositions out of it, condemned them of Impiety and Heresie, and caused them to be burnt in the Porch of Noster-Dame. John Chartier named Jarson from his Native Village near Reims, Chancellor of the University, and a Doctor of great Reputation, shewed himself mighty zealous in this Prosecution. He had formerly some contest with Petit, and the Burgundians had sold his Household Goods the year before for certain Taxes.

The following year, the Burgundian removed this Business by Appeal to the Council of Constance, where it was debated with much heat. He maintain'd that those Propositions that had been condemned at Paris, were not Petits: but that they were forged and contrived by Jarson. The Commissioners deputed to examine the thing, having made their Report, the Council, without taking any notice of Petit or Jarson, did in general condemn that pernicious Proposition, that a Tyrant may be killed, or put to death by his Subject, in what manner soever.

At the same time the King proceeded against him as an Enemy to the State, went to St. Denis to set up the Oriflame*, and summoned the Ban and Arriere-Ban against him. He takes the City of Compiègne upon Capitulation, and Soissons by force: This was miserably plundered, and Bourbonville who had defended it to the uttermost, had his Head cut off.

Without doubt the Burgundian was in a great consternation at the taking of it, and more yet when the Flemmings refused to serve him, and sent Deputies to the King to offer him all Obedience. The taking of Bapayne by the Duke of Bourbon, encreasing his astonishment, he sent the Earl of Nevers his Brother to the King then the Countess of Hainault his Sister, and afterwards the Duke of Brabant his other

* Standard so called.

other Brother, who made several Journeys to Court to endeavour to put some stop to the Kings wrath: but nothing less would serve then the Confiscation of all his Lands.

Happily for him the King fell ill again. In this interval, taking breath a little, he got a Garison into Arras, the Princes brought the King thither and besieged the Town. It made an obstinate defence, perhaps encouraged by advice from some of the Besiegers: So that their Army growing tir'd and weak by Sickness, the Countess of Hainault took this opportunity, and solicited the Duke of Guyenne so earnestly, who had all the Authority in his hands, that without consulting the rest of the Princes, he granted a Peace to the Duke of Burgundy.

This was made about the end of September: but the Agreement or Articles were not Signed till the sixteenth of October at Quessnoy. The Conditions were very hard upon the Burgundian; That five hundred of his Men should be excluded from the Indempnity; That several Officers belonging to the King, the Queen, and the Dauphin who favoured him, should be removed; That he should not come near the Court without expresse Order from the King, under the Great Seal, and by Advice of the Council. It was added, That for the Kings Honour, his Banner should be set upon the Walls of Arras, the Governor displaced, and the Burghers obliged to take an Oath of Fidelity to the King.

We have not taken notice what the English did both by Sea and Land these two last years against the French, as being of little importance; nor how they Conquer'd several places in Guyenne, the Earl of Armagnac and the Lord d'Abret siding with them because they had been banish'd from the Court. The Animosity of that Nation would allow of no Peace with France, but their King (Henry V. the Son of Henry IV. who died of a Leprosie the twentieth of March in the year foregoing) sought to make an Alliance with the French, that he might be supported against the inconstant and factious humour of his own Subjects; so that the Duke of York was come into France the preceding year for that very purpose. In the Month of February of this same, his Ambassadors came to make Overtures, and demanded Catharine the Kings Daughter, agreeing to a Truce for a year, to commence from the second day of the same Month.

"A strange Rheum called the Coqueluke, tormented all sorts of People during the Months of February and March, and made them so very hoarse, that the Bar, the Pulpits and Colledges became all dumb. It caused the death of most of the old People that were affected with it.

"Ladislaus, of whom we have made mention, was become Master of the whole Kingdom of Naples: but as he was too much addicted to Women, and besides mightily hated for his Cruelties, he was this year poisoned after a Villanous manner; He found his Death in the Fountain of Pleasure and Life. Jane II. of that name, his Sister, Widow of William of Austria succeeded him; she was then forty years old, and nevertheless, her many years, were so far from quenching her Passions, they rather inflamed them to the highest excess.

"The Council of Pisa had ordained that another general one should be held within three years, and in the mean time was continued by Deputies. At the expiration of that time John XXIII. had called one at Rome for the year 1412. which being not numerous by reason of the troubles occasioned by Ladislaus, was put off till another time. Now the Emperor Sigismund being gone into Italy in the year 1412. about some Disputes he had with the Venetians, the Pope sent some Legates to him, to appoint the place and time for the Council. They agreed upon the City of Constance on the Rhine, and as to the time the Pope assigned it on All-Saints-day of the following year.

"Notwithstanding it was not opened till the sixteenth of the Month by the Pope himself. The Emperor came thither upon Christmas-Eve and sung the Epistle at the Holy Fathers Midnight-Mass, being in the Habit of a Subdean. The second Session was not held till the second day of March following. He was present at divers afterwards, array'd in his Imperial Robes.

"In this Session the Pope sitting on his Throne, being turned towards the Altar, read a Schedule aloud, wherein he promised and gave his Oath that he would renounce the Papacy, in case the two others, Gregory and Bennet, did renounce, or happen to dye. Now, whether this act were by compulsion, or that he had done it without reflecting on the Consequences, he immediately repented, and fearing lest "left they should take him at his word, he ran away by night to the City of Schaffhausen under the protection of the Duke of Austria.

"After he had wandred some Months from one City to another, forsaken by that Duke, and not able to find any that could afford him a secure retreat, he was taken Prisoner, brought back to Constance, and deposed the eighteenth of May by the Council.

"He then made a vertue of necessity, and submitted to the Sentence very calmly. Gregory did likewise submit to the Judgment of the Council, and gave in his Cession by Proxy. Bennet only remained obstinate, and kept himself shut up in his Castle of Paniscote in Aragon till the year 1424. when he ended his days. Even at his death he commanded a couple of Cardinals, who had all along kept him company, to elect him a Successor. They put a Cannon of Barcelona in his place, who took upon him the name of Clement VIII. and King Alphonso caused this Idol to be adored for five years, in hatred to Pope Martin, with whom he had some quarrel, then obliged him to lay down his pretended Tittle Anno 1429.

The Treaty concerning the Peace and Match between France and England was yet continued: and three or four solemn Embassies were sent on either side. They offer'd the King of England Eight hundred thousand Florins of Gold, and to give up to him fifteen Cities in Guyenne, and all Limosin as a Portion for the Lady Catherine. He seemed to give ear to these Propositions: yet demanded every day some new thing to hinder the concluding of it.

His design was to fall upon France, his Subjects desired it with so much passion, that the whole Kingdom would have risen against him, if he had not satisfi'd their longing. It was suspected likewise that he was encouraged to it by the instigation and correspondence of some Traytors; at least he was assured he should have but half the French to deal with, it being impossible for the two Houses of Orleans and Burgundy ever to be united.

When all his Forces were in readines, he made no scruple to declare his Pretensions: and after he had written Letters full of Protections and Threatnings to the King, whom he stiled only his Cousin Charles of France, he came and landed at Havre de Grace at the mouth of the River of Seine, where he put on shoar six thousand Men at Arms, thirty thousand Archers, and all other Necessaries proportionably.

With these he laid Siege to Harfleur. The place defended it self bravely by the courage of four hundred Men at Arms, and seven or eight Lords of that Province that had thrown themselves in there. In fine, it was taken by assault and sacked, perhaps not without some secret intelligence, or at least the cowardize or baseness of the Chiefs of the French Army, who took no great care to relieve them. The blame fell on the Constable d'Albret.

In the mean time the King having set up the Oriflamme or Standard, at St. Denis, got his Soldiers together. The English had lost a great many of their bravest Men upon their Attaques, Diseases reigned in their Army, and a scarcity of Provisions, for they were forced to keep close together, reduced them to great streights. In-somuch as having held his Quarters for three weeks together along the Sea Coasts, they were forced to remove, and took their march towards Calais. They crossed the Country of Caux, the Earldom of Eu, and the Lands of Vimeu, with intention to pass the River Somme at Blanquetaque.

The French Army, which was as yet nothing but a multitude of Rascals pickt up in haste, durst not attaque them in their march: but when the King, who was come in Person to Rouen, had sent fourteen thousand Men at Arms, and all the Princes to them, excepting the Dukes of Guyenne, Berry, Bretagne, and Burgundy, it was resolved they should go and fight them; and instead of strongly guarding the passages over the Somme, whereby to ruine them, they went to way-lay them on the other side of the River, and lodged themselves at *Azincour, in the County of St. Pol.

* Or Agincourt.

The English being tired, seeing the French to be four times stronger then themselves, and believing they should be utterly lost if they came to an Engagement, sent to proffer them reparations for all damages done from the time of their landing in France. But their Offers were rejected; and Battle presented for the next day, being the five and twentieth of October.

1415.

The same causes that made them lose that of Crecy, and that of Poitiers, made them again lose this same, I mean the necessity or desperate condition they reduced them unto, either to vanquish, or to dye, their impetuous precipitation, the confusion in which they fought, all the Chiefs striving to be in the Head; besides the ill order order of their Van-guard drawn up so close, that none but the first Ranks had room to stir themselves, and the inconvenience of the Soil, so fat and slippery with the Rain, and withal so deep that they stood half way the Leg in Myre.

The Field was bestrewed with Six thousand of theirs, and with Sixteen hundred of the English. Amongst the slain were the Earl of Nevers, and Anthony Duke of Brabant, Brothers to the Duke of Burgundy, the Duke of Alençon, the Constable d'Abret, the Duke of Bar, the Marechal de Boucicaut, the Admiral Dampierre, the Archbishop of Sens Brother of *Montaigne, and the Vicount de Lannoi Son of the same; Amongst the Prisoners the Dukes of Orleans and of Bourbon, the Earls of Vendosme and Richemont, and fourteen hundred Gentlemen. The Army indeed victorious, but as much shatter'd as if they had been vanquish'd, had much ado to crawl to Calais; from whence their King Henry went over again into England.

* That Montaigne who lost his Head.

This great misfortune, begot such Civil Discords as made the Wound much greater. The Duke of Burgundy went on with his design of usurping the Government; and he believed this juncture very favourable towards it. But when it came to be known that he was marched to Dijon with the Duke of Lorraine, and ten thousand Horse to come again to Paris, they brought the King back with speed; and the Duke of Guyenne quartered Men in all the places thereabout.

The Burgundian being arrived at Lagny, sent to the King to desire he might come to him, and that the Duke of Guyenne might receive his Wife again, whom he had pack'd away to entertain a Mistress. He was promised satisfaction in this second thing he demanded: but for the first he could never obtain it, he was expressly forbidden to come near Paris but only with his own Servants. There had been no security for him, he found they had put all his Friends in Prison, Hang'd up all his Soldiers they could light upon, and sent for the Count of Armagnac his greatest Enemy to take the Constables Sword.

The mischief proceeded principally from the evil Counsels of certain Plagues in Court, who for their private Interests, promoted the differences between the Princes, and plunged the young Duke of Guyenne into all Debauchery. The University and Parliament made loud Complaints, and moved that young Prince so much, that he did promise to take some order: but in few days afterwards he fell sick of a Loofness, whereof he died the Five and twentieth of December, not without visible marks of Poyson.

The Count d'Armagnac being arrived at Paris the nine and twentieth of the same Month, set aside the Propositions for Peace, envenomed the Sore instead of healing it, and made himself absolute Master of the Government, having obtained the Sovereign Administration of the Treasury, and the Command of Captain General of all the Fortresses, with power to put in what Governors and what Garrisons he pleased.

After the death of the Duke of Guyenne, the Succession to the Crown was to fall to his second Brother John Duke of Touraine. The Earl of Hainault whose Daughter he had Married, had carried him into his Country: all honest Frenchmen wished he might return to inform himself in all Affairs. In the mean time to gain the affection of the People, and shew he was not engaged to any Party, he Commanded both of them to lay down their Arms. The Burgundian, who had stood gaping idly in Lagny, was glad of so fair a pretence to retire. He went back into the Low-Countries, vexed to the very Soul, that his Enemies should deride him and call him John de Lagny, not much in haste.

The Emperor Sigismund desiring to procure the Churches Peace, and also a Peace amongst Christian Princes, made a Voyage into France, and from thence into England, but without any success, because the Constable refused the Truce for four years which he had propounded betwixt those two Crowns. The King received him magnificently at Paris, and was willing he should take his place in Parliament; but it was not so well relished that he should upon any occasion assume the Authority to bestow the Order of Knighthood upon a Gentleman.

"He resolved to erect the Earldom of Savoy to a Dutchy for Amé VIII. and "divers Authors tell us he had made choice of the City of Lyons for that purpose: "but the Kings Officers let him know it would not be suffered, wherefore he performed the Ceremony at the Castle of Montluel in Bresse, out of the Territories of the Kingdom. However the Letters Patents for the said Erection are dated "from Chambery the Nineteenth of February.

"It is fit we observe that ever since the time of the Carlian Race, the Title of Count or Earl was as eminent as that of Duke; and it seems the *Grande*s liked it better, since we find some who having Dutchies yet took the names only of Counts. Such in France was the Count of Toulouse, who held the Dutchies of Septimania and Narbonne; and the Earl of Savoy did the same, though he had the Dutchies of Chablais and Aoste, which he did not omit amongst his Titles. But as Men who in length of time change their humours and fancies, had an imagination that there was something greater in the Title of Duke, Ame VIII. Earl of Savoy was willing to have that Title given to the Earldom he bore the name of.

1416.

France met with nothing but misfortune upon misfortune, the defeat of the Constable before Harfleur which he besieged, then of the Naval Forces upon that Coast, the continual Incurfions of the Burgundian Troops, the death of the Duke of Berry, who was the only Person that could have allayed these Disorders, the King of *England*s second landing, this was at Tonques, with the loss of divers places in Normandy taken by his Forces. Besides all this, the earnest endeavours of both Parties to make an Alliance with him: but the Burgundian with most industry and forwardness, enraged that they had thrust him out of the Government; and the Earl of Hainault his Cousin, to get a support for the Dauphin John his Son in Law, whom the Orleans Faction would deprive of his Birthright, to prefer and advance Charles Earl of Pontieu his younger Brother.

1416.

The new Governor rendered himself daily more odious by Exactions, without measure, equality, or justice, laid upon the Clergy as well as the Laity, for which reason the Parisians heartily desired the Burgundians return: and indeed there was a Plot discovered to have let in his Forces. The chief Conspirators paid down their Heads for it, the rest were imprisoned, all who were suspected banished, even Members of the Parliament and University, the Burghers Arms seized upon, their Chains taken away, and the Butchers Company abolished.

The passion for Government did so far transport the Burgundian that he Conferr'd with the King of England at Calais, and renewed the Truce for his Countries only; which was in some manner an obligation, not to assist the King at all. From thence retiring to Valenciennes, he had confidence with Duke * William Earl of Hainault, and the new Dauphin his Son in Law. They swore mutual assistance against all their Enemies. So the Dauphin declared himself against the Armagnacs, and promised the Duke he would never return to Court till he carried him along with him.

* He was called Duke because in Germany all the Children of a Family bear the same Title as the eldest.

It was therefore resolv'd that the Earl of Hainault should go thither to treat of those Affairs, but should leave the Dauphin at Compeigne. Not being able to obtain the recalling of the Burgundian, he threatened to carry back the Dauphin home with him: whereupon they intended to detain him till he had given up the Dauphin: but having private notice, he craftily made his escape. But they secur'd themselves of the Dauphin another, but a more wicked way, by giving him Poyson, of which he died the eighteenth of April.

Charles his Brother, a sworn Enemy to the House of Burgundy, succeeded to the Title of Dauphin and of Duke of Touraine, and which is more, to a right of inheriting the Crown, to the great satisfaction and joy of the Duke of Anjou his Father in Law, who was mightily suspected to have had some hand in the removal of the two eldest out of the World, that his Son in Law might Reign.

But his joy was not long lived, dying in the following Month of August. He left three Sons, Lewis, Rene, and Charles; the two first had successively the Titles of King of Sicilia. Charles was Earl of Maine.

The Kings Person, the Dauphin, and the City of Paris, were in the hands of the Constable & Armagnac: the Queen only was some kind of counterpoise to his Power. They living with much freedom and licence in her Family, it was easie for the Constable to fill the Kings head with jealousies against this Princefs; so that he commanded one named Bouredon to be taken thence and thrown into the River as a Party concerned in those Intrigues; and afterwards sent away the Queen his Wife, as it were a Prisoner to Tours. She could never be brought to forgive him this injury, nor even the Dauphin her own Son, it being by his consent, although he were not then above the age of Sixteen years.

The Queens confinement, the lamentable death of the two Dauphins, the displacing of a great many Officers, the plundering of all the open Country by the unpaid Soldiers, the depredations of the Armagnacs, who robbed the very Shrines in the Churches, furnished the Burgundian with specious Pretences to publish his Manifesto's, manifesto's, and to send to all the chief Cities to desire they would be assisting towards the restoring the King to his liberty. The most part of those in Champagne and Picardy, with the Isle of France, received him with open Arms, because he put down all Subsidies.

However all was nothing unless he could get into Paris, he marched round about it, approaching or going farther off for two Months together, according to the Advice he had from his Friends that were in the place. Whilst he was besieging Corbeil, he goes away in haste to Tours with some Troops of Horse, and having had a Conference with the Queen at Marmouster, whither she was come purposely under a pretence of taking the Air, he brought her with him to Troyes; From that time she claimed the Regency.

In so favourable a juncture, the King of England failed not to push on his Affairs, Caen; Bayeux, Contance, Carentan, Lisieux, Falaise, Argentan, Alençon, and in fine the greatest part of Normandy surrendered themselves up to him without scarce a blow given, excepting Cherbourg which defended it self three Months; and yet the Constable chose rather to see the Kingdom lost than his Authority, and the Burgundian consented rather to have it dismembered by the English, then governed by his Enemy.

"In Germany there were several Companies of Vagabonds began to strowle about, having no Religion, no Law, no Country or Habitation, their Faces tawny, speaking in a particular Canting Language of their own, and using a Slight of Hand in Picking Pockets, while they pretended to tell Fortunes. They were called Tartars and Zigans. These were the same in my own opinion as those the French at present call Bohemians and the English Gypsies."

"We find in the Acts of the Council of Constance, how the memory of Wickliffe was Anathematiz'd, and John Huss, who treading his steps, had sowed new Doctrines in Bohemia, was burnt alive Anno 1415. notwithstanding he had a safe Conduct of the Emperor, and how Jerome of Prague his Associate, but more cautious then he, chose rather to be condemned absent then present. In the same Council Benet having been declared Contumacious, and intruded into the Papacy, the Cardinals of all Parties joyning together, elected Otho Colonna, who took the name of Martin, as being promoted on the Eve of that Saints day.

He immediately employs his Care and Paternal Authority to endeavour the making a Peace in France. To this end he sent two Cardinal Legats, upon whose solicitation an Assembly was held at Montereau Faut-yonne, where the Deputies on either side agreed upon the Seventeenth of May, that all hatred being laid aside, the Dauphin and Duke of Burgundy should have the Government of the State, during the Kings Life. But the Constable, the Chancellor, and those that had the greatest share in the management of Affairs, fearing they should be pack'd away, or apprehending the *Burgundian*s Resentment, formally opposed it, and the Chancellor did absolutely refuse to Seal the Treaty, he who was said to have Sealed so many Instruments to the Peoples ruine and for his own private Interest.

Paris being sick of the War, this was an excellent Theme to be preached to the People, and stir up their hatred against them, and also to rowze the Burgundian Faction, who had still remained quiet, had not the Populace been drawn to side with them upon this ill management. In fine, those of his Party holding themselves assured of his Affection, introduced into their City Philip de Villiers L'Isle, Adams Governor of Pontoise, by *St. Germain*s Gate.

He entred by night upon the Twenty eight of May with Eight hundred Horse, crying out Peace! and Burgundy! The People did not stir till they were come into the Streets of St. Denis and St. Honore; then they came out on all hands and joynd with them. Tannequy du Chastel, Provost of Paris hearing the noise, ran and took the Dauphin out of his Bed, and wrapping him up in his Night-Gown, convey'd him to the Bastille, and from thence to Melun. The King who was in his Hostel remained in the power of the Burgundians.

From thence spreading themselves over the whole Town, they fell upon the Houses of the Armagnacs, and searched from the very tops of the Garrets to the bottoms of the Cellars. Some plundered the Household Stuff and carried away the Money, but were most eager to seize upon their Persons, and those were least unhappy that were coop'd up in private places till they had paid their Ransoms. Most of them were haled to Prisons, whither a great many fled voluntarily to avoid other mischiefs. The Chancellor was taken the very same day and imprisoned in the Palace. The next day the Constable was dragged to the same place; He had concealed himself in a Masons House, but Proclamation being made to discover all the Armagnacs upon pain of death, his Hoste produced him.

1418. The Banished being return'd from divers parts, with indignation and revenge in their Hearts, made the most cruel Mutiny that ever was heard of; this was upon the Two and twentieth of June. They began with the Palace, whence they drew forth the Constable and Chancellor, Murther'd them, and exposed their Bodies upon the Table de Marbre. From thence they went to the Prisons, Massacred the Bishops of Senlis and de Contances in the Petit Chastelet, and made the rest leap from the tops of the Towers, receiving them below upon the points of their Swords and Javelines. There was no part of the City which was not stained with the Blood they spilt. Near two thousand Men were killed, whose Carcasses were drawn into the Fields, with deep Incisions made upon their Backs in form of a Bend or Scarfe, which was the Signal that Party had marked themselves withal, for distinction. Such as were found with them were held to be worse then Hereticks, the Priests denied them Burial, and Baptism to their Children.

1418. Whether it were Policy or not, the Duke of Burgundy would not come to Paris till a month after L'Isle Adam had made himself Master of it. The Queen and he made their entrance the fourteenth day of July as Triumphantly as if they were returned from the Conquest of some new Empire. There was nothing heard in the Streets but the soft Musick of Voices and Instrumens; and yet their pretence did not stop the bloody hands of Murtherers. Whoever had Money or an Enemy, an Office or a Benefice, was an Armagnac.

The vilest and the most wicked had made themselves the Chiefs of that Blood-thirsty Militia; The very Hangman was one of them; and he had so much impudence as to shake the Duke by the Hand, who knew not what he was.

The One and twentieth of August they made another great Commotion, that infamous Villain being their Captain; in which they killed above two hundred Persons, and amongst others even some of those that dwelt in the Dukes Hostel; and perhaps they would have carried it home to himself, had he not been provided against that Scum of the Rabble. He bethought himself of a wyle, which was to send six thousand of that common Herd to besiege Montleberry, and when they were gone, he ordered the Hangmans Head to be chopt off, and several of the most deserving to be Hanged, or cast into the River.

1418. It seemed that Heaven would revenge those horrible Murthers with its severest Rod; About the Month of June, Paris began to be infected with the Plague, which raged extreamly to the end of October, carried off above forty thousand, most of them being the meanest of the People, and such as had dipt their Hands in Blood.

After the Dauphin was gone from Paris, his Partisans made War in his Name. Those Frenchmen that were disinterested and impartial, found themselves much perplexed between the Kings Commands, whom the Burgundian made to speak as pleased himself, and the Commands of the Presumptive Heir to the Crown; which side soever they could take, they were sure to be treated as Rebels and Traitors.

1418. The Duke of Bretagne labour'd so much that he made up the breach a second time. All the Articles were agreed upon at St. Maurdes Fosse; but those that had influence over the Dauphin kept him from Ratifying them; so that there was only a Truce for three weeks.

1418. After he had taken all the pains imaginable to find out some way to reconcile the two Parties, perceiving as little faith on the one side as the other, he retir'd into his own Country, and renewed his ancient Alliance with the English, only for his defence. When now he thought himself out of all trouble, he found himself fallen into the greatest Peril. Marguerit de Clisson Widow of John de Blois Earl of Poitiers, a Woman ambitious even to the highest Crimes, never left provoking her Sons (she had four in all) to seize upon the Person of the Duke, that they might enter upon the Dutchy of Bretagne, which she told them was their Inheritance. The Dauphins Council offended because the Breton did not Arm himself against the English, Treated underhand with these Brothers, and gave them Letters and Orders to prosecute their design.

To effect this they made use of all sorts of means to get into the Dukes favour, went to visit him at Nautes, gained great Credit with him by their Respect and Complaisance: in fine, engage him to go and divert himself at their House of Chantocéaux in Anjou upon the Second of February. Going thither with his Brother Richard unarmed, and with with little Company, as being unwilling to give them too great trouble, Oliver the eldest of the four, causes him to be set upon and taken by forty Horsemen well armed, who carried them away bound Legs and Arms, to the Castle of Paluan in Poitou: From thence they were removed from place to place all the year round, causing divers reports to be spread, sometimes that they died in despair, at other times that they were drowned, and lastly, that for a Penitance they were both gone on Pilgrimage to Jerusalem, there to end their days.

They had made account that if they could but once catch these two Brothers, they should find strength and friends enough to get themselves into possession of the Dutchy: but the Act was so base, that even their most devoted friends were ashamed to own it. All Bretagne moved with the horror of the Fact and the lamentations of the sorrowful Dutcheis, took up Arms, and sent her above fifty thousand Men to recover her Husband. In the absence of Arthur Earl of Richmond, whom the English would not set at liberty, the Bretons chose Commanders of their own Nobility, to lead them.

Chantocéaux was besieged. The Duke was not then there as they had hoped; but Marguerit de Clisson and one of her Sons were in it. The breach being made, this Womans heart failed, fear seized upon her Spirits, she dispatches Messenger after Messenger to her Son Oliver to intreat him, if he would ever see her again alive, to release the Duke. The Dukes Head was a pawn sufficient enough to answer for his Mothers: notwithstanding he was so weak as to let him go. But he had beforehand made him sign to what Articles he would. The Estates of the Country never regarded them, the four Brothers were brought to their Trial, who were condemned to die, their Houses razed, their Lands confiscated and given to great Men, that so they might never be recover'd again.

During these Brouilleries, King Henry had laid Siege to Rouen from the Month of June. The importance of that City, and the constant fidelity of her Burghers, deserved some care should be taken to relieve them. They first endeavour'd it by treating with the King of England concerning the Marriage with Catharine of France, by the Mediation of the Popes Legats, who for that purpose carried the Picture of that beautiful Princess to him. Then, that Project having failed, he making too high demands, they got some Forces together and carried the King as far as Beauvais: but they were found too weak to attempt its relief. The Besieged being in the greatest extremity make their address to the Dauphin: this was the fairest Jewel of the Crown which was so near being lost: he took no care for it, considering the place as rather belonging to the Duke of Burgundy then to France.

What Miseries did they not undergo? Thirty thousand died of Famine, hunger forced them to eat their very Bed-straw, and all the Leather they could come at. The King of England refusing to receive them on any other terms then at discretion, they undermined five hundred Rod of their Walls, and in their extremity resolved to set fire on the Timbers that propt it, and then fall out of the breach both Men and Women and take their fortune either in Death or Victory. This desperate Resolution gave the King some apprehension, he allows them tolerable Conditions, and was contented with the payment of three hundred thousand Gold Crowns, and three of their Chiefs whom he should name, of those, one called Blanchard lost his Head. Upon these Conditions he confirmed all their Priviledges; He made his entry the nineteenth of January.

The taking of this City brought in all the rest of Normandy; and that Province for some few years returned to the obedience of the English, from whom it had been conquer'd two hundred and fifteen years past, by King Philip Augustus.

They did notwithstanding negotiate between the two Kings, and at the same time between the two Parties of Armagnacs and Burgundians. A Truce for three Months was agreed upon between the two Crowns, after which there was to be an Interview near Melun to conclude on the Peace and Marriage. Men of most Judgment foreseeing France must be ruined if it came to that, never left off till they had made Truce betwixt the two Factions. The Dauphin would have had it for three years, the Burgundian for two Months only; his aim was, that if within that time he could make a full and perfect agreement with the Dauphin, they might with their united Forces fall both joyntly upon the English when the Truce expired, if not, he would make a Peace with them that he might be the more enabled to quell the Dauphinois.

The first not succeeding well, he comes back to Treat with the English. To this purpose there was an Interview between both Kings in a Park prepared for it near Melun, in the midst whereof they had pitched a Tent for the Conference. The King of France

France being fallen ill at Paris, the Queen supplied his place, and carried thither (but only the first time) Madam Catharine whom the King of England sought in Marriage. They met in this Tent frequently almost three weeks together, the King of England coming from Mantes, and the Queen from Pontoise, where they were lodged.

The Dauphins Council knowing what they treated on, sought to the Burgundian for an Accommodation, and flattered him with a perfect Reconciliation. The Duke did ardently desire it; and therefore being pleased with that hopes, he stood on higher terms with the English, and would scarce condescend to any thing that he demanded. Thus they began to shew some coldness, and then were picqued at one another: the Burgundian breaks off the Treaty, and thinks of nothing now but to accommodate Affairs with the Dauphin.

They conferred therefore in the open Field near Povilly le Fort, within two Leagues of Melun between the two Armies, each of them attended by half a score Horsemen; and there they made a Treaty, in which they swore to love and assist each other like Brothers, submitting themselves in case of any failure to the Sovereign Judgment of the Holy See. After which they agreed to meet upon the Bridge de Montereau l'aut-ynne the Eighteenth of August, each accompanied with ten Men armed, to determine all their disputes in a most amicable manner.

The Servants belonging to the deceased Lewis Duke of Orleans, particularly Taneguy du Chastel, and John Louvet President of Provence, procured these Interviews for no other end but to find an opportunity to revenge the death of their late Master upon him that was the Author of it: They durst not attempt it at Povilly, but they put things in better order at Montereau, by the contrivance of certain Barriers, which being made in appearance for the mutual safety of them both, served as a snare or trap to that unfortunate Prince.

The day being come, the Dauphin arrives at Montereau: the Duke made him wait almost fifteen days. His friends forewarning and advice, his own presentiment, all humane prudence and reasoning forbid his going thither: the power of his ill destiny dragg'd him along, by the horrid treachery of a second Dalila, I mean the Lady de Gyac his Mistress; or perhaps it was the hand of Divine Justice, for the Blood of his own Cousin, and so many thousands of Men as had been spilt in that Quarrel.

To allure him the better, they delivered up to him the Castle of Montereau, but wholly unfurnish'd of Provisions or Artillery. From thence he descended to the Bridge with his ten Men, and placed a guard at the end. While he was kneeling before the Dauphin, Taneguy du Chastel and some others, leaping over the Barriers Massacred him by several wounds, his People making but a slight defence, only this act was done without the Dauphins order, for he was not above Seventeen years of age, and Heaven would never have permitted a Prince designed to wear the Crown of France, should have perpetrated so horrible and base a piece of treachery. However it were, the event made it appear how much those wounds did blemish his Honour, and not only proved hurtful to him, but almost mortal to the whole Kingdom.

For Philip the only Son of the deceased, although a very good Prince, highly undertakes to revenge his Fathers death, and wanted not for means to do it. All that were friends to that House, all those that were discontented came and tendred their service to him: compassion and horror for this Murder renewed and heated the affections even of such as were grown coldest; the Parisians sent to assure him of their Services; and he to gain the love of the People obtained a Truce of the English, to the exclusion of the Dauphins People who were come to Rouen to desire the same thing, for which they made great profers. From this time the French, the English, and the Burgundians, began to mix and live together as if they had all been but one Nation: but the difference of their humours and interests, would suffer no long unity amongst them.

On the other hand the Dauphin gathered up all his Friends in the Provinces of Poitou, Orleannois, Berry, Auvergne, Lyonnois, Dauphine, Provence, and above all thought to secure himself of Languedoc. He took away that Government from the Earl of Foix, and gave it to Charles Count de Clermont, eldest Son of the Duke of Bourbon. From these Provinces it was that he drew his Succours that maintained him. Besides, the Kings of Castille and of Scotland, with the Duke of Milan, suppli'd him in his necessities with some of their Forces.

Accord-

According to what had been agreed upon, the King of England and Philip Duke of Burgundy, met at Troyes, where the King and Queen were; and there the Peace was Treated together with the Marriage of Catharine of France with King Henry. Which was first sworn to by all the Lords there present, and then by all the good Cities that were of their Party. The Marriage was compleated the Second day of June.

This Treaty amongst other things contained; That King Charles named and owned Henry for his Heir to the Crown of France; That however Henry should not take the Title of King of France during the life of Charles; but that he should have the quality of Regent, and the government of Affairs; That the two Kingdoms of France and England should be united and held by the same hand, viz. by Henry and his Heirs: but that they should not depend upon one another, and should be governed according to their Laws; That all Privileges and Rights should be preserved to all Estates and to every particular Person; That no Treaty of Accommodation should be made with the Dauphin without the consent of both the Kings, the Duke of Burgundy, and the three Estates of both the Kingdoms.

The two Kings afterwards with the Burgundian having taken Sens and Montereau, journeyed towards Paris. Melun made the King of England know how much all France might cost him: he was four Months before it, and not able to force it: Famine only did what his Sword could not. The Besieged surrendered upon composition, but contrary to the faith given, they were all detained Prisoners.

At their departure from thence, the two Kings made their entrance into Paris, the first Sunday of Advent; and the next day the two Queens. The Duke of Burgundy having tender'd his complaint before them and their Councils, in the Hôtel St. Pol, the Dauphin was summon'd to the Table de Marbre with the usual formalities; and afterwards as attainted and convict of Murder, was declared unworthy of all Succession, namely of that to the Crown of France, and banished the Kingdom to perpetuity.

From this Sentence given by incompetent Judges against all Right, and contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom, he appealed to God and his Sword, and transferr'd the Parliament and University to Poitiers, at which place the most illustrious Members of those two Companies did not fail to appear.

Thus almost every thing was double in the Kingdom, there were two Kings, two Regents, two Parliaments, two Constables, two Chancellors, two Admirals, and so of most of the great Officers, not to mention the multitude of Marshals of France, whereof each Party made seven or eight.

"This year 1420. the Portugal Navigators defray'd and encouraged by Henry Duke of Viseu Son of John King of Portugal, sailing at large in the Ocean found in their midway between Lisbonne and the Fortunate Islands, a little Island which they named Madera, because it was full of Wood or Materials fit for building. From thence steering along the exterior coasts of Africa, they there discover'd several large Countries, and in time failed to the East-Indies, which till then were unknown, at least those parts towards the Sea. Pope Martin, and after him his Successors, bestowed upon the Portugals all those Lands by them discover'd or to be discover'd, from the Cape which lies at the end of Mount Atlas, to the Indies.

When the King of England had sojourned some weeks at Paris, he laid Siege to the City of Meaux; the only place the Dauphin had left, upon the Rivers of Seine and Marne. After a three Months brave defence, the Besieged capitulated the ninth of May; the Inhabitants had their lives and liberties: but all the Soldiers were sent Prisoners to divers places, where they let them cruelly perish for hunger. The Bailiff named Lewis de Gas, had his Head cut off in the Halles at Paris. The City taken, King Henry went into England to draw over a new supply of Men and Money.

"So great was the fondness of the French for the Conquest of the Kingdom of Naples, that Lewis Duke of Anjou forgetting those disasters of his Father and Grandfather, and abandoning his own Country to the mercy of the English, suffers himself to be cajoled by the promises of the Pope and Sforza, who called him to dispossess Queen Jane, a Princess lost in her Reputation by her continual Gallantries or Amours. The Affairs of Lewis being in a pretty good posture in that Country, Alphonso King of Arragon, who held the Island of Sicilia, undertakes the protection of Jane, she having adopted him her Son, Sforza does reconcile himself to her; and in a word there was nothing left for the poor Angevin but the way to walk home again.

1421. One of the first seeds of division between the English and the Duke of Burgundy, was about Jacqueline Countess of Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Friseland. After the death of John Dauphin of France, they had Married her to John Duke of Brabant Son of Anthony and Cousin German to Duke Philip: but the young Gossip not being satisfied with her second Husband, a Man of little merit, prosecuted for a Divorce, and confederated with some Captains to carry her away, as it were by force, into England, where she Married Humphrey Duke of Gloucester Brother of King Henry. This undertaking turned much to the contempt of Philip, who besides observed that the English began to treat him with more pride, and endeavour'd to settle their affairs as they might have no further need of him.

1421. The War was very hot in every Province on this side the Loire, particularly in Champagne, Picardy, and in the Countries of Perche, Maine, and Anjou. The Duke of Clarence Brother to King Henry having got together eight or ten thousand Men went and besieged Bauge, in Anjou: John Earl of Bouchain a Scot, and the Mareschal de la Fayette marched to its relief, gave him battle and won it. He was slain upon the place with two thousand of his Men, the rest escaped through the Country of Mayne into Normandy. This Earl of Bouchain had brought three or four thousand Men from his own Country to the Dauphins service, in recompence he gave him the Constables Sword.

1421. The Field being clearly left to the French, the Dauphin accompanied with his new Constable and the Duke of Alençon, regained some places in the Countries of Perche and the Chartrain. In the mean time Henry being come back from England with a great reinforcement, and in a rage and fury for the defeat and death of his Brother, did endeavour all that was possible to meet with the Dauphin. He marched by Chartres and Chateaudun, lodged in the Suburbs of Orléans, and not meeting him in the Field, but a violent Dysentery that took off three thousand of his Men, he falls upon the City of Dreux, which being surrendered upon Composition, he goes to rest himself at Paris, and sends over his Queen, who was great with Child, to be deliver'd in England.

1421. Whilst he lay at the Siege of Dreux, an honest Hermit unknown to him, came and told him the great evils he brought upon Christendom by his unjust ambition, who usurped the Kingdom of France against all manner of right, and contrary to the will of God; wherefore in his holy name he threatened him with a severe and sudden punishment, if he desisted not from his Enterprize. Henry took this exhortation either for an idle whimsy, or a suggestion of the Dauphinois, and was but the more confirmed in his design.

1422. But the blow soon followed the threatening: for within some few Months after he was smitten in the Fundament with a strange* and incurable Disease, the acuteness of its pain, made him go to Senlis to seek for cure.

The Queen his Wife was a while before this returned out of England, having brought forth a Son to whom they gave the same name as his Fathers. Both she and her Husband made their entry with great splendour into Paris, and kept open Court at the Louvre upon the Feast of Pentecost, each Crowned with their Royal Diadems: but the People that went to see the Ceremony, had cause to regret the liberalities of their ancient Kings, and detest the niggardliness or pride of the English, who gave them none of their good Cheer, nor did vouchsafe to profer them one Glass of Wine.

The Dauphin in the mean time had besieged the City of Cosne on the Loire, and the place had capitulated to surrender, if they were not relieved by a prefixed day, with an Army able to give them battle. The Duke of Burgundy got a great number of Men to go thither, the Dauphin being informed of his march, did not think fit to stay for him, but raised his Siege.

1422. The King of England, though already indisposed, was gotten into his Litter that he might be present at this memorable Action. While he was at Melun his distemper increased so much that he could proceed no further, but made them bring him back to Vincennes, where he died the eight and twentieth day of August. He had only one Son who was named Henry, he left him to the education of the Cardinal of Winchester his Uncle, who bred him in England, gave the Government of that Kingdom to the Duke of Gloucester, and the Regency of the Kingdom of France to John Duke of Bedford, to whom he recommended above all things to give content to the Duke of Burgundy, never to make any Peace with the Dauphin unless Normandy were yielded to be left in full Sovereignty to the English, and not to release those Prisoners that were taken at the Battle of Azinconr till his Son were come to his majority.

The

The one and twentieth of October following, King Charles VI. the weakness of whose Brain, stupified with so many relapses, made him a prey to every one that could but come to deal with him, ended his Life, and his unhappy Reign in his Hostel of St. Pol at Paris, attended only by his first Gentleman of the Bed-Chamber, his Confessor, and his Almoner. His Funeral was at St. Denis: no Prince of the Blood went to it, not even the Duke of Burgundy, who was ashamed to give place to the Duke of Bedford. This last as soon as the Ceremony was over, caused young Henry his Nephew to be proclaimed King of France.

Charles VI. Reigned two and forty years and five and thirty days, and lived fifty two. He had by Isabella of Bavaria six Sons, the three first of them died in their infancy, the other three Lewis, John, and Charles appeared on the Theater: and the last survived him and Reigned. He had the same number of Daughters, Isabella, Jane, Mary, a second Jane, Michel and Catharine. The first was Married to Richard II. King of England, then to Charles Duke of Orléans; the second died in her Cradle, the third devoted her self to God in the Convent at Poissy; the fourth Married John VI. Duke of Bretagne, the fifth Philip, who was Duke of Burgundy, and the last Henry V. King of England.

Before him the Kings of France were wont at all Ceremonies to appear with all their Regal Ornaments, and wear some marks about them every day, as their Robes lined with Ermines, and a Crown upon their Hoods or their Hats: In the Army a Coat of Armour sem'd with Flower-de-Luces, and a Hoop with Flowers pretty high upon their Helmets: This King neglected all these Ornaments, and did not distinguish himself at all from other People, so that he seemed to have degraded himself of all Royalty.

That Quarrel which Pope Boniface had with King Philip the Fair, was the Rock whereon the Papal Power both Spiritual and Temporal was split and shipwreck'd, which till then had Master'd and Lorded it over the Emperors and other Western Princes. The translation of the Holy See to Avignon brought them lower yet, by removing them out of their natural place, and laying open their defects, which exposed the Court of Rome to the great contempt and scorn of all that did but make the least observation on their ill Conduct. But to say the truth, France that thought to aggrandise it self by this Spiritual Power of the Popes Court, gained nothing but their Vices, with the plague of Litigious Disputes, and the Malerio, or extraordinary Taxes. But if the multitude of Cardinals were an advantage to the State, France might have vaunted that she alone had as great a number as all the other parts of Christendom besides.

We have seen how Clement V. promoted to the Papacy by a method not strictly Canonical, extinguished the Order of the Templers who were found to be all guilty in France, but innocent in divers other Countries. John XXII. was the first who made it a fixt and permanent right to reserve the Fruits of vacant Benefices for the Holy See.

He bestowed the same Honour on the Bishoprick of Toulouze: but thinking it too rich and of too great extent, he divided it into five, whereof Toulouze is one, Montauban, Lavaur, Rieux, and Lombers are the other four: which he would have to be its Suffragants, as also Mirepoix and Lavaur created new by him. Moreover he restored the Bishoprick of Pamiez to that of Toulouze, which had been taken away and brought under Narbonne by Boniface VIII. when he erected it.

To recompence Narbonne in some manner, he made two more in the same Territory, these were Alet, whose See was first at Limoux, and St. Pont de Tomieres. He likewise made four for that of Bourges; Castres of a portion of that of Alby, St. Flour of part of Clermont, Vabres of part of Rodez, and Tulles of part of Limoges.

He likewise erected four for the Archbishoprick of Bordeaux which had been dismembered, Condon from the Territory of Agen, Sarlat from that of Perigueux, Mallezais and Lucon from that of Poitiers. Most of these sixteen Churches were Abbies changed into Bishopricks, and their Abbots converted to Bishops.

The Popes return to Rome was attended with a Schism of forty years, which troubled all Christendom: but afflicted France particularly, overthrew the Discipline of Elections and of Collations; filled all the Churches with Mercenary Pastors, nay hungry Wolves, and afforded all her Revenues; not only by ordinary Taxes upon each of them, by Annats, and Rights of Provision: but by extraordinary Taxes and Tenth.

The Princes, first the Duke of Anjou, then the Duke of Berry, and after him the Duke of Oyleans favoured the cupidity of the Popes of Avignon, that they might share in the prey; the Cardinals gorged themselves: the Prelats either for want of courage, or in hopes of getting into fatter Benefices, gave their consent; the lesser ones were so much under the pawes of the Wolf, they durst not so much as open their mouths. The University of Paris alone opposed these disorders, and notwithstanding the Princes menaces, the corruptions of the Court of Avignon, the tricks and artifices of the Popes that were Competitors, they saved the Temporals of the Gallican Church, and restored the Universal Churches Peace by extinguishing the Schism.

And truly this great work is in the first place due to their zeal and labour, and in the second place to the care and perseverance of the Emperor Sigismund, who called and maintained the Council of Constance, and who made divers Voyages into Italy, France and Aragon, to establish Unity and Peace.

University.

There was not in all the Kingdom, so powerful a Body as the University, as well for the multitude of her Scholars, which sometimes exceeded the number of thirty thousand, as because she was the Nursing Mother of all the Clergy of France. The remonstrances she took the liberty to make to the Princes, the care she had to procure the reformation of the State during the troubles, and that which hapned to Savoisy, are very strong proofs of it. But we will add two more. The one, that in the year 1304. the Prevost of Paris having caused a Scholer that was a Clerk to be hanged, they carried their complaints to the King and left off their Exercises till they had satisfaction. He was fain to go to the Pope for his absolution. The other was thus, in the year 1408. William de Tignonville, who was at that time in the same Office, having likewise sent a couple of Scholars to the Gallows who well deserved it, but were Clerks, was forced together with his Lieutenant to go and unhang them, to kiss their Feet, and cause them to be brought with great ceremony to the Maitburins, where yet their Epitaph is to be seen.

We find by the Letters of Pope John XXII. that the Oriental Languages, the Greek, the Arabian, the Chaldean, and Hebrew were taught in the year 1325.

Learned Men.

There sprung up, if we may so say, a vast quantity of excellent Plants in this fertile Nursery. I cannot tell whether I ought to reckon the Scholasticks in the number since they have brought forth more Thorns and Prickles than either Flowers or Fruit that is wholesome. Henry of Ghent, John of Paris, John Duns the Scot, all lived in the beginning of this Age, which was the Fourteenth Century: but perhaps some would rather have them placed at the latter end of the Age foregoing: the two first were Secular Doctors, the third a Cordelier. Of the same Order were Aureolus, Mayrons, Okam, and de Lyrz. Peter Aureolus amongst other Works, composed a short and pithy Commentary upon the Bible. The Criticks may examine whether we must distinguish him from another of the same name and of the same Order, a Native of Verberie upon the Oyse, who was a Cardinal. Francis de Mayrons having been rejected at the Sorbonne, would needs, to shew his ability, maintain an Act, where without having any President, without eating or drinking, without rising from his Seat, he answer'd from five a Clock in the morning till seven at night. Since that the other Batchelors pretend to imitate him. And from hence came the Act which they name the Grand Sarbonnique. William Okam by birth an English Man, wrote of the power of the Popes and Emperors against John XXII. Nicholas de Lyrz, a Native of the Diocess of Evreux in Normandy, whom they say was Originally an Hebrew, compiled a Commentary or Postil upon the Bible, of which great use is yet made.

From the Order of the Dominicans came Bernard de Guy, Inquisitor of the Faith against the Albigensis, Bishop of Lodeve, of whom we have divers Volumes, as well of Holy History as Profane; Durand de Saint Pourcain Bishop of Meaux; William de Rance Bishop of Sees, Confessor to King John; Herve Noel, by birth a Breton, General of the Order, and Contemporary with Durand; Peter de la Palud a Burgundian, Patriarch of Jerusalem.

Amongst the Seculars we find William Durand Bishop of Mandes, called the Speculator, who composed the Book Entitled Speculum Juris, it was he made likewise the Rationale Divinorum Officiorum. He lived in the beginning of this Age, about twelve or fifteen years before the other Durandus Bishop of Meaux. The Cardinal Bertrand Bishop of Autun. Nicholas Oresme Grand Master of the Colledge of Navarre, Dean of the Church of Romen, and Tutor to King Charles V. who made him Bishop of Lisieux, who amongst other Works translated the Bible into French, which was perhaps the first Translation that ever was seen in our Language, that is to say in *French Romance, for there had been one in French Tulesque, even in the time of the second Race.

King Charles the Wise will not disdain to be placed in the number of the Learned, since he is beholding for his Wisdom in some measure to the Writings of Learned Men, whose Eloquence and Politiques, drawn from examples in History, did both animate and instruct his Captains.

May not France also reckon amongst her Learned Men the famous Petrarque, since he spent so great a part of his Life here, though he were Originally a Floure tize, and was both born and buried beyond the Mountains. This great Genius having in his youth exercised his Pen for his Mistress Laura, repented a terwards his having trifled away so much time, and imploy'd it afterwards in works that were more Philosophical and more Christian-like.

We must own that in this Age, as in the last, the Jacobins and the Cordeliers, furnished the Roman Church with a great number of Bishops and Cardinals, and that they were so powerful, that if they had but wisely managed their prosperity, the favour of the Grandees, and the affection of the People, they might have made themselves Masters both of the Church and State. But they retarded their progress by their own faults; and if we may say, it hung Clogs upon their own Feet which hindered their higher flight; the Jacobins in being so stiff to maintain their old opinion about the Conception of the Virgin, and the Cordeliers in commenting with too much severity upon the observation of St. Francis's Rules, and Philosophising too Metaphisically, touching propriety of Goods which are consumed by the use of them.

John Duns the Scot had taken up the Cudgels against St. Thomas: In all which Controversies he came short of the solidity of that Angelique Doctor, though he had great advantage in the point of the Conception of the Holy Virgin, maintaining that it was perfectly and entirely Immaculate, wherein he varied from the Master of Sentences. This opinion appearing more to the honour of the Mother of God, and more suitable to the zeal of devout Souls, was embraced by most Christians. The Jacobins having stumbled at it, lost themselves mightily in the esteem of the World: however the Question was never fully debated till about the latter end of this Age.

Disputes.

The Cordeliers had their time of suffering likewise, for in a few years after they were brought so low they came almost to nothing, even as the Templers before them. A pretence for the strict observation of the Rules given by St. Francis, without admitting those interpretations of the Popes Nicholas III. and Clement V. had possessed divers Monks of that Order with such crude and ambitious imaginations, as caused them to be divided into Parties, who rambling from one Country to another, confounded them almost with the Bischoes and the Frerats, who were Hereticks indeed. John XXII. endeavoured to cure them of this obstinacy, but not prevailing with them, he threatned Excommunication. They, far from obeying him, retired into Sicilia, where they prescribed amongst themselves Rules very strict, but withal very ridiculous, made choice of a General, Provincials and Guardians, and began to live as independent from the Holy See. Their fancies carried them yet further, for they had the confidence to affirm that there was a Carnal Church over-grown with Riches and Vice, of which Church the Pope and Bishops were the Prelats; and likewise a Spiritual one, girded with Poverty, adorned with Vertue, which consisted only of them and such as were like them, in whom was all Authority, as well as Sanctity: That the Rule of St. Francis was the same thing as the Gospel, and nothing therefore that was contained therein could possibly be changed. But the Pope pursued them so close, that by burning, whipping, and shutting them up between four bare Walls, he made an end of them.

Others at the same time debated the Question concerning Property, with as much heat and contention. Nicholas IV. had declared by his Bull, that they were to have only the use of those things that were given them, and that the propriety belonged to the Roman Church. Now it hapned that a Begard whom in Anno 1322. they had brought to the Inquisition at Toulouse, having reply'd that neither our Lord Jesus Christ nor his Apostles had possessed any thing either in common or in particular: One Berenger who was Lecturer in their Convent, undertook the affirmative, and maintained it was an Article of Faith, and very far from any thing of Error. The difficulty was laid before the Pope at Avignon; Whilst he was ordering it to be examined by all the Universities, the General Chapter of the Friars Minors assembled at Perouse, declared that they would hold to the Decretal of Nicholas, which said it was so, and as for that abdication of all propriety, it was certain that Jesus Christ and his Apostles had taught it both by their Preaching and Example. Which having by their Letters signifi'd through all Christendom, and all their Doctors teaching the same in their Schools, and in their Pulpits. John XXII. nettled for that they had prevented his Judgment, declared that the assertion in reference to our Lord Jesus Christ and his Apostles, was erroneous, for they might have sold, changed, or given away the things that were presented to them; and for the Friars Minors, That the Bull mentioned was not to be understood of things that consumed, because the propriety of such things cannot be separate from the use of them, but only of immovables; For which he forbid them to make any further prosecution or proceedings in the name of the Roman Church. For under that colour they troubled many People, and often contended with the Prelats.

All this was but words and air; for whether they had the property, or simply the use only of the Meat and Drink bestow'd upon them, they neither eat nor drank more nor less; nor could the Pope have any advantage by it, whether it were so, or not so. These Bulls nevertheless did so anger them, that a great many went to the Emperor Lewis of Bavaria with their General Michael de Cefene. The others that did not follow them in their Schism, however stood stiff in the maintenance of their opinion, saying that John XXII. was an Heretick in this point. Neither was he sparing to them in his Ecclesiastical Censures, nor in punishing them with Faggot and Fire. A great number of them were burnt in several Countries Anno 1324. and such had a cheap and easie bargain of it, that had nothing but their Writings condemned to the Flames, as it luckily hapned to Peter John de Serignan one of their Readers in Theology.

I fear I should fall into the ridicule should I set down the disputes they had about the colour, the fashion, and the Stuffs for their Cloaths, whether they ought to be white, black, grey, or green, whether their Hoods or Capouches should be pointed or round, large or streight, whether their Garment was to sit loose or close to their body, long or short, Cloth or Serge. We shall only observe that concerning these Debates they were fain to Consult as much with his Holiness, hold as many Chapters, assemble Congregations, publish Books and Manifesto's, as if the whole weight and being of Religion and Christianity had depended upon it.

At the same time, Philip Son of the King of Majorca, and Cousin to the King of France, took a fancy to have this Rule observed, in its pure literal sense, as not to live but by the labour of their hands, and by Alms: but to preserve their full liberty, to own no Superior, and to ramble wherever they pleased. The Pope having deny'd him his Request, he vented his anger against him in the same terms as the Begards and the Minors of Michel de Cefene.

The same Spirit of presumption possessed two Monks of the same Order, John de Roquetaillade, and one Haibalus, (if at least they were two distinct Persons) who undertaking to speak against the abuses of the Court of Avignon, and withall to make Prognosticks of Divine Punishments that were to fall upon the Pope and his Cardinals, of the coming of Antichrist and the end of the World, were detained a long time in Prison by Pope Innocent VI.

These fogs thus obscuring the Order of the Friars Minors being dispell'd, they soon recovered their credit: But the Preaching Friars or Jacobins, who had gotten the upper hand in this, went and entangled themselves in the Controversy concerning the Immaculate Conception. It befell them what we have observed elsewhere in speaking of John de Monteson. To which I shall add, that they moreover lost the honour and priviledge they had enjoy'd so long while of providing the King with a Confessor of their own Order, and the Peoples hatred grew so outrageous against them, that some beggerly Rascals having poisoned the Wells and Fountains, these were accused as Authors thereof, and hardly did they escape the fury of the Populace.

It would be an easie Task to fill a whole Volume with the wicked Prelats of this Age, who sailed and steered by the Compass of the Court and Wind of the World, who dishonoured their Profession, betray'd the Body of the Church by flattery, or sold her for Interest, and in fine chose rather to be famous for their Crimes, then for their Acts of Piety. I shall observe only for the singularity of the Fact, that Hugh de Gerand Bishop of Cabors, whom Pope John XXII. degraded of the Episcopacy, for having conspired against him, and deliver'd him over to the Secular Power, who caused him to be Flayed, drawn on a Hurdle, and burnt alive. The names of those other wicked Pastors deserve as little to be inserted in History as in the Holy Canon: But the names of St. Roch, born of a noble Family at Montpellier, much called called upon in a time of Plague, of St. Gertrude, a Nun at Delft in Holland, of St. Peter of Luxembourg made a Cardinal by Clement VII. Pope in Avignon, of John Peter Birelli General of the Chartreux, and Roger le Fort Archbishop of Bourges, of Peter d' Alenfon of the Blood of France, who enroll'd himself in the Order of St. Francis, and was afterwards made a Cardinal much against his will, are worthy of — and immortal remembrance.

Besides the Begards, the Bisoches, and the Frerots who appeared in the former Age, and the Flagellants, of whom we are going to speak, if there had been any other errors in France we might have called them the Offspring of School-Divinity. One John de Paris of the Jacobins Order, to whom they had given the nick-name of Point-lasne, subtilized I know not what Proposition touching the situation of the Body of Jesus Christ in the Eucharist; the Bishops, William of Paris, Gilles of Bourges, and another William of Amiens, with the Doctors in Divinity having examined him, forbid him to teach any more.

Heresies.

In the fourth Tome of the Biblioth of the Fathers, we find that in Anno 1347. the Bishop of Paris together with the Doctors, condemned certain Propositions made by one John Mercour of the Order of Cisteaux touching Volition and the Will of our Lord, the causes of Sin, and other such like, which sounded but ill.

In the year 1348. we find that a Doctor named Nicholas d' Ourecour, was forced to retract from sixty Articles which he had framed upon divers Heads of Philosophy and Divinity, owning them to be false and Heretical, and the Books wherein they were contained were ordered to be torn and thrown into the Fire.

The year 1369. a Frier Minor named Denis Soulechat, had taught some errors concerning the renouncing of Temporal Goods, and about Charity, and the perfection of Love, which being condemned by the Faculty of Divinity; he appealed to the Pope, who confirmed their Judgment, and sent him back to Paris to retract them in the presence of John de Dormans Cardinal Bishop of Beauvais.

The great Plague which reigned over the whole Earth about the middle of this Age, begot a Spiritual one, which was the Sect of Flagellants, which taking birth in Hungary, spread it self in short time over Poland, Germany, France, and England. They carried a Cross in their Hands, and wore a Capouch on their Heads, were naked to their Waist, scourged themselves twice a day and once in the night with knotted Cords, stuck with sharp pointed Rowels, prostrating themselves upon the ground in form of a Cross, crying out for Mercy. Each Band had their Chief. These Pious beginnings degenerated into Heresie by their own pride, and their herding with the Begards, Rascals, and all sorts of idle People. They affirmed that their Blood was united in such manner to the Blood of Christ, that it had the same vertue, and that after thirty days scourging, all their Sins were remitted both as to the guilt and punishment, so that they did not care for the Sacraments. This phrensy lasted a great while in the subsequent Age, and neither the Censures of the Church, nor the Writings of Learned Doctors, nor the Edicts of their Princes, could purge the Brain of these melancholy Zealots.)

There started up another sort of Hereticks that were more pleasant, but more infamous withall, in Dauphine and Savoy, they were called Turlupins. These lived without any shame, like the Cynick Philosophers, prayed not but with their hearts, and believed that Men who were perfect ought to have a liberty of Spirit not subject to any Law.

That Opinion which Pope John XXII. endeavoured to set up touching the state of the Soul till the day of Judgment, had, it seems, been very common in the foregoing Ages: but the World had examined and consider'd it better: so that for a long while it had passed for an error. The University therefore corrected the Holy Father in that point, and he not only desisted from it himself, but likewise gave a publick Act of his Retraction, whether upon King Philip de Valois his threats, who sent a Message to him in these very words, That * if he did not retract, he would have him burnt, or rather his being better satisfied in the Point.

The grand Assemblies being formidable to all such as govern by absolute Authority, rather then by Law, there were very few Councils in this Age. I have told you to what end that of Vienne was held Anno 1311. some will have it a General one, because Pope Clement V. presided there, and it consisted of a great number of Bishops and Prelats.

In the year 1318. Robert de Courtenay Archbishop of Reims convened one at Seulis, where his eleven Suffragants were in Person, or by their Proxies. They there pronounced Excommunication against all those that were Usurpers or Detainers of the Churches Goods.

* Or, if you will not turn, you shall burn. Councils.

The Eighteenth of June of the year 1326, the Archbishops of Arles, Aix, and Embrun, assembled the Prelats of their Provinces in the Abby of St. Ruf* near Avignon, to labour for the reformation of Manners, the establishment of Discipline, the preservation of Ecclesiastical Immunities, and the Hierarchical Authority over the Regulars.

Anno 1337. there was another at the same place and from the same Provinces, which treated about the same things. Pope Bennet XII. presided there.

That of Lavaur in the year 1368. composed of three Provinces, Narbona, Toulouze, and Auscb, and convened by the Authority of Pope Urban V. had for their chief aim the reformation of Manners.

We must not omit that in the year 1377. King Charles V. used his intercession to Pope Gregory XI. to order it so, that the Bishoprick of Paris might be no longer subject to the Metropolis of Sens, and that it might be honoured with the Pall like the other Bishopricks in France. His Holiness excused himself as to the first point, as a thing too prejudicial to the Church of Sens, whereof Clement VI. his Uncle had been Archbishop, and where himself had held one of the highest Dignities: but for the second he willingly granted it. However we do not find that the Bishops of Paris ever thought of making use of it.

CALIXTUS III. Elected in April 1455. S. three years three Months.

PIUS II. Aeneas Silvius, Elected the 19th of August 1458. S. six years, whereof four under this Reign.

CHARLES VII. Called the Victorious, King LIII. Aged Twenty years eight Months.

THE Dauphin was at the Castle of Espailly near du Puy in Auvergne, when he received the news of the death of his Father. The first day he put himself into Mourning: the second he Cloathed himself in Scarlet, and after he had heard Mass, in the same Chappel made them set up the Banner of France, upon sight whereof all those Lords that were then present with Pennons of their Arms, cried out Vive le Roy!

The English and the Burgundian held the best Provinces of France, they had Normandy entirely, and all that is between the Scheld even to the Loire and the Saône, excepting some few places which Charles had yet here and there. As for his part he had only all that lies beyond the Loire, excepting Guyenne: but then he had all the Princes of the Blood on his side (the Burgundian excepted) the best Captains, and the bravest Adventurers or Volunteers; as the Bastard of Orleans, Taneguy du Chastel, James and John de Harcour, Lewis de Culan, Lewis de Gaucour, the Mareschals de la Fayette, de Rieux, de Severac, de Boussac, Poton de la Hire, Stephen de Vignoles-Saintrailles, Ambrose de Lore, William de Barbasan called the Knight without reproach, and a great many others: and indeed he purchased them at a dear rate; for he was constrained to engage his Castles and the best part of his Demeasnes in pawn for them. Now because during his first years he commonly resided in Berry, his Enemies nick-named him in raillery the King of Bourges.

In the beginning of November he was Crowned at Poitiers whither he had transfer'd his Parliament. The accident that hapned to him at Rochel some days before, was a kind of preface that he should fall into extream dangers, but yet should happily get out of them at last. Holding one day a grand Council in a House near the Walls of the City, the Floor sunk down under his Feet, James de Bourbon Lord de Preaux was crushed beneath the Ruines, divers others mightily bruised and hurt: they had much ado to pluck him out, but he had no other hurt then only some parts of his Skin rubb'd off.

In like manner at his first coming to the Crown all was in a tottering condition threatening to overwhelm him. The Duke of Bretagne enraged for that amongst the Papers belonging to the Lords de Pontieu they had found Orders, which authorized and warranted them to make him Prisoner, went his way to Amiens about mid-March

March with his Brother Arthur Earl of Richmond, where he made a League against him with the Duke of Bedford and the Burgundian. These four Princes confirmed their Alliance by a double Marriage of the Duke of Bedford, and the Bretons Brother Arthur, with two of the Burgundians Sisters; he had seven in all, whereof six Married, Arthur took the eldest named Marguerite, Widow of the Dauphin Lewis, and Bedford the fifth who was called Anne.

1423. There appeared not the least glimpse of good fortune for King Charles, he received melancholy news from all Quarters, the taking of Meulan, Crotoy, Compeigne, and Bas in Gascogne. But the worst of all was that of the defeat of his Men before the City of Crevent near Auxerre. The Earl of Salisbury had laid Siege to it: the Constable de Bouchain and the Marechal de Sevrac who went thither to relieve it were beaten, a thousand of their valiantest Soldiers lay dead upon the place, and almost as many led away Prisoners, amongst whom were the Constable and the Count de Ventadour.

1423. The Birth of his first Child, which came into the World in the City of Bourges the fourth of July, did for a time afford him some consolation: This was a Son whom they named Lewis.

1423. "The Council of Constance had by their Forty four Session appointed a Council at Paris for the year 1423, so few Prelats met there that they were fain to transfer it to Sienna. When they had held some Sessions, Alphonso King of Aragon endeavoured by his Ambassadors to bring the business again on foot concerning the Anti-Pope Peter de Luna; which he did in revenge for that Martin V. had denied him the Investiture of the Kingdom of Naples, which he could not possibly grant him, because the Council of Constance had bestowed it on Lewis III. Duke of Anjou. Now Martin to prevent a Schism, could find no readier Expedient then to dissolve the Council, upon pretence of a Plague in the Neighbourhood, though there appeared no sign of it. But that it might not be suspected he in the least apprehended the Judgment of so Holy an Assembly, he aligned another in the City of Basle, or Basil, for the year 1430.

* Vulgarly
Said.
1423. "Some jealousy and mistrust arising, which afterwards grew up to hatred betwixt Jean Queen of Naples and Alphonso King of Aragon whom she had Adopted: This ungrateful Man endeavour'd to dispossess her, and carry her away by force into Catalonia. They fell to open War, he held his Benefactress a long time besieged in one of the Castles at Naples, and without doubt had forced her to surrender, if Sforza had not come to deliver her. This offence, in respect of the publick, and according to strict Rules of Law, was cause enough to annul the Adoption. Jean (or Joan) therefore sets it aside, and by the advice of her Barons, gave the same right to Lewis III. Duke of Anjou, whom she immediately called into Italy, caused him to be owned by her Subjects, and gave him the Duchy of Calabria.

1424. The year 1424. proved not more happy to King Charles then the foregoing one had been. True it is that the Earl Douglas a Scot brought him four thousand Men, and the Duke of Milan sent him six hundred Lances, and twice as many Cross-bowmen on foot: but they were almost as soon defeated as arrived. The Duke of Bedford after the taking of some places, had besieged Troy which had capitulated after the manner used in those times, to surrender upon the Twentieth day of August, if no Army appeared before that time expired, able to give battle. Upon this the Constable, the Duke of Alencon, and seventeen or eighteen Lords more, got all their Forces together, and marched near the Town of Troy: but not daring hazard a battle, they went all to Verneuil, and made him that kept it for the English believe they had gained the Victory, and by this Stratagem wrought upon them to open the Gates to them.

The day assigned for the Battle being past, Troy surrendered. Bedford the same moment went and fought them out under the very Walls of Verneuil, fought them and carried the day, having slain four thousand of their Men, and taken Prisoners the Duke of Alencon, the Marechal de La Fayette, Lewis de Gaucourt, and above three hundred Gentlemen. Amongst the dead were found Earl Douglas, and the Vicount de Narbonne. The Body of this last was quarter'd and set upon Stakes in several places, he being an Accomplice in the Murder of John Duke of Burgundy.

1424. On the other hand the King drew over Arthur Earl of Richmond to his Party, with hopes by his means to regain the Duke of Bretagne. This Earl had ever a Soul devoted to France, and hated the English the more, for that he had offended them in making his escape from thence after the death of Henry V. pretending the the faith he had given, obliged him only to that King, but not to his Successor. He had afterwards patch'd up an agreement with the Duke of Bedford, at their interview at Amiens: but that tie was too weak to hold him; he forsook them upon some little piquant words, which passed between him and the Duke of Bedford, and Treated with King Charles, perhaps, not without the instigation, or at least the consent of the Duke of Burgundy.

There were a great many precautions before he could adventure to come to Court, they were fain to give him Lords and Towns in Hostage. Having his securities he saw the King at Tours, but he obliged himself to nothing till he had taken advice of the Duke his Brother, the Dukes of Burgundy and Savoy.

After all these Formalities, he came to wait upon the King at Chinon, and from his hands received the Constables Sword in the Field of Chinon in presence of all the Lords the Seventeenth of March 1425. as the Bretons tell us, though there is a Chronicle that says it was in the Month of November 1424.

He was positively promised the King would dismiss all those that were of Counsel for the Murder committed at Montreuil, and in that for seizing the Duke of Bretagne. The most fixed of all these was Louvet the President of Provence who had an ambition to govern in despite of all the Grandeess. He chose rather to be the ruin of his Master whom he had strangely fetter'd, then to be thrust away from him, so that he found means by his contrivances to animate him against the Constable: but the Constable made his Party so good, that the King found himself abandoned of all the Grandeess, and all his places refused obedience to him, excepting Selles and Vierzon.

Then he saw it was high time to discharge Louvet and all the rest. Taneguy generously sacrificing his fortune to serve his King, begged leave to be gone as his Reward. Louvet upon his retreat, as his Master-piece of Court-craft, put the Lord de Gyac in his place.

The Constable had no little ado to reconcile himself to the King, who fled before him that he might not see him. At length he suffers him to approach that he might get assistance of the Breton. Who being in the end satisfied by the expulsion of his Enemies, came to him at Saumur, rendred him Homage, and gave him his Contract, and the Contracts of all the Lords within his Duchy under Hand and Seal, commanding them to go upon his Service. They did him but little good, but they might have done him a great deal of hurt.

The Seventh of September, Charles the Noble King of Navarre ended his Life; Blanch his only Daughter Married to John the Brother of Alphonso King of Aragon was his Heiress.

As on the one hand these Broils prejudiced the Affairs of King Charles, on the other hand the Quarrel which hapned between the Duke of Burgundy and the Duke of Gloucester, about Jacqueline Countess of Hainault and the Duke of Brabant her lawful Husband, did much retard, nay set back those of the English, forasmuch as it diverted the Forces of those two Princes, who would undoubtedly have wholly subdued France, had they joyned them to the Duke of Bedford. Jacqueline would not endure that the Duke of Brabant, whom she affirmed was nothing to her, should enjoy her Lands; and the Duke of Gloucester who had Married her, did serve and assist her in that Quarrel. The Duke of Bedford desiring not to distaste the Duke of Burgundy, endeavour'd to patch up some agreement between the Parties: the Duke of Brabant submitted, but Gloucester regarded it not, but still pursued the right of his pretended Wife with Sword in hand.

He and the Burgundian pickered by Letters, and went on so far as to defie each other to a Personal Combat, agreeing upon the time, the place, and the Weapons. The Duke of Bedford having assembled the chiefest of the French and English Lords, brought that Challenge to nothing, and declared that there was no just or legal cause for Combat. And to testify to the Burgundian that he had no hand in the Enterprizes of his Brother, he desired they might see one another at Dourlens, as they did upon the Eve of St. Peters day.

This did not hinder them from making a brisk War in Holland, where the Duke of Gloucester and the Duke of Burgundy tried their Forces: but at two years end, the Pope having declared that the Marriage of Jacqueline with the Duke of Gloucester was of no value, that Prince desisted from his prosecution, and Married a Damisk whom he entertain'd.

The English had taken and fortified the City of Pontorson nigh Auranches, from whence they perpetually molested Bretagne; the Constable laid siege to it and regained it in a short time. He was not so happy at Saintle James de Beuveron which they had repaired: His Soldiers having forsaken him for want of their pay, he made a shameful retreat and left all his Artillery and Equipage to the Enemy. Pontorson was afterwards besieged by the English, and having surrender'd, the Duke of Bedford came to the Frontiers of Bretagne with a great Army: upon which the Duke was so astonished that he renounced the Alliance he had made with France, returned to that with England, and promised to do Homage to King Henry.

The shocks great Captains meet with, does often times proceed from the malice and envy of those that are of the Kings Council, whose care and province it is to provide for the subsistence and payment of the Armies. The Constable knew that Gyac was the cause of his disaster, because in stead of sending him Money, he stop'd the current from running that way, and diverted it to his own use, and entertained his Prince in solitude and private pleasures, that he alone might enjoy his Person and his Favours. For this reason in the Month of January following he went with a strong hand to surprize him in his Bed at Issoudun, and after some slight formalities of Justice, caused his Head to be cut off, or as others relate, drowned him.

Another Gentleman named le Camus de Beaulieu, undertook to supply the place of Gyac, and tread in his footsteps: some while after People were amazed to see the Constable rid himself of him, as he had done of the other. The Marechal de Boussac by his order, slew him in the open Street, and almost in the Kings sight, in the City of Poitiers.

He remembred too well what the Favourites had contrived at Montreuil, and against the Duke his Brother; wherefore he would suffer none to be near the King of whom he was not well assured, he therefore places the Lord de la Trimouille at Court, whom he judged to have sentiments contrary to the two former, his House owing all their good fortunes and rise to the Dukes of Burgundy.

But this Man soon blinded with his new fortune, as well as those whose post he now had taken, he kept the Princes as much at distance as he possibly could, so that even the Constable himself retired into Bretagne. This proceeded to a kind of a War, which divided the Court and retarded all the Kings Affairs for seven or eight Months.

27.

It would be endless to take notice of all the Sieges, Fights, and Enterprizes in these Wars both Foreign and Domestick. There was not a City or Burrough but had Garrisons, Forts and Castles were built in all convenient places, upon Hills, on Rivers, in narrow ways, and in the open Fields. Every Lord had his Soldiers, or to speak more properly, his Bands of Robbers, who maintained themselves by feeding on the poor Country People. I shall therefore mention only the most remarkable Events, in this place, that the French raised the Siege of Montargis in the year 1426. and the year after recovered the City of Manse, which had been taken by the English during the divisions of the Court.

The Siege of Orleans was yet much more memorable and more important. The Earl of Salisbury having brought new Forces out of England, began it upon the Twelfth of October of the year 1428, and made several Bastilles or Forts, as well on the side towards la Beausse as that towards Soulogne, having before cleared all the places in la Beausse, and all others for twelve or fifteen Leagues both above and beneath the Town along the River of Loire.

1428.

All the year 1428. the Duke of Burgundy was busied in the Low-Countries in pursuit of Jacqueline of Bavaria. He followed her so close, that having besieged her in the City of Ghent, he compell'd her to declare him Heir to all her Lands, so that to Flanders and Artois he joyned Hainault, Holland, Zealand, and Frise; and again the same year, the Earldoms of Namur and Zutphen, after the death of Count Theodoric, who sold them to him, only reserving the possession to himself during his life time. Two years after, in Anno 1430. there likewise fell to him the Dutchies of Lothier, Brabant and Limbourg, the Marquissate of the Holy Empire, and the Lordship of Antwerp, by the decease of his Cousin Philip of Burgundy, the second Son of Anbony, who had succeeded to Duke John his elder Brother, Husband of Jacqueline, who died in the year 1426.

In the beginning of this year he went to Paris to the Duke of Bedford; whither came also some Ambassadors from King Charles, and Deputies from Orleans, to intreat him that he would suffer the said City to be sequestred into the hands of the Duke of Burgundy. They remonstrated that the Princes of the House of Orleans who were Prisoners in England, could have acted nothing, for which they ought to be disposed of of their Towns, and that it would be sufficient to put them under Sequestration as a security for what they should do, when they were set at liberty.

The English believing this important City was now as good as their own, scoffed at the request: they would not lose the time and Money they had expended in the Siege; Besides Bedford granted but very little of those things which the Burgundian demanded. However that he might not be exposed between two Enemies without any Party to support him, he put on the masque of an apparent satisfaction upon the face of his discontent.

Their attacks at Orleans were very brave, and the defence of the Besieged much braver yet; the Earl of Salisbury lost his life by a Cannon shot: but the French having been beaten near Rouvray at their falling upon a Convoy of Herrings* which was going to the Camp, it was in Lent, and the Constable being retired Malecontent into Bretagne, the place was just going to fall, and the courage of all the French with it. The King was already disposing himself to retire into Dauphine; When a most extraordinary thing, pulled down the English pride, and raised up the hopes of France.

* It was called the Battle of Herrings.

About the end of February the Lord de Baudricourt Governor of Vaucouleurs in Champagne, sent a Maiden to the King, about the age of Eighteen or twenty years, who affirmed that she had an exprels Commission from God to relieve Orleans, and cause him to be Crowned at Reims, being solicited thereto by the frequent apparitions of Angels and Saints. She was named Joan de Arc, was Native of the Village of Danremy upon the Meuse, Daughter of James of Ave and Isabella Gautier, and bred to keep Sheep in the Country. Her Vocation was confirmed by miraculous proofs, for she knew the King, though meanly habited, amidst the throng, from all his Courtiers. The Doctors of Divinity and those that were of the Parliament who examined her, declared that there was somewhat of Supernatural in her behaviour; She sent for a Sword that lay in the Tomb of a Knight, behind the high Altar in the Church of St. Catharine de Fierbois, upon the Blade whereof were several Crosses and Flower-de-Luces graved; and the King openly affirmed that she had devined a very great secret, not known to any but himself.

They gave her therefore a suitable Equipage and some Forces; yet did they not trust the conduct of this relief to her management, but gave it to the Marechal de Rieux, and the Bastard of Orleans, followed by many other brave Knights who understood the Trade. When she had display'd her Banner whereon there were two Images, one a Crucifix, the other the Annunciation with the Sacred Names of Jesus-Maria, she wrote to the English in the name of God, That they should leave the Kingdom to the Lawful Heir, if not, then she would make them go perforce. But they kept her Herald Prisoner. He was found in Fetters when the City was relieved, and it was discover'd that they intended to have burnt him as a Contederate of hers whom they called a Witch.

The success made good her threatnings. From that very day all their Affairs declined; When she had thrown Provisions into Orleans, and soon after entred the City in Person, the Besieged believing her to be sent from Heaven, resumed courage, made divers Salleys, where she fought valiantly, and in two or three days took their chief Bastilles, and constrained them to decamp for good and all the Twelfth day of May.

The French ran up and down every where with this Heroine as to a certain Victory, the English fled before her as from a Thunder-Bolt, and durst not stand her approach. They were chased from Jargeau, from Beaugency, beaten at Patay in Beausse upon a retreat, and in fine dislodged from all the places in those Countries.

Touching the second point of her Commission, she over-ruled it in the Council that the King should go to Reims to be Crowned, though that City and all Champagne were yet in the Enemies power. In their passage Auxerre, Troyes, and Chalons surrendered to the King, then the City of Reims it self, (as soon as ever those Lords that held it for the Duke of Burgundy, were gone forth to fetch some assistance from Burgundy) he was Crowned upon a Sunday being the Seventh day of July by Renauld de Chartres Archbishop of that City and their Chancellor.

In recompence of these so important Services, the King Ennobled the Pucelle, her Father and her three Brothers, and all their Descendants even by the Females, changed the name of their Race, which was of Arc into that of de-Luce, or Lily, and for their Coat of Arms gave them a Field Azure with a Sword placed in Pal, the Cross and Pommel Or, accosted with two Flowers-de-Luce, and sustaining a Crown of the same upon its point.

Upon his return they gave him up Laon, Soissons, Beauvais, Compiègne, Crespy, and all the Cities even to Paris. The Duke of Bedford came and presented him Battle in the Plain of Montepilloy; the Armies were in sight, but parted after some Skirmishes. From thence he went to assault St. Denis, and made an attempt upon Paris; his Men were repulled with loss, and the Pucelle wounded at the foot of the Wall.)

(She was willing to have returned to her own Village, after she had executed the two points of her Mission: but was overpersuaded by the Soldiery to stay with them: which succeeded not so well for her, Heaven being not obliged to assist her in what it had not commanded her to undertake.)

That attempt failing, the King takes his march towards Berry. En passant he recovered Lagny upon the Marne. Soon after he made his approach near Burgundy, thinking to conclude an Agreement which was Negotiating at Auxerre with the Duke: but the business was not ripe.

But his good fortune was put to some kind of stand, by the differences at Court which lasted almost a year, concerning the Vicounty of Touars, which the Lord de la Trimouille had usurped, and held Lewis d'Amboise in Prison, whose Cause the Constable had taken in hand, as being of his Kindred. La Trimouille had so prepossessed the Kings mind, that he made him turn his Sword against his Constable; and by this means gave the English time to breathe.

The raising the Siege of Orleans had not much troubled the Duke of Burgundy, if he had not found the Kings success go on with greater speed than he desired. He was little less amazed at this suddain revolution, then the Duke of Bedford. He who had lately scorned his intercession in the Affair of Orleans, began to seek and court him with submission and earnest application. On the other hand the Kings Agents offer'd him an Accommodation, and granted him a Pass-port to come to Paris, upon some hopes they had that he would reduce them to the obedience of the King. But when he had conferr'd with the Duke of Bedford, he found it better to renew with the English, who gave him a Blank, and together with that the Countries of Champagne and Brie, only the Homage reserved.

1429, and 30.

The Duke of Savoy and Lewis de Chalon Prince of Orange and Partisans of the Duke of Burgundy, had promised to themselves to share the Country of Dauphine betwixt them: Grenoble and the Mountains, were to have been the Dukes, and Vienne for the Prince Lewis de Gaucour Governor of that Country for the King soon spoiled the Market; He gained a great Battle between Colombiez and Anton against the Prince, slew and took eight hundred Gentlemen, and afterwards seized upon all the places he held in those Countries. It is related that in the rout, the Prince chose rather to leap into the Rhosne on Horseback, Armed, and venture to swim over, then fall into the Enemies hands.

Towards the end of this year 1429. the City of Sens was reduced to the obedience of King Charles. Melun recover'd themselves, by shutting their Gates against the Garrison who had been making inroads in Gastinois. The Kings kindness to such Cities as returned to him, was a great bait for others to do the same.

1430.

At his departure from Paris the Burgundian returned to the Low-Country, where on the Tenth of January he Wedded in second Marriage Isabella Daughter of John I. King of Portugal. Then was it that to grace the Solemnity at Bruges, he instituted the most illustrious Order of the Golden Fleece, composed only of thirty Companions or Knights; nor did he quite fill up that number, making then but twenty four. The King of Spain as Heir to the House of Burgundy, holds it an honour to be their Chief, and maintains it in all its splendour, not only by the great dignity of those on whom he bestows it, but likewise by not making it cheap by too great a multitude.

1430.

Amongst the many Sieges in every Province, that of Compeigne was the most remarkable for the disgrace the Burgundians met with, as being forced to raise it, and much more yet by the Pucelles misfortune, who was there taken Prisoner the Four and twentieth day of May, upon their retreat after a Salley made, the misfortune hapning to her by the imprudence or else the malice of William de Flavy Governor of the place, who shut her out of the Barricado. She fell into the hands of a Gentleman of Picardy, who sold her to John de Luxembourg one of the Generals, he sold her again to the English for the Sum of Ten thousand Livers ready Money, and five hundred Livers yearly pension.)

1430.

The wonders of this Shepherdess having succeeded so well at Orleans, as we have mentioned, Renard de Chartres Chancellor of France, the Marechal de Bouffac, and Poton de Saintailles, (resolved to go to Rouen upon the faith of a simple Shepherd, who told them that God had sent him to lead them into that place: but the English having notice of it, way-laid and fought them in their march, defeated part of them and took Poton Prisoner.

Poton

An Arragonian Captain named Francis de Surienne, who was in the English Service, surprized the City of Montargis after this manner. Having made himself familiar with a Damsel who was in Love with the Governors Barber, he promised her great Sums of Money, and a Contract of Marriage, if she would introduce his Men into the place thorough her House which was adjoining to the Wall. The Damsel gained the Barber with the temptation of Money, without mention of the other part concerning her Marriage; Both of them assisted the English in setting up their Ladders, and getting in: but the place being once taken they were turned out, for fear they might play the same trick again by some bargain for the French, and got nothing but scoffs and reproaches for reward.

In exchange the French surprized the City of Chartres, by the contrivance of a Fellow that carried Goods in a Wheele-barrow. Whilst he pester'd the Draw-bridge with his load of Merchandize, a hundred Men running out of a Cellar hard by, where they had lain hid that night, and upon a Signal by them given, the Bastard of Orleans and Gaucour who were within a League, hastned thither with three thousand Men. The Garrison without striking a blow fled to Evreux by another Gate. Some Burghers made resistance by the example of their Bishop (John de Fritigny) a zealous Burgundian, but he was slain with his Weapon in hand upon the steps of the great Church.

1431.

The Pucelle was a Prisoner of War, and they could use her no otherwise without violating the common right of all People. But the English too much enraged for their being beaten by a Maiden, could not endure her glory who caused their shame. They thought to repair their honour by branding her with infamy; so that having obliged that remnant of an University which yet remained at Paris, to make a Request to their King, desiring Justice might pass upon her, they carried her to Rouen, and accused her in the Ecclesiastical Court, for a Witch, a Seducer, an Heretick, and one that had forfeited her honour.

Those were the four heads of her Accusation, but which they proved very ill, as being unable to make out any thing clearly against her, but only that she cloathed her self in the habit of a Man, and had taken up Arms, which they imputed a Crime, because, said they, that change of habit stained the modesty of her Sex, and flatly contradicted the express command of God against it. Peter Cauchon Bishop of Beauvais, in whose Bishoprick she was taken, the Vicar to the Inquisition, some Doctors in Divinity and Canon Law, were her Judges; the Chapter of Rouen during the vacancy of the See, lending them place.

After divers captious interrogatories, they condemned her to perpetual imprisonment, the bread of sorrow and bitter water of affliction: but the English not being satisfied with moderate injustice, pressed them so earnestly that some days afterwards they said she had relapsed in putting on the Habit of a Man again, Excommunicated her and delivered her over to the Secular Power, who burnt her alive the Thirtieth day of May in the Market place of Rouen.)

Being on the Pile of Faggots she foretold the English that the hand of God was lifted up to strike them, and that his Justice would not only drive them out of France, but pursue them even into England, and make them suffer the same calamities and mischiefs they had inflicted on the French. It is related that her heart was found entire amongst the ashes, and that a milk white Dove was observed to fly out of the midst of the flames, a token of her innocence and her purity.)

"Charles Duke of Lorraine died in the year 1430. without any Male Children. "There was a debate for the succession between Antony Earl of Vaudemont his Brother, "who pretended that Dutchy was Masculine, and Rene d'Anjou already Duke of Bar, "who had Married Isabella, who was but the third Daughter of Duke Charles, but "the two elder had renounced the Dutchy. The Burgundian in hatred to the House "of Anjou, the capital Enemy to his, and the Duke of Savoy his Allie, assisted Antony, and fortune was kind to him in the Battle that was fought between Bullegneville "and Neufchâtel in Lorraine. For Rene's Army was totally routed, Lord Bazan a "great Soldier slain, and Rene taken and led away to Dijon to the Duke of Burgundy, "who detained him till the year 1437.

After

1431. After the death of the Pucelle the English Affairs went still worse and worse. To remedy this they brought their young King to Paris, and Crowned him with a double Crown in Noître-Dame the Twenty seventh of November; and withal the better to retain the Duke of Burgundy, who was ready to start from them, they confirmed the donation of the Countries of Brie and Champagne to him.

1431. The Lord de la Trimonille made ill use still of his favour and interest against the Constable and the rest of the Lords. One day, he being with the King at the Castle of Chinon, they by confederacy brought two hundred Men in thither, who took him in his Bed, gave him a wound in the Belly, and led him Prisoner to the Castle of Montreuil. The Queen her self consented to it, and therefore soon appealed the King: and that his fancy which never could be satisfied without some particular favourite might not be left unfurnished, she helped Charles of Anjou Earl of Mayne to gain the Kings good will and more then ordinary kindness. La Trimonille was not set free till he deliver'd up the City of Tonars, which he had usurped, and the King in an Assembly of the Estates at Tours owned all that had been done in respect to him.

1431. "By vertue of what had been ordained at Pavia by the Council and the Pope, the Council of Basse * began this year upon the Three and twentieth of July under Eugenius IV. who newly succeeded to Martin V. There was never any good correspondence between him and the Fathers of this holy Assembly. For if on their part the Fathers at the very first gave him to understand that they would put some curb to his Authority, by stoutly maintaining that ancient rule, That the Council is above the Pope: he on his part made them know that his greatest desire was to dismiss or dissolve them. But as he could not so suddenly do it, because the Emperor upheld them, he was obliged to confirm the Council after two years of Controversies.

1431, 32, 33, and the following. The War was carried in all the Provinces of France with various success, but very feebly. Do not wonder to see it languish in this manner for seven or eight years together, the weakness of both Parties was the cause thereof; they wanting Money could set no great Armies on foot. Add to this the weakness of the two Kings, Henry of England for his minority, and Charles of France for the easiness of his mind, still held in leading-strings by his Favourites and Mistresses.

1431. "The Twenty fourth of November in the year 1431. Lewis of Anjou King of Naples, died at Cosenza in Calabria without any Illue. The Second of February the year following, Queen Joan, or Jane, ended her life also, and left Rene the Brother of Lewis to inherit her Kingdom. The Pope confirmed this Institution; but as Rene was yet a Prisoner to the Duke of Burgundy, Alphonso King of Arragon had full leisure to seize upon the Kingdom. In this Jane ended the first Branch of Anjou, which had produced above thirty other Sprigs, furnished Hungary and Poland with Kings, and lasted near two hundred years.

1434. "Ame VIII. Duke of Savoy, wearied with the noise and perplexity of Sovereignty, had made his retreat to the delicious Hermitage built by himself at Ripailles, and taken on the habit of a Hermit with two more Gentlemen his Confidants, having resigned his Estates to Charles his Son Earl of Geneva, whom he had Married some years before to Ame Daughter of Janus King of Cyprus.

1435. Amongst an infinite number of petty Combats hapning within these two or three years, I do not meet with any that was considerable but that of Gerbroys a little City near Beauvais. Saintraille and la Hyre had undertaken to fortifie it, and the English to hinder them; These although three times more in number, were beaten, the Earl of Arundel their Achilles mortally wounded with a Culverin Shot in his Heel, and eight hundred of their Men left dead upon the place.

1434, and 35. The earnest intreaties of the Council and the Pope to the Duke of Burgundy, did at length incline his good nature to shew his just resentment, and to take pity of the miseries of France. His Treaty had been first begun and rough-drawn by Ame Duke of Savoy, who in the year 1423. had mediated a Truce between the King and him, for the Dutchies of Burgundy and the Earldom of Nevers on the one part, and Bourbonnois, Beaujolais, Lyonnois and Forez on the other. Then it proceeded a little further at Nevers in the interview of Charles Duke of Bourbon and the Burgundian, whose Sister Charles had Married. These two Princes having accommodated those Affairs that were between them, concerning the Homage for some Lands which the Duke

Duke of Bourbon refused to render him, and for which they had made a rude War for some time, began to fall into discourse of the Affairs of the whole Kingdom, and agreed together that there should be a Conference held at Arras, to find out the best means for procuring Peace between the two Crowns, and between the King and the Burgundian.

According to this Resolution there was held at Arras the greatest and the most noble Assembly that ever this Age had heard of. All the Princes of Christendom had their Ambassadors there, the Pope and the Council each their Legats; The Harbingers took up Stabling for ten thousand Horse. This was opened the Sixth day of the Month of August.

The Duke was obliged in honour not to Treat without the English, provided they would be satisfied with reasonable Conditions. They were profer'd Normandy and Guyenne, if they would do Homage for them: but when he found they would relinquish nothing of their Pretensions, he disengaged himself from them, and made a separate Treaty, the Popes Legat having absolved him of that faith he had given them. The Popes did often practise this, believing it a part of the power which our Lord Jesus Christ had given, to bind and unbind. Here is the Summary of the chiefest Articles.

"The King by his Ambassadors disown'd that he had consented to the Murther of "Duke John, wickedly perpetrated and by wicked Counsel, for which he was sorry "with all his heart; Promised he would do justice, and cause such as were guilty to "be prosecuted whom the Duke should name to him; That if they could not be "taken, he would banish them from the Kingdom for ever, and never admit them "upon any Treaty.

"He obliged himself to build for the Soul of the deceased Duke, the Lord de Novailles, "and of all those that died since in that quarrel, a Chappell at Montreuil on the place "where the Body of that Duke lay interred, to set up a Cross on the Bridge, to "found a Monastery or Chartreuse where should be twelve Friars, and a high Mass "that should be sung every year in the Church at Dijon. To pay fifty thousand "Gold Crowns, at 24 Carats, &c. for the Goods and Equipage taken, when the Duke "was Murther'd.

"Moreover he relinquished and acquitted him of all Homage due for any Lands he "held of the Crown, and his Service and Personal Assistance during his life.

"Gave him to perpetuity for him and his Heirs Males and Females, the Countries "of Mascon and Auxerre, the Lordship of St. Jenson, the Bailiwick of St. Laurence, "the Castlewick, or Chastelleny of Bar upon the Seine, and as security for four hundred thousand Crowns, payable at two certain terms, the Chastellenies of Peronne, "Roya, and Montdidier: and the Cities of the Somme, that is St. Quentin, Corbie, "Amiens, Abeville and others. As also the County of Pontieu on either side the "Somme, and the enjoyment of the County of Boulogne for him and the Heirs Male "of his Body, with all the Rights of Tailles, Gabelles, and Imposts, all profits of "Courts of Justice, of the Regalia and all others arising from all those Countries.

"That the Burgundians should not be obliged to quit the St. Andrews Cross, even "when they were in the Kings Army; That in case of any contravention of the Subjects both of the one and other of these Princes should be absolved from their Oaths "of Fidelity, and should take up Arms against the Infringer; That the King should "tender his submissions for the compleating of this Treaty into the hands of the Legats from the Pope and the Council, upon pain of Excommunication, Reagravation, Interdiction of his Lands, and all other to which the Censures of the Church "can extend; That to the same purpose he should give the Seals of the Princes "of his Blood, the Grandees of the State, the most noted Prelats, and the greatest "and chiefest Cities.

And to make this Reconciliation the more firm and durable, there was added the promise to bestow Catharine the Kings Daughter, upon Charles Earl of Charolais the Dukes Son, both as yet very young. Four years after they sent this Princess to the Duke of Burgundy to compleat the Marriage.

Besides this weighty blow which amazed the English much, they received another, which was the death of the Duke of Bedford Regent in France, after whom they never had any but Men that were very violent, hare-brain'd, without either prudence or conduct. The French in the mean time took Diepe by Escalado; and the kind usage they shewed to the Inhabitants brought them all the places of the Country of Caen.

1435. At the same time, which was about the last day of September, died the Queen Mother Isabella de Baviere, in the Hôtel de Saint Pol at Paris, where she lived in a mean condition since the time of her Husbands death, justly hated by the French, and ingratelously despised by the English. Some have written that to save the expences of her Funeral, they conveyed her Corps in a small Boat to St. Denis, attended only by four People. Her death is attributed to an inward grief occasioned by the outrageous raileries of such as delighted to tell her to her face, that King Charles was not the Son of her Husband.

1435, and 36. One of the greatest faults they committed, after they had refused the offers made them at Arras, was their not treating the Duke of Burgundy well, their giving him reproachful language, and not suffering him to be Neuter as he desired; but to fall on his People wherever they met them, endeavouring to surprize his places, and harrasing him so perpetually that at length they constrained him to become their utter Enemy.

The Parisians comparing the pride and wretchedness of these Strangers with the courtesie and magnificence of their Natural Kings, could no longer endure them; or if any thing did yet with-hold them, it was some remainders of that affection they preserved for the Duke of Burgundy; But this knot being broken, they now sought nothing but the opportunity to free themselves from their Bondage.

1436. The English having therefore been beaten at St. Denis by the Constable, the honest Citizens of Paris took that opportunity to treat about their surrender to him. Having obtained an Act of Oblivion and the confirmation of their Priviledges in such form as they desired, they introduced him by the Gate called St. James; This was on the Friday after Easter. When he was entred, the People fell upon the English on all hands, crying out, a la queue; Many had their Brains beaten out in the Streets, the rest escaped to the Bastille, where they made composition. All the little Neighbouring Forts were an Accessory to this Reduction.

* Or, Have at their Tails.

In the Month of August following, the King recalled the Parliament, the Chambre des Comptes and the University thither.

The English had declared themselves Enemies to the Duke of Burgundy by all Acts of Hostility upon his Countreys, and by underhand-dealings to stir his Subjects up to Rebellion, in those days very much knit to and concerned for England, as well by Commerce and Trade as out of a real hatred they had towards the French. He would therefore needs revenge himself by taking of Calais, which he esteemed no great difficulty, and laid Siege to it with a numerous Army. In the midst of this Enterprize, the Flemmings finding it spin out to a great length, fell into an imagination that they were betray'd, and herding together in several small parcels, on a suddain made up all their packs in great confusion, leaving their Provisions and Artillery behind for want of Waggons to carry them off. All that their Duke could possibly do for them, was to cover them with his Cavalry, lest the English should have charged them, and after that to follow them.

The Duke of Gloucester, who had sent word that he was coming to give him Battle, not finding him there, entred into Flanders, where he increased their former jealousy by his burning all those places he came near.

1437. It was impossible for Rene of Anjou to obtain his liberty of the Duke of Burgundy, without paying him an extraordinary Ransom, yielding up several places, and consenting to a Marriage between his eldest Daughter whose name was Yoland, as then but nine years old, and Ferry eldest Son of Anthony Earl of Vaudemont, the means whereby Lorraine returned to the Males of that House.

1437. In the interim they carried the King into Lyonnois and Dauphine to make Moneys in those Countries; and the following year he went even to Languedoc for the same end. Upon his return he laid Siege to Montreuil Faut-yonne which submitted not till after a long resistance. From thence he came to make his entrance into his good City of Paris the fourth of November; and then he might truly call himself King of France, having replanted his Throne in the capital City of his Kingdom.

1438. These long and tedious Wars did necessarily produce great licentiousness and daily Robberies. The Soldiers not being paid lived at discretion, and the extream scarcity of all things, rendered them most inhumane. There were divers Bands, commanded even by the Kings best Officers, who under colour of seeking for subsistence, ran from Province to Province, rising all they could lay hands on. Those called *Escoucheurs, and then the *Redondens, committed strange disorders.

* Flayers, * Shavers.

By these ravages, the flight of the Husbandmen and Peasants who neither ploughed nor sowed, and the continual Rains during two years, 1437, and 38. ensued a great Famine, and then a horrible Mortality over all France, especially at Paris and its Neigh-

Neighbourhood. That City was so depopulated the Wolves came and devoured Children even in the midst of the Street St. Anthoine. They were forced that they might rid themselves of those Beasts greedy of humane Flesh, to make Proclamation that any one should have twenty Solz a piece for every head of a Wolfe they brought to the Magistrate.

"Pope Eugenius and the Council of Rasle, or Basil, were imbroiled to that height, that Eugenius declared the Council dissolved, and called another to Ferrara; and on the other hand the Prelats that were at Basil having summon'd him divers times to come thither, began to think of deposing him, with the greater confidence, for that the Most Christian King seemed then to favour them, having forbid the Prelats of the Gallican Church from going to Ferrara.

"This Discord in the end turned to a Schism, he that might have extinguish it hapning to die. I mean the Emperor Sigismond who ended his days in Moravia the Eighth of November 1437. Albertus Duke of Austria his Son in Law, succeeded him in the Kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia, and the year following in the Empire by the suffrages of the Electors.

"The Clergy of France, ever since the translation of the Holy See to Avignon, had suffered infinite oppressions by the Court of Rome. And therefore the King having assembled them at Bourges to find out some way to reconcile the Pope to the Council; who had each sent their Legats: they embraced the opportunity which they could never have since the Council of Constance, and made their remonstrances touching those insupportable abuses. The King desiring to provide against it, order'd them to apply the most convenient remedies. To this end, by advice of his Council, they framed that so celebrated Reglement, called the Pragmatique, which preventing any the like Enterprizes of the Court of Rome, might well be termed the Bulwark of the Gallican Church.

"Eugenius transferr'd his Council of Ferrara to Florence, where they treated concerning the uniting the Greek to the Latine Church, their Emperor John VI. assisting with a good number of his most illustrious Prelats. But in the mean while those who were assembled at Basil, though reduced to a small number, and not well agreed amongst themselves, deposed Eugenius and elected Ame VIII. Duke of Savoy, who had retired himself, as was before related, to the solitude of Ripaille. France, Germany, and most part of the West paid their obedience to him during the life of Eugenius: but after his death, all of them almost turned to Nicholas V.

"Two years after Rene was delivered from captivity, he went into his Kingdom of Naples, where according to the example of his Predecessors, his entrance was very happy, but his exit very different.

The Siege of Meaux by the Constable, although long and full of difficulty succeeded happily for the French; but that of Auranches in the Lower Normandy, being ill managed by the same Person and the Duke of Alençon, brought them nothing but shame: the English having made them raise it, and taken part of their Bagage and their Ammunition.

At the Solicitation of the Dutcheys of Burgundy and the Popes Legats, a great Conference was held between Graneline and Calais, the Deputies of France, England, and those of Burgundy meeting, to treat about a Peace. The English not receding from that Condition, that Normandy and their other Conquests should be left to them in full Sovereignty, they parted without doing any thing in it.

The King by inclination was well enough disposed for the good of his Country: and we observe that from this very time even to the Reign of Henry II. the Kings did often and willingly make use of this term, The Publick Concerns of Our Kingdom. This year he held a great Assembly of Notables and Deputies of the Lords of the Estates at Orléans, where it was resolved that a Peace should be endeavoured, without which all designs for reformation would be useless and indeed impossible, and that in the mean while the Souldiery should be all reduced into Companies established and well regulated, every Gentdarm to three Horses, who should be paid every Month. Before this they had seven or eight, and a great number of Roguy-boys who devoured all the Country where-ever they passed.

This reform could not be pleasing to the Grandees nor Captains who grew fat by eating up the People, whole misery was their happiness. They interrupted it by a dangerous Commotion which was named La Praguerie. The Dukes of Alençon, Bourbon, Vendôme, the Bastard of Orléans and divers others had a hand in it. They complained that the King allowed no share in his Government, but to three or four private Persons; and thereupon entred into a League against his Ministers. La Trimouille who was in disgrace joyned also with them, that so he might by any means whatever be brought into play again at Court.

1440. The Conspiracy being made, the Duke of Alençon hies to Niort to debauch the Dauphin, who was his Godson, aged but sixteen years, but married already to Marguerit Daughter of James I. King of Scotland, and turned away the Count de Perdriac his Governor, and all those the King had placed about him. The King ran immediately to quench this new lighted Fire; after he had well provided his Frontiers against any attempts of the English, he takes the Field accompanied with his Constable, the Earls de la Marche, and Dunois, whom he had drawn off from that League, with eight hundred Men at Arms, and three thousand others. He pursued the Leagued so smartly into Poitou, and from Poitou into Bourbonnois, taking all the places where they thought to stand at Bay and make Head, that they were forced to give up his Son to him, and come and beg his pardon on their knees.

1440. A marvellous change: Charles Duke of Orleans who was detained Prisoner in England for five and twenty years, was delivered from captivity by that hand from which he had the least hopes in the world to expect it; It was by Philip Duke of Burgundy, who desiring to put a final end to the mortal quarrel between his Family and that of Orleans, by a principle of goodness, as generous as it was politique, contrived the deliverance of this Prince, and helped him to pay his Ransom which was three hundred thousand Crowns.

1440. These two Princes by a sincere and cordial Reconciliation quenched the mortal Enmities their Fathers had begot. Philip received Charles with great honour in his City of Graveline the Twentieth of November, gave him his Order of the Fleece, and accepted the Order of the Porcupine from him. Moreover Charles married his Niece, Daughter of his Sister and of Adolph first Duke of Cleves; In fine, each strove to shew the other all the marks and tokens of the most sincere and perfect amity.

"Amongst the Marshals of France, there was one Giles Lord de Raiz of an illustrious House and very valiant, but a great squanderer of Wealth, whose mind was so depraved that he addicted himself to all sorts of Vice and Sins both against God and Nature, entertaining Sorcerers and Enchanters to find out Treasures, and corrupting young Boys and Girls whom he afterwards murder'd that he might have their Blood to compound his Charm and Spells. This being a publick Scandal he was put into the hands of Justice, the Bishop of Nantes made his Process, the Seneschal of Renes Judge-General of that Country assistant, the Cause being of a mixt nature. He was condemned to be burnt alive in the Field of Nantes. The Duke was present at his Execution, but mitigating the Sentence, he permitted them first to strangle him, and then to bury his Body, not much consumed by the Flames. "I think I do remember in his Process that there was some Crime of State against the Duke, who was glad he had this occasion to revenge that offence, in punishing those hainous offences against Almighty God.

1441. The King had laid Siege before Pontoise, which charge the Parisians were to defray. The City having been re-victualled three or four times by Talbot, the honour of the English Commanders, his heart seemed to fail and he withdrew to Poissy: but observing this retreat despicable, he courageously returns, commanded a general assault, and by his presence so animated his People that he carried it by main strength.

That done he went to clear all the Country of Poitou and Angoumois of those Robbers that infested them, and to effect this he turned all the pilfering Captains out of their places and put honest Men in their steads.

Returning thence he came to keep his Court at Limoges during the Feast of Pentecost, where he received the Duke of Orleans and his Wife, and gave him 160000 Franc's towards the payment of his Ransom, and six thousand Livers Pension.

1442. From thence he went to Gascogne, saved Tartas which had capitulated to surrender to the English, if they were not relieved by a prefixed day. He presented himself before the place on the Eve of St. John's day with so considerable an Army that the Enemy durst not appear. St. Sever was forced, Dacqs compounded, so did Marmande and la Reole. But so soon as the King had but turned his back, the English by correspondence regained Dacqs and St. Sever. The King spent the Winter at Montauban, which was so sharp that all the Rivers in that Country were frozen up, and kept the Soldiers in their quarters not able to stir abroad.

1442. Whilst he was there, he secured himself of the succession to the Earldom of Comings. Matthew de Foix had for his fourth Wife married Jean who was the Countess of of it. As she was very aged and had no Children by him, he kept her Prisoner in a Castle, to compel her to make a donation of all she had to him. The King having received the good old Woman's complaint, fails not to take this advantage for himself, and at the same price delivers her and brings her into his Court.

Dying shortly after in Poitiers; the Earl of Armagnac who had at his second Marriage wedded a Daughter of hers by another Husband, seized upon her Lands. He did not hold them long; the Dauphin Lewis going into that Country, chastised him with fair words, and clapt him in Prison, as also his Wife, and his Children. The Earl of Foix by his intercession got him out again, but not without much trouble and a surrender of all the Lands, he had usurped.

The Eight and twentieth of the Month of August, John V. Duke of Bretagne, ended his days at the Castle de la Touche near Nantes. He left his Duchy very much enriched and improved by a long Peace, and mightily Peopled by that War which made its Neighbouring Countries desolate, particularly Normandy. From that single Province there went above thirty thousand Families to inhabit in Bretagne, and a great part of them at Rennes, which mightily enlarged it, and gave occasion to inclose with Walls that quarter of the Town which is named the Basse-ville. He had three Sons, Francis, Peter, and Giles, whereof the two eldest were Dukes of that Country successively.

The foregoing year the English laid Siege to Diepe. The Dauphin being returned out of Guyenne, went thither in quality of Lieutenant-General for the King, and chased them shamefully thence. But the Earl of Sommerfet landing at Cherbourg with six thousand fighting Men, pierced as far as Anjou and Bretagne, defeated the Marshal de Lobeaec and the Lord de Rueil, then returned laden with spoil back to Rouen.

"In the year 1440, or 1442. is placed the Invention, or at least the first use of Printing, which would be as excellent as it is wonderful, were it not that, like Fame whose clearest Trumpet it is, it vends as many ill things, as it does good ones. The City of Leyden in Holland attributes the honour to it self in behalf of Laurent Johnson one of her Burghers; Mentz for a Gentleman named Gutemberg; Some allow it to one John Mentel of the same City. Those deceive themselves that say it came from China, for although it be true that they printed there a long time before, yet was it not with Letters separate and movable as are ours, theirs were graved on plates.

The two Kings loved their pleasures enough to make them have but little love for War. The King of England was the first that made mention of an accommodation, the Deputies met at Tours, where not being able to agree a final Peace, they made a Truce of eighteen Months, the Twentieth day of May, and the Marriage of Marguerit Daughter of Rene of Anjou with the King of England; to whom she was conducted by the Duke of Suffolk.

By consent of both Kings, it was thought good to throw the French and English Forces, upon the Countries of the Empire, which were fat and but poorly defended. The apparent pretences were to assist the House of Austria against the Swiss; to revenge some incursions the Count de Montbelliard had made upon the Territories of France, to assuage the Council of Basil, that they might put an end to the Schism, and to take part with Rene of Anjou Duke of Lorraine in his contest with the City of Metz; for their having assisted Anthony Earl of Vaudemont his Enemy: but the real design or cause, was to discharge the Kingdom of those troublesome Sons of Mars the Soldiers.

The Dauphin leading these Men (there were near 20000 Horse) parted from Troyes in the Month of July, took Montbelliard, and from thence went into Alsacia between Basil and Strasbourg, Basil fortified it self and called the Swiss in to their aid. He fought four thousand near that place, who rather tired then overcome, died all upon the place, but sold their lives at double the number. There were but sixteen escaped, others say but only one single man, who being returned home to his Canton lost his Head as a deserter. The Dauphin judging by this that he should gain nought from them but by losing too much himself, and withall being gorged with spoil, and observing the heavy German Body began to move, he retired for fear of being over-matched, and went to joyn with his Fathers Army that lay before Metz.

He besieged that Town in favour of Rene Duke of Lorraine. The Citizens seeing the Country wasted and ruined for seven or eight Months together, bought their redemption at the rate of three hundred thousand Florins, of which the King had two hundred thousand, and the other hundred thousand they give Rene acquittance for, who owed it to them.

The Army paid with this Money, were all disbanded, excepting fifteen hundred Men at Arms, as many Coustilliers (these were Foot that accompanied the Horse) and three thousand Archers. This was the establishment of what they called Companies d'Ordonnance.

45.

He caused them to be quarter'd and cloathed and fed in the Towns: but the Vulgar who look no further then the present, and will never consider what may happen hereafter, minded nothing but how to ease themselves of this burthen, and granted a Tax in Money for the subsistence of these Gents-darmes, not considering that when once this Tax was settled, it would not be in their power to say either how long it should last, or how much or little it should be increased or diminished.

1444.

"The Tenth of November was fought the bloody Battle of Varnes between the Turks, and young Ladislaus King of Hungary. He had solemnly sworn a Peace with them: having unhappily broken it, by the Popes instigation, who dispenced him of his Oath, he most unfortunately lost his Life and all his Army; a wound that bleeds yet to this very day.

The Counties of Valentinois and Diois were united this year to Dauphine. Lewis de Poitiers who possessed them, had in Anno 1419. given them by his Will to Charles V. who was then Dauphin, upon a condition to furnish fifty thousand Crowns to pay off his Debts and Legacies; and in case he failed so to do, he then gave the succession to Ame Duke of Savoy. The Dauphin not having done it, Ame was got into possession and had settled a Governor there. But this year upon a Treaty at Bayonne agreed the third of April, Lewis the Son of Ame gave up all the right he had in favour of the Dauphin Lewis, who in retaliation quitted to him the absolute Siegneury and Homage of Foucigny.

the following.

* Vulgarly
called Sorel.

During the quiet and soft minutes of the Truce, the King enjoy'd the sweet pleasures of his Gardens, and languished amidst his Amours and Mistresses. Ease and prosperity had plunged him into dalliance and effeminate softness. His greatest inclination was Agnes Soreau a Gentlewoman of Touaine, a very agreeable and generous Lady, but who setting her self up as equal with the greatest Princesses, became the envy of the Court, and a scandal to all France.

1445.

"The King of England lived much more reserved: He was a devout Prince, fearing God, and of a gentle disposition: but having no great Spirit or parts, and loving nothing but his Wife, he suffer'd her to possess him wholly. This Princess bold and undertaking beyond the nature of her Sex, would needs take the Helm and make her self absolute. To this end she gives some sinister impressions to her Husband concerning his Uncle Humphry Earl of Gloucester who then had the Government, and prevailed with him at last to put him to death without any form of Process. Which excited the hatred of all the great ones against her, and made them think of ruining her, that they might preserve themselves.

1444, or

King Charles was then not much above the age of forty three, and the Dauphin who was already two and twenty trod upon his Heels, and would have plaid the Master, in so much as one day at Chinon he gave a box on the Ear to the fair Agnes.

There hapned another incident worse yet then this. He had bargained with Anthonny de Chabanes Earl of Dammartin, to assassinate some body that had displeased him, James Brother of that Earl, who was Grand Maître of the Kings Household, dissuaded him from it. The King coming to the knowledge of this, gave the Dauphin a sharp reprimand; The young Prince to excuse himself charged the Earl as having suggested this base design first to him; the Earl boldly denied it in the Kings presence, and offer'd to justify himself by Combat against any of the Dauphins Gentlemen that would undertake it. The King then found the malignity of his Son, abhorred it, and commanded him not to see him in four Months time, but to go into Dauphine. He retir'd with menaces; and being once gone thought no more of returning: but to Cantonise and Reign alone, without any dependance but on his malicious fancies.

Emp. Constance

Frederic III.

1445.

"The City of Genoa, in a few years had changed their Lords and Governors four or five times. The Fregoses and the Adornes who were of their principal Citizens, disputed for the Siegnory amongst themselves. Barnaby Adorne had usurped it with the Title of Doge: Janus Fregese pretending he would put it into the Kings hands,

"hands, having treated with him for that purpose, made use of the Forces and Money of France to make himself Master, then kept it in his own hands, and scoffed at the French.

The King had for a while adhered to Pope Felix, or at least stood Neuter: but when informed that Nicholas was elected in the room of Eugenius, he would let all Christendom understand he approved his Election. He sent a famous Embassy to tender his obedience, which perhaps brought in the custom of those stately and expensive Embassies of Obedience which Kings now send to every new Pope.

1446.

"The Government of the Viscounts at Milan, after its having lasted One hundred and seventy years, ended this year by the death of Duke Philip; And that Estate was claimed by divers Pretenders, as either having a right, or thinking it would be of great convenience and necessary for them; The Emperor Frederic, the Duke of Savoy, the Venetians, Alphonso King of Naples, and Charles Duke of Orleans. Now as it truly appertained to this last, according to the Conditions of the Contract of Valentine his Mother, he went thither with some Forces: but the Milanese intending their own liberty, he could get no more then only his Earldom of Ast. Afterwards those People having for many years undergone much trouble and affliction by the contending Parties that strugled for the Mastery, fell, as we use to say, out of the Frying-pan into the Fire, by accepting for their Duke, Francis Sforza, who had Married a Bastard of Duke Philip.

There were but little Infantry in France; The King that he might have some that were good and well maintain'd, ordained that every Village throughout the Kingdom should furnish him with, and pay one Foot-Archer who should be exempt from all Taxes and Subsidies. For which they called them the Franc-Archers. These made a Body of two or three and twenty thousand Men.

1448.

The Truce prolonged three or four several times, was not to end till about a Twelvemonth after this time: a Captain of the English Party, this was Francis de Surienne, extremely greedy after Prey, surprized the City of Fougères belonging to the Duke of Bretagne, where he met with a Booty of above Sixteen hundred thousand Crowns; and at the same time the English made irruption in Scotland, which was also comprehended in the Truce as well as Bretagne, but they were soundly beaten there. England began likewise to be imbroil'd within its self by reason of some new Tax which King Henry would raise in London; which hath most commonly been the occasion, or at least the pretence for a Civil War.

1448.

The Duke of Bretagne and the Scots likewise, make their complaints to King Charles for this breach of the Truce. The English are summon'd to repair the damage, they disown'd Surienne indeed, but for the rest gave no satisfaction but put off's and delays. All this was suffer'd six Months; they imagine the French are afraid. At length the Duke of Bretagne flies out, and with the Kings consent surprizes at the same time the Pont de Larche above Rouen, Conches near Evreux; Gerbroy not far from Beauvais, and Cognac upon the River Charente.

1448.

"By force of many Intreaties, Negotiations and Menaces, the King overpersuaded Felix to set his hand to the re-union of the Church; He renounced the Papacy more gloriously then he had accepted of it. His Conventions with Nicholas V. were such that he seemed to quit it as a thing belonging to him, which he conferr'd as a favour upon his Rival. For he made his demission in the Council which he had purposely transferr'd from Basil to Lausanna, and after he had deposited his Pontifical Ornaments, the Fathers elected Nicholas, who left him perpetual Legat in all the Countries of Savoy, Montferrat, Lyonnois, Switzerland and Alsatia, and received all those Cardinals he had created, into the Sacred Colledge.

1449.

The disturbances of England continuing, King Charles found the opportunity so favourable, that he resolved to chase the English out of his Kingdom. He had made the Earl de Foix Lieutenant of his Armies from the Garonne to the Pyrenees, and the Earl de Dunois in all the Kingdom, in such sort nevertheless as he rendered respect and honour to the Constable, when they both met in the same place.

1449.

The first had Order to take all places the English held at the foot of the Pereneans, thereby to block up the passage against John of Arragon King of Navarre, who had made a League with them, and obliged himself for a certain Sum of Money, to keep and guard Mauleon de Soule for them, a place very strong in those times, and situate upon a high Rock. For this purpose he had taken it into his protection, and had placed his Constable in it. The Count de Foix was Son in Law to that Prince, however he had more regard to the Kings Orders, then his Father in Law, and scruples not to besiege it. The Navarrois knowing it wanted Provisions, Arm'd himself to relieve it, and came within two Leagues, but finding he was too weak, and that his prayers availed not with his Son in Law, he retreated, and his Constable was forced to capitulate.

10

* Call'd by the Vulgar Guerbe.

1449.

The Castle of * Griffant, which is within four Leagues of Bayonne, surrendered likewise, after three thousand English whom the Constable of Navarre and the Mayor of Bayonne sent by Water to their relief had been beaten by the Besiegers.

At the same time Veneuil in Perche was taken by the contrivance of a Miller, in revenge for that the English had beaten him: the great Tower held it out yet a while. In the interim the Count de Dunois by the small resistance he met with from Pont-Audemur, Lisieux, Mantes, and the Forts that were round those Cities, perceiving the English were at a low ebb, sent the King word that Normandy was sorely shaken.

He was besides informed that the Duke of Bretagne with the Constable, had taken Contances, and that the Inhabitants of Alençon had restored their Duke to his City, and besieged the Castle which immediately capitulated. Upon this good news he departs from Vendôme where he got his Forces together, came to Verneuil, thence to Louviers and Pont de Larche, to summon the City of Rouen, whose Inhabitants were disposed to shake off their yoke.

The Earl of Sommerfet who was in it with three thousand English, did not permit his Heralds to come near. Which could not prevent a party of the Inhabitants from placing many Frenchmen upon their Walls; but the rest not joyning with them that design miscarried. These would first make their Conditions with the King, as they did the next day. Their Archbishop Rodolph Roussel who was chief of the Deputation, obtained security and liberty for the Persons, and for the Goods of all those that were within the City, as well English as French, whether choosing to remain there still, or to remove elsewhere if they desired it.

When he had given an account of the Treaty in the Town-Hall, the English endeavoured to frustrate the execution by seizing on the Gates and Walls: but the Inhabitants soon dispossest them, and forced them to retire to the Bridge, the Castle, and the Palace.

The Fort St. Catharine held but little. Sommerfet having few Provisions in the old Palace, capitulated within fifteen days, That himself and all his should go out with their Lives and Goods, and all their furniture for War, excepting their great Guns, That they should pay fifty thousand Gold Crowns, and all such Debts as they owed to the Bourgois and the Merchants belonging to that Country, That they should be obliged to procure the surrender of Candebeac, Moutiervilliers, Lisbonne, Tancarville and Honnefleur, and for Hostages should leave the Sire Talbot, and five or six more of their principal Commanders. The Tenth day of November the King entered the City in Pomp, and celebrated the Feast of St Martin the ancient Patron of Gall.

50.

Notwithstanding the inconveniences of the Winter Season, he laid Siege to Havfleur, which was the first place that was conquered by the late Henry King of England. It surrendered upon the Twelfth day of January. As did Honnefleur afterwards, which held out but a few days.

1449.

At the same time the Duke of Bretagne and the Constable reduced Valongne with six or seven other little places, and after a long Siege regained likewise his City of Fougeres.

These prosperities were not without some mixture or alloy of sorrow to the King. In the year 1449. while he was at Jumieges, they poisoned his dear Agnes de Sorcans, without whom he could not live one moment. To comfort him, Antoinetta de Maiguelais Dame de Villequier, Cousin to the deceased, took her place: but she was not sole Mistress, the impotence of age, stirring up this Kings desires, he entertained a great number of beautiful Damsels, at least to satisfy the pleasure of his Eye.

Some would needs have it, that some of the Dauphins friends made away Agnes, and that he who did most contribute to it, was the famous James Cœur, Keeper of the Kings Plate, Master of the Moneys, or Mint-Master of Bourges his Native City, a Merchants Son, and one that managed all the Treasury. There are such wonders related related of his Riches, his Credit, and his Buildings, that Chymists would fain persuade us, he had the Philosophers Stone.

In Anno 1452. an Accusation was framed against him in the Kings Council, and all his Goods were seized, as well for the Crime abovementioned, as for those of Concussion, Exaction, Transportation of Money out of the Kingdom, falsifying of Coyn, counterfeiting Seals, selling Arms and Powder to the Sarrasins, &c. He appeared voluntarily to justify himself, he was Arrested and removed to several Prisons; Finally the King being satisfied that he was guilty, (says the Decree of the Nineteenth of May 1453.) of all these Crimes, and yet remitting the pains of death, for the services he had rendered him, and upon the intercession of the Holy Father, condemned him to make *Amende Honorable, to pay a hundred thousand Crowns, and confiscated all his Goods. Some time after, the Parliament restored him in his Reputation and Estate, after he had paid his Fine.

Towards the beginning of this year 1450. there landed three thousand English at Cherbourg, commanded by Thomas Kyrle, who drawing a Party out of the Garrisons, made up a gross of six thousand Men, with which he adventur'd to take the Field. The Constable having heard of their march goes forth to seek them, although he had not half their number of Men. He met and fought them nigh the Village of Fourmigny between Carentan and Bayeux, along a small River which ran behind them. These new Levies joyned with such as had never hunted together, could not stand before the old experienced Soldiers, who had so many brave Leaders and Warlike Nobility to encourage them; few of them escaped, since they counted three thousand seven hundred seventy four that were slain, and fourteen hundred Prisoners.

This blow brought them to their last gasp, they appeared now no more but upon the Walls of some places yet remaining in their hands. The King being gone into the Lower Normandy, found no great difficulty in besieging them, nor much more in taking them. Vire, Bayeux, St. Sauveur le Vicomte, Falaize, Caen, defended themselves but weakly: Caen made its composition upon St. John's Eve. They provided the Earl of Sommerfet and four thousand English he had about him, with Vessels to transport them into England, but not to any other place. The City was given up to the King the Second day of July, Falaize the Twentieth of the same Month. The King made his entrance into Caen the Sixth. Nothing remained but Cherbourg, the Constable had besieged it after the surrender of Caen; Thomas Gouel who was Governor, with a thousand Natural English, gave it up the Eleventh day of August.

Thus was all Normandy regained by the French, or to speak more properly, helped to recover it self in one year and six days. The King desiring the remembrance should be preserved, and that eternal thanks should be rendered to God, ordained general Processions should be made in the Month of September of the same year, and annually hereafter upon same day that Cherbourg surrendered.

After the King had given Order for all the Affairs of this great Province, leaving only six hundred Lances and their Archers, he returned towards Guyenne; and this same year open'd the passage over the Dordogne by the taking of Bergerac, which was besieged and mastered by John Earl of Pontieure and Vicount of Limoges. He was one of the four Sons of Marguerite de Clisson, who was restored to the Estate belonging to his Family by Duke Francis, pursuant to the Treaty made at Nantes in Anno 1448.

As the loss of the Battle at Fourmigny made the English lose all Normandy, the defeat of the Bourdalois made them lose all the rest of Guyenne. Amanieu d'Albret Lord d'Orval, going to scowre about the Neighbourhood of Bordeaux with seven hundred Horse only, there came forth ten or twelve thousand Horse and Foot, English and Bourdalois, who ran confusedly upon him as to a certain Victory. D'Orval knowing whom he had to deal with, charges them briskly, puts them to the rout, strewed the ways and Fields with a thousand of those giddy-brain'd Fellows, and carried away a great many more to Basin.

The following Summer, the King who was still at Tours, having drawn together a great many Men, resolved to compleat the Conquest of Guyenne, much crest-faln at that shock. The Count de Dunois his Lieutenant General, the Count de Pontieure, Foix and Armagnac attack'd it at the four corners; the English were beaten and gave ground every where, so that having no more then Fronsac, Bordeaux and Bayonne, the Count de Dunois having besieged Fronsac, they capitulated to surrender those three places, if upon St. John Baptists-day, there appeared not in the Field and near Fronsac, an Army able to give them Battle. Which not having been able to do, they executed the Agreement, excepting only as to Bayonne, whom they abused with the flattering flattering hopes, that the King of England was preparing to come and relieve it personally. The French Generals made their triumphant entry into Bourdeaux the Nineteenth day of June.

1451. In vain did the English struggle obstinately to keep Bayonne; after some assaults, the apprehension of being taken by Storm, obliged them also to capitulate on Friday the Twentieth of August. The Governor John de Beaumont with all the Garrison were made Prisoners of War; and it cost the Inhabitants forty thousand Crowns of Gold to be spared.

The favour of Heaven was so benign towards the French, or the Peoples fancies so strong, that upon that same Friday, they beheld a white Cross in the Air over Bayonne, which seemed to instruct them that God would have them to forsake the red Cross of England, and take up that of France. This place being reduced, the English had nothing left them in all France but only Calais, and the County of Guisnes.

If we search into the causes of this so sudden and wonderful a revolution, we shall find it was the neglect of the English in not well providing and strengthening their places, their want of good Commanders, the hatred the People had for their scornful and imperious way of Government. On the other hand the union and hearty zeal of the Nobles and all the French Militia, the good order and discipline in their Armies, the huge stores and provision of Canons and all sorts of Warlike Engines, Pioneers and Ammunitions, and the new method of approaching and attacking of Towns by Works and Trenches: but above all, the Civil War that Richard Duke of York had kindled amongst the English.

1451, and 52. "That Duke knew how to make such use of the disgust that Nation had taken against the Government of Queen Marguerite who was a French-woman, as to raise himself amidst their discontents up to the Throne, which he pretended was due to him, rather than to Henry; For he descended (but only by the Female side) from Lionel of Clarence who was second Son of King Edward III. and Henry came but from the third Son, who was John Duke of Lancaster his Paternal Great Grandfather.

1452. These Divisions were calmed for a while, upon the intreaties of the Lord de L'Esperre, deputed from the City of Bourdeaux and the Lords of the Country of Bourdelois, who taking distaste at some new Impost that was laid upon them, offer'd to restore that Country to the English. Talbot the bravest of that Nation and the most zealous for its honour, being therefore landed in Medoc with four thousand Men, was brought into Bourdeaux by the Citizens the Twensy fourth day of October; and about the latter end of the year having received a like reinforcement from England, he made himself Master of Castillon, Cadillac, Libourne, Fronsac, and some other small places besides.

The Bourdelois had taken their opportunity when the King was just going to engage in a great War against the Duke of Savoy, who apparently must have been upheld by the Dauphin, and by consequence had correspondence in the very heart of the Kingdom.

1452. The Kings quarrel to that Duke was because he had agreed the Marriage of his Daughter Charlotte and the Dauphin without his consent: This was the true motive of the War: but that he might have some apparent cause, he had taken into his protection certain Lords belonging to the Estates of Savoy, who having joyned in a League against their Princes chief Minister, named John de Compein, were for ever banished, by a Sentence given at Pont de Beauvoisis. The King advanced even to Fores to restore them: but being informed the English were landed at Bourdeaux, the Duke being come to wait upon him at Feurs, he suffer'd himself to be overcome by his most humble submissions, and agreed to a Peace.

1453. The following year he marched to Lussignan in Poitou, thence to St. Jean d'Angely, for the recovery of Bourdelois. His Army besieged Castillon: Talbot coming to its relief with six thousand Men, was beaten and slain together with his Son. His defeat caused the surrender of the City, the utter ruine of the English Party, and after that the regaining of Bourdeaux; For they perceiving Fronsac, Libourne, Langon, Cadillac, and all the other Towns about them were reduced, the King quartered at Lermont, all Relief and even all Provisions failing them, surrendered upon composition, which the King would never have granted them, if a great mortality had not swept away his Men.

However

However the better to curb and keep this City which the interest of Traffick and reciprocal Marriages inclined to be for the English, he banished forty Lords and Citizens who were most to be suspected, and bridled them with two strong Castles which he order'd to be built there.

"The University being one of the greatest Bodies and one of the most necessary to all Christendom, the Cardinal d'Estouteville the Popes Legat, making use of his faculty, but by the Kings express Order, employ'd himself in purging it of some abuses that had much disfigur'd them, and made many good Reglements, which are yet kept in their Archives.

Never since the Siege of Calais had the Duke of Burgundy much concern'd himself in the War against the English: but yet he was not free from crosses in his own Countries. Those of Bruges being up in Arms Anno 1437. let him into their City as if they had intended to give him satisfaction, then fell upon his Men, killing above an hundred of them, amongst the rest the Lord de L'Isle-Adam. Himself ran a great hazard, and escaped with much difficulty by breaking open one of the City Gates with Hammers. After this fury they betook themselves to rove all about the Country. Their rage began to cool when they found the rest of the Towns did not approve of their rash actions, and that the Duke was coming to besiege them with a vast Army. They craved his pardon, which they obtained not but upon rude Conditions. It cost them two hundred thousand Gold Crowns, the loss of many of their Privileges, and the Lives of a dozen or fifteen of the most Factionous.

The Ghentois gave him much more trouble, by their frequent disturbances. The most dangerous was that in Anno 1452. a Gabel, or Impost was the cause of it. He would needs settle it in Flanders and make it certain and fixt, imposing 24 Gros, Money of that Country, upon every Sack of Salt. They resolved to run all the hazards and extremities imaginable, rather then suffer an Impost upon Water and the Sun, which are free and universal Gifts bestow'd by Nature. They relied upon the protection of the King; and indeed he wrote earnestly and in high terms in their behalf to the Duke of Burgundy; but having received an answer in terms that were yet higher, he thought it not prudence to embarque himself in a Civil War, being as yet not come to an end of the War against the English his Foreign Enemy.

The losses which the Ghentois met with in five or six great Fights, did but heat their savage hearts the more: but the Battle of Ripelmond; and afterwards that of Gavre, where they lost twenty thousand Men, brought them so low, they were forced to come to composition. Two thousand Men bare Head and bare Foot, with all their Counsellors, Sheriffs and Officers only, in their Shirts, went out a League to meet the Duke and his Son, to implore their Mercy. The Gate through which they marched out to fight him at Ripelmond, was stop't up for ever. They were condemned to pay four hundred thousand Ridders of Gold, to bring their Banners that he might dispose of them as he pleased, and to suffer a change of their Usages and Privileges.

"Upon a Tuesday the Nine and twentieth of May, Constantinople the Trunk of the Grecian Empire, from which the Turks had lopp'd off all the Branches, was taken perforce by Mahomet II. not more then three and twenty years of age. Constantine her last Emperor perished there, crowded to death by the multitude at one of the Gates of the City. Such was The End of the Eastern Empire, the which to reckon from the dedication of Constantinople upon the Nineteenth of May in the year Three hundred and thirty, had lasted Eleven hundred twenty three years. We shall henceforwards place the Turkish Sultans in the room of those Emperors.

Emperor Frederic III. and Mahomet II. Reigned 28 years at Constantinople.

The Count d'Armagnac was not grown the wiser by his first chastisement, he would play Rex, hindring him that had provisionally the Archbishoprick of Auch from taking possession: and obstinately persever'd to keep his own Sister for his Wife, maugre the Censures of the Church. The King being therefore moved at the importunity of the Pope to wipe off this scandal from the Kingdom, sent some Forces thither with five or six of his chief Commanders, some whereof seized on the Country of Rouergne, others on the Valley d'Aure; and another Party on the County of Armagnac. The City of Leytoure environed with a triple Wall, and its Castle situate upon a steep Rock, did not hold out long: so that the Count fled out of the Country, and retired safely to some Lands he had upon the Frontiers of Arragon.

1455. It concerned the honour both of the Kingdom and the King of France, to justify the memory of the Pucelle. The King therefore ordered her Parents to Petition, the Holy See to appoint some Judges that might review the Process. Upon their request Calixtus III. ordered Commissioners, who were the Archbishop of Reims, and the Bishops of Paris and Coutances, who being met at Rouen, looked into and examined the Proceedings, heard divers Witnesses; and thereupon fully justified that Heroick Virgin, caused the former Process to be torn and burnt, by which they had condemned her. Their Sentence was proclaimed in Rouen, at St. Ouis Churchyard, and the old Market, and likewise in many other Cities of the Kingdom. There was no need of taking any course against her false Judges, the greater part of them being perished either by suddain or such a shameful death, as seemed to shew the hand of God upon them.

1455. "During these years began those divisions which did not a little contribute to the losing of Navarre. Blanch the Heiress of that Kingdom had a Son named Charles, by John King of Arragon her Husband. This Prince's dying in Anno 1441. John took in second Wedlock Isabella of Portugal, and retained the enjoyment of Navarre, which in effect belonged to Charles, as then about One and thirty years of age. This dispute Armed the Son against the Father, the Kingdom was divided. The House of Gramont which was considerable, took part with the Father, that of Beaumont which was not inferior, joyned with the Son. The Mother in Law, who could have wished the Son out of the World, blew the coals, and exasperated the Fathers anger; From thence grew irreconcilable Enmity, and cruel Wars. Prince Charles having given Battle to his Father lost it, and was taken Prisoner. A while after he was set at liberty upon an Accomodation.

1456. The Dauphins ill Conduct, and those insupportable Exactions he laid upon Dauphine, particularly the Clergy, did so irritate the King his Father, that he commanded Anthony de Chabanes Earl of Dammartin to go and Arrest him. Dammartin having been cruelly offended, as we have related, would have executed this Order severely, had not the Dauphin been informed, and made his escape in post-haste into the Principality of Orange, and from thence into the Franche-Comte, from whence he was conducted into Brabant. The Duke of Burgundy received him as the Son of his Sovereign, and assigned him twelve thousand Crowns for his use, and the Castle of Gueppe within four Leagues of Brussels, for his ordinary Residence.

1457. Whatever noble Reception and Entertainment he met with in that Country, he had not been long there before he sowed division between the Father and the Son, having gained the Lords of the House de Crouy who governed the Father, and countenancing and abetting them against the Son who could not endure them. The first year of his sojourning there they brought Charlotte of Savoy to him to Consummate his Marriage, by whom a Son was born about three years afterwards, who died.

1456. The Kings wrath discharged it self upon John Duke of Alençon, the Dauphins God-father. This Prince returning from Dauphine, where he had been to brew some Intrigue with his God-son, and having contrived I know not what League with the English, to make some disturbance in favour of them, was seized and imprisoned in the Castle de Loches.

1457. In the year 1457. as it is usual after a long War, to squeeze the Finances of what they have sucked in during the publick Calamities: the King called those to account who had managed the Treasury. One John Xancoins * Receiver General, convicted of misdemeanour, and of having detained sixty thousand Crowns, was banished for ever, his Goods confiscated, and the fair Houses he had built, bestowed upon the Count de Dunois.

1458. Two years after the imprisonment of the Duke of Alençon, for it required all that time to find out proofs, the King convened his Parliament and his Pairs at Montargis to make his Process. They laboured three Months in it, he being at Baugency. The business not going on with that expedition as he desired, he removes the Assembly to Vendosme, where he intended to be present. At last by a Sentence of the Tenth of October, they condemned the Duke to lose his Head, and confiscated all his Estate. The King gave him a pardon for his life: but took the best of his Lands, and sent him back Prisoner to Loches.

1458. The Twenty sixth of December of the same year was the last of brave Arthur's days, Earl of Richmond Constable of France, who had likewise been Duke of Burgundy a year and an half by the death of Peter the Simple, second Son of his eldest Brother.

Brother. He had no child, and so the Dutty went to Francis his Nephew, Son of Richard Earl of Estampes his younger Brother. Charles of Anjou Earl of Mayne had the Office of Constable.

The same year the Twenty seventh of June, Alphonso King of Arragon and Sicilia, passed into the other World. At his death he left the Kingdom of Naples (then called Sicilia on this side the Fare) to Ferdinand his Natural Son. Rene of Anjou finding this a fair opportunity to pursue his right against him, before he could be well settled, sent John Duke of Calabria his Son into those Countries. This Prince guided by the destiny of his Predecessors, had very prosperous beginnings, and an unfortunate end.

Since the taking of Constantinople, the Duke of Burgundy had for two or three times made shew as if he would employ his Forces and Person against the Infidels. We may see in Oliver de la Marche the Vows which he and the Lords in the Assembly of Bruges, made on the Peacock at a stately Banquet; all this vanished into Air together with the Wine and Mirth of the Feast.

As little did Pope Pius II. (this was Aeneas Sylvius) succeed in his Project, which was to unite and engage all Christendom against the Turks. In order to which he had convened a General Assembly at Mantua, where appeared Ambassadors from all Sovereign Princes, and the War was resolved upon with great designs, but without any effect. The French Ambassadors returned but ill satisfied, the Pope not condescending to favour Rene in his pretence to the Kingdom of Naples, but threatening to Excommunicate the King upon the score of the Pragmatick, whereupon John Dauvet Attorney General of the Parliament, made Protections, and appealed to the future Council.

"The Duke of York had for the second time vanquished and taken King Henry Prisoner; afterwards, Queen Margaret with the aid of the Scots, slew that Duke in Battle and delivered her Husband, but Edward Son of that Duke having brought other Forces, tried fortune once more, and defeated the Queens Army under the Walls of York. Then Henry being fled into Scotland, and Queen Margaret into France, he was Crowned King in the year 1461. This was the first Act of the Tragedy between the Houses of York and Lancaster, that of York wore the White Rose, and Lancaster the Red.

It was now thirteen years that the Dauphin had been absent from the Court, his Father sent often for him which he cared not to obey, he often called upon the Duke of Burgundy to send him back, telling him he nursed and hugged a Serpent, which when well warmed in his Bosom, would one day make him feel his mortal Sting. He sometimes proceeded even to threaten the Duke, and stirred up divers of his own People against him; who finding himself so harassed, sent at last a smart Message desiring him to consider whether he would maintain the Peace of Arras or not.

For this time therefore, the King left him quiet: but two years after his Counsel or his own Resentment pressing him, he was about to go and fetch him with an Army; However he changed his mind again, and thought it were better punish him by advancing Charles his second Son to the birth-rights of elderhip, according to the power the Kings of the first and second Race had had. Which no doubt he would have put in execution, had not the Pope strongly dissuaded him, or perhaps if he could have had time enough to dispose the minds of the French Nation to admit of such a change.

While he was at Meun on the Yeuure * in Berry, he had notice that his Domesticks had plotted to take away his life. The poor Prince after that thought he saw nothing but poyniards and poison. His apprehensions were so great, that not knowing from what hands he might take his food without danger, he refrained from eating some days, after which it was not in his power, when he would have done it, to swallow any thing. So that he died of hunger the Two and twentieth of July about the midst of his Sixtieth year, and near the end of the Nine and thirtieth of his Reign.

Never Prince had greater Traverses or more potent Enemies, nor overcame them more gloriously. After he had driven those out of France that attempted at his Crown, he found a more dangerous Enemy in his House, that attempted on his Life. He might have been called Happy, had he had another Father and another Son. He was affable, debonnaire, liberal, just; He tenderly loved his People, and spared them as much as it was possible, rewarded those that served him very largely, took particular particular care of the Justice and Policy of his Kingdom, laboured greatly for the reformation of the Church, and was so religious he would not charge it with any Tenth. But being of somewhat too soft a temper, he was governed and led away by his Favourites and Mistresses too much; and in his latter days became apprehensive, jealous and suspicious to the extreamest degree.

He had three Bastards by his Mistresses, and eleven Legitimate Children by his Wife Mary Daughter of Lewis II. Duke of Anjou, four Sons, and seven Daughters. Of his Sons two only survived him, which were Lewis and Charles. As for Daughters, Radegonde died being betrothed to Sigismund eldest Son of Frederic V. Arch-Duke of Austria; Yoland was Wife of Ame VIII. Duke of Savoy, Catharine of Charles Duke of Burgundy, Jean, or Joan, of John II. Duke of Bourbon, and Magdelain of Gaston Prince of Viana, and Earl of Foix; another Jeane, and Mary Twin-Sisters, did not outlive the age of Infancy.

LEWIS XI.

King LIV.

Aged xxxviii. Years.

POPES,

PIUS II. 3 years under this Reign.	SIXTUS IV. Elected the 9th of August 1471. S. 13 years, where- of 12 under this Reign.
PAUL II. Elected the 29th of August 1464. S. 7. years wanting one Month.

THe conduct which the Prince had made appear in all his actions, particularly towards his Father, and towards his People of Dauphine, made it plainly enough known what his Friends and Subjects were to expect from him. He ever Governed without Counsel, most commonly without Justice, and without Reason. He thought it the finest Policy to go out of the great and beaten Road of his Predecessors, to change every thing, were it from better to worse, that he might be feared. His judgment which was very clear, but too subtil and refined, was the greatest enemy to his own and his Kingdoms quiet, having as it seems, taken pleasure in putting things into disorder, and throwing the most obedient into Rebellion. He rather loved to follow the bent of his own irregular fancies, then the wise Laws of the Land; and made his Grandeur consist in the oppression of his People, in the pulling down of the great ones, and the raising up of others from the very dust and nothing. This is what another calls putting their Kings, hors de page, i. e. out of their Minority; he should have said putting them out of their Sence, and their Reason.

The Creatures of the late King formed a Party in favour of Charles his second Son (they named him the young Lord) which perhaps tended to exclude the Eldest. He therefore stood in need of diligence and power to prevent it. The information given him by the Count du Mayne, not so much out of affection, as of hatred to the Count de Dammartin, who had been his Rival in the favour of Charles, caused him to mount on Horse-back the soonest he could; And the Duke of Burgundy and his Son accompany'd him with four thousand Horse, chosen out of ten Thousand.

He went directly to Reims where he was Crowned the 15th of August by John Juvenal of the Ursins. Before he received the Sacred Unction, he would be made a Knight by the Duke, then distributed that honour to 117. Lords. At the end of the Feast, the Duke kneeling down beseeched him to forget the injuries which had been done to him, upon occasion of the discontents that had been betwixt his Father and himself. He granted him that request: but he excepted against seven, and under pretence of that number pardoned not any one.

He made his entrance into Paris the last day of August, followed by thirteen or fourteen thousand Horse. The feastings being ended the Duke returned into Flanders, the Count went on Pilgrimage to St. Claude's in the Franche-Comte, and and the King to Amboise to see his Mother. She died in a short time after, to the great regret of the wisest, who could have wished that the respect he had for her might for a longer time have been as a Bridle to the violence of her Son.

He was much delighted at Plessis les Tours, the Count found him there at his return, to whom he gave the Government of Normandy, and 12000 Crowns by Establishment: But it was only a Paper-security, and seeming marks of Friendship, which were accepted for no other then they were given. These two Princes resembled each other too little, and knew one another too well to love on either side; and indeed from that time the Count treated secretly with Romille Vice-Chancellor of Brittany, and gave him his Commission Sealed.

As soon as Lewis was entered into his Kingdom, he Governed himself as in a conquered Country. He destituted all the Officers of the Royal Family, of War, of Judicature, and of the Treasury, treated all the Creatures belonging to the King his Father very ill, took delight in destroying all he had set up; gave nothing but Berry to his Brother for his whole Apenage or Portion, set the Duke of Alençon at liberty, and put the Count de Dammartin into the Bastile, restored the Count of Armagnac to his Lands, loaded the people with Taxes, strip'd the great ones, and offended all the Clergy.

1461.

Never had any private person laboured more to reduce the power of the Pope within the terms of the Canons, then Aeneas Sylvius; and never Pope did struggle more to enlarge it beyond those bounds of right and reason then the same, when he was Pius II. The Pragmaticque was a Curb very troublesome to his undertakings; He made so many applications to the King that he allowed of a Declaration in November 1641. to abolish it. The Court of Rome transported with an insolent joy, did immediately cause that Constitution to be dragged along the Streets: But it was not yet time; for the oppositions of the University hindered the effect of the Declaration, and the King never troubled himself to have it put in Execution, because the Pope had failed of his word in many things. John Gefrey Bishop of Arras had the Cardinals Cap as a recompence for having negotiated this affair with the King.

1462.

In the mean time the Pope maintained the Bastard Ferdinand in the Kingdom of Naples, so that John de Calabria the Son of Rene of Anjou, after various revolutions, was utterly driven thence. The Kings intreaties could obtain nothing from the Holy Father in favour of those Princes of his own Blood: But Pius thinking to flatter him, confirmed the Title of Most Christian to him, which had been already derived to him with more honour from his Ancestors, and exhorted him to a Croisade against the Turks, presenting him with a Sword on the Blade whereof were some Latin Verses engraved, which invited him to that expedition.

There was a rude War between Henry King of Castille, and John King of Arragon. This last had by a Treaty of accommodation, given Catalogna to Charles Prince of Viana, Son of his first Bed, and therefore his principal Heir: His Mother in Law harra's'd him so much that he once more fell out with his Father and took up Arms. He was again defeated and taken Prisoner. The Catalonians making an insurrection in his favour, forced his Father to set him at Liberty: but the same day of his deliverance he Died of a Morfel which his Mother in Law had caused her own Physician to give him.

After his Death the Catalonians being revolted against John, and having degraded him, as the Murderer of his Son Charles; The King of Castille assisted them. It was not the zeal of justice that led him to it, but the desire of Siezing those places in Navarre which were for his purpose.

Mean while John that he might have Men and Money in this pressing necessity, had engaged the Counties of Roussillon and of Cerdagne to the King of France for 300000 Crowns, Gaston de Foix Brother in Law to the Castilian, and Son in Law to the Arragonian brought these two Princes to refer their differences to the judgment of the King, who then was at Bordeaux to treat of the Marriage of Magdelin his Sister, with Gaston de Foix Count of Viana.

When he had heard the reasons of either party from the mouths of their Ambassadors, he pronounced his Sentence of Arbitration: but it satisfied neither the one, nor the other any more, then his interview with Henry King of Castille, satisfied either the French, or Spaniards. These scoffed at the Niggardlyness, and mean and simple countenance of King Lewis, who was clothed only in coarse Cloth *, had a short and straight Garment on, and wore a Madona of Lead in his his Cap; The others had an indignation at the Castilian Arrogance, and the Pride of the Count de Lodeme Favourite of Henry. But it is true that their King condescending, as he ought, to the Majesty of France, passed over, not only the River Bidasso, which separates the two Kingdoms, to come to the King, but likewise advanced two Leagues within his Dominions, and came even to the Castle of Uterbia, where they conferred together.

At his return from this Voyage, Lewis found that the Lords de Croüy Father and Son, had so well managed the mind of Philip Duke of Burgundy, with whom they could do any thing, that he consented to render up to him the Cities of the Somme for the 400000 Crowns. The business was of importance, and indeed for fear the Duke should find out some excuses to retract his word, he caused the money to be immediately sent to Hesdin, and went thither himself.

The surrender being executed, he would shew himself in the Low-Countries, where his Sovereignty was but little acknowledged. He visited Arras, was received at Tournay, and went as far as Pisle, where the Duke came and saluted him. The City of Tournay, which had never owned any other Dominion but that of France, sent three Thousand Citizens forth to meet him, each of them having a Flower-de-Luce embroidered with Gold just upon his Heart.

Lewis Duke of Savoy waited for him at St. Cloud to make complaints of the disobedience of Philip his young Son, who more sprightly then Amedea his elder Brother, had gained the affections of the Nobility, and was making his way to invade the Crown. The King commanded Philip to come to him; he immediately did so upon the Faith of a safe conduct, which hindered not his being Arrested, and then his sending him Prisoner to Loches. He was detained two years, to give his Father time to settle his affairs, and authority, and establish his eldest Son in the Succession.

The hatred betwixt the King and the Charolois was augmented more and more. There are five or six principal causes taken notice of. The surrender of the places in the Somme, the kind reception the King made the Lords of Croüy, whom the Charolois had driven from his Fathers Court and Country for that reason; moreover the Kings endeavours to lay a Tax or Gabelle upon Burgundy, contrary to the Articles of the Treaty of Arras, and the favour he manifested to the Count d' Estampes, who was accused to have intended to poison the Duke and his Son.

At the same time the Chancellor de Morvilliers a Man vehement and bold, went on the Kings behalf to forbid the Duke of Bretagne to style himself any more Duke by the Grace of God, to Coyn any money, or to raise any Taxes in his Dutchy. The Duke taken unprovided acted coolly, and promised all; but demanded time to Assemble the Estates of his Country; and in the mean while he diligently negotiated with the Burgundian by Romille, and with all the Grandees of the Kingdom whom he knew to be highly discontented. The Habits of Fryers Mendicants, especially of the Cordeliers, served to make the Messengers of these intrigues pass securely up and down.

The Charolois had chosen Gorcum in Holland for his ordinary residence, the Bastard de Rubempre slunk privately into that Port with a small Vessel, being disguised like a Merchant, to sieze and carry away alive or dead this Romille the Engine of all these designs, or perhaps the Count de Charolois himself. However it were, the Count having discover'd it, caused him to be imprisoned, and gave notice thereof to the Duke his Father who was going to Hesdin to confer with the King.

Upon this intelligence the Duke retires in haste, his People gave out that there had been a design to sieze upon the Father and the Son both at the same time, the Preachers entertained their Auditors with it, and Oliver de la Marche made mention of it in Terms which hugely offend the Kings Honour. To justify himself against these reproaches, the King sent Morvilliers his Chancellor and some Lords to make great complaints to the Duke, and demand reparation. The Chancellor did it in such high words, and Sovereign expressions, that he seemed to design rather to exasperate then to compose differences; And indeed the Count de Charolois said to one of the Ambassadors at their departure, that before one year were past, he would make the King repent it.

The King thought he had time to subdue the Breton before Philip, whom Age render'd unwieldy, could Dream of stirring. He therefore called the Grandees of the State together at Tours to make them know what reasons he had to undertake it; Charles Duke of Orleance, first Prince of the Blood, would needs speak there there of the disorders of the Kingdom, as his Age, his Reputation, and his Rank, obliged him to do; but his Remonstrances grated the Ears of the King, and were received with anger and contempt; In so much as he died for grief within two days after. This was the 4th of January.

In hatred towards that good Prince, and in prejudice of the pretensions he had to Milan, the King had a little while before acknowledged Francis Sforza for Duke of Milan, and with that had not only given up to him all the right the French had to the Seignury of Genoa: But had also remitted and given him Savona which he yet held, declaring to all the Princes of Italy, that whosoever should assist the Genoese against Sforza, should be his enemy. So that Sforza by the support of his great name, made himself master of Genoa and of all that Signeury.

1465.

The Author of the Antiquities of Orleans says that the River of Loire was Frozen this year in the Month of June. If this prodigie were true, we must needs conclude it proceeded from a natural cause, since Chronology demonstrates to us that the thing upon which he would have it to be a Miracle, could not happen in that time as he hath put it.

The Breton having dispatched his Ambassadors to Tours, to demand the Term of three Months, carried his practises on so cunningly, that his League was ready for their purpose, before the King had discovered any steps of it. The Dukes of Bourbon and Alençon, all the other Princes of the Blood, except the Counts d'Estampes, de Vandosme and d'Eu, almost all the Grandees, and all the late Kings old Captains were in it, amongst others the Duke of Nemours and the Counts of Armagnac, of St. Pol, of Dunois, of Dammartin who made his escape from the Bastille through a hole, the Mareschal de Labeach, the Lords D'Albret, de Bueil, de Gaucour, and de Chaumont d'Amboise. They called it a League For the Publick Good, because the Princes gave it that fair pretence.

While the King was at Poitiers, the Bastard d'Armagnac, seized his only Brother Charles, and carried him into Bretagne. All the zealous Servants of the Deceased Charles his Father flocked in to him, and got him to write a Manifesto to all the Princes of France, inviting them to unite with their Party for the easing of the People, and the reformation of the Kingdom.

After the King had attempted in vain to reclaim them by fair promises, and flattering words, he went to strike the first blow at them, who had the first declared themselves. These were the Dukes of Bourbon and Dammartin who had begun the War in Berry, Bourbonnois and Auvergne.

All Berry submitted, except Bourges which was guarded by the Bastard of Bourbon, Rion in Auvergne waited a Siege, and sustained it. John Duke of Nemours, the Count d'Armagnac, and Charles Sire d'Albret brought a considerable reinforcement to the Duke: nevertheless he gave Ear to a Treaty with the King, promising to summon his Confederates to a Peace, and to abandon them, if they would not accept of reasonable conditions. Nemours gave his positive word to the King to side with his Party, but he kept it not; and the King kept the Oath he made to himself to be revenged in time and place convenient.

In this Country the King had notice that the Count of Charolois had taken the Field with the Duke his Fathers leave, who had assured him, when they parted that if he fell into any danger, he should not want an Hundred Thousand Men to bring him out again. He knew likewise that this Count had fifteen Hundred men of Arms, eight Thousand Archers, and a great equipage of Artillery and Waggon, that he had made his Rendezvous before Paris, and that the Duke of Bretagne and Monsieur were to joyn him.

1465.

The Charolois sent the fairest pretence in the World before him, the Abolition of Imposts and the publick good. He burned the Seats of those Officers at all the places of Receipts, and tore their Registers, paid the expences of his Soldiers, and kept them in good Discipline. If this good order could have held all had been his own, or if the Breton had come at the time appointed, they had been Masters of Paris, there being few Soldiers in it, and many male-contented, and lovers of Novelties.

The fear of losing Paris made the King leave his other game, to get to Paris, before the Charolois: As soon as he had repassed the Loire, the Duke of Bourbon, Dammartin, Nemours, and Albret broke their words with him, and having gotten together ten Thousand men, marched to joyn with the other Confederates.

The

The Lords of the League were all to be at St. Denis towards the end of the month of June, the Charolois waited for them ten or twelve days, and in the interim attempted the Suburbs of Paris by several Skirmishes. When he found none stirred in his favour, and that he had no certain news of them, nor of the Bretons march, he was in great perplexity and thought to retire back again. Nevertheless the Vice-Chancellor Romille, a Normand and very subtil, shewing him from time to time Letters from his Master, which he wrote upon blanks Signed before, wrought so far that he engaged him to pass the River Seine over the Bridge at St. Cloud, to go and joyn the Breton towards Estampes where he thought to have met him. He quartered that day at the Village of Longjumeau, his advanced Guard, at Montleher. The King returning from Berry kept the same Road, and came to Quarter at Chafres a League on this side of Montleher.

Both Armies were mightily surprised to find themselves so near each other. The Kings design was to slip aside, and reach to Paris without hazarding a Battel; but Peter de Breze Grand Seneschal of Normandy, concerned that he should ask him whether he had not given his Hand and Seal to the Princes, engaged them to fight, where he was killed one of the very first. Thus hapned it to be a rencounter rather then a Battel. It was on Tuesday 16th of July near Montleher, from whence it took name.

Both Armies, to speak properly, had the worst, and neither of them any advantage. The Kings left Wing, and the Burgundians right were broken; and in the rout the fright was so great that there were run-aways both of the one and other Party that posted it, for fifty Leagues together without baiting, or looking behind them, each of them declaring they had lost the Battel on their side. The two Chiefs fought Valiantly in person, the Burgundian was twice near being taken Prisoner or slain.

In the Evening, the King tyred with being on Horse-back all the day, was conducted by the Scotch-men of his Guards to the Castle of Montleher. His men seeing him no more believed him to be dead; And the Count du Mayne, and the Lord de Montauban withdrew themselves with Eight Hundred Lances.

The Burgundian Army being half broken, all in a Consternation, fearing a new Engagement the next day which they could not have sustained, the Principal Officers were in deliberation to dislodge that night, and go towards Burgundy. Fear is an evil Counsellor, all were of that opinion, the Lord of Contay only hindred that retreat, which would have turned to a rout. The next day they had certain intelligence that the King was decamped, and gone to Corbeil, and a few hours after they were assured the Breton was arrived at Estampes. Thus the Field was left to the Charolois, which filled his head with so much pride that it may well be said that day was the cause of all his misfortunes.

The next day the King fearing to be hemm'd in, descended directly to Paris along the Seine. The same night he supped in the company of the principal Ladies of that City, to gain their hearts by the power of that insinuating Sex, and to have a Party amongst the Beauties to oppose the intrigues of those that were for the interests of the Princes. He also highly commended the Fidelity of the Citizens, and to allure the People he caused to be proclaimed in all the Suburbs an abatement upon Wines, from a fourth part to an eighth part, and a general revocation of all Imposts, the five great Farmes only excepted.

These favours being against his will did not last long, no more then the establishment he made of a Council of eighteen persons, six of the Parliament, six of the Body of the University, and six of the chiefest Citizens, by whose Counsel and advice he promised to be governed, according to the remonstrances of the Clergy, the Parliament and the University. The danger past he kept nothing of all this but a mortal hatred against those that had made the proposition, and particularly against the Bishop who first mentioned it in the name of the rest. This was William Brother of Allen Chartier, a man of great vertue, and hugely zealous of the publick good.

Being in want of money, he made great borrowings amongst his Officers. Which was the first occasion of making employments vendible, for he set aside those that had refused to lend him what he demanded. About fifteen days after having well provided for the security of the City, he went into Normandy to raise men and Money.

In the mean time the Count de Charolois marching to meet the Breton took the House d'Estampes to refresh his Soldiers and dress the wounded which were to the

the number of almost two Thousand. At the end of three days the Breton arrived, having with him the Counts of Dunois and Dammartin, the Marechal de Lobeack, the Lords de Bevil, de Gancour, and d' Anboise. 800 Men at Armes, and six Thousand Light-horse.

It hapned one day that Monsieur, a young Prince who had but a faint heart; seeing the wounded men who were carried thorough the Streets of Estampes, and the sick that crawled up and down, let fall some expressions which signified his repentance for that enterprize. The Count de Charolois heard it: and perhaps he heard likewise that the Bretons, upon the rumour that had been spread how the King was slain in the Battel of Montlebery, had consulted of a means to rid themselves of him, that they might govern the new King alone: upon which he imagined that he might be left betwixt the Hammer, and the Anvil; and in this apprehension he sent to Edward King of England to treat of an Alliance with him, and desire to have his Sister Margret. His design was but to entertain him with hopes, that he might make no League with the King; for he mortally hated the House of York, and was for the interest of Lancaster; nevertheless by over-acting the dissembler, he engaged himself so far as to compleat the marriage, and took the Order of the Garter.

When the Princes had staid two Weeks at Estampes, they resolved to return before Paris, to try a second time whether they could move them to declare themselves for the publick good. Having therefore foraged the Country of Gastinois, they passed the Seine over a Bridge of Boats between Melun and Montereau. At this passage John of Anjou, Duke of Calabria and Lorrain, the Son of good King Rene and a great Captain, joyned them with the Forces of both Burgundy's. He had but eight hundred Horse, but of the very best, and amongst his Foot, which were but few, five Hundred Swisse, the first that were seen in France.

* The Trenches are yet to be seen.

When all the other Lords were come with their Forces, there were near a Hundred Thousand Horse in that Army. The Burgundian had his Quarters at Charenton, and was lodged in his Castle of *Conflans, the Dukes of Berry and Calabria at St. Maur, and the rest at St. Denis, and the places thereabouts.

In this multitude of principal Officers, there was no Head considerable enough to command this vast Body; they staid three days before Paris without doing any thing. Perhaps they might have forced it by assaults, had they undertaken it, for there were but five hundred Lances, and some Bands of Archers, however they rather furnished themselves, then starved the City to a Compliance.

It is true, they narrowly missed the gaining of it by Treaties and Intreagues. For some out of a desire to see the Blockade at an end, and the rest for fear of some sad event gave Ear to certain Letters brought them by the Heralds from the Brother of their King.

They sent Deputies to him from the Chiefest of the Clergy, the Parliament, the University, and the Citizens; The Bishop was Speaker. At their return, notwithstanding the contrary orders of the Count d' Eu who was Governor, it was concluded at their Town-Hall, that they should desire the King to Assemble the Estates, that the Princes might come into Paris in small companies, and that they should be furnished with Provisions for their money. The King being informed thereof returned to Paris the 28th of August and broke off this project.

Had he staid two days longer, he might perhaps have found the Princes in Paris and the Gates shut against him. Had that hapned he had resolved to have retired to Lewis Sforza Duke of Milan his good Friend, who had sent him a relief of seven or eight Thousand Men that mightily harraided the Duke of Bourbons Country.

After his Arrival, no day passed without Skermishings, unless upon some Truces which were renewed divers times for four and twenty hours only. There had been a Conference agreed upon by Deputies the third of September, which was held at Mercers Grange. From that hour there was nothing but bargaining to debauch people, the Confederates grew jealous of each other, that Party disunited, and the Kings grew strong and better fortified, and Confirmed.

It was resolved the Council of Sforza Duke of Milan should be followed, which was to dissolve the League at what price soever, and for that purpose to grant to every one in particular almost whatever he demanded. The King had very near made an agreement which each of them, excepting only about the Appenage for his Brother; they being obstinately bent to have Normandy allowed ed him for that purpose. He could not consent to the dismembring that fair Province: but in the mean time having information that the Duke of Bourbon who made War in that Country, having been by some intelligence introduced into the Castle of Rouen, had made himself Master of that City, and that all the Province inclined to the same resolution, allured with the desire of having a Duke as Bretagne had, who found themselves very well under him: he was induced to grant them what they held already.

The Treaty was concluded the 29th of October. The Count de Charolois had the Cities of the Somme, redeemable only after his Decease for two hundred thousand Crowns, and moreover the Counties of Guines, of Boulogne and of Pontieu. The Count de St. Pol who Governed him, had the Constables Sword; To the Count of Armagnac, and to all the rest they restored their Lands, and those Offices they were dispossessed of, and withal they gave them Pensions and employments: but in such a manner as sowed the Seeds of discord amongst them. The Duke of Bretagne made them pay the charges of his Army and his Journey. The Publick, which served for a Stalking-Horse to this War, and who had born all the expences, gained no advantage, save only that it was promised, That there should be named Six and Thirty Notables, or prime Men, twelve of the Nobility, twelve of the Clergy, and twelve of the long Robe, to consult of Methods to ease the People, and redress the disorders of the State.

The next day the King and the Confederate Princes met at the Castle de Vincennes, which he had put into the hands of the Count; and there Monsieur rendred Hommage for his Dukedom of Normandy. Two days after the Count took his journey towards Flanders, the King conducting him as far as Villers le Bel, and at the same time the Duke of Bretagne went with Monsieur into Normandy to see him take the possession of it.

1465.

The good success of Francis Sforza's Counsel did soon appear; the King gained the most valiant of their Commanders to be for him, put some of them into jealousies and divisions, sought occasions to strip others, and in time lighted on fit opportunities, which entangled them in great troubles and perplexities. The Count de Charolois was gotten into one that was bad enough, to wit, a War with those of Liege: he needed but to encourage them, by blowing up the Flame, and assisting those inveterate people in their furious hatred.

Their Bishop was Brother to the Duke of Bourbon, Nephew by his Mother to Duke Philip of Burgundy, they had expelled him the Country, because he did not live like a Prelate, and the Burgundian had undertaken to restore him. Those of Leige and those of Dinant sent to declare a War against the Charolois when he was on his March towards Paris.

For that time the Duke his Father with the assistance of the Dukes of Cleves and Guelders, compelled them in a few days to buy a Peace. But a while after upon the flying report that the Count was kill'd at Montlebery, they reassumed their Arms with more fury, relying upon the promise the King had made to give them assistance, and that he would make no Peace without them. Those of Dinant, a City Famous and enriched by their works in Copper, burst out into a Thousand outrages against the Charolois, even to the calling him Bastard, and hanging him in Effigie.

Their chastisement followed their outrageous Insolence very close: The Duke laid Siege to the Town, his Son commanded the Army. The place was taken by Storm and burnt, eight Hundred of the Inhabitants drowned in the Meuse, and the rest abandoned to extream misery. The Liegeois who came to their relief, terrified with the smoak of this Fire, desired a Truce for a year, till the month of January the year following, and gave up three hundred Hostages.

The Duke of Bretagne would monopolize Monsieur to himself alone, and enjoy all the favours he could confer in Normandy. John Duke of Calabria and the old Servants of Charles the VII. had their pretences too; divisions grew amongst them, one may guess whether Engines were then wanting to blow up the Sparks. They made John Duke of Calabria believe that the Breton had plotted to convey away Monsieur into Bretagne. Duke John gives notice hereof to the Normands, the noise is spread all over the City, the Foolish people take it for a truth, run to the Mount St. Catharine, where Monsieur was waiting till they had made all ready for his reception, sets him upon a Horse, and forces him to make his entrance Tumultuously & without Ceremony. The Breton durst not appear and was constrained for his own safety safety, and to avoid that fury, to retire into the lower Normandy, whose Cities were in his hands.

1465. Soon as the King knew this, he took opportunity by the foretop. He marched directly to him, frighted him, brought him to a Conference at Caen, where the Duke consented that those places which he held, should be put as in Sequestration into the hands of Oder Daydic-lefenn, since Count of Cominges.

Whilst the King was in this Country, the same Duke of Bourbon who had put Normandy into the power of Monsieur, laboured to get him out again, and put it into the Kings possession. In all his life the Duke of Burgundy felt not a more sensible displeasure, then to find that Prince whom he had loved above all the Men in the World, turn his back upon him so soon, and ruine his own designs.

1466. Louviers and the Pont de Larche being surrendered to the King, those of Rouen demanded composition the 10th of January, and their miserable Duke denuded of Friends, Money, Heart and Counsel, escaped in a pittiful equipage, and thought himself happy in finding a shelter at the Bretons. Thus Normandy kept her Duke but two Months. The King could not pardon the passion they had shewn to have one. It cost the lives of a great number of the most considerable in that Country.

The War with the Liegeois detained Count de Charolois so, that he could not prevent this revolution, and old Age hindered Duke Philip his Father from stirring in it so early as he would have desired. He held only a Correspondence with the Breton, and strove to Animate King Edward, whose Daughter he had demanded in marriage to make a descent in France.

During the noise which was spread every where, of this irruption, and the murmurings of infinite numbers of discontented persons, the King amused the people with the hopes of easing them, having Summoned an Assembly des Notables at Paris, out of which were chosen 21 Commissaries who began to set themselves about it in the Palace the 16th of July. The Count de Dunois presided; It was he alone who amongst so many Princes had followed it; out of that Laudible zeal he hath transmitted to all his posterity, to procure the publick good.

There were more Propositions made, no doubt, then they intended to practise, and fine studied speeches; This is what they call in France, de Belles actions, brave actions.

1466. The excessive heats of the Summer bred many contagious Maladies, which in the City of Paris alone, swept away above forty Thousand People, and frighted away a much greater number; In so much as the King desiring to re-people it, by an Edict called in all sorts of Nations and People, even such as were banished, or Criminals, to whom, besides the Abolition, he gave Priviledges and Franchises.

1467. The Pragmatique subsisted yet, Pope Paul II. sent as Legat to the King, John Joffredi Cardinal Bishop of Alby to get the revocation verified; who employed John Balue Cardinal Bishop of Angiers, to carry the Letters from the King to the Chastellet and the Parliament. They passed at the Chastellet without opposition: but in the Parliament he found John de Saint Romain Attorney General who opposed him to his face; and the University went to the Legat to signify their Appeal to the next Council, and after entred it into the Register at the Chasteler.

Paris being as it were the Kings Bulwark against the Grandees that loved him not, he ordained that all the Inhabitants, even the Ecclesiasticks should enroll themselves under the Banners of their Principals, and Sub-Principals, that is to say, of Colonels and Captains, and should provide themselves with good Arms. At one Muster which was made the 4th of September, there were found to be between 70 and 80000 men, between the ages of 16 and 60 years. In another which was made the following year they counted 84000.

1467. The 15th of July in the year 1467. Philip Duke of Burgundy called le Bon (i. e. the Good,) ended his days at Brussels in the 72th year of his Age, and the 45th of his Domination. He yielded not in power or riches to any King but the French; but had not his like in Goodness and Magnificence. And indeed he was adored by his people, respected by all the Princes of Christendom, and dreaded even by the Infidels. The Count de Charolois Succeeded in his great Dominions, not at all in his Goodness and Wisdom. He was Rash, Presumptuous, Quarrelsome and Bloody: But withal Valiant, Undaunted and Indefatigable in War, and who within himself observed exact justice and right towards his own Subjects.

1467. At his first coming to this Estate he was engaged against the Liegeois, whom the King

King had wrought to break the Truce, and he assisted them yet, notwithstanding he offered to forsake them, if the Duke would forsake the Breton, whom the King held already, as it were by the Throat, being entred into his Country with thirty Thousand Men. The Duke would do nothing of this; but hastned to make an end of the War with Liege. Now the Liegeois having lost a Battel when they came to relieve the City of St. Tron, did submit themselves to any conditions he would require, excepting firing and plundering. He caused the Heads of 20 or 30 of the most guilty to fly, together with the Towers and Walls of the City of Liege, changed the Magistrates and the Laws, and drained them of great Sums of Money for his expences. This was in the Month of November.

The people of Flanders, especially the Gantois who had mutined after the Death of his Father, humbled themselves likewise before their victorious Prince, and sent him all their Banners to Bruges.

In the Month of October, the King received advice that the Duke of Alençon, who made one in every discontented Party, was joyned in that of Monsieur and the Duke of Bretagne, and had given them up all his places, by means of which and of those that yet remained in their possession, amongst others Auranches, Bayeux and Caen, they held almost all the lower Normandy. The King willing to tread him down first in his way to the others, did presently cause his Army to march into the Countreys of Perche and of Mayn, and arrived at Mans himself.

One of the causes which had most stirred up the Cities, especially Paris, against the King in the League for the publick good, had been the mutation of Officers. For this reason, before his march against the Leagued Princes, he made this celebrated Ordinance * This order of the 21th of October, * which bears, That considering that in his Officers of not being consists under his Authority, the direction whereby are Policed and managed the publick affairs of the Kingdom, and that thereof they are Essential Ministers, as it is to be seen members of that Body, whereof he is the Head, he would therefore free them from in the Capitall doubts they had of falling into the inconveniences of mutation and destitution, and laries of Charles provide for their security. And therefore he Ordained that thenceforward there should be no Office disposed of unless it were vacant by Death, or by voluntary resignation, the Bald, and in an Ordinance of Philip de Valois, quoted by du Monlin.

His Army lay all the rest of Autumn without doing much, for as subtil as he was, he suffer'd himself to be amused by the Breton, with the hopes of an accommodation. Nevertheless he did not wholly lose his time. Towards the end of the year, he Debauched Rene Count du Perche Son of John Duke of Alençon, who betraying his own Father, delivered the Castle of Alençon up to him, which in those days was reckoned for a very good place. The Breton forsook the Town. And finding Monsieur and the Duke of Bretagne astonished at so unexpected an accident, he employ'd the Popes Legat to let them know that he would refer all his Deputies to the judgment of the General Estates; And for that purpose summoned them together at Tours the first day of April.

All the Deputies proved to be so much at his Devotion, that they ordained nothing but what was conformable to his desires: That Normandy being united to the Crown, could not be dismembred to be given to his Brother: That that young Prince should be exhorted to be satisfied with twelvethousand Livers yearly Rent in Lands for his Appenage, and 60000 Livers Annual Pension, but this not to be a President for the future Sons of France. That the Breton should surrender the places in Normandy, and if he would not obey this Ordinance they should make War upon him with all their Forces, and to do this they proffered their Lives and Fortunes.

He caused this to be immediately made known to his Brother, and to the Breton; and at the same time his Army, led by his Admiral, entred Bretagne, took Chantoce and Ancenis, and penetrated a great way into the Country, whilst himself, after he had visited his good City of Paris, was gone towards the Frontiers of Picardy to make use of some Engines to endeavour to disjoyn the Duke of Burgundy from them.

At that time the said Duke having vanquished the Liegeois, had sent to entreat him to leave his Friends in Peace, otherwise he should be obliged to Succour them; And indeed he advanced by long Marches for that end: but mean while they being affrighted, though nothing appeared which could oblige them to precipitate themselves so soon, concluded their agreement, and complied with the resolution of the Estates.

The King failed not to give speedy notice of it to the Burgundian, but he would believe nothing; even the Herald from the Breton who carry'd him the News, ran the hazard of being hanged as a Party Suborn'd, because he had seen the King in his journey. At length he met with so many demonstrations that he must give Faith.

He encamped in great order along the Somme (He was the first that renewed the Roman Method, to enclose his Forces in a Camp entrenched.) Notwithstanding those precautions the Kings Army was so strong, and his Soldiers so Animated that he might easily have forced him had he undertaken it: but he would rather try a less hazardous way, and gave him six Score Thousand Crowns of Gold to procure a Truce. He never let any thing slip which could be purchased by money which cost him nothing, for that he drained out of his Subjects pockets, but the chance of a Battel concerned him most.

1468. The Catalonians notwithstanding the Kings Sentence, and the accommodation of the Castilian, had chosen the foregoing year John Duke of Calabria for their Sovereign, as well for his valour as the pretensions the House of Anjou had to the Kingdom of Arragon. He made a War in that Country with the Kings assistance three years together, having sometimes good success, and sometimes bad: but in the year 1470. When he had routed the Army of John King of Arragon who besieged the City of Peralta, he Died of a Burning Fever in Barcelona.

Lewis had a Genius that was marvellously Subtil, Insinuating and Intriguing: He knew it perfectly well, and had conceived that if he could but confer with the Burgundian, he could disunite him from the other two, or at least cast the Seeds of jealousies amongst them. He therefore negociated for an interview, and by the advice of Cardinal la Balae, went to find him at Peronne where he was, without taking any Guards: but only the Cardinal, the Duke of Bourbon, the Count de Saint Pol, and two or three other Lords, thereby to shew an entire confidence.

The Duke had lodged him in the City. Soon after there arrives three Princes of the House of Savoy, Philip Lord of Bresse, the Count de Romont, and the Bishop of Geneva, then the Mareschal of Burgundy, the Lords du Lau, and d' Urse, and some others, all Enemies to the King. Du Lau had been otherwise his Favourite but afterwards had been clapt in Prison whence he made his escape. The sight of these People put him in such fear, that he desired the Duke to lodge him in the Castle; This was to go into the Trap, and give himself up a Prisoner.

Before his going to Peronne, he had sent Ambassadors to Liege, to stir those bustling People to take up Arms, and he had taken no care to countermand it. Now the Mine was sprung earlier then he would have had it; for at the first word those impetuous People went forth out of hand, took the City of Tongres immediately, where they Seized their Bishop, tore in pieces five or six of his Canons, and slew some Burgundians.

1468. At this news the Duke grows in a Rage, causes the Gates of the Castle of Peronne to be shut up, and hardly could retain his wrath, from a revenge upon the King himself. Three days together the King was in mortal Trances, he saw himself in the hands of his Enemies justly provoked and enraged, and who might have gained all by loosing him, amidst People that hated him to the very Death, and in a House at the foot of that Tower where Hebert Count de Vermandois had heretofore put Charles the Simple to Death. In effect he had been lost had he not found out the means to gain some of the Dukes Domestick Servants (amongst others Philip de Comines) who softened the Spirit of the Duke their Master. He would not withdraw himself from this Precipice but by making a new Treaty with the Duke, by which he agreed Monsieur should have the Counties of Champagne and Brie, and promised to follow the Burgundian to the destruction of the unhappy Liegeois, with what numbers of men he should desire. He carry'd only some Guards, and 300 Soldiers.

1468. Although the City of Liege were dismantled and without Guns, they nevertheless defended themselves desperately eight days together, made great Salley's, amongst others one in the Night wherein they had like to have killed the King and the Count in their Quarters. But on a Sunday the 30th of October which they believed to be a day of rest amongst Christians (as if there were any Religion in a War) they were Attack'd about Dinner time, and made but little defence. One great great part of the People fled over the Bridge that crossed the Meuse into the Forest of Ardennes, where more then half of them perished by hunger and cold, the rest got into Churches, or hid themselves in their Houses.

Fear constrained the King to rejoyce at the unhappiness of his miserable Allies, to applaud the great actions of the Duke of Burgundy, before his own People and in his presence, and make Courtship to his own Vassal. Four days after he managed it so, by means of those whom he gained to be for him, that he was permitted to go, to cause the Treaty of Peronne to be verif'd in the Court of Parliament: for without that, as Philip de Comines says, the Treaties were at no value. The Duke having made him some ill-favour'd excuses, for having brought him thither, conducted him only half a League.

After the Kings departure he caused about a Thousand, or twelve Hundred of those miserable wretches to be drowned, that had been taken in their Houses at Liege and set fire to the whole City, excepting the Churches and three hundred Houses about them which were preserved to lodge the Clergy.

The Parisians could not refrain from Scoffing at the craft of the King, which brought him into this Trap at Peronne, he contrived to turn their discourse upon another Subject, by sending to their Houses to take away all their Deers, Goats, Cranes, Swans, Cormorants, and other Creatures which they kept for their pleasure, as likewise all such Birds as were taught to whistle and speak. Perhaps they had instructed some Parrot to say Peronne.

At his parting with the Duke, he had asked him what he understood he was to do in case his Brother would not be contented with Champagne for his Appenage: the Duke answered that if he would not take it, and that the King could otherwise satisfy or content him, he would leave it to them two. He failed not to take his advantage of these inconsiderate words. He would not have his Brother be so near a Neighbour to the Burgundian, his Interest was to place him at the other end of the Kingdom to break off their Communication. That young Prince, Weak and Inconstant of mind was Governed by Oder-Daydie Lord of Lescun a Gascon and vain, who would needs be a Prophet in his own Country; by his means he was persuaded to renounce Champagne, and accept of Guienne with the City of Rochel.

This change was the loss of that young Prince; The Cardinal de la Ballue, in whose hands the Treaty of Peronne had been Sworn, with much regret suffered it to be altered, whether out of love to Monsieur, or that he would have had the King still in some perplexity. This good Prelat and William de Hæraucoux holding Intelligence with the Burgundian, wrote to Monsieur to dissuade him, and represented many things to him for his advantage, but contrary to the Kings intentions. Their Letters having been intercepted and they Seized, they ingenuously confessed their practices. The King sent the information to his Brother; who suffering himself to be overcome by his Carasses, accepted of Guienne, and came to meet him at Tours.

The Bishop was shut up in an Iron Cage, a punishment he well deserved, since he was the first inventor of it. The Cardinal was convey'd to the Bastille, where he remained twelve years, the Pope demanding him as liable only to his Justice, and the King pressing the Pope to let him have Judges assigned him within the Kingdom to hear his cause.

The good correspondence between the two Brothers seemed to be perfected, and the King to gain, or wean, Monsieurs Heart from the Countries on this side, allured him with a great Match in Spain. Henry King of Castille had a Daughter named Jeane, but whom the Castilians held for a Bastard, because he was esteemed impotent; in so much as they had constrained him to declare the Infanta Isabella, who was his Sister, his Heiress. The King sent the Cardinal of Arras to demand this Isabella for Monsieur: But the Lords of the Country having stollen her away, and married her to Ferdinand Infant of Arragon, he seeks to have Jane, which Henry agreed to. A Matter for a long War if Charles had lived.

The first day of August the King being at his Castle of Amboise, instituted an Order of Knighthood in honour of St. Michael, and limited the number of Knights to 36, yet was it never filled up in all his Reign.

The French particularly Honoured St. Michael as the Tutelary Angel of that Monarchy; And a better could not be pitched upon to tread down the Pride of the English, who carry'd Dragons in their Ensigns, then that Prince of they Celestial Militia, who is painted with a Dragon under his feet. And indeed, it had been reported reported that he was seen at the head of our Army's fighting against them for the French.

He imagined by means or virtue of this Collar, that he should have drawn all the Grandees of the Kingdom within his clutches when he held this Chapter. And therefore the Duke of Bretagne refused it, and the Duke of Burgundy doing yet worse, received the Order of the Garter, and wore it to his Death.

The Breton had in his service one Peter Landais his Treasurer, a man of Low Birth, but very knowing and able to countermine all the Artifices of Lewis XI. It was he that led him to all these evasions, and emboldened his Master to withstand all his devices, and his threats. Thus, what ever endeavours he could use, though he were on his Frontiers with an Army, he could never disunite him from the Burgundian, but only obliged him by a Treaty made at Saumur, to renounce all offensive Leagues against the Kingdom.

1470. In the year 1470. John the Natural Son of Lewis Duke of Orleans, left this world aged 70 years, having divers years before left the Court because of his almost continual pain of the Gout, which the hardships in the Wars had brought upon him. This Prince, valued in all things, says Comines, having made himself as able a Counsellor as he was a Captain, was one of the principal instruments God made use of to drive the English out of France. Therefore the Princes of his Family gave him the County of Dunois, King Charles that of Longueville, the Office of Great Chamberlain, and the Lieutenantancy General of his Army's and strong Forts; A power of so great extent that it hath been communicated to none but himself in the third Race.

1470. The renunciation which the King caused the Breton to make, had most respect to Edward of York King of England, and Brother in Law to the Burgundian, of whom it was hourly reported, that he was coming to Land at Calais. He was wholly prevented by the Earl of Warwick, who in revenge of some injuries received from him, set himself to carry on the interests of the House of Lancaster, and had even Debauched the Duke of Clarence his Brother.

1471. He had the foregoing year defeated his Army, and afterwards took him Prisoner. Then Edward having escaped, beat him in his turn: So that he was forced to save himself in France, about the end of the Month of May this year. From thence returning into England with the Succours the King lent him, he changed the Scene a second time. For all stocked to him, according to the Genius of that Country, which loves change, and Edward wholly forsaken, fled into Flanders to the Duke of Burgundy his Brother in Law. Then King Henry who was in the Tower of London was set at Liberty, and Warwick and Clarence took upon them the Government of the Kingdom.

Though the King still resented in his Heart the affront received at Peronne, nevertheless being of a fearful Spirit, and the length of any enterprize putting him out of patience if the success were not as swift as his desires: he would have lived in peace, if the Constable and those that were about him, had not excited his resentment to draw him to a rupture. They feared, and the Constable most of all, that a Peace making them appear useless, the King might think of retrenching their great allowances, and his stirring mind, if it were not employ'd abroad, might put him upon great alterations at home in his Court.

Besides these motives, there was also an Intrigue of the Bretons and the Constables in favour of Monsieur. As they desired to strengthen him against the King, they had inspired him with a desire of marrying the only Daughter of the Burgundian; And because they knew the Father would not easily consent to it, they believed they should sooner bring it about by force, then by friendship, and therefore they resolved to engage the King to make a War upon him.

The Bias they took for this was to assure him that they had Infallible Intelligence how to surprize the Dukes Towns, and make his Subjects revolt in the very Heart of Flanders. Upon the hopes of these great advantages, he sent an Usher of the Parliament to Summon him even in the very City of Ghent, to give satisfaction to the Count d' Eu, from whom he detained some Lands, belonging to the County of Pontieu. In stead of appearing upon the Summons, he levy'd Soldiers at half Pay, but having been at this charge three Months, seeing no Body moved, he thought it was only a huffe, and dismissed them.

The House of Burgundy spared their People so much, that they kept up no Militia, nor Garrisons in their Towns, they thought that by Treating their Subjects well they were Guard good enough. However when he had laid down all his Arms, he he received divers informations that all was ready to overwhelm him. John de Chaulons Prince of Orange, and some of his Domestick Servants forsook him; Baldwin one of his Bastard Brothers (he had eight) Plotted to poison him; the Breton renounced his alliance, and the Constable Seized upon the City of Saint Quentin. Then he that had feared nothing, began to apprehend every thing. He got together with much ado three hundred Horse, with which he advanced, to cover his other Cities on the Somme: But upon sight of him those of Amiens turned their backs and received the Kings Forces. Abbeville would have done as much if Desquerdes had not hindered it.

He retired therefore to Arras with more haste then he went forth, and sent a private messenger to the Constable to pray him not to push things forward to extremity. He received for answer, that unless Monsieur would declare for him he could not be served in it: But that he was ready to embrace his defence, if he would give his Daughter in Marriage to him. A Note from Monsieur conveyed to him in a piece of Wax, assured him the same thing; and the Breton gave him intelligence that all his Towns, even Bruges and Ghent were upon the point of revolting, and that the King was resolved to besiege him, whithersoever he went.

But the more they will force him, the more he stands out against them. Not being followed so closely, as he might have been by the King, he resumes his Courage, gathers up Men, takes the Field, and having gained Pequigny, presents himself before Amiens, and Fired his Guns at the Town to invite the Constable to give him Battel. But finding the great numbers of men coming which the King got together at Beauvais, he retreated back, and wrote a very Submissive Letter to him, which in gross discovered the Artifices of those that Animated the King against him. The King who found he was as little secure as the Duke amongst such double dealing People, agreed to a Truce for a year the 12th Day of May. St. Quentin remained the Constables, and was at last the cause of his ruine. The Treaty Signed, the King went into Towaine. Monsieur to his Apennage of Guyenne, and the Burgundian to Flanders.

During this War, Edward of York with a Moderate assistance which the Burgundian and secretly furnished him withal (for he apprehended to offend the Earl of Warwick) had by the favour of the Duke of Clarence his Brother, whom he had regained by the intrigues of a Woman, re-enters England gained two Battels, one against Warwick who was killed on the spot, the other against young Edward Son of King Henry and the Queen his Mother, in which that Prince was slain. The Queen became a Prisoner to the Conqueror, whom afterwards King Lewis redeemed by a ransom of 6000 Crowns. Thus Edward re-established himself in his Throne, and maintained it till his Death.

Sigismund Duke of Austria having need of Money, which that House hath ever been in great scarcity of, till the time of the Emperor Charles V. engaged his County of Ferreite for a Notable Sum to the Duke of Burgundy. The Duke puts in a very courteous Governor, he was called Hagenbach, who laying great exactions, was the first cause of the Germans hatred towards his Master.

Pope Sixtus the IV. (this was Francis de la Rovere) Elected in the Room of Paul II. to follow the example of his Predecessors, Solicited the Christian Princes to unite themselves against the Turks. For this purpose he sent the Cardinal Bessarion a Greek by Birth and a person of great merit, to the King of France and the Duke of Burgundy. The Cardinal having seen the Duke first, the King was so much offended at it, that he made him wait a long time before he would admit him to his presence, and giving him Audience he rallied with him, and treated him as a Grecian* Beard.

The Truce displeased the Duke who had made it by compulsion; neither was it to the good liking of Monsieur, nor the Breton, nor the Constable; thus all four sought to re-unite themselves together. The marriage of Monsieur, was the only tie that could be secure, the Burgundian promised it, though he had no mind to it; and upon this foot they renewed their League.

The Constables soliciting the other Princes to enter into it, the Duke of Bourbon gave notice of his practices to the King, who wisely dissembled it, contriving to be quit with them by the same method. For he every day pared away somewhat of his Brothers Apennage, threw one rub one day and another the next, Debauched baunched his Friends from him, corrupted his Servants, and got them to reveal all their Masters secrets.

By the Treaty of Conflans, John Count of Armagnac had been restored to his Lands: the King had caused them to be again Seized on in the year 1468. And had given them to Monsieur with the Government of Guyenne; Monsieur being discontented had caused that Count to return, put him into possession of his Estate, and by his means, and with the assistance of the Counts de Foix, and the Lord de Albret, he raised Men, either that he might not be Surprized, or to undertake something.

1471. Whatever his designs were, they were blasted by a detestable and cruel remedy. He loved a Lady Daughter of the Lord Monsereau and Widdow of Lewis d'Amboise, and had for Confessor a certain Benedictine Monk Abbot of St. John d'Angely, named John Favre Versois. This wicked Monk poyson'd a very fair Peach and gave it to that Lady, who at a Collation put it to steep in Wine, presented one half of it to the Prince, and eat the other her self. She being tender died in a short time; the Prince more robust sustained for some while the assaults of the Venome, but how-ever could not Conquer it, and in the end yielded his Life to it.

1471. Such as adjust all the Phenomena's of the Heavens to the accidents here below, might have applied to this same a Comet of extraordinary Magnitude, which was visible four score days together from the Month of December. It's Head was in the Sign of the Ballance, and it had a long Tail turning a little towards the North.

In Spring the King drew near towards Guyenne; the Monk had perhaps reiterated his Dose. However it was, Monsieur died the 12th of May. In the mean time the Burgundian passionately desiring to recover St. Quintin and Amiens, was entred into a Treaty with the King, who promised to restore it, and to leave the Counts of Nevers and St. Pol to his Mercy: and the Duke reciprocally did oblige himself to abandon Monsieur and the Breton to him.

Neither of these Dreamt of keeping their Word or Faith. The Duke Signed the first, the King deferr'd from day to day, expecting what would become of his Brother: when he had certain news of his Death, he scoffed at the Duke, and Seized Guyenne again into his own hands.

Although in many actions he had not too much of the Fear of God before his Eyes: nevertheless he had great Devotion towards the Saints, enriched their Churches, went several Pilgrimages every year, particularly to places Consecrated to our Lady. He Ordained on the first of May that at the sound of the great Bell at Noon, every one should kneel down and say the Ave Maria. The same day after the procession, William Chartier Bishop of Paris Died suddenly, not without Suspicion that some had contributed towards his Death.

1472. It was in this year that Philip de Comines quitted the Duke of Burgundy, whose Domestick and Subject he was, to go into the Service of the King his Sovereign Lord. If the Motive thereto had been Honest, no doubt but it would have been explained by him who hath reasoned so well on every thing else.

Who could express the rage the Duke of Burgundy was in when he Learn'd the Death of the Duke of Guyenne? He entred into Picardy with a Torch in one hand and his Sword in the other. Hitherto burnings had not been practised by either Party: nevertheless he made a Bon-fire of all the open Country, and Sacrificed all that fell under his power to his Friends Ghost. Nestle taken by assault endured all sorts of cruelties, because the Inhabitants had killed a Herald at Arms who went to Summon them, and two men besides during a Surcease which had been allowed them to Treat in. The reverence to the Altar could not save those innocent people who fled to the Church for refuge; and such as escaped the Sword were all hanged, or had their hands cut off.

His blind fury ran aground at the Siege of Beauvais. The want of attacking it roundly at first, made him lose six Weeks time and two Thousand Men. It is Memorable that upon a General Assault which was given the Thursday 9th of July, the Men within being ready to give ground, the Women conducted by one Jane Hachete, did wonders, repelling the Enemy with showers of Stones, Wild-fire, and Lead melted with scalding Rozen. The Effigies of that Woman is yet to be be seen in their Town-Hall, grasping a Sword in her hand; and there is a procession the 10th of July, which is the Day on which the Siege was raised, where the Women march first, the Men following after.

Going thence the Burgundian Ravaged all the Country of Caux, took Eu and St. Valery: but was repulsed before Diepe, then before Rouen, and having threatened Noyon, he retired to Abbeville.

From Guyenne the King passed into Bretagne to force the Duke to renounce the League, and surrender the Monk to him who had Poyson'd Monsieur. For Odet-Daydie had Seized him and transfer'd him to Nantes. The Monk was found dead in Prison, the Devil, as was said, having broken his Neck the Night before that day wherein they were to pronounce his Sentence.

This was what the King desired, that so the Proof of the Crime might perish with the Poysoner; and it was more easie now for the Breton to avoid the heavy strokes of his power by the ordinary craft of his Landays. He granted him a Truce the 10th of September, and remained still in Poitou, till it was converted into a final peace. Which was brought about by the Mediation of Odet-Daydie, whom he allured to his Service by great rewards.

He knew better then any Prince in the World how to gain Men, discover his Enemies secrets, distract them with jealousies, divide the most united: but in his mirth he could not hide his secrets, every thing came to light, and he was likewise more subject to commit faults, then able to repair them; which he strove to do by Methods, more frequently bad then good.

In the beginning of Winter the Burgundian accepted a Truce. In the Month of February the Duke of Alençon who had a troubled and unquiet mind, for having contrived I know not what League with him, was made Prisoner and conveyed to the Castle of Loches, and from thence to the Lowre. The following year the Parliament by a Sentence of the 18th of July, Condemned him to loose his Head. The King his Godson gave him his Life, and Seventeen Months after took him out of Prison, and put him into a Citizens House at Paris under a good Guard, where he soon Died.

John V. Count of Armagnac who had been once more driven from his Country after the Death of Monsieur, had again Siezed upon his City of Leytoure, by certain correspondence, and had there surprised Peter de Bourbon Beauneu, Governor of Guyenne. He was straightly besieged in that place, by the Kings Army commanded by the Cardinal of Arras. 'Tis said, that having capitulated with him, that good Prelate broke his Faith; so that the City was invaded during the Suspension, and the Count miserably Murth'ed in his House. His Brother Charles was brought Prisoner to Paris.

During the Truce the Burgundian went to conquer the Dutchy of Guelthers. Duke Arnold had either sold or given it to him, dismembering his wicked Son Adolph, who had a long time held his Father Prisoner, and was himself so now by the Burgundian at Ghent.

This new Acquisition gave him the Appetite to encrease on the German side: He flatter'd the Emperor Frederick with the marriage of his Daughter to his Son Maximilian, and was even willing she should give him her promise and a Diamond. With this Lure he brings Frederick to Mets, thinking by his Authority to make himself Lord of that Town (which did not Succeed) and got his promise, that he would raise his Dukedom to a Kingdom. With these hopes he went awhile after to him at Treves, carrying along the Regal Ornaments, and made him a Feast with more then Royal Profusion: But the Emperor meant the Marriage should be first accomplished, and the Duke would sign the Contract in Quality of King. They could not agree thereon; And the Emperor left him there without taking his leave.

The King let him run after his fancies, and endeavoured then to recover Perpignan, whercof John King of Arragon was repossessed by Intelligence, it was only the Town, for the Castle held out still for the French: Their Army went thither after the taking of Leytoure. King John besieged in the City though Aged above Seventy years, defended himself bravely for two Months together, till his Son Ferdinand came to his assistance and relieved him.

ceded to the Dutchy of Lorrain after the Death of his Father, Died of the Plague at Nancy. Thus his Cousin Rene of Lorrain, Son of his Aunt Yoland d' Anjou, and de Ferry, who was Son of Antony Count of Vaudemont, restored the Dukedom to their House whence it came.

For about four or five years past, the Constable play'd double betwixt the King and the Burgundian, and incited them the one against the other. He thought their broils was his only safety: but both offended with his duplicity, agreed his ruin at the price of his head and his plunder, if they could but catch him. He had some hint of it, and broke the project by the many reasons he gave the King in writing. But after he had obtained his pardon, he again offended him more grievously then ever: For he Seized on the City of St. Quentin, and which was worse had the impudence to confer with him well Armed upon a Bridge, with a Barrier betwixt them as he had been his equal.

1474: The Burgundians ambition was insatiable. He had invited Edward of the House of York to make a descent in France, where the Burgundian promised to do as much by his correspondence as they with their Forces: and nevertheless instead of waiting for them, he went and ruined his Army before the Town of Nuz, building great designs upon the taking of this place which lies on the Rhine. The apparent reason why he laid that Siege, was to re-settle Robert de Baniere in the Arch-Bishoprick of Cologne, whose Channons had refused to admit him, and for their Chief had taken one of their Colleagues, to wit Herman Brother of the Landgrave of Hesse.

1474. As King Rene was good, liberal and devout, so was he inconstant and variable, of Courage tame and weak. His Sons and Grand-sons being all dead, there remained only his Daughter Yoland mother of Rene Duke of Lorrain: but that House was at distance from him, and such as were near, made him believe that having received so many troubles from her, he ought not to love her, and inclined him according to their interests, to give his Succession one while to the King of France, another while to Charles Count du Maine his Nephew, Son of his Brother of the same name, another time to the Duke of Burgundy. And this is the reason of so many several Wills and divers Donations made by him on that Subject.

It is believed that he caused one to be written in Letters of Gold and Adorned with Miniature, whereby he made the King his Heir to the County of Provence. It is certain that this year 1474. he instituted Charles du Maine in all his Lands, reserving only the Dutchy of Barr, which he left to his Daughters Son Duke Rene. Now the following year when he saw the King had Seized his City of Angers and the Castle of Barr, for the Portion, said he, of Mary d' Anjou his Mother, he changed his mind, or pretended so, and to make him afraid, said he would bestow it upon the Duke of Burgundy: but the King being purposely advanced as far as Lyons, hindred him, and thereupon hapned the defeat of that Duke, as you shall see.

Whilst he was battering his Head against that potent Body of Germany which is all of Iron, the King accumulated Enemies on that part against him, especially the Swisse, whose alliance he had gained with the Cities of Basle, and Strasburgh, and others on the Rhine; Sigismund Duke of Austria, Rene Duke of Lorrain, and even the Emperor Frederic. Sigismund with the aid of the Swisse, re-enters the County of Ferrete, and caused Hagenbac's head to be cut off for the Concussions he had used. Rene Duke of Lorrain sent to declare War against him even before Nuz, by a Moorish Servant who belonged to the Lord de Craon; and Frederick Armed all the power of the Empire to force him to raise the Siege. Nevertheless durst he not attack him, though he were four times more in number. The Bishop of Munster alone had brought thither 1200 Horse and 60000 Foot, all clothed in Green, with 1200 Waggons.

1475. The Truce betwixt the King and the Duke being expired, the King goes into the Field, and snatched from him Roye, Montdidier and Corbie: but neither this multitude of Enemies, nor the Winter long and sharp, nor the loss of his Towns, could not make his stubbornness Flexible, which held him still to that Siege for ten Months from its beginning.

In the Month of June Edward King of England caused his Army to Land at Calais which took up three Weeks time. Whilst he was putting them ashore, he sent two or three dispatches to him, prayed him, and pressed him to come and joyn with him, the Duke making now one delay, and then another. The Mediation of the Apostolick Apostolick Legat, and of the King of Denmark, who was in a City near at hand, was a plausible pretence for him to withdraw from that dangerous enterprize with Honour, but he obstinately refused it. In the end when he saw it was too long a business, though he was within ten days of taking the City by Famine, he consented it should be put into the hands of the Legat.

That done he comes post to find the English at Calais, leaving his Forces in Barrois, so shatter'd that he durst not let them be seen. He conducted the King all along the way to Peronne, and from thence went to see the Constable at St. Quentin, who gave him his word he would deliver that City and all his other places up to the English; the Duke assured them of it: But when they would have approached, he caused them to Fire upon them. It is hard to express, whether was then greatest, their amazement or their rage; the Duke having spent a great many words to Interpret this in the best Sence, returned to Barrois to recruit his Forces.

Edward was a Voluptuous Prince, very Fat and naturally slow, who fought only to cram his Purse, and who having undertaken this War, rather to screw money from his Subjects, then to acquire Dominion or Honour, had brought over with him some of the Fattest London Citizens such as loved their ease mightily, that so their weariness and toyl might make them sooner willing to desire a Peace. It hapned therefore, that during the Burgundians absence, the King by force of intrigues, of flattery, and withal some Presents, whereof the English are very greedy, persuaded that Prince, and his Council, to hearken to an accommodation.

The procedure of the Burgundian, who had made them expect too long, and which was worse the double perfidious dealing of the Constable, and the approaching Winter, they having no one place to shelter themselves in, gave them a plausible pretence to do so.

In few days the Deputies for the two Kings agreed upon conditions; It was a Merchandized Truce for nine years, the Burgundian, and the Breton to be comprized, if they would; 73000 Crowns of Gold ready Money for the English, and the Marriage of his Daughter with the Dauphin; for whose maintenance King Lewis would allot the Revenue of Guyenne for nine years, or 50000 Crowns a year, which should be carried to the Tower of London to the King of England.

When the Duke had notice of what was treating, he came in great haste, he being the Sixteenth of his Company, to find Edward. He spake loud, he thundered, and braved him: But neither his fury, nor his reproaches having done good, he turned short home again. The Truce agreed, whilst the Kings were to sign the Treaty, the King of England came with his Army to lodge within half a League of Amiens. The King sent him 300 Waggons laden with the best Wines, and gave order they should permit as many English as desired to come into Amiens, and that nothing should be spared to make them welcome; Which lasted three or four days.

It was afterwards resolved the two Kings should have an interview on a Bridge which was erected at Pequigny upon the Somme, with a Barriere grated betwixt them. And there they ratified the Peace the 29th of August. That done, the King of England with all the Lords of his Retinue repass'd the Sea, very well satisfied with the good Wines, and the fine French Gold, there having been 16000 Crowns distributed in Pensions amongst such as had most Credit with their King.

The Burgundian shewed himself a little refractory till in the Month of October he accepted of a Truce. In the mean time his Choler discharged it self upon the young Rene Duke of Lorrain whom he stripp'd of his Dukedom, all but Nancy, which defended it self above two Months.

Then the Constable who thought to have plaid upon all the three Princes, promising to each of them his Town of St. Quentin, found himself exposed as the Butt for all three to shoot at; and unhappily for him, his Wife, who was Sister to the Queen hapned to Die. This Lord so powerful, who wanted neither for Servants, nor Money, nor strong Holds, wanted both Courage and Brain all of a sudden; and fearing all the World, durst not Trust any one. In fine, he retired into the Burgundians Country, whom he guessed the most exorable, and who in effect gave him security to go thither.

He was no sooner gone out of St. Quentin but the King Seized it, and gave notice of it to the Burgundian, Summoning him to deliver up that Infidel in Exchange of that place, conformably to an Article of the Truce between them. The Burgundian was then before Nancy, which was necessary for him to keep Lorraine in awe, and to joyn the Low-Country to the Dutchy and County of Burgundy. For fear therefore, lest the King should disturb him in that Conquest, he caused the Constable to be Seized at Mons, whence he was transferr'd to Peronne, and ordered his People to deliver him, but not till a certain day remote enough, in which time he believed he should take Nancy, and then promised himself by that space he might revoke his order. But the place defended it self so well that he could not master it within the said time, and nevertheless his people delivered up, the Constable with his Letters, sealed Writings, and other pieces to convict him.

1475. They gave him not leasure to bethink himself, he was led to the Bastille, the 2d of December, examined by some Commissary's, condemned to Death by the Parliament, and Executed in the Greve the 19th of the same Month.
